So much for record of performance that largely or finely touched the music in hand. Yet that music, even when it was as familiar as Berlioz's overture, kept intrinsic interest as well. Professionally "thoughtful people"—a priggish and pestilent b——do not set much store by Enesco's sounding symphony. They say, with reason, that the music lacks large and firmly knit substance; that it neither scales heights nor plumbs depths of reflection or emotion; that it is prone to substitute power for passion; that it less advances, intensifies, cumulates musical thought, fancy and design than threshes about from key to key, rhythm to rhythm, color to color, mood to mood. It is not necessary to deny these reproaches, which in the main seem sound, in order to enjoy what Enesco makes and accomplishes. Before this symphony, indeed, better is it for the listener to be regenerate and pleasured than pedantic and free.

Agreed that there are measures in the first movement wherein Enesco seems to be groping for the next turn of the musical way; wherein his tonal fabric not only sags, but also falls apart. None the less, it is easily possible to enjoy the rhythmic verve, the sonorous voice, the rich color, the restless progress of the music. As often in Enesco composing, native wildness is in it, a pulse of race not so long frankly barbaric—the inspiriting, the [illegible] quality that, for the life of them, neither the reflective Brahms nor the imaginative Debussy—for convenient examples—could summon. There is likely to be too little of it in music of a twentieth century—unless, like Enesco's, written to a background of Roumanian hills, or, like Sibelius's in an endless [illegible] of Finnish forest.

Recall—since it first seizes the ear and then lingers in the memory—the [illegible] the horns, pervading, indeed [illegible] Enesco's slow division. The [illegible] the tang of that Balkan Europe [illegible] welter of races still wild at heart [illegible] imagination, clearly savors it. [illegible] drenches it, a melancholy that [illegible] ens into intense longing, as the [illegible] home-sickness in the world [illegible] within it—the malady of the [illegible] as their music and poetry show, that most besets these races, [illegible] less and cribbed. It can still [illegible] co's spirit, though his body [illegible] Paris, and intensify this slow [illegible] sombre fires. Enesco lavishes upon [illegible] and instrumental color [illegible] They deepen atmosphere and [illegible] Of a piece with the rhapsodic [illegible]

...s and the piece in his "Epic ... mediæval in suggestion, utilizing ...urgical music of his country. Kal[illegible]nnikov, an older Russian composer, who has occasionally figured upon programmes in America, has also provided a symphony new to Bostonian ears. To Stravinsky Mr. Monteux, after their long collaboration with Mr. Diaghilev's ballet, instinctively turns. From "Petrushka"—the mimodrama of puppets at a Russian fair, seen and heard of old in Boston—the composer once drew a suite for the concert-hall. The conductor believes he can reproduce it. And the music of Rimsky-Korsakov is by no means exhausted. Upon Mr. Monteux's music-rack is the overture to his opera, "A Night in May;" accessible in New York is the suite chosen and sewn together from another opera, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan" in the composer's rich vein of fantastic legend. Near neighbor to these Russians, as the land, though hardly the spirit, goes, is the Finn, Sibelius none of whose music has lately been heard at the Symphony Concerts, persistently as Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck gave it vogue. Both overlooked h's third symphony. Mr. Monteux will undertake it. The clanging and familiar first also tempts the conductor.

And the Americans to whom Mr. Monteux has long lent a receptive ear? Two of their pieces for which he waits have already been specified—Mr. Carpenter's ballet-suite and Mr. Hill's tone-poem. Add to these, if a performance can be arranged, Mr. Arthur Shepherd's concerto for piano and orchestra, a much-praised music among his fellow composers; a revival of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and of Mr. Carpenter's gay feat of ingenuity and humor, "Adventures in A Perambulator"; certain extremely modern "sketches"—no more than six minutes long—by an obscure New Yorker, discovered by Mr. Monteux; and a deserved repetition of the late Mr. Griffes's "Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," and the more imaginative American voices will not go unheard at Symphony Hall through the winter.

To complete the circle the Germans. From them the classics—Bach and Mozart as already recited; Beethoven in at least two symphonies and sundry miscellaneous pieces; the symphony of Schubert aforesaid, another from Schumann; the fourth symphony of Brahms; the usual modicum of Wagner in the concert-room. Finally, hope of Strauss in the finer-fibred tone-poems. Mr. Monteux does not lack admiration or zest for them. Like the rest of us, he is curious to discover how lapse of years and change of taste have affected impression from them and pleasure in them. He is well aware that other conductors purpose to bring them back to American concert-halls. From their fortunes and from the public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston he awaits a cue. As a cosmopolitan musician, he is valiant for Strauss; as a Franco-American conductor, he would also be discreet.

H. T. PARKER

TRAN. Oct. 15

BAUER SHOWS RARE SKILL AT THE PIANO

Soloist at the Symphony in a Brahms Concerto

Harold Bauer's skillful management of the piano part in Brahams' D minor concerto was the most interesting feature of yesterday's Symphony concert. Probably some of the audience thought during the performance of the fact that this concerto is the one Bauer chose for his American debut, at a Symphony concert Dec 1, 1900. It is obviously a favorite with him, since he also played it here in 1914.

Yet it is scarcely a masterpiece, and has never been popular wth performers or audience. It is an early work, distinctly mediocre in thematic material, and labored in development, though there are moments which foretell the glories of the symphonies. Mr Bauer, perhaps, looks at the music from a pianistic rather than a musical standpoint. He certainly makes the most of the many opportunities afforded him to prove his technical skill, and his understanding of the style of Brahams.

Enesco, whose Symphony in E flat filled most of the rest of the afternoon, once said that his music was derived from both Wagner and Brahms. Although it is certainly true that his orchestration and some of his rhythmic devices are akin to Brahms, and even more obvious that his melodies have been influenced by Wagner, his music seems closer to Tschaikowsky than to anything else.

He is not guilty of the glaring lapses of taste to which the Russian was subject. Neither has his work the sheer emotional power that to many critics redeems the vulgarities of the "Pathetic Symphony." Enesco, in short, has everything needed by a symphonist except genius.

Mr Monteux, after dealing conscientiously with Brahms and Enesco, evidently found satisfaction in the rather tawdry brilliance of Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The superb orchestration helps the effectiveness of performance in such music, but the conductor ably seconded the composer's intention, and made the piece seem more alive than it really is.

The trouble with all three numbers is that no one of them contains a profoundly beatiful melody, or a genuinely powerful motive for development. Not by endless taking thought can a composer secure these things. Yet no amount of skill in orchestration or genius for harmonic invention can compensate for their absence in orchestral or in any other music.

Next week the orchestra will play Sibelius's First Symphony; Skriabin' "Poem of Ecstasy"; and a "Divertissment" by Ropartz, (first time in America). There is to be no soloist.

GLOBE Oct. 16

BAUER ASSISTS AT SYMPHONY

Masterly Performance Is Given by Pianist at Afternoon Concert

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK ANNOUNCED

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Harold Bauer, pianist, assisted. The program was as follows: Enesco, Symphony in E-flat major; Brahms, Pianoforte Concerto No. 1; Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

This concert, although it evidently gave the great audience pleasure, does not call for laborious comment. The three compositions were more or less familiar, yet it is doubtful whether the first movement of the Roumanian-Parisian symphony would be fully grasped after several performances: it is so complex in the working of inner voices; nor are the motives with the possible exception of the chief theme, of such a salient character that they compel admiration. The second movement is beautiful in its melancholy mood, its gravity that is not austere, its emotional depth. The Finale is spirited and without any too deliberate endeavor on the part of the composer will inevitably provoke hearty applause, when it is played as spiritedly as it was played yesterday. Enesco, a singularly accomplished musician; a violinist and a pianist; as a composer has his own idiom, although he has said that the influence of Wagner and Brahms is shown in his works. This idiom is not easily grasped, any more than the idiom of Delius, or of the Scriabin of the later years.

Mr. Bauer's devotion to the first piano concerto of Brahm's is equalled only by that shown in the Micawber family on a certain memorable occasion. No, Mr. Bauer will not forsake this concerto of Johannes. He played it here 20 years ago, when he first appeared as a pianist in this country. He played it again in 1914. And he has written about it and his fondness for the granitic work. It is true that he plays it uncommonly well; one might say, better than it deserves, for it is far inferior to the second concerto, and for the most part is intolerably long drawn out and dull. The masterly performance only brought out the inherent dryness and forbidding nature of too many pages. Only in the Adazio is there a poetic breath.

A brilliant performance of Berlioz's overture, now nearly 100 years old, brought the concert to a close. How fresh it sounds today! More modern than many orchestral works composed during the last 20 years.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week is as follows: Siblius, Symphony in E Minor No. 1: Guy Ropartz, Divertissement (first time in America); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ectasy."

The management announces that in future late-comers will be admitted during the performance of a symphony only after the first movement. The doors will be closed during the pauses between the other movements.

HERALD Oct. 16

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux has arranged an interesting program for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. A notable revival will be the First Symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, long popular at these concerts.

The novelty of the program will be a divertiissement for orchestra by Guy Ropartz, the talented pupil of Cesar Franck, which will on this occasion have its first performance in America.

The final number will be the revolutionary "Poem of Ecstasy," by the Russian, Scriabin, and which is said to express the joy of untrammeled activity.

AMER. Oct. 16.

BAUER'S ART AMAZES AT SYMPHONY

Master Pianist Plays Brahms' D Minor Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The D minor concerto of Brahms is the most Scandinavian music that can be imagined. Music of northern nature and northern gods, who might thus contend on the mountain tops. This work was given a remaarkable performance by Harold Bauer as pianist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The other compositions on the programme were Enesco's symphony in E-flat, an early work, of a noisy character, and Berlioz' overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini."

RUGGED AND BEAUTIFUL

It is no wonder that the audience applauded and repeatedly recalled Mr. Bauer. He has played this concerto, which is too rarely heard, before with the Boston Symphony. Doubtless his conception of the music continues to broaden and deepen with the years. Certainly this is one of the compositions which have no limit of wonder for the listener. It seems with every hearing—at least at the hands of this pianist—that the music is more rugged, dramatic and grandly beautiful.

As one of the few examples of really great and enduring art, this concerto has at once the boundless energy and the underlying vast repose of nature. Especially, be it noted again, northern nature. The first theme, stark, heroic, Scandinavian, leaps out of the orchestra with much of the shattering force, the blinding energy of the lightning flash. Theme clashes against theme. The orchestra is full of gray and storm. Yet there are other episodes entirely congruous with the composer's idea, of the most lofty and poetc beauty, as sudden marvellous vistas might be seen between the lifting of clouds or the lines of cragged peaks.

Has Right to Play It

A frightful task for a pianist! And one of the distinctions of Mr. Bauer's performance is that it never sounds that way! Strength, virtuosity, tonal loveliness go hand in hand. His sense of instrumental ensemble and his profound knowledge of his score make him one of the very few who have the right to interpret this music. Nor should Mr. Monteux's superb conducting go unmentioned. Two admirable musicians collaborated with memorable results. Thank heaven that the concerto is so hard to play, that it looks so ungrateful to the pianist anxious to make a quick, superficial success. He will leave it alone, as he should. Where this music is concerned only great artists should apply.

Enesco's Work Noisy

Enesco, the Rumanian, was 25 when he composed his symphony. To those who have ever tried to write any music for orchestra this accomplishment on the part of a young man of 25 speaks for itself. It is enormously difficult to write any symphony at all. Having said this, it is fair to add that the symphony is not particularly worth hearing. It has by no means the individuality of mood and idiom that the suite, op. 9, possesses. It is thickly, brassily orchestrated in the first and last movements, showing unmistakably the influence of Brahms, whom we greatly prefer in his undiluted state, with an occasional admixture of a modern French ninth or a bouquet of augmented chords. Most of the instruments are going all the time. There is so much counter-point, so muddily arranged, that half the time you are scratching your ear trying to find out which melody is the principal one in the tonal mass. The form of first and last movements is deadly orthodox.

The movement which remains in the memory is the second, in which, after some dark chords sprung from the underground caves of the Nibelungen, some music that is legendary and melancholy is heard—music which offers more than a foretaste of the later Enesco, a man who, when he speaks his own musical language in his own way, arrests the attention of the writer and communicates certain artistic impressions which are not communicated by any other modern composer.

POST

BAUER SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

Yesterday afternoon marked the second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conducting.

Mr. Harold Bauer, the soloist, played Brahms Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1, in D minor. This is the third time Mr. Bauer has performed his composition with Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time was in 1900, again in 1914 and yesterday afternoon. Mr. Bauer played with much brilliance and assurance. His interpretation of the second movement, "Adagio" (which in form is an ornamentation of a single theme) was tender tho' temperate. He asserted his brilliance of technique and style in the last, a rondo form, "Allegro non Troppo." The large audience rendered enthusiastic and appreciative applause.

The first number on the program was an E flat major symphony by Georges Enesco. Boston has heard this splendid work before. As performed by the orchestra yesterday its magnificance was apparent. The first movement climbs height after height until at length the climax is reached with full orchestral strength. The second movement "a Lament" on three notes is full of beauty. Its ending is appealing. The last movement is all that the tempo mark expresses "Vif et Vigoreux."

Berlioz, overture "Benvenuto Cellini" was the last number on the program. Its performance merited the warm applause which it received.

The concert next week will include Sibelius's E minor Symphony No. 1,and "Le Paeme de L'Extase" by Ccriabin.

TRAN. Oct. 16.

Sibelius and Skriabin on Mr. Monteux's Next Programme—Mme. Galli-Curci in Routine—Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Kubelik and Mme. Homer at Hand — The London String Quartet at Harvard

TWO composers neglected at the Symphony Concerts since the departure of Dr. Muck will return to them on Mr. Monteux's programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Sibelius, the Finn, and Skriabin, the Russian. Sibelius will speak through the large clangors, the deep voiced eloquence, the seething progress of his symphony in E-minor, first of the series. Skriabin, in turn, will be heard in his one symphonic piece that has found way into the repertory of the Boston Orchestra——"The Poem of Ecstasy," charged and surcharged with a singular and poetizing rhapsody and rich in purely musical suggestion. Both pieces, moreover, should kindle Mr. Monteux's best powers. The third item on the conductor's programme is novel, a "Divertissement,"—no doubt a variation of an eighteenth-century "Divertimento"—by Ropartz, French composer of the elder generation too little known in America. In order the programme stands:

Symphony in E minor, No. 1..........Sibeliu
Divertissement ....Ropart
Poem of Ecstasy..........................Skriab

TRANS. Oct. 16.

Oct. 16

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM ENESCO, THROUGH BRAHMS TO BERLIOZ

Orchestra, Conductor and, in Particular, Mr. Bauer in the Vein — The Roumanian's Music of Native Wildness—The German's Cool Charm and Musing Voice in His First Piano-Concerto—The Parisian's Overture of the Opera House

MOST things worked together for good, and also for pleasure, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. The programme was relatively long, since it could hardly be otherwise with Brahms's piano-concerto in D minor upon it, and as further happened an uncommonly lengthy intermission. There must be contrasting pieces to this many-paged and generally exacting Concerto, if the audience is to be primed before it and soothed after it. Mr. Monteux chose Enesco's symphony in E-flat, unheard at Symphony Hall through five years, and a "standard" overture, Berlioz's to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini." Both invite the conductor's familiar abilities and accord with the present progress of his refilled orchestra. "To a resolute intellectual scrutiny," as Mr. Shaw used to say, when he felt the oats of his own superiority, the symphony may not yield too much. Yet it "sounds"; the first and the last divisions move ardently, vigorously at moments tumultuously; while the slow section between is surcharged with a melancholy hungry for expression. Enesco can ply rhythm, lay on color, sharpen contrast, intensify mood. So also can Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with him. The composer likes to fling about sonorous, largely hewn masses of tone, to upbuild broad climaxes, to proceed in sharp transitions. So also does the conductor; while the band, as it now is, readily answers to both. Sombrely moves the slow division and all concerned readily sustain its quality. Of kin in time and degree is Berlioz's overture.

Displayful passages for single instruments or groups of instruments recur, and our orchestra does not lack adept and alert virtuosi. The music moves impetuously, abruptly or else halts the while for orotund song. All is motion, color, sharp effect and broad impression. Mr. Monteux, in and out of the opera house, excels in such music and is bringing his orchestra to like excellence—the more quickly, the more easily, for the new concert-master's obvious zest for both. Already it is possible to discover Mr. Burgin's incisive bowing, broad phrasing, quick sense of rhythm and generally communicating energy stimulating the string choir.

Brahms's concerto is, of course, music of another voice. In the progress of it sensitive ears readily discovered the lack of middle tints in the orchestra's present shading, of middle force in its present gamut of power, of fine modulations, gradients, euphonies, of the golden glow that is halo upon orchestral tone and that even Brahms, once called the muddy in such things, often hears in imagination and forthwith summons. But these are the virtues of a band at summit of perfections and not in eager and loyal advance toward them. Let them come, as time and tide bring them. Besides, there were compensations. Mr. Monteux, being intelligent over every sort of music, abides by the precedent set by Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck with Brahms—the tradition—since it has now become such—of pre-voiced, mettlesome, keenly rhythmed and warmly colored performance. The four horn-players, moreover, had only to meet once more Brahms's imagination for their instruments with their own sensibility.

There was also Mr. Bauer—in his own particular dominion, so to say, when a piano-concerto of Brahms is to be played. Be it the first, as it was yesterday, or the second, as it was nearly five years ago, there is no pianist now traversing "these concerts" to match him in such music save only Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Bau has the perceiving mind and the reveal-ing hand. Thereby he opens the desig of Brahms, and the clearer when it i abstruse or intricate. Mr. Bauer has the divining mind and the communicating touch. Thereby he enters into Brahms's musical thought and poetizing moods and imparts them, feelingly to hearers. The pianist possesses the selective faculty and the discriminating finger. Therefore, he does not play the long concerto as though every measure in it were of equal worth and impression. He is unemphatic with tonal paragraphs that Brahms himself knew were only filling; he does not labor over measures that cannot and will not "sound." For this concerto in D minor dates from no more than the twenty-seventh year of the composer's young age.

Finally, Mr. Bauer is sensitive and se-cure master of the voice of the piano. He never forces it; he never turns mechanical; always, unless a composer absolutely defeats him, he keeps it musi-cal and individual. His touch can traverse all the gradation of tone; his imagination ranges over the whole palette of color. Neither exposition nor song, neither play of figures nor play of ornament, baffles him. Incandescent he seldom is; but the concerto of Brahms does not exact that quality; while always he is luminous. He knows out of himself the passion that quite as much of the mind as of the heart he can transmit and enhance it—and that is the passion of Brahms in the piano-concertos. With reason conductor, orchestra and audience rose to such a pianist, achieving no mean task.

So much for record of performance that largely or finely touched the music in hand. Yet that music, even when it was as familiar as Berlioz's overture, kept intrinsic interest as well. Professionally "thoughtful people"—a priggish and pestilent breed—do not set much store by Enesco's sounding symphony. They say, with reason, that the music lacks large and firmly knit substance; that it neither scales heights nor plumbs depths of reflection and emotion; that it is prone to substitute power for passion; that it less advances, intensifies, cumulates musical thought, feeling and design than threshes about from key to key, rhythm to rhythm, color to color, mood to mood. It is not necessary to deny these reproaches, which in the main seem valid, in order to enjoy what Enesco manifestly accomplishes. Before this symphony, indeed, better is it for the listener to be regenerate and pleasured than pedantically free.

Agreed that there are measures in the first movement wherein Enesco seems to be groping for the next turn of the musical way; wherein his tonal fabric not only sags, but also falls apart. None the less, it is easily possible to enjoy the rich verve, the sonorous voice, the [illegible] the restless progress of the music [illegible] often in Enesco composing, native [illegible] is in it, a pulse of race not so long [illegible] frankly barbaric—the inspiriting, the [illegible] lading quality that, for the life of [illegible] neither the reflective Brahms nor [illegible] imaginative Debussy—for conventional examples—could summon. There is [illegible] to be too little of it in music of [illegible] tieth century—unless, like Enesco's, written to a background of [illegible] hills, or, like Sibelius's in an [illegible] of Finnish forest.

Recall—since it first seizes the [illegible] then lingers in the memory—the [illegible] the horns, pervading, indeed [illegible] Enesco's slow division. The [illegible] the tang of that Balkan Europe [illegible] welter of races still wild at heart [illegible] imagination, clearly savors it. [illegible] drenches it, a melancholy that [illegible] ens into intense longing, as the [illegible] home-sickness in the world [illegible] within it—the malady of the [illegible] as their music and poetry [illegible] that most besets these races, [illegible] less and cribbed. It can still [illegible] co's spirit, though his body [illegible] Paris, and intensify this [illegible] sombre fires. Enesco lavishes [illegible] and instrumental color upon [illegible] They deepen atmosphere and [illegible] Of a piece with the rest [illegible] phony is the rhapsodic [illegible]

e admirably
h memorable hat the conthat it looks so nist anxious to al success. He should. Where ed only great k Noisy

n, was 25 when phony. To those write any music complishment on nan of 25 speaks
ously difficult to at all. Having to add that the rticularly worth o means the ind idiom that the
e. It is thickly, in the first and ing unmistakably ahms, whom we undiluted state, admixture of a or a bouquet of ost of the instru-e time. There is t, so muddily arne time you are trying to find out principal one in form of first and dly orthodox.
ch remains in the d, in which, after sprung from the f the Nibelungen, egendary and mel-usic which offers ste of the later
, when he speaks
guage in his own ntion of the writer ertain artistic im-not communicated composer.

---

rilowitsch. Mr. Bauer mind and the reveal-he opens the design clearer when it is
Mr. Bauer has the the communicating e enters into Brahms's nd poetizing moods and ingly to hearers. The he selective faculty and finger. Therefore, he long concerto as though it were of equal worth
He is unemphatic with that Brahms himself
lling; he does not labor at cannot and will no s concerto in D minor more than the twenty he composer's young age uer is sensitive and se the voice of the piano it; he never turns it unless a composer him, he keeps it musi-His touch can traverse of tone; his imagination whole palette of color r nor song, neither play play of ornament, baffles nt he seldom is; but this does not exact that ways he is luminous. He mself the passion that is the mind as of the heart nd enhance it—and this Brahms in the piano season conductor, orches-ose to such a pianist, so task.

ord of performance that uched the music in hand ven when it was as fa overture, kept intrins Professionally "thought ggish and pestilent blood store by Enesco's re
y. They say, with rea lacks large and firmly hat it neither scales depths ~~of~~ reflection and prone to substitute pow-it less advances, intenusical thought, feeling eshes about from key to thm, color to color, mood necessary to deny those n the main seem sound what Enesco manifestly ore this symphony, in r the listener to be un sured than pedantic an e are measures in th herein Enesco seems next turn of the mus his tonal fabric not on s apart. None the less, to enjoy the rhythm us voice, the rich colo

gress of the music ompos ng, native wildn of race not so long
—the inspiriting, the hat, for the life of h ective Brahms nor ussy—for convenient ummon. There is bo
f it in music of a tw less, like Enesco's, i ackground of Rouman elius's in an environm

first seizes the ear he memory—the mot ding, indeed maintain vision. The exotic Balkan Europe that till wild at heart an ly savors it. Melan ancholy that soon onging, as though the world bur lady of the imagin nd poetry seems to hese races, at once
It can still seize his body be remo ify this slow song nesco lavishes ha y color upon the sphere and illus
the rest of

---

most part, a Czech, a Roumanian, a Hungarian, writing music of large design and dimension, must rhapsodise or founder. Because Enesco is Enesco, he must set his strings whirring and racing, catch up and fling about motive and fragments of motivs from the rest of the music, recall those three notes of the sorrowing horns; then smother them in loud fanfares, and leap on, shout on, from sonority to sonority. There is, or there ought to be, a barbaric streak in each of us, under the veneers of civilization and cultivation, as in Enesco's music in this symphony, as in many another of his pieces, sets it throbbing.

And the foil to Enesco—to reverse the process suggested at the beginning of this review—is the Brahms of the concerto in D minor. Once more was Mr. Monteux astute, even imaginative, programme-maker. Brahms has his fervors no less than Enesco—in the entrance and proclamation, for example, of the second motiv in the "majestical" movement, in not a little of its progress through the music. Yet they are grave fervors, more reticent than Enesco's more concentrated, maybe running deeper. The voice of mourning rises out of Brahms's slow division, as the voice of melancholy outfolds from Enesco's. The Roumanian of our day is more poignant than the German of the middle years of the last century; but not for him is the gaining of the note of exaltation that stirs out of the music of Brahms, though he be no more than at the end of his twenties. Brahms laments by himself with an accent of nobility in his tones; Enesco, as an Irishman might say, "keens" so that all ears may hear. Enesco's finale rhapsodizes; Brahms's—because such a temperament as his cannot help it—takes thought even of lively spirits.

As with the matter, so with the manner of the two pieces—and with due allowance for the difference in end and task. Where Enesco must strike fire, Brahms is content with cool charm, as with many a purling passage for the piano or well-fused euphony between it and the orchestra. There are lovely details in this concerto when Mr. Bauer plays it. Enesco, when Mr. Monteux seconds his energies, prefers the broad or the sharp stroke. If Enesco, as at moments in his first division, is groping and inconsequential, Brahms can match him with arid spots even when he would be "majestical." Yet when Brahms at last flows and sometimes for long, how warm and deep, how serene and secure is the current of even this youthful, this obviously studied, music! Therein, though in young work and young years, is the sign of the master to ripen and endure. Enesco, in the symphony, set alight in many of us, a smouldering native wildness. Brahms brushed it away, stirring minds, at moments even sinking (and also singing) into hearts. There is heat in white fires as well as in red.

Foil again in Berlioz's overture. The opera that it preluded, "Benvenuto Cellini," has been seldom enough staged—nowhere for long, indeed, except under Mottl at Carlsruhe and Munich. But hardly are we hearers past the first rhetorical pause and into the rotund measures of the Cardinal than straightway we are in the theatre. Enesco's Roumanian wilds vanish far away is the meditative seclusion of Brahms. Holà for the rushes of the Roman folk—and their fitful moods—up and down the music. Holà for the fanciful tune of the mimes, of the brave, warm melody of Cellini taking thought of his mistress. Holà for Berlioz, splashing this way and that in all sorts of romantic excitements; yet somehow finding the exact timbre, rhythm, modulation, color, to speed everything home to us listeners. Even "the mere opera-goer" much chastised, yet ever resilient figure, would rejoice in the songful tumult, the endless ardors of this overture, though the rest of "Benevenuto Cellini" might bore him off to the nearest "Palais de Danse." . . . Yes: there was good sport, if the phrase may be forgiven of Brahms, at the Symphony Concert yesterday.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. Oct. 16

Boston Symphony Programme

For the third pair of Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will revive the first symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer, which has been for a number of seasons in the past particularly popular with the patrons of the Symphony concerts.

The novelty of the programme will be the first performance in America of a divertissement for orchestra by Guy Ropartz, the celebrated pupil of Cesar Franck, who is considered one of the most talented of his generation. The "Poem of Ecstasy" by the Russian composer, Scriabin, who died in 1915, will close the programme. This bold and brilliant score, which is said to express "the joy of untrammeled activity," was played at the Symphony concerts in 1917.

POST. Oct. 17.

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will revive the First Symphony of Sibelius. The novelty on the program will be a divertissement for orchestra by Guy Ropartz. The "Poem of Ecstasy," by Scriabin, will close the program.

ADVERTISER Oct 17

BAUER PLEASES AT SYMPHONY

Gives Engrossing Performance of Brahams' Concerto; Enesco's Work Well Played

Harold Bauer was the soloist at the second program this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. He played Brahms' piano concerto No. 1, in D minor; and the concert included also Enesco's Symphony in E-flat major and the Overture to Benvenuto Cellini by Berlioz.

In many ways a brilliant, though not a spectacular program, brilliantly performed. Mr. Bauer's technic and artistry are by this time like the rock of Gibraltar; there they stand, and one can only contemplate them with wonder, love and praise.

If anyone could make the Brahms concerto engrossing, he is the man. Most of the time, he did; but the work has many passages that make one recall Lesbia's speech in Shaw's "Getting Married:"

"Excuse me for interrupting you, Boxer, but your sentiments are always so correct that I know exactly what you are going to say."

The pianist was recalled with a degree of enthusiasm that made one wonder why Boston audiences are called "cold."

The program for next week is: Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor; the first performance of a Divertissement for Orchestra by Ropartz; and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase."

AMER. Oct. 16.

BAUER PLAYS AT SYMPHONY

Pianist Triumphs at His Twentieth Anniversary Concerts Here

By E. F. HARKINS

Harold Bauer's appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, was of an anniversary character and for this reason well worth special attention.

It was twenty years ago, lacking a few weeks, that this poetic pianist, of mixed German-English blood, like the British royal family, made his American debut as Symphony soloist, playing the Brahms Concerto in D minor, which had never before been played here. He chose the same work for these twentieth anniversary performances, displaying in its full maturity an artistic temperament that long since recommended him for a place among the foremost virtuosi of the century.

In these two decades Mr. Bauer has considerably increased his fame and has won a staunch following in Boston both as soloist and ensemble player. There was ample evidence of this admiration in the cordial greeting given him Friday afternoon and in the hearty applause that rewarded his performance.

But the concerto has gained no impressiveness since 1900, although Brahms as a whole is not the "caviare to the general" that he was then. The work is acceptable only when, as at these Symphony concerts, it reflects the brilliancy of pianist and orchestra. It is not a favorite with pianists, but to Mr. Bauer it is both a happy medium for a flawless technique and a problem in metaphysics.

On the other hand, the Enesco Symphony in E-flat major, played for the first time in five years, improves with age. The first movement remains vague, but the "splendor of color and ornament" noted in the slow movement by one of the Enesco guides was vividly apparent in Mr. Monteux' interpretation. So were the Wagnerian influences which the composer has acknowledged. The lively third part, equally colorful and ornamental, is more suggestive of the composer's native Rumania than any other part. The Symphony made a very favorable impression, thanks to a spirited performance that proved the renewed power of the orchestra.

Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture was also played.

ADVERTISER Oct. 17.

Boston as a Musical Center People in New York have long been saying that Boston is off the map musically. Recently Bostonians themselves have been inclined to admit in private and sometimes even publicly that there is truth in the accusation. But is there? It is a subject on which everyone has a right to his own opinion, of course, yet we are inclined on the whole to disagree with the pessimists.

We disagree emphatically, in the first place, with those who insist that the Symphony Orchestra has gone or is going to the dogs. On the contrary it is well on the way to regaining the superlative excellence of the days before the United States entered the war and caused incidentally some regrettable upsets in the orchestra.

Dr Muck, whatever his non-musical delinquencies were, is one of the three or four finest living conductors of symphonic and operatic music. Mr Rabaud, despite his many merits and his personal integrity, was not Muck's equal as a conductor. The same holds true of Mr Monteux. It is commonly overlooked, however, by detractors of the orchestra, that with the single possible exception of Nikisch's short term many years ago, we have never had conductors of superlative excellence for the Symphony.

Monteux and Rabaud compare very favorably with Fiedler and Paur, by all accounts. Gericke, too, except as a disciplinarian, was inferior to Muck. The moral is obviously that one can make a wonderful orchestra without a great genius to wield the conductor's baton. The present membership of the orchestra averages well, how well we are not yet certain in detail. The present leader, Mr Monteux, is a fine musician, and a skilled and gifted conductor. We have every reason to hope and not croak as far as the Symphony is concerned.

It is true that we have no resident opera company, but did we have one in the "good old days?" It is perhaps true also that our old established choral organizations have each and all seen better days. Any long established chorus would be better for that drastic elimination of dead wood which its social character always hinders. Our local choral societies, too, are most of them in a rut as far as their repertories are concerned. We shall never evade these defects as long as we are without endowed choruses run on a professional basis like the Symphony, except under specially favorable circumstances.

There is indeed only one chorus in America which does evade them triumphantly at the present moment. That is the reorganized Harvard Glee Club, which is certain to clinch this season its position as the best choral organization in America. If we didn't dislike hints we might hint that we have inside information, not yet for publication on that subject. And although a university organization is never strictly local Boston is justified in regarding Harvard and all its works as more hers than anyone else's.

When it comes to chamber music and recitals of all sorts the quantity offered here is at least as great as it ever was, and the quality equal to the general average in New York. Almost every artist worth listening to who comes to this country appears here.

The excellent work of Mr Longy's Boston Musical Association, organized last season, permits us to hear adequate performances of much novel and interesting music outside the beaten track of concert givers.

We have many excellent teachers of all sorts of music both in and outside the New England Conservatory. We have innumerable private or semi-private concerts such as those at the Algonquin Club and the Boston Athletic Association. Yet all public concerts by artists of established high rank are well patronized. The standard of public taste, though it might often be higher in some respects, is not notably lower in Boston than in New York, or in Paris, for that matter.

Surely with all these points in her favor, Boston may still claim her place on the musical map, though we all hope that place may in time become more prominent.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Third program. Symphony No. 1, Sibelius; Divertissement, Ropartz (first performance in America); "Poem of Ecstasy," Skriabin. There is no soloist.

GLOBE Oct. 17.

WHY BAUER PLAYED BRAHMS' CONCERTO

Harold Bauer had sentimental reasons for playing Brahms' D Minor Pianoforte Concerto last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He made his American debut with the same orchestra and playing the same Concerto 20 years ago, Nov. 30, 1900.

"I was extremely anxious about my debut in America," he said, "for I had gathered a high opinion about the American public and about the Boston public in particular. Moreover, I came over with but a single engagement—to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and subsequent engagements would naturally depend upon the success of that. I did not choose a more brilliant concerto, not wishing to appear too ambitious for my years before my new public. I rejected the idea of playing a Beethoven concerto, because they had been played so often before. Accordingly, I hit upon Brahms, and anxiously wrote to Mr. Gericke, then conductor of the orchestra, asking his sage counsel. From Mr. Gericke came a polite 'Yes.' Arriving in Boston, I found that the music of Brahms stirred up bitter controversy in many quarters, but I was received warmly by the critics, and about subsequent engagements there was no trouble whatsoever."

HERALD Oct. 17.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

For the third pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux will revive the First Symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer, which has been for a number of seasons in the past particularly popular with the patrons. The novelty of the program will be the first performance in America of a Divertissement for orchestra by Guy Ropartz, a celebrated pupil of Cesar Franck. "The Poem of Ecstasy," by the Russian, Scriabin, will close the program, a bold and brilliant score, which is said to express "the joy of untrammelled activity."

HERALD Oct. 17.

TRIBUNE
ress New York City
OCT 17 1920

The Boston Orchesta will celebrate the fortieth year of its existence. M. Monteux will conduct the ten concerts as usual in Carnegie Hall. In place of the concertmaster who led the turmoil of last season, which only reacted on the heads of those who participated in it, there will be a newcomer in the person of Mr. Richard Burgin. Of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia, and part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the East to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For twelve years he served as concertmaster in the fine orchestras which the largest cities of these countries possess. His first teacher was Lotti and his most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, he studied four years. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came before his time; Seidel and Piastro came later, while Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, he toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society and the Stockholm Concert Society. New York is not entirely strange to him, for he crossed the ocean as a boy of twelve and played, to the marvel of many, at Carnegie Hall and in the now vanished Mendelssohn Hall. He has served as concertmaster under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch—likewise under Richard Strauss and Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania, and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm, which regularly toured from city to city, performing twelve recitals a season.

ULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.
OCT 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE FIVE PROVIDENCE CONCERTS

Strong Programmes Arranged for Infantry Hall Dates.

Five concerts will be given in Infantry Hall during the coming winter by the n Symphony Orchestra, which celees its 40th anniversary this winter, the schedule of concerts being more pretentious than ever before. The dates that have been selected for these concerts in Providence are all for Tuesday evenings, as follows: Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, and subscriptions will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1, at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange building. Pierre Monteux, who became director of the orchestra last year, will continue this season.

The five concerts in Providence will be made the more memorable by the appearance at each of a notable singer or virtuoso. The soprano will be Alice Neilsen, who since her triumphant seasons as prima donna of the now extinct Boston Opera Company, has made many notable appearances in concert. Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, is also in the list and his many appearances in opera, oratorio and recitals of his own, and also as soloist, are well remembered in the concert world. Felix Fox will be the only pianist.

Samuel Gardner, the young American violinist, who is known hereabouts, having lived many years in Providence, could not be more fittingly heard than as soloist with the great orchestra. The favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel, he has since won a foremost place among violinists by his many recitals and appearances with orchestras. Another violinist is Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently come from the eastern part of Europe.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.
OCT 24

M. Monteux's Program.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made an engrossing program for the opening concert of the season at the New National Theater, which will take place Tuesday afternoon, November 2.

The symphony to be played will be the eighth, the so-called "Little Symphony" of Beethoven, with which also Mr. Monteux opened the season in Boston. This masterpiece is especially remembered by the fantastic Larghetto, which is a burlesque of the metronome of Maelzel newly invented at the time of its composition.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

A New "House Rule" for the Symphony Concerts—Only One Opening of Doors for the Tardy—Mme. Galli-Curci Sings Familiar and Unfamiliar Pieces According to Expectation — Prospective and Abandoned Recitals

THE new season has brought a minor change in the routine of the Symphony Concerts that observant auditors are beginning to notice. Mr. Monteux, like most of his recent predecessors, usually puts the symphony of the day at the beginning of the programme. A week ago, at the end of the first movement of Beethoven's eighth symphony, the usual late-comers trooped to their places, but after the second and the third came none of these tardy stragglers. Again, on Friday and Saturday of last week, the usual concourse followed the first division of Enesco's symphony; but at the end of the second the conductor had no need to pause for the dilatory to seat themselves. Optimistic observers, seeing these things, believed they descried the dawn of the millenium in the concert-hall. At last there were no late-comers to enter after the second or the third section of the symphony in hand. But there were; probably, until human nature is made anew, there always will be; only they were held in durance behind doors opened at the close of the first movement, but thereafter shut tight until the end of the whole symphony.

So goes and so is politely enforced a new house-rule, as the word is in clubs, at the Symphony Concerts. Every conductor inwardly, and sometimes outwardly, has resented the long pauses that the tardy have compelled him to make between the movements of a symphony, placed at the beginning of the concert. Such halts threw him and the orchestra out of their stride. Hardly less they distracted an audience intent upon the music and often illuded by it. So to vex a hundred men seeking to do their best in performance, so to annoy 2500 listeners settled into the concert, because ten, twenty or thirty happened or chose to be late, did not appeal to the management's sense of fairness. Hence the new "house-rule" and, thus far, praiseworthy results from it. In consideration of those accidentally delayed, the doors are opened once; thereafter they remain closed until the symphony is done. So do the Symphony Concerts and the public thereof gradually progress toward that happy, but probably distant day, when there will be no pause between the movements of a symphony, beyond the instant or two necessary to the change of measure and mood—no pause even for applause. Then at last will the impression of music and performance be altogether unified and more sensitive auditors take uninterrupted and undisturbed pleasure in both. But we write of the ideal in a world that, in twice twenty centuries and in a great many things, can do no more than toddle toward it.

H. T. P.

TRAN. Oct. 18

Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An engrossing program has been made by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening concert of the season at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, November 3, for which seats will be placed on sale, beginning next Wednesday morning.

The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, in E minor, which, by virtue of its striking melodies and national character, has long been one of the most popular of his works with local audiences. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and, for a novelty, a new poem for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, based on "The Fall of the House of Usher," the poem of Edgar Allan Poe.

As the soloist of the evening Madame Helen Stanley, foremost among the lyric sopranos of the concert stage, with also a notable operatic career to her credit, will sing Mendelssohn's air, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onlegin."

[30]

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC AND THE DANCE

A NOTABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT IN PROSPECT

6.V.21

Restored Sibelius, Revived Skriabin and a Novel Piece by Ropartz—Pavlova and Removable Uncertainties — Sunday-Evening Concerts at the Copley-Plaza—Programmes at Hand—An Impressive Pianist Rises in New York — Incidents and Opinions

UNLESS performance belies anticipation—and so to fall short is not Mr. Monteux's way—the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday should be the most interesting, thus far, of the season. First and foremost they restore Sibelius to the active repertory of the orchestra. Under Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck his music flourished there; while, from year to year and with piece after piece, audiences heard it, interested, impressed, stirred. Thereafter, of a sudden, it vanished from Symphony Hall, outside occasional performance at The Pops of a single tone-poem, "Finlandia." There was no reason to "ban" Sibelius in the queer fashion of those amusing days of intolerance. He was not German by either birth or musical practice. Racially, nationally, he was Finn of the Finns, while, if ever there was an individualist among composers, it is he. Upon his own land and into his own heart, he has looked and then written—altogether in his own way. Probably Mr. Rabaud was merely ignorant of Sibelius, though the conductor's temperament was not one readily responsive to this music of the North. Mr. Monteux, of course, knew him; was disposed to bring him back; but perforce deferred the occasion until last summer gave him opportunity for study and choice. Betimes he has set the Finn's first symphony upon his programme for the current week; and, as after long silence, two audiences will hear anew this terse, sinewy, clanging, darksome music, like to none other that composer in our time has put to paper.

Sibelius begins the two concerts; while, for further good fortune, Skriabin ends them. The chosen piece is "The Poem of Ecstasy"—the one full score from the Russian in the library of Symphony Hall, though it is high time that the earlier "Divine Poem" and the culminating "Prometheus" should also find place there. Agreed that Skriabin is not all that some of his recent priests and prophets assert; that, under long sifting of the searching years, he may slip from his present pinnacle. Beyond peradventure, as man and as musician he had weaknesses, while in his music are the idiosyncrasies of a spirit perverted in measure by its own faiths and visions. Agreed also that in method, until he felt as secure in his own ways as he does in "Prometheus," he cultivated the orchestral procedures of the romantic Germans in general and of Wagner in particular. None the less, a clear flare of genius seems to illuminate Skriabin's symphonic music. It is intensely personal and introspective; it springs from a dreamer of dreams rapt in his own keen sensations; it heaps ardor upon ardor in a veritable passion, at moments almost hysterical, for full expression; if it is not always choice of means, it can be exceedingly poignant with them. Again a composer that deserves to be heard at the Symphony Concerts, whether the hearer is sympathetic or resentful. Once and again Mr. Monteux's German predecessors gave Skriabin an inning; now the cosmopolitan Frenchman is as kind.

The middle piece upon the programme is new to any and all ears, unless they chance to have heard it in France. It is a Divertissement by Guy Ropartz, and in French musical parlance (writes W. S. S.) the word may signify several things, including a short ballet and an entr'acte, in any case, something essentially diverting. Perhaps this particular Divertissement might serve as an entr'acte, though it seems a bit too scholarly for the purpose. Yet it is plainly a piece for entertainment rather than reflection. A single theme of the composer's own devising, though savoring strongly of the folk-music of his native Brittany, serves him for material. Throughout the piece it is modified in interval and rhythm, and subjected to all the devices of "development." And ever and anon it reassuringly appears in original form. A vigorous unison of the four horns proclaims the opening measures, then with a pronounced slackening of the tempo, divided strings—first the violins then 'cellos and violas—bring the theme to a strangely peaceful conclusion. The same device is repeated with different instrumentation and harmony, after which the English horn sings a lyrical motiv derived from the initial phrase, but so changed that the eye rather than the ear recognizes it. No special analysis of the rest of the piece is needed, as the composer's purposes are plain. The harmonic idiom is conservatively modern, varied and stimulating, but never troubling. The orchestration is skillful; for what else would one expect from a modern Frenchman? There is a quiet and beautiful close, and at the last a clarinet breathes a B natural over the tonic chord of C major—an ending which today seems perfectly logical. The place of the Divertissement on Friday's programme—between the vigors of Sibelius and the ecstacies of Skriabin—would seem to be happily chosen.

TRAN. Oct. 21.

SENSUAL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy" Superbly Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

Orchestral music of uncommon interest made the programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, the first symphony of Sibelius, a new divertissement for orchestra, played for the first time in America, by Guy Ropartz, and Scriabine's "Poem de l'Extase."

DISPLAY OF VIRTUOSITY

The performances were of extraordinary brilliancy. Never has the orchestra played so well so early in the season. It was not only Mr. Mager, player of the difficult first trumpet part in Scriabine's work, who distinguished himself during that performance. It was every section and every solo player of the organization. There had been no such interpretation of Scriabine's music here, though it was conducted both by Mr. Fiedler in 1910 and Dr. Muck in 1917. The music had never been so clear, nor had its passionate and rhapsodical career been so fortunately conveyed.

Some do not like this "Poeme de l'Extase" at all. Others, and the writer among them, listen to it with keen interest, but strong reservations. Others are wildly enthusiastic. Everyone was stirred by the performance yesterday. The music?

Written by Master

It is a composition which will not down. One thing is now clearly understood, thanks largely to Mr. Monteux's reading, as well as to increased familiarity with the work—it is made with a master hand, not formally according to so-called "classic" standards, but with an extremely definite concept in the composer's mind, with a clearly perceived and irresistibly approached climax, which is one of the most brilliant in modern orchestral music. Whether you like it is another thing. But this is music of extraordinary workmanship and of a tonal physiognomy, so to speak, which, once heard, is not readily dismissed from the mind or forgotten.

The poetic programme of the work has roughly three divisions outlined by the composer in a long and strange poem. (a) "His (the composer's) soul in the orgy of love." (b) "The realization of a fantastic dream." (c) "The glory of his own art." This programme finds a musical prototype in a long, very gradual, masterly progress from a soft opening to the final outburst, most effectively planned and fulfilled.

Amazingly Orchestrated

No one can question the composer's sincerity. You do not strike out a new idiom like this unless there is a driving sincerity, an uncompromising determination to discover a new path, back of your pen. There is unquestioned originality of invention, themes that are like no other men's themes, that are labelled "Scriabine" in letters for those who run to read. Perhaps there is derivation from Chopin, but one's impression is essentially that of a completely new, confident voice. And there is the amazing orchestration which drips color.

But the things which determine an individual's opinion of an important work of art are after all less facts than matters of personal temperament and disposition. Each of us knows of certain composers of whom he says: "It may be fine, but I don't like his tunes." We do not like the tunes of this "Poeme de l'Extase," ready as we are to pay tribute to their unusual curve, their frequent harmonic pungency and their wonderful adaptability to the poetic purpose. And we do not like the spirit of the music.

Erotic and Sensual

The music is erotic and sensual. True, sensuality in greater or lesser degree is inherent in art. In this place we are personally repulsed by it, and we understand for the first time the ire of revered seniors of criticism at whom we used to wonder when they exclaimed passionately against the lewdness of a Strauss or even a Berlioz. They meant it. They abhorred their music so intensely that they were willing to fight it all their lives. Are we getting old? We don't like these tunes; we sicken of the languorousness, the hot-house intensity of this music, and we are repelled by its general flambuoyancy.

Perhaps it seemed wilder and more lurid because of the dry-as-dust "Divertissement" of Ropartz which preceded. This may have been "divertissement" for scholar and technician like Ropartz, in its incessant juggling with a particle of tune. For most of us it was a deadly bore, an emptiness exposed the more forcibly by the other virile compositions.

Sibelius' Symphony

The Sibelius symphony—a composer who stands lonely and incomparable today, whom no one can imitate, whose works reflect in the most grand, sombre and dramatic manner northern nature, northern rebellion against sullen skies and fate, a symphony of the elements, a defiance of this puny age by a Northman reborn to his people. This work was applauded until the orchestra rose to its feet with the conductor. There was even greater enthusiasm for the music of Scriabine.

POST Oct. 23.

Posed on the Stage Exclusively for the Boston Sunday Post

First Photograph of the Complete New

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Showing the Reorganized Orchestra of 1920, Including New Members, with Identification of Each Player.

Get It in Tomorrow's Boston

SUNDAY POST

POST Oct. 23.

For its third program of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the afternoon of October 22, played Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor, op. 39; Ropartz's "Divertissement for Orchestra," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," op. 54. Pierre Monteux proved during the lengthy, intricate and highly varied course of the Sibelius symphony that he has his forces well in hand, firm and elastic in response to the slightest shading of his brilliant readings. The pleasure of the audience in the exquisite rendering of the second movement of the symphony was especially marked. In the allegro Mr. Monteux reveled in the hearty mocking humor, and brought the movement to an end with a huddling of pace that was like a fat boy trying to run faster than he possibly could and ending by tumbling down in a sudden inglorious sprawl. The finale, possibly, might have had a greater dignity, but one could not cease to remark the variety of Mr. Monteux's handling of the parts. The Ropartz divertissement had a most sympathetic and well-prepared performance, with every detail and mass of the form brought out clearly in a rendering that could be called interesting at all times. There is something hugely refreshing in the prodigal way Scriabin tosses forth his emotional thoughts, giving little hints of his themes here and there out of a tumultuous tonal sea, tidbits to pique the intelligence instead of long, fully stated phrases that some composers too often repeat tediously. Impressions of life and nature, uncramped by tidy little formulas, but having a firm logic all Scriabin's own—such seems this music in effect. And because it does not depend for its large thrusting effects upon anything like meticulous handling of its details, Mr. Monteux appeared to take it in a freer fashion than he had done with the other pieces, as if he had turned from circumscribed lyrics to the throb, swing and soar of blank verse.

MONITOR Oct. 23

SIBELIUS AND SKRIABIN HEARD AGAIN

Content and Discontent Over the Paired Composers—The Dull, Blank Twilig of Mr. Kubelik — Mr. Goding's We managed Recital—Edward Johnson Singer Out of the Opera House—Ite and Opinions

THOSE who resent the prolixity much music written in our ti must have sat well content, at t Symphony Concert of Saturd before Sibelius. In this first sympho he is not so terse and bare as in the seco or the fourth; but in both respects gladdens many a surfeited ear. There no mistaking the motivs out of which would generate his music. Each is cle of outline, brief and pregnant; each i presses the hearing ear. The upspringi melodies are as plain of contour, as f of character. In the progress of symphony, there is no meaningless m ulation, no contested wallowing in m harmonic textures, no playing with the sources of the orchestra as with a many sided and susceptible toy. Instead, all is direct; all is clear; nothing is superfluous; and nearly all rings with imagination or marches with power. A stripped music if the hearer will, but music also in which bone and sinew tell, and in a day in which too many composers, like Bunthorne, are "fleshly" and also fleshy "poets" in tones.

Because Skriabin in "The Poem of Ecstasy" twice seeks and gains the upswelling and mighty climax in the manner of Wagner and Strauss seems hardly reason for the resentful to label him as apostle of din. Such climaxes were a fashion of music in the days in which Skriabin wrote his tone-poem. They are inevitable also, like his fondness for many instruments, to a composer with his passion for the fullest expression. It is not, however, in these relatively conventional passages that either his imagination or his procedure most penetrate and impress the hearer. More characteristic is the fashion in which the motiv of ecstasy, pursued, gained, lost and seized again, flickers and flames above the tonal mass as in a tongue of white, darting, inextinguishable fire; while of Skriabin and of none other is the sudden staying of the surging music, the sudden opening of the close-packed voices upon a few measures of glowing celestial vision and as ardent spiritual beatitude. Skriabin may be this, that or the other in the final category of composers; but imagination with genius in it does such works as these.

SKRIABIN ENLIVENS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Sibelius and Ropartz Also Contribute to Program

Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" made yesterday's Symphony concert memorable for many listeners. It was played for the third time at these concerts and the rehearing strengthened previous impressions that its composer is the one unmistakably great genius of the last 30 years.

This music, with its masterful use of novel harmonies, its intricate counterpoint and its powerful generative motives, achieves triumphantly in a fashion which overwhelms the listener what such lesser geniuses as Sibelius and Ropartz painstakingly and timidly attempt.

One has but to feel the sweep of the broadening and mounting phrases as the climaxes are built up to be conscious of Skriabin's essential kindship with the Wagner of "Tristan," whom almost all the moderns have imitated without rivaling. Even Wagner moreover never made a tonic chord in the elementary key of C major sound like a revelation from on high as Skriabin does at the end of the "Poem of Ecstasy."

The only grave limitations of the composer's genius perceptible without long and patient study of his now completely unprocurable score, are a futile attempt to confuse the arts of music and poetry revealed in the long and tiresome theosophic poem printed as motto for the music, and a slight tendency which persists from his earlier piano works to employ the melodic idiom of Chopin's "Nocturnes." The performance was eloquent. Its only flaw was Mr Monteux's long familiar way of failing to make his climaxes gradual and steady.

Sibelius' First Symphony, written under the manifest influence of Grieg, Tschaikowsky and Wagner at a time when he had not yet found the distinctive idiom he so well employs in the later Fourth Symphony, is not a characteristic work. It was superbly played and much applauded.

Ropartz' new "Divertissement" is erudite and rather labored, showing traces of the influence of Massenet, as well as again demonstrating that of Franck on modern French music. It is far inferior to his symphony recently played here.

Next week the soloist will be Helen Stanley. Her numbers are arias by Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky. The orchestra will play Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, and a new symphonic poem by E. B. Hill, entitled after Poe's tale, "The Fall of the House of Usher."

GLOBE Oct. 23.

Mr. Monteux is producing this ye more interesting programmes tha ever. One of the most interesting w the programme of Friday afternoon a last night. There were powerful co trasts. The first symphony of Je Sibelius was again heard, and aga made an irresistible impression.
makes this impression because althou
it is an early work it has the primev atmosphere, the nature mood, t heroic and sombre quality of all Sibelius. Yet it is in some respects, f those of us who accept the Sibelius n merely of the first and the seco symphony, but the Sibelius of "Ph jola's Daughter," of the "Night Ri and Sunrise," of the "Oceanidee," the 4th symphony, a student work, co ventional by the side of later maste pieces.

The first movement is in part th mighty north reborn in the music o this Finnish master, but it is also Wa ner, and even Mendellsohn. The slo movement is in large part Tschaikow sky. We rejoice in this music, but wh not go a little farther? Many an audi ence here still stops at this first sym phony of Sibelius, whereas the secon symphony is stronger, deeper, not les picturesque and much more individu
Mr. Monteux will play later in the yea the third symphony, as yet unheard Boston. It is said that Mr. Richa Burgin, the new concert master, wh knows Sibelius and his music very we and is a fervent admirer of the man an the composer, will play the violin co certo for his first solo performance the Symphony concerts.

Let us also acknowledge the gre good fortune of another hearing of t Poeme d'Extase of Scriabine. Scriabin is unfortunately the least known, eve today, of the modern Russians. Stra insky, of the new school, has either b the inherent virtue or by a skilful laid programme of propaganda, ove shadowed him. Men like Rimsky-Kor sakoff, Borodine, etc., only a few years ago, wild radicals, now Russian co servatives of the most respected kin preceded him, and obtained a prior ho on the interests and admiration of the public. Yet Scriabine, whether we like him or not, is very obviously an im portant personality, a fearless but con sistent innovator in harmony, in rhythm, in plans and development, in instrumen tation. He went through a very uncom mon evolution. Neither his antecedents nor his developments were those of any of his contempararies. In the domain of piano music, in which he has done much that is very important, he seems to have been one of the very few wh fully absorbed and conciously and in telligently developed the path blazed by Chopin. Chopin has only one descend ant in music, if he has any. If we grant he has any, that descendant is surely Scriabine.

This is a conclusion we cannot avoid, ter having been privileged to examine number of compositions of piano usic, up to and including the fifth nata of this composer, whose music it now almost impossible to obtain ce the war from Russia. What he s beyond the fifth sonata is not well own to the writer, but up to that nt the note of Chopin is readily per ved.

the "Poeme d'Extase," in which,
, we find traces of Chopin, there is ertheless exploited very fully the in dual and mature elements of abine's genius, breaking through throwing off the yoke of prece
. Mr. Monteaux's performance,
t be said again, was a further reve n of the power of the music, now to be not merely formless, mad sody, but a structure very care built, shrewdly planned, efficiently uted, and flung over this structure of the freest and most individua essions of modern music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, prior to the first Southern tour of the orchestra, which will occupy the succeeding week, the soloist will be Helen Stanley. Her numbers will be Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D-minor, Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3, and a new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," a poem for orchestra after the short story by Edgar Allen Poe.

Possible late comers are reminded of the fact that Schumann's Symphony, which opens the programme, is played without pauses between the four movements.

POST Oct. 2

---

in Europe
teux found new works of Italy, Fra Spain. These
by the old established be expected unusually e e, could than as soloi stra. The favor sel and once a ent musician's won a forem ists by his man nces with orch other violinist rd Burgin, cond

n Symphony O nly newcomer the various s si being uncha Burgin, of Polis raining, has rece astern part of
of the country long count t

uirer hiladelphia

Boston Symph
the opening of Symphony con my of Music on ber 1, for which ingly beginning t ierre Monteux h mme of unusual Symphony in E Enesco, which sterpiece of this will be the first of the evening w Stanley, formerly Opera Company tours during r established hers
t lyric sopranos produced.
e Stanley will ria "Infelice" a m Tschaikows Onegin." The
mme will cons
Prelude, Chorale strated by the ctor, Gabriel Overture

TIGHT BINDING

New

bers, with

ST

VAUDEVILLE
THEATRE
1:30 to 10:30

NESDAY

an the Passionate iful Clothes to the Woman Who Can
Will Understand—BEST IN

OMAN"

Special Two Reel
COMEDY

7. All New Vaudeville

CONTINUOUS TO 10:30
COMEDIES — MUSIC

vement is in part the reborn in the music of szt, but it is also Wagn large part Tschaikow- slow ce in this music, but why farther? Many an audistops at this first sym-ous, whereas the second ronger, deeper, not less more individual.
will play later in the year phony, as it is unheard in said that Mr. Richard new concert master, who and his music very well, admirer of the man and first solo performance at concerts.

acknowledge the great another hearing of the cine of Scriabine. Scriabine the least known, even modern Russians, Straw-ronger, has either by virtue or by a skilfully of propaganda, over-Men like Rimsky-Kor-icals, now Russian years most respected kind and obtained a criabine, whether we like very obviously con-uality, a fearless
ce in harmony, in rhythm, evelopment, in instrumenent through a very con-Neither his accommponents were those of any In the domain in which he done very important, seems one of the very few who and consciously and ineloped the path blazed by has only one descend-that descendant is surely

---

om TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has auspiciously begun the 40th season in its history, which is so closely connected for many years back with the musical development of this country. As usual, five concerts are to be given at Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1, at Seddons's news stand in the Butler Exchange building. The anniversary season, which will comprise a schedule of concerts of unprecedented size, began in brilliant fashion in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 8 and 9. On that occasion the full-numbered body of musicians and the superfine quality of their performance won alike the highest praise. These auspicious beginnings promise to make the coming season memorable indeed. Continuing in the post of conductor, to which he came last year, Pierre Monteux is again winning the acclaim of his audiences, not only by the inspired quality of his direction, but by his evident skill as a drillmaster and his discernment in the making of programs, which has already become a by-word in the musical world. During his sojourn in Europe last summer, Mr. Monteux found some highly itneresting new works by the living composers of Italy, France, England, Russia and Spain. These new scores, duly balanced by the older and finer music of the established orchestral repertory, may be expected to provide material for unusually engrossing programs. The appearance at each of the coming concerts in Providence of a notable singer or virtuoso will add an additional interest. The soprano will be Alice Nielsen, one of the talented and popular American singers, whose triumphs as prima donna of the opera in Boston are only equalled by her subsequent appearance in concert in each of our larger cities.

Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has no peer in popularity upon the concert stage, is also in the list, and his many appearances in opera, oratoria and recitals of his own, and also as soloist with this orchestra, are well remembered in the concert world.

Felix Fox, who played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last year, will be the only pianist.

Samuel Gardner, the young American violinist of highest talents, who is known hereabouts by the many many years he has lived in Providence, could not be more fittingly heard than as soloist with the great orchestra. The favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel and once a member of that eminent musician's quartet, he has since won a foremost place among violinists by his many recitals and appearances with orchestras.

Another violinist is to be heard—Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, all these virtuosi being unchanged from last year. Burgin, of Polish birth and Russian training, has recently come from the eastern part of Europe, in which part of the country he is considered by a long count the finest master.

From Inquirer OCT 24 1920 K
Philadelphia, Pa.

Opening Boston Symphony Programme

For the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 1, for which tickets will be sold singly beginning tomorrow morning, Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of unusual interest.

The Symphony in E flat major by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Rumanian composer, will be the first number. The soloist of the evening will be Madame Helen Stanley, formerly star of the Chicago Opera Company. In several concert tours during recent seasons she has established herself as one of the finest lyric sopranos which America has produced.

Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria "Infelice" and the letter song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugene Onegin." The remainder of the programme will consist of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore,

---

From CITIZEN, 24
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Will Open Its Brooklyn Season on Friday, Nov. 5.

With Mme. Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the ladership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season on Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. Caesar Franck's prelude, choral and fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also be played, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria, "Infelice," and the "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

AMERICAN, OCT 24 1920
Baltimore, Md.

Mr. Grice Writes of the Superb Work Done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tells of a Performance He Attended in Boston.

To the Editor: It is, indeed, gratifying to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has overcome its strike troubles and has arranged to give its usual season of concerts in Baltimore at the Lyric Theater.

The music lovers of Baltimore, particularly those of experience, realize how much ths superb orchestra has done for Baltimore musically, as it came here season after season at a financial loss in order to bring to us its symphonic treasures, and the spirit which actuated the backers of the orchestra deserved the success which was finally won in packed houses and prolonged plaudits.

The writer had the pleasure of first hearing this orchestra perform a Wagnerian program in the Concordia Opera House under the baton of Arthur Mikisch, and many enjoyable and uplifting hours have resulted from attendance at succeeding concerts, distributed over a period of years.

That the orchestra is still true to its fine form of past years was evidenced during a recent trip which the writer made to Boston, as on that occasion the "pop" concerts were being given at Symphony Hall, and it was the good fortune of the signatory to hear two fine programs rendered, the entire program of the second concert, which was rendered on September 23, being made up by popular request, and it is a tribute to the good taste of Bostonians to be able to say that the concert was one of fine compositions only, such numbers being played as the overture to "Tannhauser," introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," Handel's largo, overture "Solonelle, 1812," Tsehaikowsky, Rachmaninoff's prelude, largo from Dvorak's "New World Symphony," Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow," "The Blue Danube" waltz of Strauss, and Czibulka's "Love's Dream After the Ball," etc.

The performance of Handel's largo was so wondrously beautiful that it seemed as though nothing could be closer to perfection until the enthralling strains of "Kammenoi Ostrow" created doubt as to which was the most exquisite, yet there was such a wealth of tone and harmonic beauty from the other numbers that one left the famous hall of music wondering which melodic gem shone most brilliantly.

The music lovers of Baltimore are no doubt looking forward with pleasant anticipations to the concerts scheduled here and the support which will be given this premier orchestra will be indicative of our appreciation of the good, the true and the beautiful. Yours truly,

LOUIS M. GRICE,
2836 Parkwood Avenue, Baltimor

Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 24 1920 K

—For the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evening next week, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of unusual interest. The symphony in E flat major by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Rumanian composer, will be the first offering. The soloist of the evening will be Helen Stanley, formerly star of the Chicago Opera Company. In several concert tours during recent seasons she has established herself as one of the finest lyric sopranos America has produced. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria "Infelice" and the letter song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onegin." The remainder of the program will consist of Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 3.

OURNAL OCT 24 1920 A
Providence, R. I.

Announcement has been made of the dates for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place this season at Infantry Hall, on Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1.

At each of the concerts there will be a prominent soloist assisting. The list includes Anna Nielson, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Felix Fox, pianist; Samuel Gardner, violinist, and Richard Burgin.

The soprano, Alice Nielsen, is a prima donna to whom the fame of the Boston Opera Company in its palmiest days was largely due. Since the opera in Boston ceased to be, Miss Neilsen has been singing in concerts in all parts of the United States.

Reinald Werrenrath has to his credit a long list of appearances in oratorio and in opera, as well as in recitals of his own. His interpretation of Antonio in Pagliacci at the Metropolitan Opera House made a considerable stir in New York, and he has sung a number of times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra notably when he took the part of Christ when the orchestra performed Bach's Saint Matthew Passion Music.

The pianist, Felix Fox, played as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last year.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, spent years of his life in Providence. Although brought to America in babyhood, when his parents were forced to take flight from persecution in Russia, Mr. Gardner has entirely identified himself with the musical life of this country. For a long time the favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel, he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet for a whole season during the absence of Mr. Letz. Since that time he has been soloist with larger orchestras and in recitals of his own.

There will be interest in the Providence debut of Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, the other virtuosi remaining in every case unchanged from last season. Mr. Burgin arrived recently from Eastern Europe.

A native of Poland, his training was mostly Russian, and at Petrograd he studied four years under Leopold Auer. He has played as concert master and soloist with the large orchestras in Petrograd, Helsingfors, Finland, also Christiania and Stockholm. He has played in Europe as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch—and under Richard Strauss. He has also performed with notable string quartets in the last two cities mentioned.

Pierre Monteux continues at the head of the orchestra. Returning from his summer's sojourn in Europe, he has brought with him some notable new scores from France and England, where he visited, and from Italy, Spain and Russia as well. The younger and bolder generation of Italian composers will best be represented at these concerts by Respighi di Sabata, Cassella and Malipiero; by the Frenchmen, Milhaud and Roger Ducasse; the Spaniard, deFaila; the Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and the English composers, Vaughn Williams, Bantock and Bok.

New American works to be heard are Mr. Hill's tone poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," and a symphonic version of Carpenter's "Birthday of the Infanta," thus arranged by the composer. Some scores of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, will be revived, notably his First and Third Symphonies. The classic masterpieces of long standing and enduring popularity with symphony audiences will have their due place upon Mr. Monteux's programmes.

From
EAGLE, OCT 24 1920 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

For the opening Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will present Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, the so-called "Little Symphony." He will also conduct "Two Folk-Songs of Anjou," a symphonic fantaisia by Guillaume Lekeu. Another number will be the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue by Cesar Franck himself, which has been arranged for orchestra by Gabriel Pierne, and, to close, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso."

For the Saturday matinee on Nov. 6, the symphony will be the "First in E Minor," by Sibelius. A new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, based on Edgar Allan Poe's poem "The Fall of the House of Usher," will be the novelty of the afternoon, and the closing number, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

PHILADEL
OCT 24
NO. AM. REVIEW.

The first concert in the symphony series here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy, Monday evening, November 1, will open with the Symphony in E Flat Major, by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Rumanian composer. The soloist will be Helen Stanley, formerly of the Chicago Opera Company. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria "Infelice" and the "Letter Song" from Tchaikovski's opera, "Eugen Onegin." The remainder of the program will consist of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 3."

EAGLE, OCT 24 1920 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BROOKLYN CONCERTS

With Mme. Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the sason on Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also b played, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Helen Stanley, the American soprano, who since her debut with the Chicago Opera Company has made herself a favorite with our concert audiences season after season, will sing Mendelssohn's aria from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Onegin."

TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 24 1920 Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY BILL.

With Madam Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season on Friday evening, November 5, at the Academy of Music.

Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. This so-called "Little Symphony" is particularly popular on account of its slow movement which is said to be a burlesque of the metronome, newly invented by Maelzel at the time of its composition.

Caesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, finely orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also be played, and Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Helen Stanley, the American soprano, who since her debut with the Chicago Opera Company has made herself a favorite with our concert audiences season after season, will sing Mendelssohn's aria, "Infelice," and the noted "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 24 1920 K

For the opening of the season of the Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 1, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of unusual interest. The symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Roumanian composer, will be the first number. The soloist of the evening will be Madame Helen Stanley, lyric soprano. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oneigin." The remainder of the program will consist of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist will be Helen Stanley, the noted lyric soprano. Her numbers will be Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin." Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D-minor, Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and a new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," after the story of Edgar Allen Poe, will be the orchestral numbers.

EVENING JOURNAL,
Oct. 29 New York City

As a fact, the evening bore the general and particular aspect of the old days (one already falls into that phraseology concerning them) of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York. Everybody who is anybody hereabouts had tried to get into the hall last night, but many of the somebodies were more prescient or just more forehanded than others, and had rounded out a full subscription; wherefore there was a considerable number of familiar faces among the well-packed standees around the rear rail.

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
OCT 28 1920 L

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 2, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem Tasso.

The soloist is to be Madame Helen Stanley, whose brilliant career as lyric soprano has won her the highest place in the estimation of our audiences. She will sing at this concert Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice" and Tatiana's Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

EVENING POST,
New York City

In Carnegie Hall the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Thursday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. For the opening concert Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Sibelius, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." For the Saturday matinée there will be the symphony of the Rumanian composer, Enesco, for a novelty, the new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," which will then have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

New York City
OCT 30 1920 D SUN.

SATURDAY.

Aeolian Hall, morning, Symphony Society of New York. Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aeolian Hall, afternoon, London String Quartet. Carnegie Hall, evening, 'cello recital, Mildred Wellerson. Aeolian Hall, evening, piano recital, Edwin Hughes.

NEW YORK OCT 30 1920 L
ESTABLISHED
From
Telegram

Boston Symphony Concert.

In Carnegie Hall, the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with a pair of concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. For the opening concert, Pierre Monteux will conduct the strikingly melodious First Symphony of Sibelius, Finnish composer; Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammeled activity." For the Saturday matinee there will be the Symphony of the Roumanian composer, Enesco, said to be his masterpiece; for a novelty, the new work by an American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," which will then have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

World OCT 31 1920 L
New York City

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony season in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon at 2.30. Pierre Monteux will conduct on Thursday the first symphony by Sibelius in E minor, a symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou by Guillaume Lekeu, and the "Poem of Ecstasy" by the revolutionary composer, Scriabine. This work has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammeled activity." For the Saturday concert the symphony will be the E flat major of Enesco, the Roumanian composer. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, "The Fall of the House of Usher," will have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne and Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

SUN OCT 29 1920 D

For the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, has compiled the following programmes: For Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the so called "Little Symphony," Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on two folksongs of Anjau, Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the First Symphony in E minor by Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

[32]

TIGHT BINDING

New

bers', with

ST

THEATRE
1:30 to 10:30

NESDAY

OMAN"

Special Two Reel
COMEDY

All New Vaudeville

CONTINUOUS TO 10:30
— COMEDIES — MUSIC

TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has auspiciously begun the 40th season in its history, which is so closely connected for many years back with the musical development of this country. As usual, five concerts are to be given at Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1, at Seddons's news stand in the Butler Exchange building. The anniversary season, which will comprise a schedule of concerts of unprecedented size, began in brilliant fashion in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 8 and 9. On that occasion the full-numbered body of musicians and the superfine quality of their performance won alike the highest praise. These auspicious beginnings promise to make the coming season memorable indeed. Continuing in the post of conductor, to which he came last year, Pierre Monteux is again winning the acclaim of his audiences, not only by the inspired quality of his direction, but by his evident skill as a drillmaster and his discernment in the making of programs, which has already become a by-word in the musical world. During his sojourn in Europe last summer, Mr. Monteux found some highly itneresting new works by the living composers of Italy, France, England, Russia and Spain. These new scores, duly balanced by the older and finer music of the established orchestral repertory, may be expected to provide material for unusually engrossing programs. The appearance at each of the coming concerts in Providence of a notable singer or virtuoso will add an additional interest. The soprano will be Alice Nielsen, one of the talented and popular American singers, whose triumphs as prima donna of the opera in Boston are only equalled by her subsequent appearance in concert in each of our larger cities.

Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has no peer in popularity upon the concert stage, is also in the list, and his many appearances in opera, oratoria and recitals of his own, and also as soloist with this orchestra, are well remembered in the concert world.

Felix Fox, who played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last year, will be the only pianist.

Samuel Gardner, the young American violinist of highest talents, who is known hereabouts by the many many years he has lived in Providence, could not be more fittingly heard than as soloist with the great orchestra. The favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel and once a member of that eminent musician's quartet, he has since won a foremost place among violinists by his many recitals and appearances with orchestras.

Another violinist is to be heard—Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, all these virtuosi being unchanged from last year. Burgin, of Polish birth and Russian training, has recently come from the eastern part of Europe, in which part of the country he is considered by a long count the finest master.

From Inquirer OCT 24
Philadelphia, Pa.

Opening Boston Symphony Programme

For the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 1, for which tickets will be sold singly beginning tomorrow morning, Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of unusual interest. The Symphony in E flat major by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Rumanian composer, will be the first number. The soloist of the evening will be Madame Helen Stanley, formerly star of the Chicago Opera Company. In several concert tours during recent seasons she has established herself as one of the finest lyric sopranos which America has produced. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria "Infelice" and the letter song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onegin." The remainder of the programme will consist of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

From CITIZEN, 24
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Will Open Its Brooklyn Season on Friday, Nov. 5.

With Mme. Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the ladership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season on Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. Caesar Franck's prelude, choral and fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also be played, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria, "Infelice," and the "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

AMERICAN, OCT 24
Baltimore, Md.

Mr. Grice Writes of the Superb Work Done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tells of a Performance He Attended in Boston.

To the Editor: It is, indeed, gratifying to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has overcome its strike troubles and has arranged to give its usual season of concerts in Baltimore at the Lyric Theater.

The music lovers of Baltimore, particularly those of experience, realize how much ths superb orchestra has done for Baltimore musically, as it came here season after season at a financial loss in order to bring to us its symphonic treasures, and the spirit which actuated the backers of the orchestra deserved the success which was finally won in packed houses and prolonged plaudits.

The writer had the pleasure of first hearing this orchestra perform a Wagnerian program in the Concordia Opera House under the baton of Arthur Mikisch, and many enjoyable and uplifting hours have resulted from attendance at succeeding concerts, distributed over a period of years.

That the orchestra is still true to its fine form of past years was evidenced during a recent trip which the writer made to Boston, as on that occasion the "pop" concerts were being given at Symphony Hall, and it was the good fortune of the signatory to hear two fine programs rendered, the entire program of the second concert, which was rendered on September 23, being made up by popular request, and it is a tribute to the good taste of Bostonians to be able to say that the concert was one of fine compositions only, such numbers being played as the overture to "Tannhauser," introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," Handel's largo, overture "Solonelle, 1812," Tsehaikowsky, Rachmaninoff's prelude, largo from Dvorak's "New World Symphony," Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow," "The Blue Danube" waltz of Strauss, and Czibulka's "Love's Dream After the Ball," etc.

The performance of Handel's largo was so wondrously beautiful that it seemed as though nothing could be closer to perfection until the enthralling strains of "Kammenoi Ostrow" created doubt as to which was the most exquisite, yet there was such a wealth of tone and harmonic beauty from the other numbers that one left the famous hall of music wondering which melodic gem shone most brilliantly.

The music lovers of Baltimore are no doubt looking forward with pleasant anticipations to the concerts scheduled here and the support which will be given this premier orchestra will be indicative of our appreciation of the good, the true and the beautiful. Yours truly,

LOUIS M. GRICE,
2836 Parkwood avenue, Baltimor

Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 24

—For the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evening next week, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of unusual interest. The symphony in E flat major by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Rumanian composer, will be the first offering. The soloist of the evening will be Helen Stanley, formerly star of the Chicago Opera Company. In several concert tours during recent seasons she has established herself as one of the finest lyric sopranos America has produced. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria "Infelice" and the letter song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onegin." The remainder of the program will consist of Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 3.

* * *

OURNAL
Providence, R. I. OCT 24 A

Announcement has been made of the dates for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place this season at Infantry Hall, on Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1.

At each of the concerts there will be a prominent soloist assisting. The list includes Anna Nielson, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Felix Fox, pianist; Samuel Gardner, violinist, and Richard Burgin.

The soprano, Alice Nielsen, is a prima donna to whom the fame of the Boston Opera Company in its palmiest days was largely due. Since the opera in Boston ceased to be. Miss Neilsen has been singing in concerts in all parts of the United States.

Reinald Werrenrath has to his credit a long list of appearances in oratorio and in opera, as well as in recitals of his own. His interpretation of Antonio in Pagliacci at the Metropolitan Opera House made a considerable stir in New York, and he has sung a number of times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra notably when he took the part of Chris when the orchestra performed Bach's Saint Matthew Passion Music.

The pianist, Felix Fox, played as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last year.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, spent years of his life in Providence. Although brought to America in babyhood, when his parents were forced to take flight from persecution in Russia. Mr. Gardner has entirely identified himself with the musical life of this country. For a long time the favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel, he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet for a whole season during the absence of Mr. Letz. Since that time he has been soloist with larger orchestras and in recitals of his own.

There will be interest in the Providence debut of Richard Burgin, the new concert-master of the orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, the other virtuosi remaining in every case unchanged from last season. Mr. Burgin arrived recently from Eastern Europe.

A native of Poland, his training was mostly Russian, and at Petrograd he studied four years under Leopold Auer. He has played as concert master and soloist with the large orchestras in Petrograd, Helsingfors, Finland, also Christiania and Stockholm. He has played in Europe as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch—and under Richard Strauss. He has also performed with notable string quartets in the last two cities mentioned.

Pierre Monteux continues at the head of the orchestra. Returning from his summer's sojourn in Europe, he has brought with him some notable new scores from France and England, where he visited, and from Italy, Spain and Russia as well. The younger and bolder generation of Italian composers will best be represented at these concerts by Respighi di Sabata, Cassella and Malipiero; by the Frenchmen, Milhaud and Roger Ducasse; the Spaniard, deFalla; the Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and the English composers, Vaughn Williams, Bantock and Bok.

New American works to be heard are Mr. Hill's tone poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," and a symphonic version of Carpenter's "Birthday of the Infanta," thus arranged by the composer. Some scores of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, will be revived, notably his First and Third Symphonies. The classic masterpieces of long standing and enduring popularity with symphony audiences will have their due place upon Mr. Monteux's programmes.

* * *

From
EAGLE,
oklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

For the opening Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will present Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, the so-called "Little Symphony." He will also conduct "Two Folk-Songs of Anjou," a symphonic fantaisia by Guillaume Lekeu. Another number will be the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue by Cesar Franck himself, which has been arranged for orchestra by Gabriel Pierne, and, to close, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso."

For the Saturday matinee on Nov. 6, the symphony will be the "First in E Minor," by Sibelius. A new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, based on Edgar Allan Poe's poem "The Fall of the House of Usher," will be the novelty of the afternoon, and the closing number, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

PHILADE
4
NO. AM. REVIEW.

* * *

The first concert in the symphony series here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy, Monday evening, November 1, will open with the Symphony in E Flat Major, by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Rumanian composer. The soloist will be Helen Stanley, formerly of the Chicago Opera Company. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria "Infelice" and the "Letter Song" from Tchaikovski's opera, "Eugen Onegin." The remainder of the program will consist of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 3."

* * *

EAGLE, OCT 24 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BROOKLYN CONCERTS

With Mme. Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the sason on Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also b played, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Helen Stanley, the American soprano, who since her debut with the Chicago Opera Company has made herself a favorite with our concert audiences season after season, will sing Mendelssohn's aria from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Onegin."

TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY BILL.

With Madam Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season on Friday evening, November 5, at the Academy of Music.

Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. This so-called "Little Symphony" is particularly popular on account of its slow movement which is said to be a burlesque of the metronome newly invented by Maelzel at the time of its composition.

Caesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, finely orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also be played, and Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Helen Stanley, the American soprano, who since her debut with the Chicago Opera Company has made herself a favorite with our concert audiences season after season, will sing Mendelssohn's aria, "Infelice," and the noted "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 24

For the opening of the season of the Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 1, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of unusual interest. The symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco, which is considered the masterpiece of this Roumanian composer, will be the first number. The soloist of the evening will be Madame Helen Stanley, lyric soprano. Madame Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oneigin." The remainder of the program will consist of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist will be Helen Stanley, the noted lyric soprano. Her numbers will be Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter song from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin." Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D-minor, Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and a new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," after the story of Edgar Allen Poe, will be the orchestral numbers.

EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

As a fact, the evening bore the general and particular aspect of the old days (one already falls into that phraseology concerning them) of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York. Everybody who is anybody hereabouts had tried to get into the hall last night, but many of the somebodies were more prescient or just more forehanded than others, and had rounded out a full subscription; wherefore there was a considerable number of familiar faces among the well-packed standees around the rear rail.

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

OCT 28

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 2, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem Tasso.

The soloist is to be Madame Helen Stanley, whose brilliant career as lyric soprano has won her the highest place in the estimation of our audiences. She will sing at this concert Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice" and Tatiana's Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

EVENING POST,
New York City

In Carnegie Hall the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Thursday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. For the opening concert Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Sibelius, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." For the Saturday matinée there will be the symphony of the Rumanian composer, Enesco, for a novelty, the new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," which will then have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

New York City
OCT 30 D SUN.

SATURDAY.

Aeolian Hall, morning, Symphony Society of New York. Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aeolian Hall, afternoon, London String Quartet. Carnegie Hall, evening, 'cello recital, Mildred Wellerson. Aeolian Hall, evening, piano recital, Edwin Hughes.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED OCT 30
From
Telegram

Boston Symphony Concert.

In Carnegie Hall, the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open with a pair of concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. For the opening concert, Pierre Monteux will conduct the strikingly melodious First Symphony of Sibelius, Finnish composer; Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammeled activity." For the Saturday matinee there will be the Symphony of the Roumanian composer, Enesco, said to be his masterpiece; for a novelty, the new work by an American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher," which will then have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

World
New York City

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony season in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon at 2.30. Pierre Monteux will conduct on Thursday the first symphony by Sibelius in E minor, a symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou by Guillaume Lekeu, and the "Poem of Ecstasy" by the revolutionary composer, Scriabine. This work has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammelled activity." For the Saturday concert the symphony will be the E flat major of Enesco, the Roumanian composer. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, "The Fall of the House of Usher," will have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne and Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

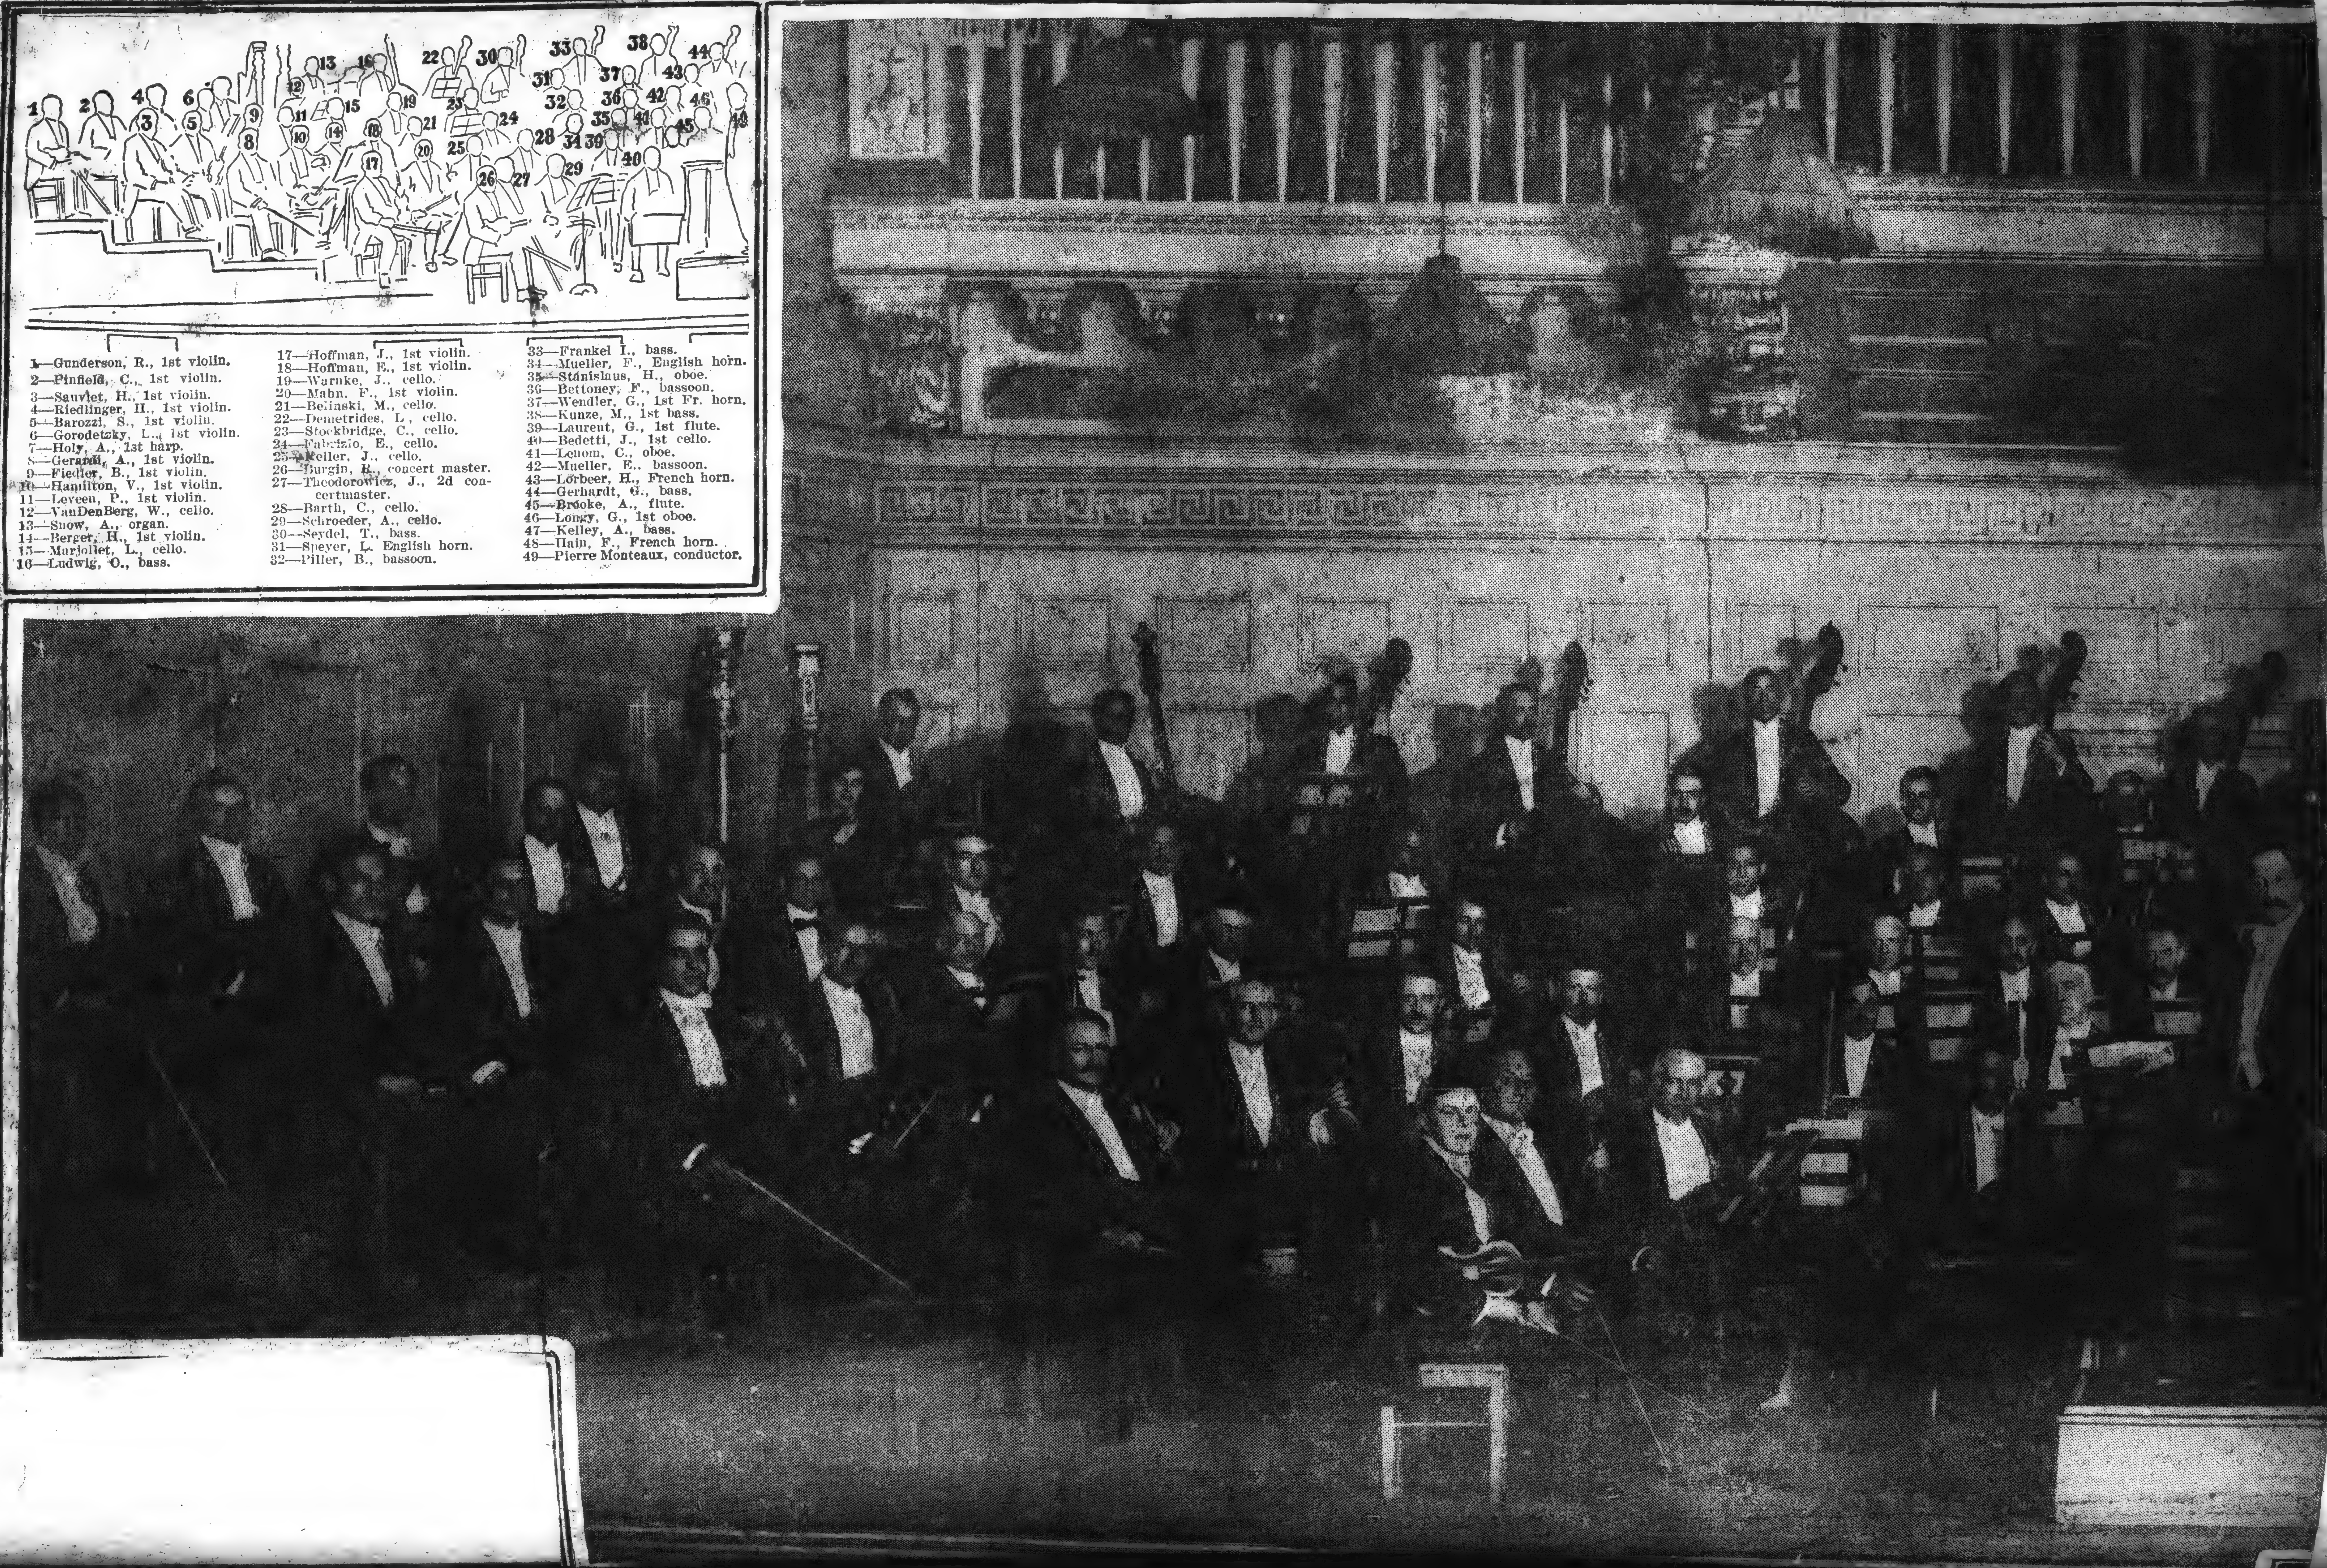
SUN OCT 29

For the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, has compiled the following programmes: For Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the so called "Little Symphony," Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on towo folksongs of Anjau, Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." For the Saturday matinee the First Symphony in E minor by Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Oct. 24

FILMED AS BOUND

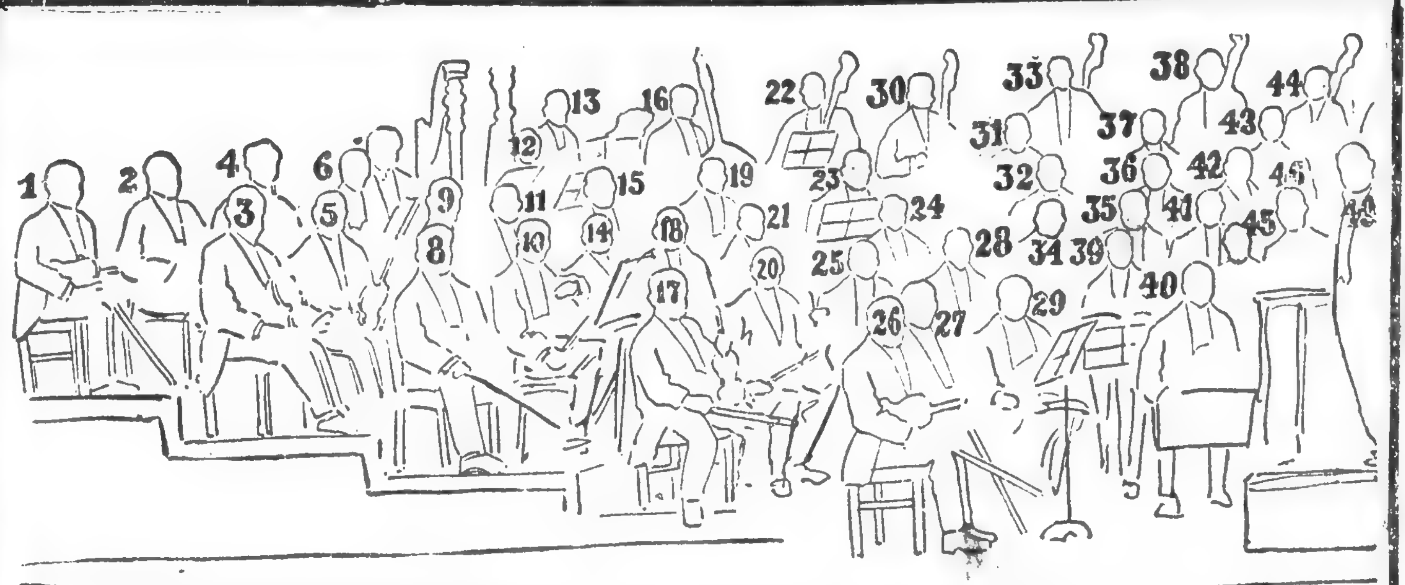
FIRST PHOTOGRAPH OF THE REORGANIZED BOSTON



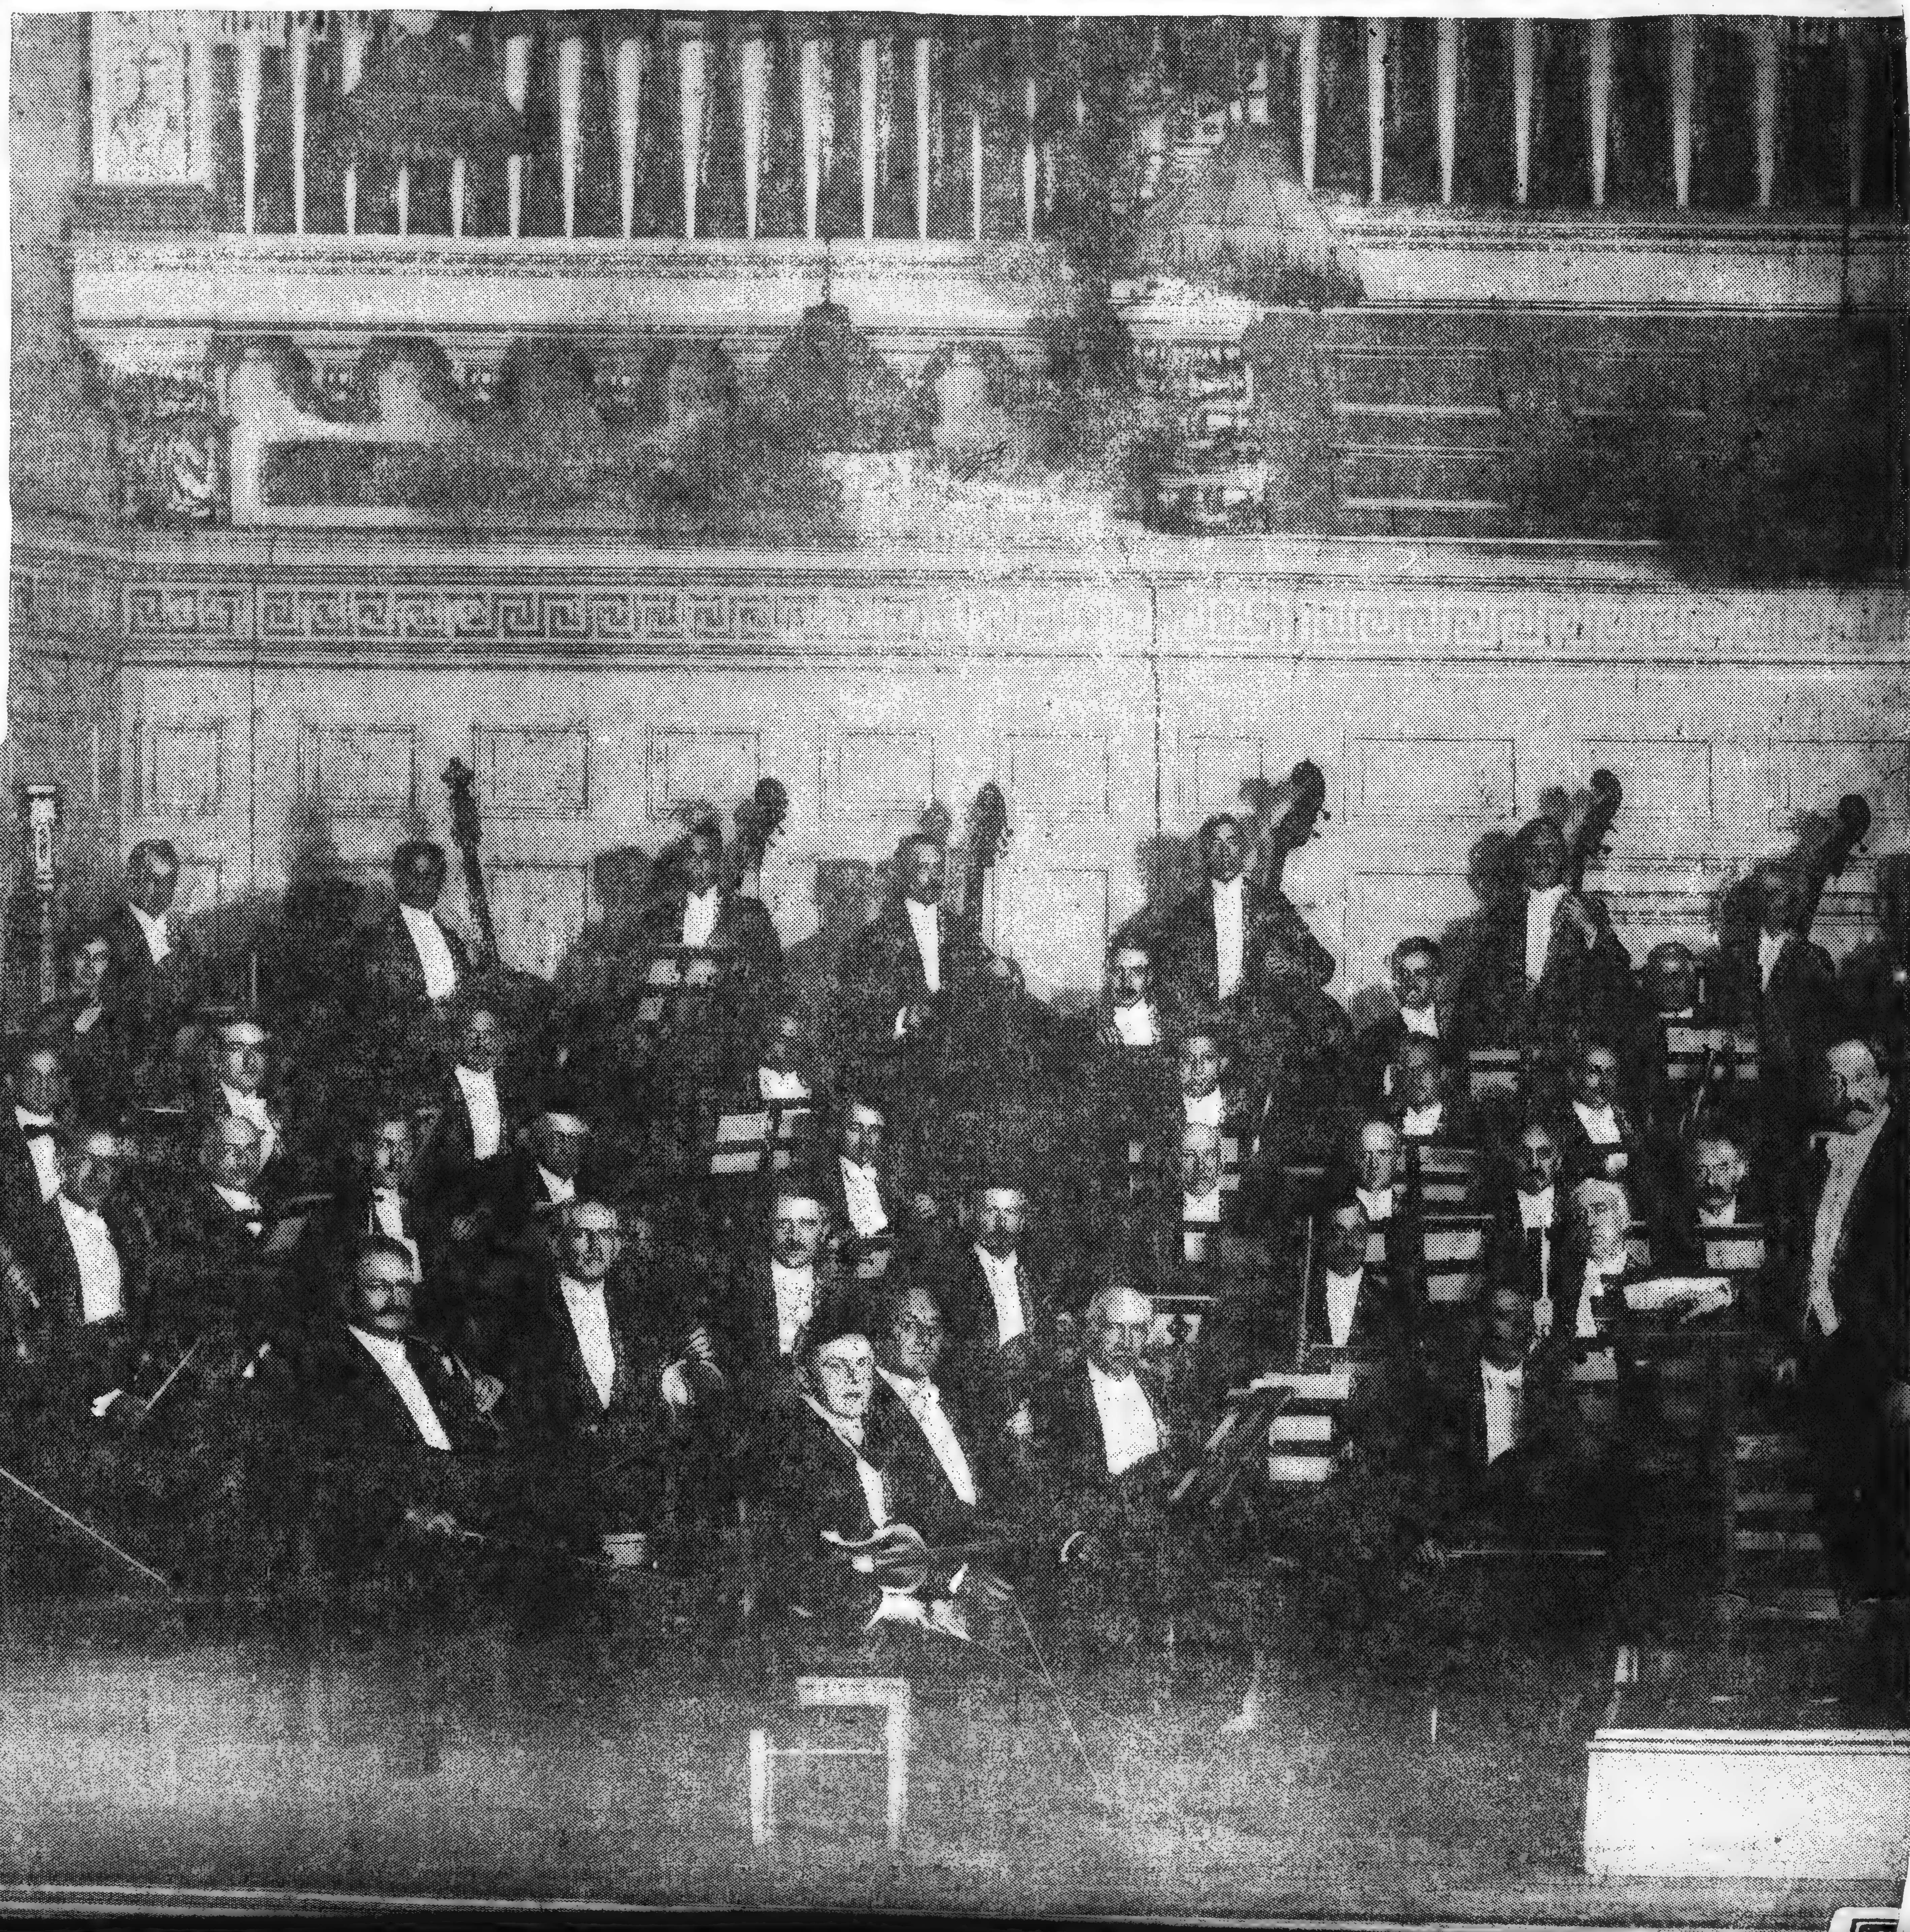
1—Gunderson, R., 1st violin.
2—Pinfield, C., 1st violin.
3—Sauvlet, H., 1st violin.
4—Riedlinger, H., 1st violin.
5—Barozzi, S., 1st violin.
6—Gorodetzky, L., 1st violin.
7—Holy, A., 1st harp.
8—Gerardi, A., 1st violin.
9—Fiedler, B., 1st violin.
10—Hamilton, V., 1st violin.
11—Leveen, P., 1st violin.
12—VanDenBerg, W., cello.
13—Snow, A., organ.
14—Berger, H., 1st violin.
15—Marjollet, L., cello.
16—Ludwig, O., bass.
17—Hoffman, J., 1st violin.
18—Hoffman, E., 1st violin.
19—Warnke, J., cello.
20—Mahn, F., 1st violin.
21—Belinski, M., cello.
22—Demetrides, L., cello.
23—Stockbridge, C., cello.
24—Fabrizio, E., cello.
25—Keller, J., cello.
26—Burgin, R., concert master.
27—Theodorowicz, J., 2d concertmaster.
28—Barth, C., cello.
29—Schroeder, A., cello.
30—Seydel, T., bass.
31—Speyer, L. English horn.
32—Piller, B., bassoon.
33—Frankel I., bass.
34—Mueller, F., English horn.
35—Stanislaus, H., oboe.
36—Bettoney, F., bassoon.
37—Wendler, G., 1st Fr. horn.
38—Kunze, M., 1st bass.
39—Laurent, G., 1st flute.
40—Bedetti, J., 1st cello.
41—Lenom, C., oboe.
42—Mueller, E., bassoon.
43—Lorbeer, H., French horn.
44—Gerhardt, G., bass.
45—Brooke, A., flute.
46—Longy, G., 1st oboe.
47—Kelley, A., bass.
48—Hain, F., French horn.
49—Pierre Monteaux, conductor.

FILMED AS BOUND

FIRST PHOTOGRAPH OF THE REORGANIZED BOSTON



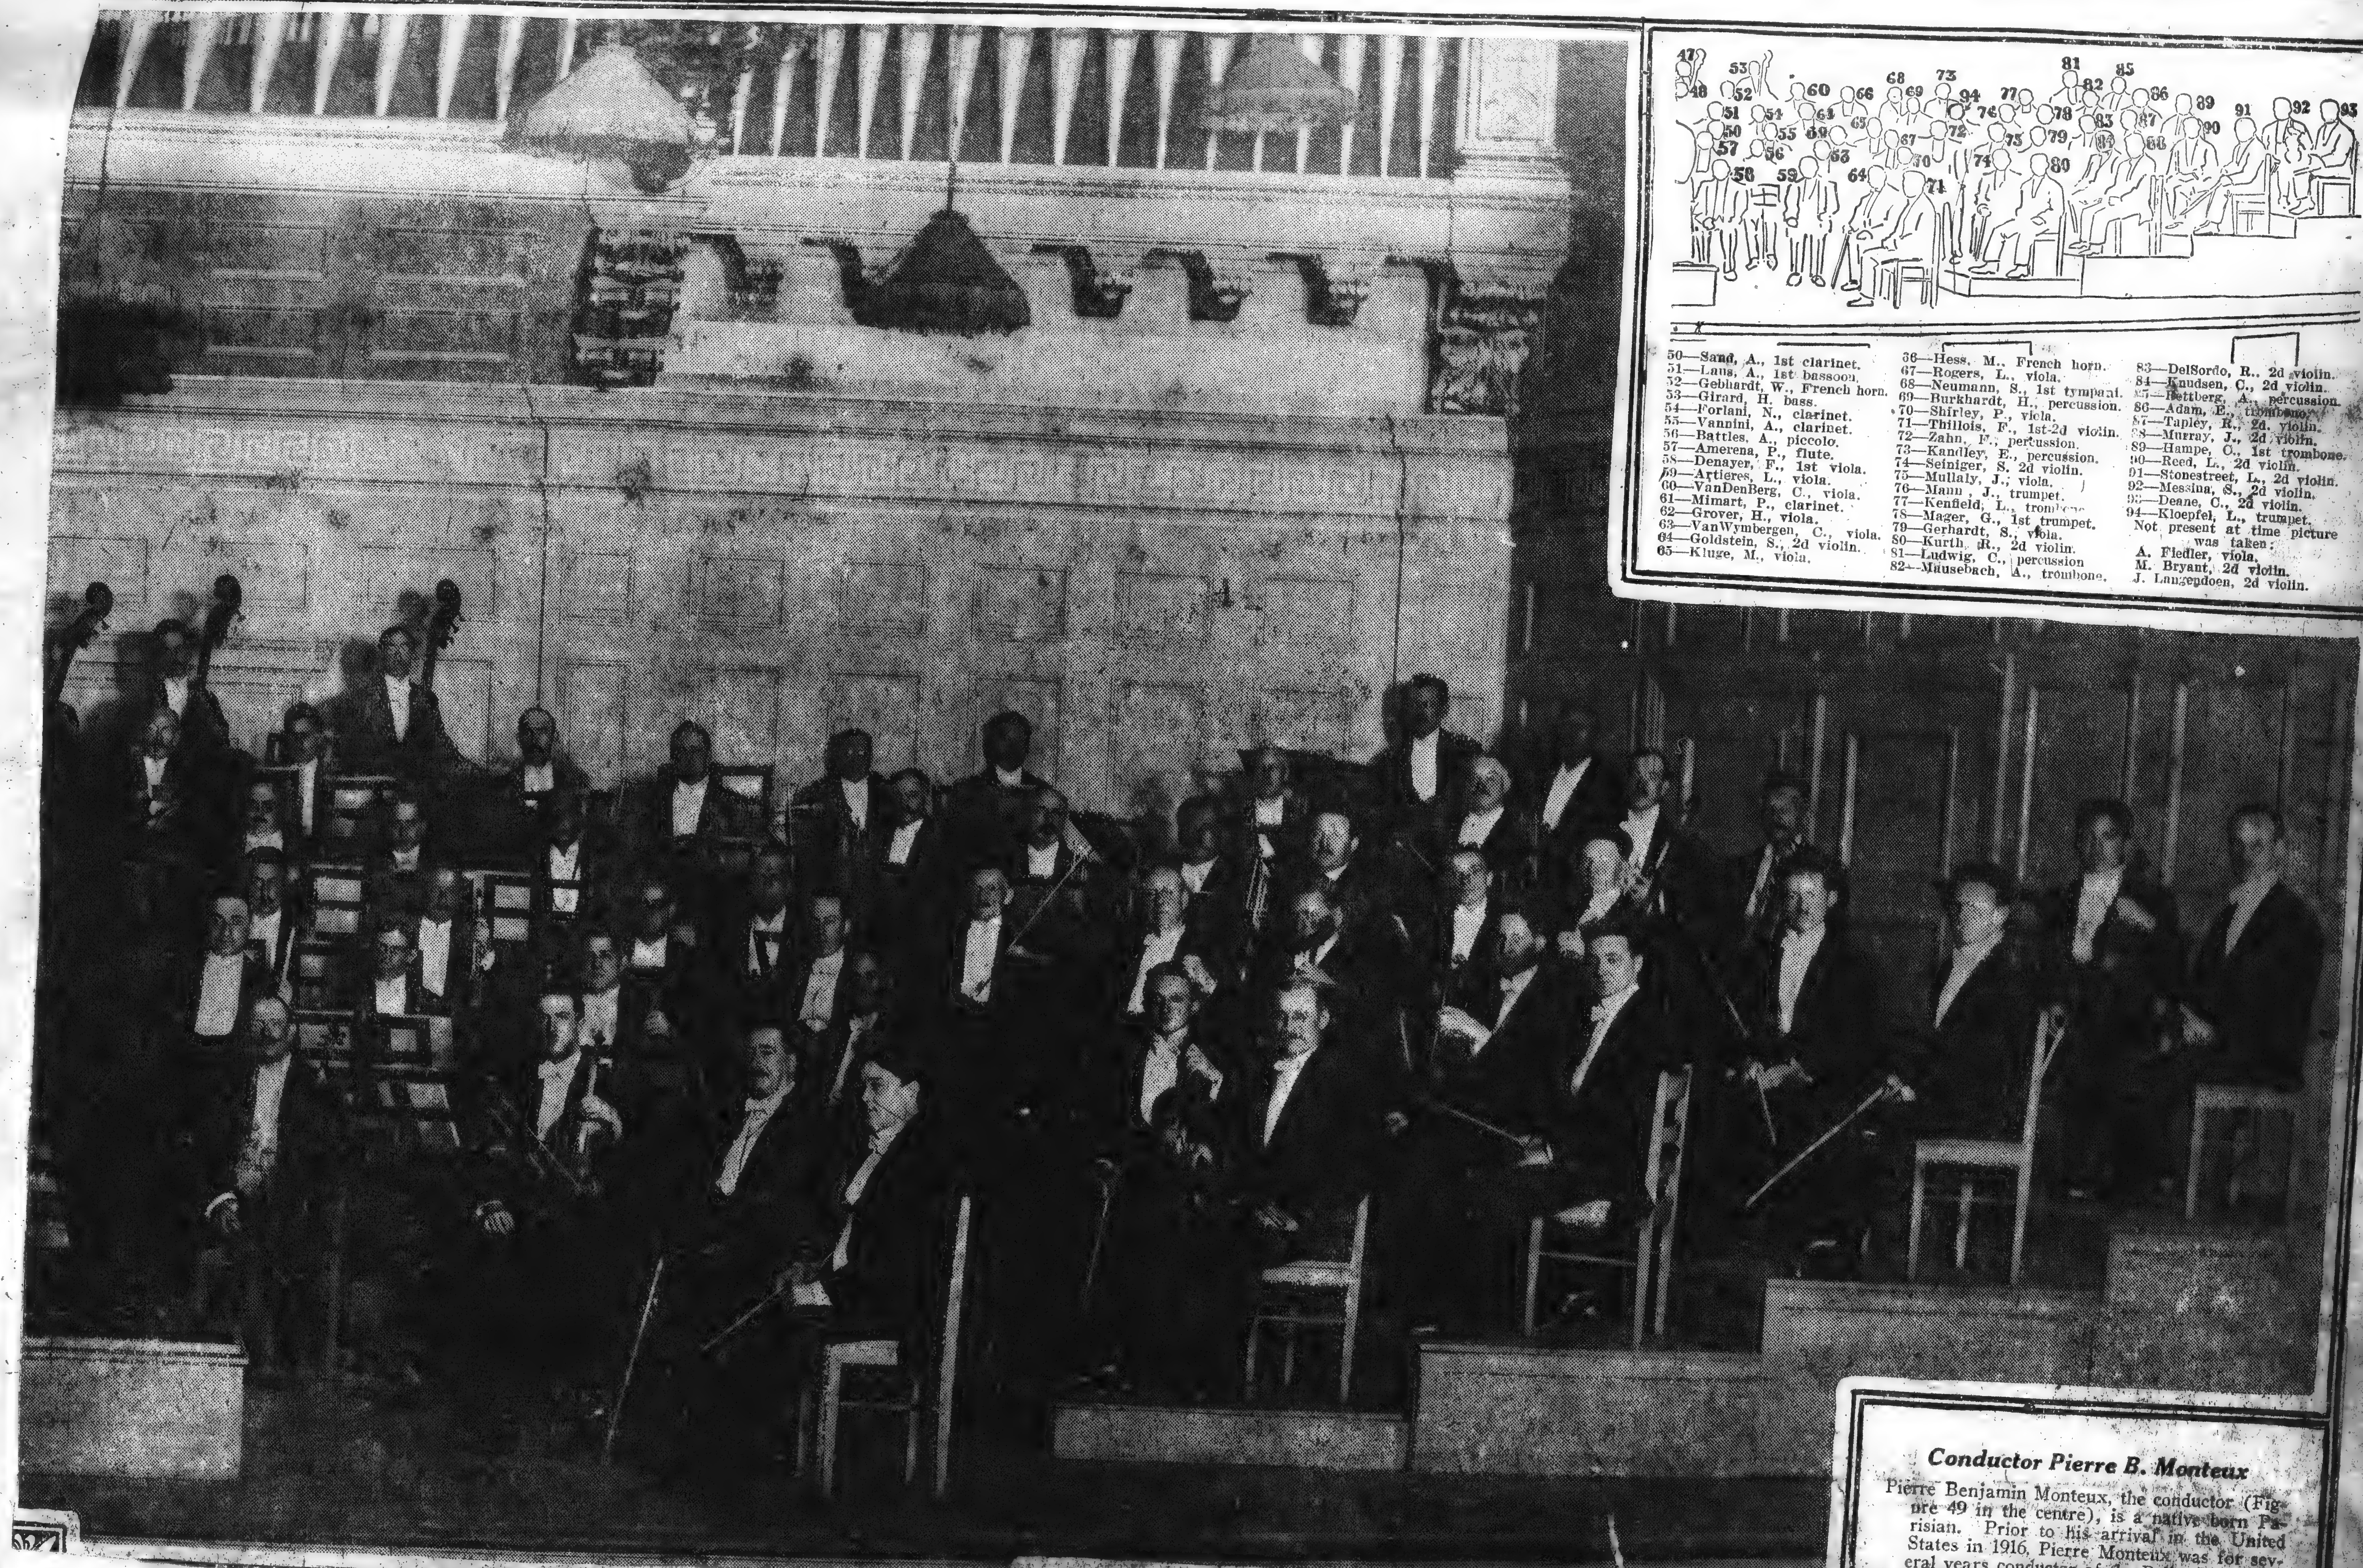
1—Gunderson, R., 1st violin.
2—Pinfield, C., 1st violin.
3—Sauvlet, H., 1st violin.
4—Kiedlinger, H., 1st violin.
5—Barozzi, S., 1st violin.
6—Gorodetzky, L., 1st violin.
7—Holy, A., 1st harp.
8—Gerardi, A., 1st violin.
9—Fiedler, B., 1st violin.
10—Hamilton, V., 1st violin.
11—Leveen, P., 1st violin.
12—VanDenBerg, W., cello.
13—Snow, A., organ.
14—Berger, H., 1st violin.
15—Marjollet, L., cello.
16—Ludwig, O., bass.
17—Hoffman, J., 1st violin.
18—Hoffman, E., 1st violin.
19—Warnke, J., cello.
20—Mahn, F., 1st violin.
21—Belinski, M., cello.
22—Demetrides, L., cello.
23—Stockbridge, C., cello.
24—Fabrizio, E., cello.
25—Keller, J., cello.
26—Burgin, R., concert master.
27—Theodorowicz, J., 2d concertmaster.
28—Barth, C., cello.
29—Schroeder, A., cello.
30—Seydel, T., bass.
31—Speyer, L. English horn.
32—Piller, B., bassoon.
33—Frankel I., bass.
34—Muêller, F., English horn.
35—Stánislaus, H., oboe.
36—Bettoney, F., bassoon.
37—Wendler, G., 1st Fr. horn.
38—Kunze, M., 1st bass.
39—Laurent, G., 1st flute.
40—Bedetti, J., 1st cello.
41—Lenom, C., oboe.
42—Mueller, E., bassoon.
43—Lorbeer, H., French horn.
44—Gerhardt, G., bass.
45—Brooke, A., flute.
46—Longy, G., 1st oboe.
47—Kelley, A., bass.
48—Hain, F., French horn.
49—Pierre Monteaux, conductor.



FILMED AS BOUND

TIGHT BINDING

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OF 1920 PHOTOGRAPHED EXCLUSIVELY FOR THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST



50—Sand, A., 1st clarinet.
51—Laus, A., 1st bassoon.
52—Gebhardt, W., French horn.
53—Girard, H. bass.
54—Forlani, N., clarinet.
55—Vannini, A., clarinet.
56—Battles, A., piccolo.
57—Amerena, P., flute.
58—Denayer, F., 1st viola.
59—Artieres, L., viola.
60—VanDenBerg, C., viola.
61—Mimart, P., clarinet.
62—Grover, H., viola.
63—VanWymbergen, C., viola.
64—Goldstein, S., 2d violin.
65—Kluge, M., viola.
36—Hess, M., French horn.
67—Rogers, L., viola.
68—Neumann, S., 1st tympani.
69—Burkhardt, H., percussion.
70—Shirley, P., viola.
71—Thillois, F., 1st-2d violin.
72—Zahn, F., percussion.
73—Kandley, E., percussion.
74—Seiniger, S. 2d violin.
75—Mullaly, J., viola.
76—Mann, J., trumpet.
77—Kenfield, L., trombone.
78—Mager, G., 1st trumpet.
79—Gerhardt, S., viola.
80—Kurth, R., 2d violin.
81—Ludwig, C., percussion
82—Mausebach, A., trombone.
83—DelSordo, R., 2d violin.
84—Knudsen, C., 2d violin.
85—Bettberg, A., percussion.
86—Adam, E., trombone.
87—Tapley, R., 2d. violin.
88—Murray, J., 2d violin.
89—Hampe, C., 1st trombone.
90—Reed, L., 2d violin.
91—Stonestreet, L., 2d violin.
92—Messina, S., 2d violin.
93—Deane, C., 2d violin.
94—Kloepfel, L., trumpet.

Not present at time picture was taken:

A. Fiedler, viola.
M. Bryant, 2d violin.
J. Langendoen, 2d violin.

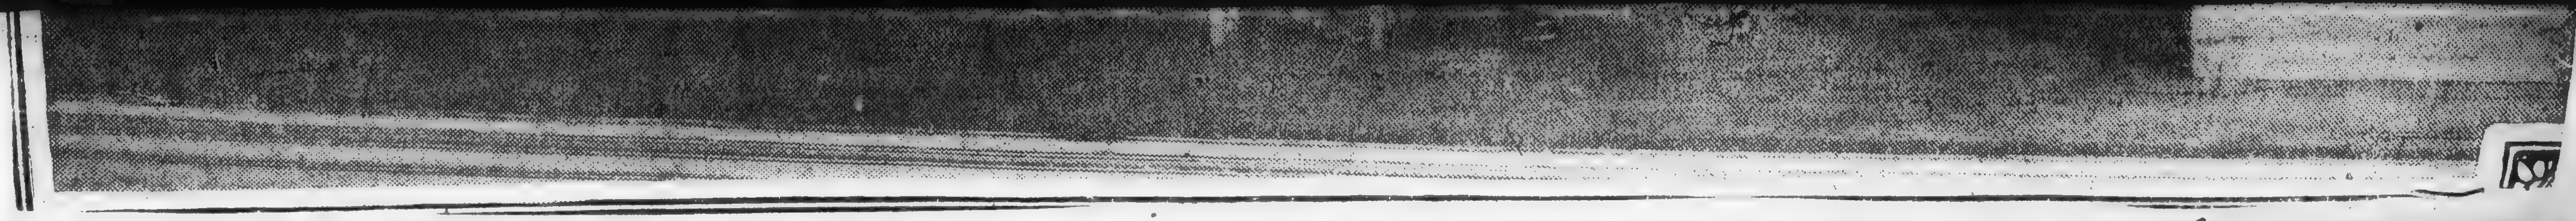
Conductor Pierre B. Monteux

Pierre Benjamin Monteux, the conductor (Figure 49 in the centre), is a native born Parisian. Prior to his arrival in the United States in 1916, Pierre Monteux was for several years conductor of the Ballet Russe and made his first appearance in this country in that capacity. In 1917 he was appointed conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House.

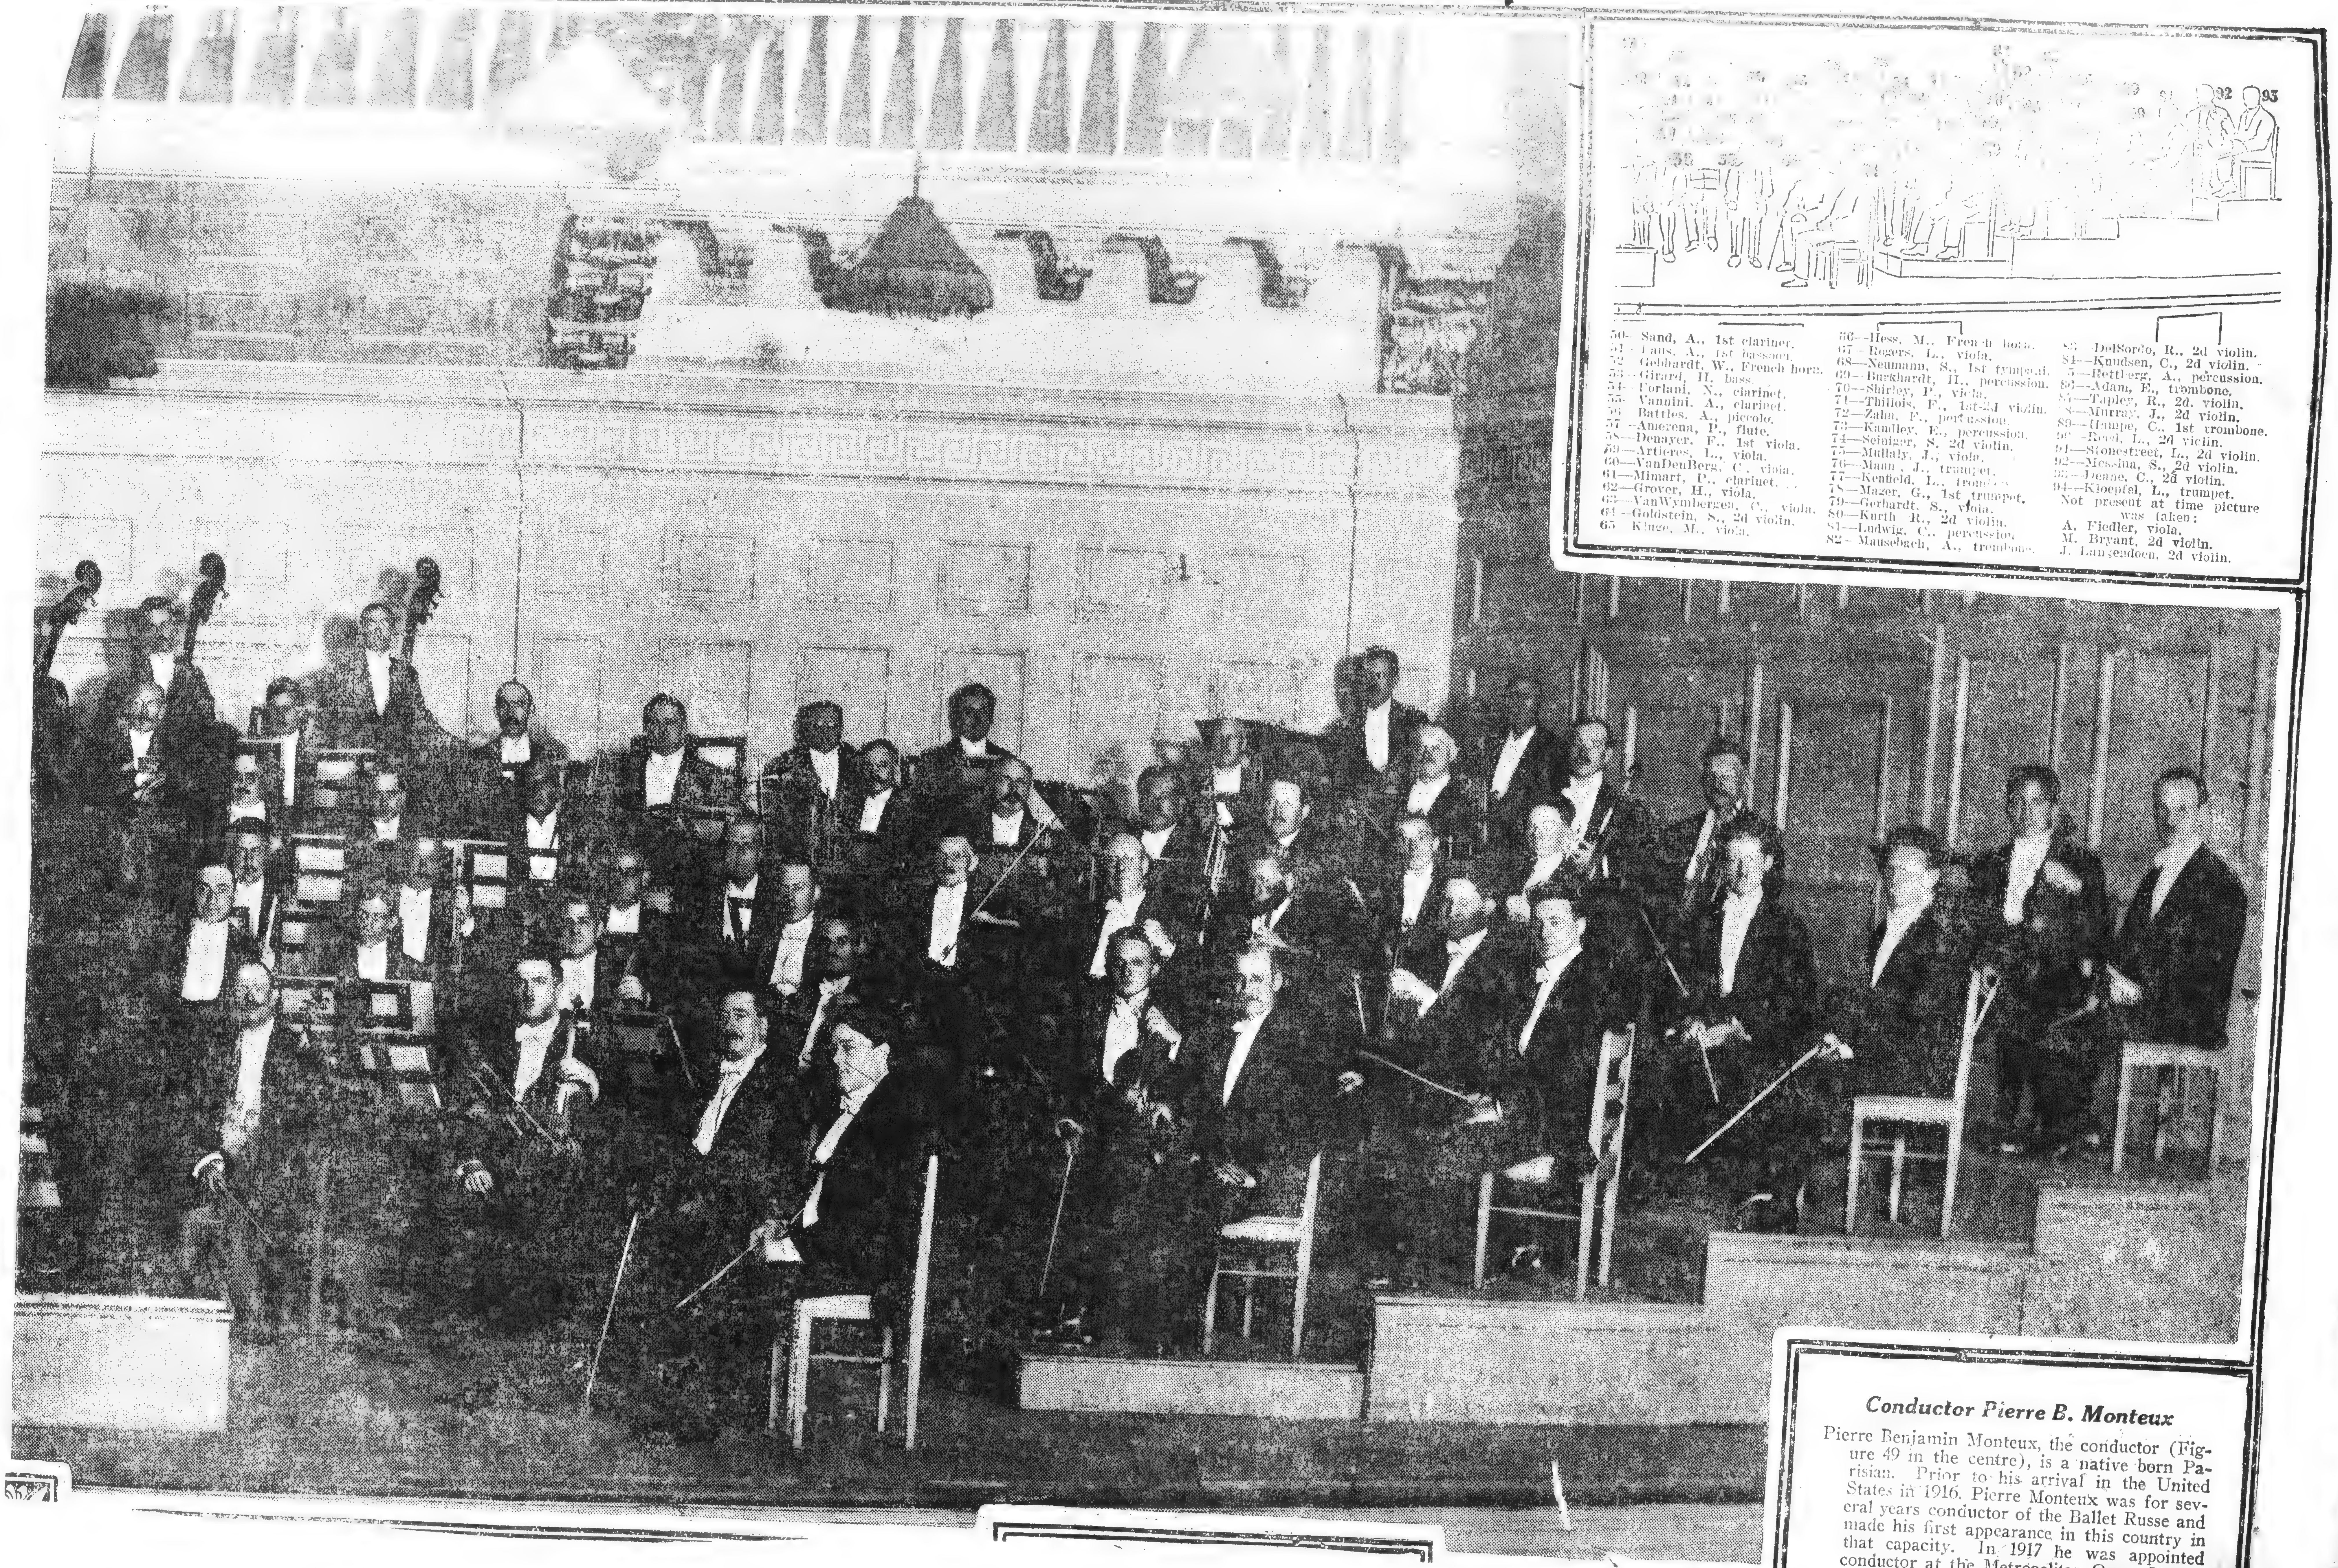
Photo (C) Central Photo Co.

FILMED AS BOUND

TIGHT BINDING



SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OF 1920 PHOTOGRAPHED EXCLUSIVELY FOR THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST



50—Sand, A., 1st clarinet.
51—Laus, A., 1st bassoon.
52—Gebhardt, W., French horn.
53—Girard, H. bass.
54—Forlani, N., clarinet.
55—Vannini, A., clarinet.
56—Battles, A., piccolo.
57—Amerena, P., flute.
58—Denayer, F., 1st viola.
59—Artieres, L., viola.
60—VanDenBerg, C., viola.
61—Mimart, P., clarinet.
62—Grover, H., viola.
63—VanWymbergen, C., viola.
64—Goldstein, S., 2d violin.
65—Kluge, M., viola.
66—Hess, M., French horn.
67—Rogers, L., viola.
68—Neumann, S., 1st tympani.
69—Burkhardt, H., percussion.
70—Shirley, P., viola.
71—Thillois, F., 1st-2d violin.
72—Zahn, F., percussion.
73—Kandley, E., percussion.
74—Seiniger, S. 2d violin.
75—Mullaly, J., viola.
76—Mann, J., trumpet.
77—Kenfield, L., trombone.
78—Mager, G., 1st trumpet.
79—Gerhardt, S., viola.
80—Kurth R., 2d violin.
81—Ludwig, C., percussion.
82—Mausebach, A., trombone.
83—DelSordo, R., 2d violin.
84—Knudsen, C., 2d violin.
85—Rettberg, A., percussion.
86—Adam, E., trombone.
87—Tapley, R., 2d. violin.
88—Murray, J., 2d violin.
89—Hampe, C., 1st trombone.
90—Reed, L., 2d violin.
91—Stonestreet, L., 2d violin.
92—Messina, S., 2d violin.
93—Deane, C., 2d violin.
94—Kloepfel, L., trumpet.

Not present at time picture was taken:

A. Fiedler, viola.
M. Bryant, 2d violin.
J. Langendoen, 2d violin.

Conductor Pierre B. Monteux

Pierre Benjamin Monteux, the conductor (Figure 49 in the centre), is a native born Parisian. Prior to his arrival in the United States in 1916, Pierre Monteux was for several years conductor of the Ballet Russe and made his first appearance in this country in that capacity. In 1917 he was appointed conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Photo (C) Central Photo Co.

From OCT 30 920 M
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Baltimore season next Wednesday evening, November 3, at 8:15, when Pierre Monteux, continuing as its illustrious conductor, will present the following program: The popular and melodious first symphony of Jan Sibelius; a new work by the American composer, E. B. Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after the short story by Edgar Allen Poe), and Berlioz's Overture, Benvenuto

Cellini. Madame Helen Stanley, as the first soloist of the season, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's Opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 OCT 30
From
EVENING JOURNAL,

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, again under Pierre Monteux, will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. The first programme will include the First Symphony of Jan Sibelius and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," whilst that of Saturday will contain Georges Enesco's First Symphony and a new piece by Edward Burlingame Hill, based on Poe's story, "The Fall of the House of Usher."

SUN OCT 30 D

THURSDAY.
Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society of New York. Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aeolian Hall, evening, piano recital, Marie Mikova.

From OCT 30 920 M
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE MUSICAL SEASON

Orchestral Programs, Opera and Concerts of Varied Interest

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the season, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The symphony will be Enesco's master work in E flat, and the other symphonic numbers Cesar Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's "Lenore," No. 3. Helen Stanley, soprano, as the soloist, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin."

EveningMail
New York City
OCT 30 M

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

At the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux conductor, these programmes will be given: Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." Saturday matinee, the First Symphony in E-minor, by Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy."

From OCT 30 920 M
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its current season's concerts at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when a program of unusual interest will be presented. The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the one in E minor, other orchestral numbers being Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures, a new tone poem by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, that was inspired by Edgar Allan Poe's story of "The Fall of the House of Usher." The assisting artist will be Mme. Helen Stanley, the operatic lyric soprano, who will sing Mendelssohn's air, "Infelice," and also the famous "Letter Song," from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin."

Evening World
New York City OCT 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fortieth season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and play again there on Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux conducting. At the Saturday afternoon concert "The Fall of the House of Usher," a new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, will have its first performance in New York.

EAGLE, OCT 31 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BROOKLYN MUSIC

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Berlioz's Overture "Benvenuto Cellini." The soloist is to be Mme. Helen Stanley.

TIMES, OCT 31 920 L
Washington, D. C.

Mme. Galli
Boston Sy
Be Here

By JESSIE

The Boston Symphony O share the concert honors this in the offering—to be given eight merry-makers in musi Artists."

The first concert of the Boston players, under Pierre Monteux, brings a highly diversified program with Beethoven in the symphony, dramatic program music in Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky. Two opera arias will be given by Mme. Helen Stanley, with orchestra, in which the tone color of Tschaikowsky's orchestral palette will give added charm to the famous letter scene of "Tatiana" from his opera Eugen Oneigen.

Record OCT 31
Philadelphia, Pa.

—The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening, when Pierre Monteux will present the following program: Symphony in E-flat, Enesco; Pierne's orchestra version of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Beethoven's overture, "Lenore," No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin." Madame Stanley's work as a lyric soprano has won her high praise. Her early training was in Chicago, where, at the age of 14 years, she sang as soloist in several churches. She studied in New York and, when still a young girl, won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera. She was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Company, singing leading roles in French, Italian, German and English.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening, when Pierre Monteux, continuing as conductor of the orchestra, presents the following program: The Symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer, Enesco; Pierne's orchestral version of Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Madam Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin." Madam Stanley's brilliant career as a lyric soprano has won her the highest praise in the estimation of our audiences. Her early training was in Chicago, where, at the age of fourteen, she sang as soprano soloist in several churches. She soon found herself studying in New York, and when still a young girl won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera there. Thence she was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Co. With this company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Co., as it still exists, she sang the leading roles in French, Italian, German and English.

STAR Washington, D.
OCT 31

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

At the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Pierre Monteux will conduct in the following program: Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony in F Major," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

The soloist will be Mme. Helen Stanley, whose brilliant career as lyric soprano has won her a high place in the estimation of her audiences. When still a young girl she won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew, New York. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera there. Thence she was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Company as it still exists.

She will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and Tatiana's letter scene from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onegin."

HERALD
Washington, D. C. L

Orchestra and Soloists Will Be Heard This Week

PIERRE MONTEUX

GALLI-CURCI

STANLEY

NEW MEMBER TO BE HEARD

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Introduce Richard Burgin on Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first concert of the season at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, will have as its soloist Mme. Helen Stanley. Pierre Monteux will conduct, and the only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections will be Richard Burgin, the concert master, who recently arrived from Eastern Europe where he is considered the finest concert master.

Of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia. Part of his career, however, has been confined by chaotic conditions in the east to Russia, Finland and Scandanavia. For twelve years he served as concert master in the best orchestras which the largest cities of those countries possessed.

His first teacher was Lotti, and his most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, he studied four years. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came before his time; Seidel and Piastri came later, while Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, he toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandanavia with great success. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm which regularly toured from city to city performing twelve recitals a season.

From STANDARD UNION OCT 31
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to give five concerts at the Academy of Music during its coming fortieth season on the following five Friday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 4 and March 18, with Mesdames Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska and Messrs. Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists, performed its opening concerts in Boston with brilliant success. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and the illustrious orchestra which sat in full ranks under him, were praised with one accord. The only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia.

---

om TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I.
te OCT 31

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FINEST QUALITY.

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now successfully started in Boston, promises to be one of the finest in the history of that renowned institution. Five concerts are to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12th, at which the assisting soloists will be Alice Nielsen, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Richar Brugin and Samuel Gardner, violinists and Felix Fox, pianist. At each pair o concerts that has been played at Symphony Hall this season there has bee nothing but the highest praise for th performances of the orchestra and th skill of the musicians. Mr. H. T. Parke wrote in the Boston Transcript of Oct 23d: "Above the stage, up and dow the auditorium, the atmosphere wa electric—even on a Friday afternoon i Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and the heats of it added new virtues to old. And not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast; it played also—and for the first time as refilled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradiant, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individulized choirs. In measures it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in times past was like the human voice in song. So did the orchestra severally and collectively distinguish itself. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready a new band. Yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich."

From
TIMES, OCT 31 920 Y
Brooklyn, N. Y.

STANLEY WITH BOSTON SYM

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening, November 5, (the others to be given December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 18), Pierre Montreux will conduct the following program: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." The soloist is to be Madame Helen Stanley, lyric soprano. As prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphiaphia Opera Company, and subsequently of the Chicago Opera Company, as it still exists, she sang the leading roles in French, Italian, German and English. She will sing at this concert Mendelssohn's concert aria, 'Infelice" and Tatiana's Letter scene from Tschaikowsy's Opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

News OCT 31 M
Baltimore, Md.

TWO SYMPHON ON THIS

Boston And Baltimore Orchestras To Play—"Carmen" By Baltimore Opera Society—Farrar And Godowsky Recitals Also At Hand.

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Two symphony concerts are on hand this week—those by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday night and the Baltimore Symphony next Sunday afternoon, in both cases the first these respective organizations have given this season.

Sun
Baltimore, Md.

On Wednesda Symphony Orche timore season a Pierre Monteux, co will give the following pro First Symphony of Jan Sibel nish composer; a new Ame by E. B. Hill, "The Fall of of Usher" (after the grues story by Edgar Allen Poe). lioz's brilliant overture, "Benv lini." As the soloist of the eve Helen Stanley will sing Me concert aria, "Infelice," and Scene from Tschaikowsky's O gen Oniegin." Mme. Stanley soprano who following long tra and abroad, made appearances opera as prima donna with the Philadelphia Opera Company sequently with the Chicago Gra Company. She has in recent voted herself to concert singing

---

EAGLE, OCT 31
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the B Symphony season in Carnegie will take place Thursday evenin Saturday afternoon. Pierre M will conduct on Thursday the p and melodious First Symphon Sibelius in E minor, a Symp Fantasia on Two Folk Songs o jou, by Guillaume Lekeu, the br genius among the compose France, whose career was cut by death while he was s young man, and the "Poem o stasy," by the revolutionary co Scriabin. This impressive wor been described as expressing "t of untrammeled activity." Fo Saturday concert the symphon be the masterpiece of Enesc Rumanian composer, in E-flat A new work by Edward Burli Hill, the American composer, Fall of the House of Usher," wi its first performance in New Yor other numbers will be Cesar Fr Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, o trated by Gabriel Pierne, and lioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cel

---

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MABEL GARRISON WILL S

The management of the B Symphony Orchestra announces Helen Stanley, who has been a tised as soloist for the concert o day night at the Academy of M will not sing on that date. Her will be taken by Mabel Garrison coloratura soprano of the Metropo Opera Company. Miss Garrison's bers will be announced later.

From NOV 1 M
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

GARRISON TO APPEAR

Place Of Helen Stanl Symphony Concert.

rison, the distinguished co no of the Metropolit the assisting artist at t Symphony Orchestra co yric next Wednesday ev favorite Baltimore arti Helen Stanley, who is i be heard here later in t of the Music Lovers' on has recently return from Europe

[35]

From OCT 30
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Baltimore season next Wednesday evening, November 3, at 8:15, when Pierre Monteux, continuing as its illustrious conductor, will present the following program: The popular and melodious first symphony of Jan Sibelius; a new work by the American composer, E. B. Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after the short story by Edgar Allen Poe), and Berlioz's Overture, Benvenuto Cellini. Madame Helen Stanley, as the first soloist of the season, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's Opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING JOURNAL,

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, again under Pierre Monteux, will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. The first programme will include the First Symphony of Jan Sibelius and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," whilst that of Saturday will contain Georges Enesco's First Symphony and a new piece by Edward Burlingame Hill, based on Poe's story, "The Fall of the House of Usher."

SUN OCT 30

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society of New York. Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aeolian Hall, evening, piano recital, Marie Mikova.

From OCT 30
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE MUSICAL SEASON

Orchestral Programs, Opera and Concerts of Varied Interest

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the season, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The symphony will be Enesco's master work in E flat, and the other symphonic numbers Cesar Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's "Lenore," No. 3. Helen Stanley, soprano, as the soliost, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin."

EveningMail
New York City
OCT 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

At the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux conductor, these programmes will be given: Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." Saturday matinee, the First Symphony in E-minor, by Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy."

From OCT 30
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its current season's concerts at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when a program of unusual interest will be presented. The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the one in E minor, other orchestral numbers being Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures, a new tone poem by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, that was inspired by Edgar Allan Poe's story of "The Fall of the House of Usher." The assisting artist will be Mme. Helen Stanley, the operatic lyric soprano, who will sing Mendelssohn's air, "Infelice," and also the famous "Letter Song," from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin."

Evening World
New York City OCT 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fortieth season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and play again there on Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux conducting. At the Saturday afternoon concert "The Fall of the House of Usher," a new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, will have its first performance in New York.

EAGLE, OCT 31
Brooklyn, N.Y.

BROOKLYN MUSIC

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Berlioz's Overture "Benvenuto Cellini." The soloist is to be Mme. Helen Stanley.

TIMES, OCT 31
Washington, D. C.

Mme. Galli Boston Sy Be Here

By JESSIE

The Boston Symphony O share the concert honors this in the offering—to be given eight merry-makers in musi Artists."

The first concert of the Boston players, under Pierre Monteux, brings a highly diversified program with Beethoven in the symphony, dramatic program music in Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky. Two opera arias will be given by Mme. Helen Stanley, with orchestra, in which the tone color of Tschaikowsky's orchestral palette will give added charm to the famous letter scene of "Tatiana" from his opera Eugen Oneigen.

From
Record 31
Philadelphia, Pa.

—The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening, when Pierre Monteux will present the following program: Symphony in E-flat, Enesco; Pierne's orchestra version of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Beethoven's overture, "Lenore," No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin." Madame Stanley's work as a lyric soprano has won her high praise. Her early training was in Chicago, where, at the age of 14 years, she sang as soloist in several churches. She studied in New York and, when still a young girl, won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera. She was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Company, singing leading roles in French, Italian, German and English.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening, when Pierre Monteux, continuing as conductor of the orchestra, presents the following program: The Symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer, Enesco; Pierne's orchestral version of Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Madam Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin." Madam Stanley's brilliant career as a lyric soprano has won her the highest praise in the estimation of our audiences. Her early training was in Chicago, where, at the age of fourteen, she sang as soprano soloist in several churches. She soon found herself studying in New York, and when still a young girl won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera there. Thence she was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Co. With this company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Co., as it still exists, she sang the leading roles in French, Italian, German and English.

STAR Washington, D.
OCT 31

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

At the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Pierre Monteux will conduct in the following program: Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony in F Major," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

The soloist will be Mme. Helen Stanley, whose brilliant career as lyric soprano has won her a high place in the estimation of her audiences. When still a young girl she won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew, New York. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera there. Thence she was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Company as it still exists.

She will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and Tatiana's letter scene from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onegin."

HERALD
Washingt[illegible]C.

Orchestra and Soloists Will Be Heard This Week

PIERRE MONTEUX

GALLI-CURCI

STANLEY

NEW MEMBER TO BE HEARD

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Introduce Richard Burgin on Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first concert of the season at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, will have as its soloist Mme. Helen Stanley. Pierre Monteux will conduct, and the only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections will be Richard Burgin, the concert master, who recently arrived from Eastern Europe where he is considered the finest concert master.

Of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia. Part of his career, however, has been confined by chaotic conditions in the east to Russia, Finland and Scandanavia. For twelve years he served as concert master in the best orchestras which the largest cities of those countries possessed.

His first teacher was Lotti, and his most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, he studied four years. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came before his time; Seidel and Piastri came later, while Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, he toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandanavia with great success. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm which regularly toured from city to city performing twelve recitals a season.

From OCT 31
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to give five concerts at the Academy of Music during its coming fortieth season on the following five Friday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 4 and March 18, with Mesdames Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska and Messrs. Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists, performed its opening concerts in Boston with brilliant success. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and the illustrious orchestra which sat in full ranks under him, were praised with one accord. The only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia.

---

om TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I. te

* * *

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FINEST QUALITY.

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now successfully started in Boston, promises to be one of the finest in the history of that renowned institution. Five concerts are to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12th, at which the assisting soloists will be Alice Nielsen, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Richard Brugin and Samuel Gardner, violinists and Felix Fox, pianist. At each pair of concerts that has been played at Symphony Hall this season there has been nothing but the highest praise for the performances of the orchestra and the skill of the musicians. Mr. H. T. Parker wrote in the Boston Transcript of Oct 23d: "Above the stage, up and down the auditorium, the atmosphere was electric—even on a Friday afternoon in Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and the heats of it added new virtues to old. And not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast; it played also—and for the first time as refilled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradiant, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individulized choirs. In measures it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in times past was like the human voice in song. So did the orchestra severally and collectively distinguish itself. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready a new band. Yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich."

* * *

---

om
News OCT
Baltimore, Md.

TWO SYMPHON ON THI

Boston And Baltimore Orchestras To Play—"Carmen" By Baltimore Opera Society—Farrar And Godowsky Recitals Also At Hand.

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Two symphony concerts are on hand this week—those by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday night and the Baltimore Symphony next Sunday afternoon, in both cases the first these respective organizations have given this season.

From OCT 31
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

STANLEY WITH BOSTON SYM

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening, November 5, (the others to be given December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 18), Pierre Montreux will conduct the following program: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." The soloist is to be Madame Helen Stanley, lyric soprano. As prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphiaphia Opera Company, and subsequently of the Chicago Opera Company, as it still exists, she sang the leading roles in French, Italian, German and English. She will sing at this concert Mendelssohn's concert aria, 'Infelice" and Tatiana's Letter scene from Tschaikowsy's Opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

Sun OCT 31
Baltimore, Md.

On Wednesday evening Symphony Orchestra will o timore season at the Lyr Pierre Monteux, continuing a will give the following prog First Symphony of Jan Sibeli nish composer; a new Ame by E. B. Hill, "The Fall of of Usher" (after the grue story by Edgar Allen Poe), lioz's brilliant overture, "Benv lini." As the soloist of the eve Helen Stanley will sing Me concert aria, "Infelice," and Scene from Tschaikowsky's o gen Oniegin." Mme. Stanley soprano who, following long tra and abroad, made appearances opera as prima donna with th Philadelphia Opera Company sequently with the Chicago Gr Company. She has in recent voted herself to concert singing

---

EAGLE, OCT 31
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the Symphony season in Carnegie will take place Thursday evenin Saturday afternoon. Pierre M will conduct on Thursday the p and melodious First Symphon Sibelius in E minor, a Symp Fantasia on Two Folk Songs o jou, by Guillaume Lekeu, the br genius among the compose France, whose career was cut by death while he was s young man, and the "Poem o stasy," by the revolutionary co Scriabin. This impressive wor been described as expressing "t of untrammeled activity." Fo Saturday concert the symphon be the masterpiece of Enesc Rumanian composer, in E-flat A new work by Edward Burli Hill, the American composer, Fall of the House of Usher," wi its first performance in New Yor other numbers will be Cesar Fr Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, o trated by Gabriel Pierne, and lioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cel

---

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MABEL GARRISON WILL S

The management of the Symphony Orchestra announces Helen Stanley, who has been a tised as soloist for the concert on day night at the Academy of M will not sing on that date. Her will be taken by Mabel Garrison coloratura soprano of the Metropo Opera Company. Miss Garrison's bers will be announced later.

From NOV 1
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

MABEL GARRISON TO APPEAR

Will Take Place Of Helen Stanle At Boston Symphony Concert.

Mabel Garrison, the distinguished co ratura soprano of the Metropolita Opera, will be the assisting artist at th first Boston Symphony Orchestra co ert at the Lyric next Wednesday eve ning. [illegible] favorite Baltimore artis will re[illegible] Helen Stanley, who is ill [illegible] be heard here later in th season [illegible] of the Music Lovers' re[illegible]

[illegible] has recently returned from Europe, where sh[illegible] of successful concert ap[illegible]

From OCT 30 1920 M
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Baltimore season next Wednesday evening, November 3, at 8:15, when Pierre Monteux, continuing as its illustrious conductor, will present the following program: The popular and melodious first symphony of Jan Sibelius; a new work by the American composer, E. B. Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after the short story by Edgar Allen Poe), and Berlioz's Overture, Benvenuto Cellini. Madame Helen Stanley, as the first soloist of the season, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's Opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 OCT 30
From
EVENING JOURNAL,

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, again under Pierre Monteux, will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. The first programme will include the First Symphony of Jan Sibelius and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," whilst that of Saturday will contain Georges Enesco's First Symphony and a new piece by Edward Burlingame Hill, based on Poe's story, "The Fall of the House of Usher."

Sun OCT 30 1920 D

THURSDAY.
Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society of New York. Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aeolian Hall, evening, piano recital, Marie Mikova.

From OCT 30 1920 M
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE MUSICAL SEASON

Orchestral Programs, Opera and Concerts of Varied Interest

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the season, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. The symphony will be Enesco's master work in E flat, and the other symphonic numbers Cesar Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's "Lenore," No. 3. Helen Stanley, soprano, as the soloist, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Song from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin."

EveningMail
New York City
OCT 30 1920 M

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

At the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux conductor, these programmes will be given: Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." Saturday matinee, the First Symphony in E-minor, by Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy."

From OCT 30 1920 M
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its current season's concerts at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when a program of unusual interest will be presented. The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, the one in E minor, other orchestral numbers being Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures, a new tone poem by Edward Barlingame Hill, the American composer, that was inspired by Edgar Allan Poe's story of "The Fall of the House of Usher." The assisting artist will be Mme. Helen Stanley, the operatic lyric soprano, who will sing Mendelssohn's air, "Infelice," and also the famous "Letter Song," from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin."

Evening World
New York City OCT 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fortieth season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and play again there on Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux conducting. At the Saturday afternoon concert "The Fall of the House of Usher," a new work by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill, will have its first performance in New York.

EAGLE, OCT 31 1920 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BROOKLYN MUSIC

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following program: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Berlioz's Overture "Benvenuto Cellini." The soloist is to be Mme. Helen Stanley.

TIMES, OCT 31 1920 L
Washington, D. C.

Mme. Galli
Boston Sy
Be Here L

By JESSIE

The Boston Symphony O share the concert honors this in the offering—to be given eight merry-makers in music Artists."

The first concert of the Boston players, under Pierre Monteux, brings a highly diversified program with Beethoven in the symphony, dramatic program music in Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Berlioz, Mendelssohn, and Tschaikowsky. Two opera arias will be given by Mme. Helen Stanley, with orchestra, in which the tone color of Tschaikowsky's orchestral palette will give added charm to the famous letter scene of "Tatiana" from his opera Eugen Oneigen.

From Record OCT 31 1920 K
Philadelphia, Pa.

—The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening, when Pierre Monteux will present the following program: Symphony in E-flat, Enesco; Pierne's orchestra version of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Beethoven's overture, "Lenore," No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin." Madame Stanley's work as a lyric soprano has won her high praise. Her early training was in Chicago, where, at the age of 14 years, she sang as soloist in several churches. She studied in New York and, when still a young girl, won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera. She was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Company, singing leading roles in French, Italian, German and English.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 31 1920 R
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening, when Pierre Monteux, continuing as conductor of the orchestra, presents the following program: The Symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer, Enesco; Pierne's orchestral version of Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Madam Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin." Madam Stanley's brilliant career as a lyric soprano has won her the highest praise in the estimation of our audiences. Her early training was in Chicago, where at the age of fourteen, she sang as soprano soloist in several churches. She soon found herself studying in New York, and when still a young girl won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera there. Thence she was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Co. With this company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Co., as it still exists, she sang the leading roles in French, Italian, German and English.

STAR Washington, D.
OCT 31 1920

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

At the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Pierre Monteux will conduct in the following program: Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony in F Major," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

The soloist will be Mme. Helen Stanley, whose brilliant career as lyric soprano has won her a high place in the estimation of her audiences. When still a young girl she won the coveted place of soloist in the Church of St. Bartholomew, New York. Then followed a long period of European study, which led to many appearances in opera there. Thence she was engaged as prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently with the Chicago Opera Company as it still exists.

She will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and Tatiana's letter scene from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Eugen Onegin."

From OCT 31 1920
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to give five concerts at the Academy of Music during its coming fortieth season on the following five Friday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 4 and March 18, with Mesdames Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska and Messrs. Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists, performed its opening concerts in Boston with brilliant success. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and the illustrious orchestra which sat in full ranks under him, were praised with one accord. The only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia.

From
TIMES, OCT 31 1920 Y
Brooklyn, N. Y.

STANLEY WITH BOSTON SYM

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music Friday evening, November 5, (the others to be given December 3, January 7, February 4 and March 18), Pierre Montreux will conduct the following program: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F Major, Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." The soloist is to be Madame Helen Stanley, lyric soprano. As prima donna of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, and subsequently of the Chicago Opera Company, as it still exists, she sang the leading roles in French, Italian, German and English. She will sing at this concert Mendelssohn's concert aria, 'Infelice" and Tatiana's Letter scene from Tschaikowsy's Opera, "Eugen Oniegin."

AME DON RAF
nister from Ecu the mother of a ures, but I'm not

I think Lieut.
any rate Capt.
e of the balloon ver you call it—l to learn all the is applied to avibut didn't pro-ear.) He, too, is r person and also leed, very enter-ee his ship very any name on it ac, I don't know of having a new d.

ITAL TRUCTIVE.
C. O., showed me by the Internaon the occasion
ts of the Zodiac Washington, with mand. The reel
s of Col. Hensley
Billy 3d, enter-Zodiac. Cute lit-waves at the au-bry himself is n various poses, erned and work-gh nothing was are lovely pic-Washington, too,
House, the Cap-

E
R 8.
g events that is ws across the is the Girl Scout

---

and Soloists Will Be Heard This

GALLI-CURCI

---

om TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I.
te OCT 31

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN FINEST QUALITY.

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now successfully started in Boston, promises to be one of the finest in the history of that renowned institution. Five concerts are to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12th, at which the assisting soloists will be Alice Nielsen, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Richard Brugin and Samuel Gardner, violinists; and Felix Fox, pianist. At each pair of concerts that has been played at Symphony Hall this season there has been nothing but the highest praise for the performances of the orchestra and the skill of the musicians. Mr. H. T. Parker wrote in the Boston Transcript of Oct. 23d: "Above the stage, up and down the auditorium, the atmosphere was electric—even on a Friday afternoon in Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and the heats of it added new virtues to old. And not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast; it played also—and for the first time as refilled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradiant, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individulized choirs. In measures it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in times past was like the human voice in song. So did the orchestra severally and collectively distinguish itself. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready a new band. Yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich."

---

om M
News OCT 31
Baltimore, Md.

TWO SYMPHON ON THIS

Boston And Baltimore Orchestras To Play—"Carmen" By Baltimore Opera Society—Farrar And Godowsky Recitals Also At Hand.

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Two symphony concerts are on hand this week—those by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday night and the Baltimore Symphony next Sunday afternoon, in both cases the first these respective organizations have given this season.

TIGHT BINDING

Sun OCT 31 M
Baltimore, Md.

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Baltimore season at the Lyric Theatre. Pierre Monteux, continuing as conductor, will give the following program: The First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new American work by E. B. Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after the gruesome short story by Edgar Allen Poe), and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." As the soloist of the evening Mme. Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin." Mme. Stanley is a lyric soprano who, following long training here and abroad, made appearances in grand opera as prima donna with the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company and subsequently with the Chicago Grand Opera Company. She has in recent years devoted herself to concert singing.

---

ard This Week

HE STANLEY

EAGLE, OCT 31 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony season in Carnegie Hall will take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux will conduct on Thursday the popular and melodious First Symphony by Sibelius in E minor, a Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou, by Guillaume Lekeu, the brilliant genius among the composers of France, whose career was cut short by death while he was still a young man, and the "Poem of Ecstasy," by the revolutionary composer Scriabin. This impressive work has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammeled activity." For the Saturday concert the symphony will be the masterpiece of Enesco, the Rumanian composer, in E-flat major. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, "The Fall of the House of Usher," will have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

PHON
THIS

timore Or-lay—"Car-nore Opera
And Go-
Also At

ER BROWN ncerts are on by the Bos-ednesday night Symphony next both cases the e organizations

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MABEL GARRISON WILL SING.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Helen Stanley, who has been advertised as soloist for the concert on Friday night at the Academy of Music, will not sing on that date. Her place will be taken by Mabel Garrison, the colorature soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Garrison's numbers will be announced later.

---

rom NOV 1 M
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

ABEL GARRISON TO APPEAR

l Take Place Of Helen Stanley
At Boston Symphony Concert.

abel Garrison, the distinguished colure soprano of the Metropolitan ra, will be the assisting artist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra con-at the Lyric next Wednesday eve-
. This favorite Baltimore artist replace Helen Stanley, who is ill, who will be heard here later in the on at one of the Music Lovers' res.
me. Garrison has recently returned his country from Europe, where she a number of successful concert ap-

NOV 1 M om
Evening Star
altimore, Md.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

Boston programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contain the following:

"City of Boston, Revised Regulation of August 5, 1898—Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

"Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn.

"Attest: J. M. Galvin, City Clerk."

Skull caps, possibly?

And, if a "head covering" is something which covers the head, does the regulation cover coiffures

A note of a different order, however, is that which says:

"The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert."

This tells of a provision for the public which ought to be made wherever possible.

ULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

First Concert of Season, With Mabel Garrison as Substitute Soloist

OPENING its thirty-sixth season in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in an unusually interesting program. Pierre Monteux, who is now the permanent conductor of the orchestra, was given a cordial reception, and emphasized the success which he won last season.

The program had largely the flavor of modern French music, with a symphony by Georges Enesco and the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue of Cesar Franck as its principal numbers. These constituted the first part, after which there was a pleasant vocal interlude in the appearance of Mabel Garrison, the young American soprano, as soloist, with the "Leonore," No. 3, overture of Beethoven as a brilliant instrumental climax.

The Enesco symphony in E flat major—was not entirely new here, having been played by the Philadelphia Orchestra about eight years ago, but it had nevertheless the aspect of a novelty, and its performance was notable, too, because of the fact that it is a work by a living composer—Enesco at present residing in Paris—and was directed by a French conductor. It is in such music that Mr. Monteux may be said to be at his best, and the imposing composition was given an impressive interpretation under his facile and scholarly leadership.

The work is distinctly modern, without going to the extremes of involved profuseness of effect which the term "modernism" in music has come to signify. There is considerable of the vociferous, but also much of the melodious, for the most part in full, compact orchestration, which at times is so rich as to seem "thick." Many beautiful effects are all but lost in the maze of complicated tonalities, as if the composer, fearing that he would not do enough, did too much.

The Boston orchestra returns in excellent form, not all that it used to be in the days of its illustrious past, but retaining much of its former efficiency, in richness and pliancy of tone. There will be improvement in this respect, as the reconstruction of the organization proceeds and its balance is restored. But there was much fine work last evening, not only in the symphony, but in a superb delivery of the Beethoven overture, at the end. There was also a splendid interpretation of the Franck number, an excellent orchestration by Gabriel Pierne of the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, written originally for piano, and played here recently by Ossip Gabrilowitsch in his recital.

The appearance of Mabel Garrison was an unexpected pleasure to the audience, which, in listening to her, had ample compensation for the non-appearance of Helen Stanley, a soprano, formerly well-known here as a member of the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company. Her illness brought Miss Garrison as a last moment substitute, and there was no occasion for disappointment. Miss Garrison's light, flexible soprano, of a purity and sweetness that give color and charm alike to legato passages and to those of "coloratura" intricacy, was heard in two selections, a Mozart aria and "Charmant Oiseau," from David's "The Pearl of Brazil."

STANDARD BROOKLYN
UNION 2- A

MUSICAL NOTES.

It is announced that Mabel Garrison will take the place of Helen Stanley as soprano soloist at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music next Friday night.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 2- M

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Players Give Good Account of Themselves at the Academy

There were some vacant seats at the concert of the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux, at the academy last night. One reason was the powerful counter-attractive of Dr. Stokowski's lecture, which drew a large part of the loyal "old guard."

The Boston players gave an excellent account of themselves. They have not yet regained the virtuoso brilliancy of old, nor the pure golden tone of the choir of violins. But they have with a manful valor set themselves to a reconstructive task upon the wreckage, and the progress already made is striking and praiseworthy. Fortunately some of the veterans still represent the distinguished personal tradition and the esprit de corps of the days of yore.

Pierre Monteux spared no effort and lavished his ability upon the tumultuously vigorous symphony of Enesco, the Rumanian, which opened the program. The work was played by our own orchestra in 1912. The first movement is feverish and restless; the second is sedative, and at intervals finds resting-places of rare beauty for the ear; in the last movement there is a recurrence of the exuberant animation that marks the opening measures.

The aggressive and progressive qualities of the fiery Rumanian gave way to the lofty spirituality of Franck's prelude, chorale anl fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne from the piano score so beautifully displayed by Gabrilowitsch a few evenings ago. The orchestral version, moving as it is, seems hardly so effective as the original form.

Helen Stanley's illness forbade her appearance as soloist, and Mabel Garrison in her place sang two taxing arias—Mozart's "Mia Sempre Adorata" and David's showpiece, "Charmant Oiseau," from "La Perle du Brazil." Miss Garrison rose to the occasion superbly, and in her flexible and easy exhibition of coloratura more than satisfied the expectancy of her hearers. There was applause loud and long for her afterward. She sang Mozart as the music should be sung—with a delicacy and refinement to match the exquisite gentility of the composer's idiom, without melodrama or explosive accentuation. The flute obbligato was well done by Mr. Laurent.

The orchestra finally played Beethoven's "Third Leonore" overture—its best performance of the evening. The trumpet episode was particularly effective, and the ensemble was cohesive—Mozart's "Mia Sempore Adorata" and the whole, since the "diabolic" Muck departed.

From Republican
Springfield, Mas.
OCT 3 X

A People's symphony orchestra is projected in Boston, to give a series of 20 concerts of somewhat more general appeal than the programs of the Boston symphony orchestra. The new orchestra, it is said, is not founded out of animosity to the established orchestra, but because it is believed that there is a field in Boston for both. Considering the remarkable success of the "pop" concerts this year, there seems to be good ground for this view. Discontinuance of the sale of wines did not prove a detriment to the concerts. On the contrary, the attendance was better than ever, and this fall, for the first time, the series was resumed to fill in the gap before the beginning of the regular symphony season. The new orchestra does not purpose to give the type of concert known as the "pop." But it may prove that there is a field the greater part of the year for this institution, which has the great merit of bridging the gulf between the most austere music and the best of the light music.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 4 A CITIZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MISS GARRISON TO SING.

Owing to illness, Miss Helen Stanley will be unable to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. Miss Mabel Garrison has been engaged to take Miss Stanley's place and will sing "Mis Speranza Adorata" (Mozart) and "Charmant Oiseau," from the "Pearl of Brabil" (David).

From INQUIRER NOV. 2
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Evening

There was a large but not an overflowing audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, giving its first local concert for the present season, was heard in a programme which included Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3 and a version made by Gabriel Pierne of a prelude, chorale and fugue by Cesar Franck, and which has for its central and most substantial feature the symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer Enesco. Although not well known here, this melodious and ingratiating work is not an absolute novelty. It has had one or two performances which may be pleasantly remembered, and it is so spontaneous and characteristic it contains so much that is racy and original, it smacks so strongly of the Rumanian soil, that it was a pleasure to hear it again, especially in view of the brilliancy and eloquence by which its interpretation was distinguished.

The Boston organization, which at the close of the last season had become sadly demoralized as the result of various untoward circumstances over which its management had no control, has regained much of its former lustre and is playing with something like a near approach to its old unequaled form. There is still room for improvement in the quality of the tone which it produces, although in this respect, as in others, a marked improvement has been made, but the spirit and technical efficiency of its execution, the unanimity of its ensemble and its ready responsiveness to the conductor's baton bespeak alike the excellence of its material and the efficiency of the discipline to which it has evidently been subjected. Its work, whether in the symphony or in the other numbers on the list, was greatly enjoyed and is deserving of a hearty commendation.

Owing to an indisposition, Miss Stanley was unable to appear, but her place was most acceptably taken by Miss Mabel Garrison, one of the younger singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is well known here. She sang an aria by Mozart and the "Charmant Oiseau," with flute obligato, from "The Pearl of Brazil." To a charming personality she adds a high voice of singular purity. She sings with great perfection of technique and delightful tone color. She was recalled many times by an appreciative audience.

Post
Washington, D. C.

CONTRALTO'S VOICE DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Mme. Homer Takes Place of Helen Stanley at Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the first concert in its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. Louise Homer, contralto, was soloist in place of Helen Stanley, soprano, who was too ill to appear. M. Monteux chose the eighth symphony of Beethoven in F major, opus 93, for its opening number, and the orchestra played it with simplicity, breadth and dignity, and two of the movements with delicacy and lightness.

The last number was the Liszt symphonic poem, No. 2, which they played with brilliant climaxes and crescendos. Mrs. Homer sang "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the air from "Julius Caesar," by Haendel. The first was rich in beautiful tone and interpretation, for she sang it with breadth and classic style. The Haendel air was delightful and showed Mrs. Homer's complete voice control in the coloratura work the air requires. She was recalled many times by the large and enthusiastic audience, in spite of the fact that encores on symphonic programs are not permitted. M. Monteux also received an ovation at the close of the program. The second concert will be given on Tuesday afternoon, November 30, in the National Theater, with Jean Bedetti, cellist, as soloist.

STAR, NOV. 3
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, with Mme. Louise Homer as the assisting artist inaugurated its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon with a concert at the New National Theater. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, who was originally announced as the assisting artist, was unable to appear and Mme. Homer replaced her, singing with her usual charm and artistry "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the air from "Julius Caesar," by Haendel. She was recalled many times by an appreciative audience. The symphony, Beethoven's "Eighth in F Major," opus 93, was beautifully rendered, as also was the Liszt "Symphonic Poem No. 2," the other purely orchestral number on the program. At the close of the concert much enthusiasm was manifested by the audience in applause for Conductor Monteux and the orchestra.

The next concert of the orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 30.

From NOV 2
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

On October 22 the Boston Orchestra gave its third concert in Boston, playing the same Sibelius symphony that we are to hear in Baltimore tomorrow evening, and also the Scriabine "Poem of Ecstasy" and Ropartz's "Divertissement." As there seems to be a vague unrest in Baltimore as to the artistic status of this time-honored organization at the present time, you will, I am sure, be interested in reading what that most distinguished of critics, H. T. Parker, of the Boston Transcript, wrote of what he described as "a band renewed, an afternoon of tonal power, splendor and finesse." I shall quote here but a few paragraphs of the writer's exhaustive criticism of the performance, but enough ot indicate the place now occupied in the musical world by the Boston Symphony: "The first two symphony concerts of the autumn were interesting, gave pleasure. The third, yesterday afternoon, rose to splendor of impression, evoked ardor of response. . . . Above the stage, up and down the auditorium, the atmosphere was electric—even on a Friday afternoon in Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and in the heats of it added new virtues to the old. Not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast. It played also—and for the first time as a refilled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradient, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs. In measures within the "Divertissement"—music often of suave, pliant elegance—it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more, in this piece by Ropart, came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in times past was like the human voice in song. . . . The fitful reverberations, the restless rhythms, the long range of Sibelius' symphony lay equally within this imparting power—the darksome and storming Allegro, the pale and penetrating Andante, the clumping Scherzo, the plunging, screaming Finale. The composer himself could hardly have heard in imagination a sharper edge upon the violins, a larger vigor in the basses, a voice more wan and piercing in oboes and clarinets, a richer sonority in the horns, a more ominous or frenetic drumbeat. So did the orchestra, severally and collectively, distinguish itself. With such zest, imagination and scope of characterizing power did the conductor enter into the music of the day. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready his new band; yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich."

I trust that at some later concert we may hear the Scriabine and Ropartz numbers, for Mr. Parker, in concluding his remarks about the orchestra before taking up the question of the "selections," adds: "If New York two weeks hence is to know the Boston Orchestra of 1920 as it really is, it should hear it in Sibelius, Scriabine and Ropartz." But, then, you see Mr. Parker, like most people who go frequently to concerts, appreciates the moderns. Just what particular coterie of concertgoers—one can scarcely call them music lovers—the program makers are trying to please, where year after year, as regularly as June follows May, they select the same classic numbers for the delectation of Baltimoreans, is not quite apparent. We shall probably have to depend upon Mr. Monteux and his "renewed band" to extend our knowledge of composers, for it looks now as if the other orchestras were not going to play anything but Beethoven symphonies and the compositions of the ancients!

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
NOV 3

FAMED ORCHESTRA TENDERED OVATION

Boston Symphony Players Delight Enthusiastic Audience With Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux directing, made its bow to Washington this season before an enthusiastic audience at the National Theater yesterday afternoon that filled the theater and gave a real ovation to Mme. Louise Homer, our queenly American contralto, who took the place of Mme. Helen Stanley who was ill.

Showing their accustomed beauty of detail in playing, this great body of artists particularly in the Liszt tone-poem "Tasso" gave a stirring illustration of the rich "concord of sweet sound" that lies within the reach of the orchestral voice under spirited direction. The tone poem's "lament" was rare in tonality from the wind choirs and a full deep singing of the strings. Arias there were of southern romance against a tragic orchestra of Wagnerian complexity and dramatic meaning. Mr. Monteux brought it to a triumphant hymn of rare choral lovliness in full orchestra.

Mme. Homer sang two great arias of Gluck and Handel. The "Che faro" from Gluck's "Orpheus" at once disclosed that very personal beauty of voice for which this singer is notable.

TIGHT BINDING

Sun OCT 31 M
Baltimore, Md.

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Baltimore season at the Lyric Theatre. Pierre Monteux, continuing as conductor, will give the following program: The First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new American work by E. B. Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after the gruesome short story by Edgar Allen Poe), and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." As the soloist of the evening Mme. Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin." Mme. Stanley is a lyric soprano who, following long training here and abroad, made appearances in grand opera as prima donna with the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company and subsequently with the Chicago Grand Opera Company. She has in recent years devoted herself to concert singing.

---

ard This Week

HE STANLEY

EAGLE, OCT 31
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony season in Carnegie Hall will take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux will conduct on Thursday the popular and melodious First Symphony by Sibelius in E minor, a Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou, by Guillaume Lekeu, the brilliant genius among the composers of France, whose career was cut short by death while he was still a young man, and the "Poem of Ecstasy," by the revolutionary composer Scriabin. This impressive work has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammeled activity." For the Saturday concert the symphony will be the masterpiece of Enesco, the Rumanian composer, in E-flat major. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, "The Fall of the House of Usher," will have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

EAGLE,
oklyn, N. Y.

MABEL GARRISON WILL SING.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Helen Stanley, who has been advertised as soloist for the concert on Friday night at the Academy of Music, will not sing on that date. Her place will be taken by Mabel Garrison, the coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Garrison's numbers will be announced later.

---

rom
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

ABEL GARRISON TO APPEAR

l Take Place Of Helen Stanley At Boston Symphony Concert.

abel Garrison, the distinguished colure soprano of the Metropolitan ra, will be the assisting artist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra con at the Lyric next Wednesday eve. This favorite Baltimore artist replace Helen Stanley, who is ill, who will be heard here later in the on at one of the Music Lovers' res.

me. Garrison has recently returned is country from Europe, where she a number of successful concert ap nce

---

M

PHON
THIS

ltimore Or-lay—"Car-
nore Opera
And Go-
s Also At

IER BROWN

ncerts e by the Bos-ednesday night
ymphony next both cases the organizations

---

om NOV 1 M
Evening Star
altimore, Md.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

Boston programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contain the following:

"City of Boston, Revised Regulation of August 5, 1898—Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

"Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being, understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn.

"Attest: J. M. Galvin, City Clerk."

Skull caps, possibly?

And, if a "head covering" is something which covers the head, does the regulation cover coiffures

A note of a different order, however, is that which says:

"The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert."

This tells of a provision for the public which ought to be made wherever possible.

LLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

First Concert of Season, With Mabel Garrison as Substitute Soloist

OPENING its thirty-sixth season in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in an unusually interesting program. Pierre Monteux, who is now the permanent conductor of the orchestra, was given a cordial reception, and emphasized the success which he won last season.

The program had largely the flavor of modern French music, with a symphony by Georges Enesco and the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue of Cesar Franck as its principal numbers. These constituted the first part, after which there was a pleasant vocal interlude in the appearance of Mabel Garrison, the young American soprano, as soloist, with the "Leonore." No. 3, overture of Beethoven as a brilliant instrumental climax.

The Enesco symphony—in E flat major—was not entirely new here, having been played by the Philadelphia Orchestra about eight years ago, but it had nevertheless the aspect of a novelty, and its performance was notable, too, because of the fact that it is a work by a living composer—Enesco at present residing in Paris—and was directed by a French conductor. It is in such music that Mr. Monteux may be said to be at his best, and the imposing composition was given an impressive interpretation under his facile and scholarly leadership.

The work is distinctly modern, without going to the extremes of involved profuseness of effect which the term "modernism" in music has come to signify. There is considerable of the vociferous, but also much of the melodious, for the most part in full, compact orchestration, which at times is so rich as to seem "thick." Many beautiful effects are all but lost in the maze of complicated tonalities, as if the composer, fearing that he would not do enough, did too much.

The Boston orchestra returns in excellent form, not all that it used to be in the days of its illustrious past, but retaining much of its former efficiency, in richness and pliancy of tone. There will be improvement in this respect, as the reconstruction of the organization proceeds and its balance is restored. But there was much fine work last evening, not only in the symphony, but in a superb delivery of the Beethoven overture, at the end. There was also a splendid interpretation of the Franck number, an excellent orchestration by Gabriel Pierne of the Prelude. Chorale and Fugue, written originally for piano, and played here recently by Ossip Gabrilowitsch in his recital.

The appearance of Mabel Garrison was an unexpected pleasure to the audience, which, in listening to her, had ample compensation for the non-appearance of Helen Stanley, a soprano, formerly well-known here as a member of the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company. Her illness brought Miss Garrison as a last moment substitute, and there was no occasion for disappointment. Miss Garrison's light, flexible soprano, of a purity and sweetness that give color and charm alike to legato passages and to those of "coloratura" intricacy, was heard in two selections, a Mozart aria and "Charmant Oiseau," from David's "The Pearl of Brazil."

STANDARD UNION BROOKLYN 2

MUSICAL NOTES.

It is announced that Mabel Garrison will take the place of Helen Stanley as soprano soloist at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music next Friday night.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 2 M

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Players Give Good Account of Themselves at the Academy

There were some vacant seats at the concert of the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux, at the academy last night. One reason was the powerful counter-attractive of Dr. Stokowski's lecture, which drew a large part of the loyal "old guard."

The Boston players gave an excellent account of themselves. They have not yet regained the virtuoso brilliancy of old, nor the pure golden tone of the choir of violins. But they have with a manful valor set themselves to a reconstructive task upon the wreckage, and the progress already made is striking and praiseworthy. Fortunately some of the veterans still represent the distinguished personal tradition and the esprit de corps of the days of yore.

Pierre Monteux spared no effort and lavished his ability upon the tumultuously vigorous symphony of Enesco, the Rumanian, which opened the program. The work was played by our own orchestra in 1912. The first movement is feverish and restless; the second is sedative, and at intervals finds resting-places of rare beauty for the ear; in the last movement there is a recurrence of the exuberant animation that marks the opening measures.

The aggressive and progressive qualities of the fiery Rumanian gave way to the lofty spirituality of Franck's prelude, chorale anl fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne from the piano score so beautifully displayed by Gabrilowitsch a few evenings ago. The orchestral version, moving as it is, seems hardly so effective as the original form.

Helen Stanley's illness forbade her appearance as soloist, and Mabel Garrison in her place sang two taxing arias —Mozart's "Mia Sempre Adorata" and David's showpiece, "Charmant Oiseau," from "La Perle du Brazil." Miss Garrison rose to the occasion superbly, and in her flexible and easy exhibition of coloratura more than satisfied the expectancy of her hearers. There was applause loud and long for her afterward. She sang Mozart as the music should be sung—with a delicacy and refinement to match the exquisite gentility of the composer's idiom, without melodrama or explosive accentuation. The flute obbligato was well done by Mr. Laurent.

The orchestra finally played Beethoven's "Third Leonore" overture—its best performance of the evening. The trumpet episode was particularly effective, and the ensemble was cohesive —Mozart's "Mia Sempore Adorata" and the whole, since the "diabolic" Muck departed.

From Republican
Springfield, Mas.
OCT 3

A People's symphony orchestra is projected in Boston, to give a series of 20 concerts of somewhat more general appeal than the programs of the Boston symphony orchestra. The new orchestra, it is said, is not founded out of animosity to the established orchestra, but because it is believed that there is a field in Boston for both. Considering the remarkable success of the "pop" concerts this year, there seems to be good ground for this view. Discontinuance of the sale of wines did not prove a detriment to the concerts. On the contrary, the attendance was better than ever, and this fall, for the first time, the series was resumed to fill in the gap before the beginning of the regular symphony season. The new orchestra does not purpose to give the type of concert known as the "pop." But it may prove that there is a field the greater part of the year for this institution, which has the great merit of bridging the gulf between the most austere music and the best of the light music.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 4 A CITIZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MISS GARRISON TO SING.

Owing to illness, Miss Helen Stanley will be unable to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. Miss Mabel Garrison has been engaged to take Miss Stanley's place and will sing "Mis Speranza Adorata" (Mozart) and "Charmant Oiseau," from the "Pearl of Brabil" (David).

From INQUIRER NOV 2
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Evening

There was a large but not an overflowing audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, giving its first local concert for the present season, was heard in a programme which included Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3 and a version made by Gabriel Pierne of a prelude, chorale and fugue by Cesar Franck, and which has for its central and most substantial feature the symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer Enesco. Although not well known here, this melodious and ingratiating work is not an absolute novelty. It has had one or two performances which may be pleasantly remembered, and it is so spontaneous and characteristic it contains so much that is racy and original, it smacks so strongly of the Rumanian soil, that it was a pleasure to hear it again, especially in view of the brilliancy and eloquence by which its interpretation was distinguished.

The Boston organization, which at the close of the last season had become sadly demoralized as the result of various untoward circumstances over which its management had no control, has regained much of its former lustre and is playing with something like a near approach to its old unequaled form. There is still room for improvement in the quality of the tone which it produces, although in this respect, as in others, a marked improvement has been made, but the spirit and technical efficiency of its execution, the unanimity of its ensemble and its ready responsiveness to the conductor's baton bespeak alike the excellence of its material and the efficiency of the discipline to which it has evidently been subjected. Its work, whether in the symphony or in the other numbers on the list, was greatly enjoyed and is deserving of a hearty commendation.

Owing to an indisposition, Miss Stanley was unable to appear, but her place was most acceptably taken by Miss Mabel Garrison, one of the younger singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is well known here. She sang an aria by Mozart and the "Charmant Oiseau," with flute obligato, from "The Pearl of Brazil." To a charming personality she adds a high voice of singular purity. She sings with great perfection of technique and delightful tone color. She was recalled many times by an appreciative audience.

Post
Washington, D.C.

CONTRALTO'S VOICE DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Mme. Homer Takes Place of Helen Stanley at Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the first concert in its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. Louise Homer, contralto, was soloist in place of Helen Stanley, soprano, who was too ill to appear. M. Monteux chose the eighth symphony of Beethoven in F major, opus 93, for its opening number, and the orchestra played it with simplicity, breadth and dignity, and two of the movements with delicacy and lightness.

The last number was the Liszt symphonic poem, No. 2, which they played with brilliant climaxes and crescendos. Mrs. Homer sang "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the air from "Julius Caesar," by Haendel. The first was rich in beautiful ttne and interpretation, for she sang it with breadth and classic style. The Haendel air was delightful and showed Mrs. Homer's complete voice control in the coloratura work the air requires. She was recalled many times by the large and enthusiastic audience, in spite of the fact that encores on symphonic programs are not permitted. M. Monteux also received an ovation at the close of the program. The second concert will be given on Tuesday afternoon, November 30, in the National Theater, with Jean Bedetti, cellist, as soloist.

KAY BEE

STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, with Mme. Louise Homer as the assisting artist inaugurated its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon with a concert at the New National Theater. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, who was originally announced as the assisting artist, was unable to appear and Mme. Homer replaced her, singing with her usual charm and artistry "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the air from "Julius Caesar," by Haendel. She was recalled many times by an appreciative audience. The symphony, Beethoven's "Eighth in F Major," opus 93, was beautifully rendered, as also was the Liszt "Symphonic Poem No. 2," the other purely orchestral number on the program. At the close of the concert much enthusiasm was manifested by the audience in applause for Conductor Monteux and the orchestra.

The next concert of the orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 30.

From NOV 2
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

On October 22 the Boston Orchestra gave its third concert in Boston, playing the same Sibelius symphony that we are to hear in Baltimore tomorrow evening, and also the Scriabine "Poem of Ecstasy" and Ropartz's "Divertissement." As there seems to be a vague unrest in Baltimore as to the artistic status of this time-honored organization at the present time, you will, I am sure, be interested in reading what that most distinguished of critics, H. T. Parker, of the Boston Transcript, wrote of what he described as "a band renewed, an afternoon of tonal power, splendor and finesse." I shall quote here but a few paragraphs of the writer's exhaustive criticism of the performance, but enough ot indicate the place now occupied in the musical world by the Boston Symphony: "The first two symphony concerts of the autumn were interesting, gave pleasure. The third, yesterday afternoon, rose to splendor of impression, evoked ardor of response. . . . Above the stage, up and down the auditorium, the atmosphere was electric—even on a Friday afternoon in Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and in the heats of it added new virtues to the old. Not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast. It played also—and for the first time as a refilled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradient, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs. In measures within the "Divertissement"—music, often of suave, pliant elegance—it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more, in this piece by Ropart, came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in times past was like the human voice in song. . . . The fitful reverberations, the restless rhythms, the long range of Sibelius' symphony lay equally within this imparting power—the darksome and storming Allegro, the pale and penetrating Andante, the clumping Scherzo, the plunging, screaming Finale. The composer himself could hardly have heard in imagination a sharper edge upon the violins, a larger vigor in the basses, a voice more wan and piercing in oboes and clarinets, a richer sonority in the horns, a more ominous or trenetic drumbeat. So did the orchestra, severally and collectively, distinguish itself. With such zest, imagination and scope of characterizing power did the conductor enter into the music of the day. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready his new band; yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich."

I trust that at some later concert we may hear the Scriabine and Ropartz numbers, for Mr. Parker, in concluding his remarks about the orchestra before taking up the question of the "selections," adds: "If New York two weeks hence is to know the Boston Orchestra of 1920 as it really is, it should hear it in Sibelius, Scriabine and Ropartz." But, then, you see Mr. Parker, like most people who go frequently to concerts, appreciates the moderns. Just what particular coterie of concertgoers—one can scarcely call them music lovers—the program makers are trying to please, where year after year, as regularly as June follows May, they select the same classic numbers for the delectation of Baltimoreans, is not quite apparent. We shall probably have to depend upon Mr. Monteux and his "renewed band" to extend our knowledge of composers, for it looks now as if the other orchestras were not going to play anything but Beethoven symphonies and the compositions of the ancients!

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
NOV 3

FAMED ORCHESTRA TENDERED OVATION

Boston Symphony Players Delight Enthusiastic Audience With Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux directing, made its bow to Washington this season before an enthusiastic audience at the National Theater yesterday afternoon that filled the theater and gave a real ovation to Mme. Louise Homer, our queenly American contralto, who took the place of Mme. Helen Stanley who was ill.

Showing their accustomed beauty of detail in playing, this great body of artists particularly in the Liszt tone-poem "Tasso" gave a stirring illustration of the rich "concord of sweet sound" that lies within the reach of the orchestral voice under spirited direction. The tone poem's "lament" was rare in tonality from the wind choirs and a full deep singing of the strings. Arias there were of southern romance against a tragic orchestra of Wagnerian complexity and dramatic meaning. Mr. Monteux brought it to a triumphant hymn of rare choral lovliness in full orchestra.

Mme. Homer sang two great arias of Gluck and Handel. The "Che faro" from Gluck's "Orpheus" at once disclosed that very personal beauty of voice for which this singer is notable.

[36]

TIGHT BINDING

Sun OCT 31 M
Baltimore, Md.

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Baltimore season at the Lyric Theatre. Pierre Monteux, continuing as conductor, will give the following program: The First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer; a new American work by E. B. Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (after the gruesome short story by Edgar Allen Poe), and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." As the soloist of the evening Mme. Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice," and the Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin." Mme. Stanley is a lyric soprano who, following long training here and abroad, made appearances in grand opera as prima donna with the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company and subsequently with the Chicago Grand Opera Company. She has in recent years devoted herself to concert singing.

---

eard This Week

STANLEY

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony season in Carnegie Hall will take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux will conduct on Thursday the popular and melodious First Symphony by Sibelius in E minor, a Symphonic Fantasia on "Two Folk Songs of Anjou" by Guillaume Lekeu, the brilliant … among the composers of …ce, whose career was cut short …death while he was still a young man, and the "Poem of Ecstasy," by the revolutionary composer Scriabin. This impressive work has been described as expressing "the joy of untrammeled activity." For the Saturday concert the symphony will be the masterpiece of Enesco, the Rumanian composer, in E-flat major. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, the American composer, "The Fall of the House of Usher," will have its first performance in New York. The other numbers will be Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

OM

MPHON N THIS

altimore Or-Play—"Car-altimore Opera
rar And Goitals Also At

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

ABEL GARRISON WILL SING.

management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that …n Stanley, who has been advertised as soloist for the concert on Friday night at the Academy of Music, … not sing on that date. Her place … be taken by Mabel Garrison, the …rature soprano of the Metropolitan …a Company. Miss Garrison's num… will be announced later.

ILMER BROWN

concerts are on … those by the Bos… Wednesday night … Symphony next … in both cases the …tive organizations …ason.

---

m
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

ABEL GARRISON TO APPEAR

Take Place Of Helen Stanley
Boston Symphony Concert.

Garrison, the distinguished col… soprano of the Metropolitan … will be the assisting artist at the … the Lyric next Wednesday con… Boston Symphony Orchestra … This favorite Baltimore artist …lace Helen Stanley, who is ill … Garrison will be heard here later in the … one of the Music Lovers' re…

Garrison has recently returned … country from Europe, where she … number of concert ap…

---

om NOV 1 M
Evening Star
altimore, Md.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

Boston programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contain the following:

"City of Boston, Revised Regulation of August 5, 1898—Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement.

"Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn.

"Attest: J. M. Galvin, City Clerk."

Skull caps, possibly?

And, if a "head covering" is something which covers the head, does the regulation cover coiffures

A note of a different order, however, is that which says:

"The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert."

This tells of a provision for the public which ought to be made wherever possible.

ULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

First Concert of Season, With Mabel Garrison as Substitute Soloist

OPENING its thirty-sixth season in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in an unusually interesting program. Pierre Monteux, who is now the permanent conductor of the orchestra, was given a cordial reception, and emphasized the success which he won last season.

The program had largely the flavor of modern French music, with a symphony by Georges Enesco and the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue of Cesar Franck as its principal numbers. These constituted the first part, after which there was a pleasant vocal interlude in the appearance of Mabel Garrison, the young American soprano, as soloist, with the "Leonore," No. 3, overture of Beethoven as a brilliant instrumental climax.

The Enesco symphony—in E flat major—was not entirely new here, having been played by the Philadelphia Orchestra about eight years ago, but it had nevertheless the aspect of a novelty, and its performance was notable, too, because of the fact that it is a work by a living composer—Enesco at present residing in Paris—and was directed by a French conductor. It is in such music that Mr. Monteux may be said to be at his best, and the imposing composition was given an impressive interpretation under his facile and scholarly leadership.

The work is distinctly modern, without going to the extremes of involved profuseness of effect which the term "modernism" in music has come to signify. There is considerable of the vociferous, but also much of the melodious, for the most part in full, compact orchestration, which at times is so rich as to seem "thick." Many beautiful effects are all but lost in the maze of complicated tonalities, as if the composer, fearing that he would not do enough, did too much.

The Boston orchestra returns in excellent form, not all that it used to be in the days of its illustrious past, but retaining much of its former efficiency, in richness and pliancy of tone. There will be improvement in this respect, as the reconstruction of the organization proceeds and its balance is restored. But there was much fine work last evening, not only in the symphony, but in a superb delivery of the Beethoven overture, at the end. There was also a splendid interpretation of the Franck number, an excellent orchestration by Gabriel Pierne of the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, written originally for piano, and played here recently by Ossip Gabrilowitsch in his recital.

The appearance of Mabel Garrison was an unexpected pleasure to the audience, which, in listening to her, had ample compensation for the non-appearance of Helen Stanley, a soprano, formerly well-known here as a member of the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company. Her illness brought Miss Garrison as a last moment substitute, and there was no occasion for disappointment. Miss Garrison's light, flexible soprano, of a purity and sweetness that give color and charm alike to legato passages and to those of "coloratura" intricacy, was heard in two selections, a Mozart aria and "Charmant Oiseau," from David's "The Pearl of Brazil."

STANDARD BROOKLYN
UNION 2- A

MUSICAL NOTES.

It is announced that Mabel Garrison will take the place of Helen Stanley as soprano soloist at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music next Friday night.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 2- M

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Players Give Good Account of Themselves at the Academy

There were some vacant seats at the concert of the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux, at the academy last night. One reason was the powerful counter-attractive of Dr. Stokowski's lecture, which drew a large part of the loyal "old guard."

The Boston players gave an excellent account of themselves. They have not yet regained the virtuoso brilliancy of old, nor the pure golden tone of the choir of violins. But they have with a manful valor set themselves to a reconstructive task upon the wreckage, and the progress already made is striking and praiseworthy. Fortunately some of the veterans still represent the distinguished personal tradition and the esprit de corps of the days of yore.

Pierre Monteux spared no effort and lavished his ability upon the tumultuously vigorous symphony of Enesco, the Rumanian, which opened the program. The work was played by our own orchestra in 1912. The first movement is feverish and restless; the second is sedative, and at intervals finds resting-places of rare beauty for the ear; in the last movement there is a recurrence of the exuberant animation that marks the opening measures.

The aggressive and progressive qualities of the fiery Rumanian gave way to the lofty spirituality of Franck's prelude, chorale anl fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne from the piano score so beautifully displayed by Gabrilowitsch a few evenings ago. The orchestral version, moving as it is, seems hardly so effective as the original form.

Helen Stanley's illness forbade her appearance as soloist, and Mabel Garrison in her place sang two taxing arias—Mozart's "Mia Sempre Adorata" and David's showpiece, "Charmant Oiseau," from "La Perle du Brazil." Miss Garrison rose to the occasion superbly, and in her flexible and easy exhibition of coloratura more than satisfied the expectancy of her hearers. There was applause loud and long for her afterward. She sang Mozart as the music should be sung—with a delicacy and refinement to match the exquisite gentility of the composer's idiom, without melodrama or explosive accentuation. The flute obbligato was well done by Mr. Laurent.

The orchestra finally played Beethoven's "Third Leonore" overture—its best performance of the evening. The trumpet episode was particularly effective, and the ensemble was cohesive—Mozart's "Mia Sempore Adorata" and the whole, since the "diabolic" Muck departed.

From Republican
Springfield, Mas.
OCT 3

A People's symphony orchestra is projected in Boston, to give a series of 20 concerts of somewhat more general appeal than the programs of the Boston symphony orchestra. The new orchestra, it is said, is not founded out of animosity to the established orchestra, but because it is believed that there is a field in Boston for both. Considering the remarkable success of the "pop" concerts this year, there seems to be good ground for this view. Discontinuance of the sale of wines did not prove a detriment to the concerts. On the contrary, the attendance was better than ever, and this fall, for the first time, the series was resumed to fill in the gap before the beginning of the regular symphony season. The new orchestra does not purpose to give the type of concert known as the "pop." But it may prove that there is a field the greater part of the year for this institution, which has the great merit of bridging the gulf between the most austere music and the best of the light music.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From CITIZEN, NOV 4 A
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MISS GARRISON TO SING.

Owing to illness, Miss Helen Stanley will be unable to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. Miss Mabel Garrison has been engaged to take Miss Stanley's place and will sing "Mis Speranza Adorata" (Mozart" and "Charmant Oiseau," from the "Pearl of Brabil" (David).

From INQUIRER NOV 2
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Evening

There was a large but not an overflowing audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux, giving its first local concert for the present season, was heard in a programme which included Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3 and a version made by Gabriel Pierne of a prelude, chorale and fugue by Cesar Franck, and which has for its central and most substantial feature the symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer Enesco. Although not well known here, this melodious and ingratiating work is not an absolute novelty. It has had one or two performances which may be pleasantly remembered, and it is so spontaneous and characteristic it contains so much that is racy and original, it smacks so strongly of the Rumanian soil, that it was a pleasure to hear it again, especially in view of the brilliancy and eloquence by which its interpretation was distinguished.

The Boston organization, which at the close of the last season had become sadly demoralized as the result of various untoward circumstances over which its management had no control, has regained much of its former lustre and is playing with something like a near approach to its old unequaled form. There is still room for improvement in the quality of the tone which it produces, although in this respect, as in others, a marked improvement has been made, but the spirit and technical efficiency of its execution, the unanimity of its ensemble and its ready responsiveness to the conductor's baton bespeak alike the excellence of its material and the efficiency of the discipline to which it has evidently been subjected. Its work, whether in the symphony or in the other numbers on the list, was greatly enjoyed and is deserving of a hearty commendation.

Owing to an indisposition, Miss Stanley was unable to appear, but her place was most acceptably taken by Miss Mabel Garrison, one of the younger singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is well known here. She sang an aria by Mozart and the "Charmant Oiseau," with flute obligato, from "The Pearl of Brazil." To a charming personality she adds a high voice of singular purity. She sings with great perfection of technique and delightful tone color. She was recalled many times by an appreciative audience.

Post
Washington, D. C.

CONTRALTO'S VOICE DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Mme. Homer Takes Place of Helen Stanley at Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the first concert in its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. Louise Homer, contralto, was soloist in place of Helen Stanley, soprano, who was too ill to appear. M. Monteux chose the eighth symphony of Beethoven in F major, opus 93, for its opening number, and the orchestra played it with simplicity, breadth and dignity, and two of the movements with delicacy and lightness.

The last number was the Liszt symphonic poem, No. 2, which they played with brilliant climaxes and crescendos. Mrs. Homer sang "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the air from "Julius Caesar," by Haendel. The first was rich in beautiful ttne and interpretation, for she sang it with breadth and classic style. The Haendel air was delightful and showed Mrs. Homer's complete voice control in the coloratura work the air requires. She was recalled many times by the large and enthusiastic audience, in spite of the fact that encores on symphonic programs are not permitted. M. Monteux also received an ovation at the close of the program. The second concert will be given on Tuesday afternoon, November 30, in the National Theater, with Jean Bedetti, cellist, as soloist.

KAY BEE

STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, with Mme. Louise Homer as the assisting artist, inaugurated its fortieth season in Washington yesterday afternoon with a concert at the New National Theater. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, who was originally announced as the assisting artist, was unable to appear and Mme. Homer replaced her, singing with her usual charm and artistry "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo," and the air from "Julius Caesar," by Haendel. She was recalled many times by an appreciative audience. The symphony, Beethoven's "Eighth in F Major," opus 93, was beautifully rendered, as also was the Liszt "Symphonic Poem No. 2," the other purely orchestral number on the program. At the close of the concert much enthusiasm was manifested by the audience in applause for Conductor Monteux and the orchestra.

The next concert of the orchestra will be given at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 30.

From NOV 2
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

On October 22 the Boston Orchestra gave its third concert in Boston, playing the same Sibelius symphony that we are to hear in Baltimore tomorrow evening, and also the Scriabine "Poem of Ecstasy" and Ropartz's "Divertissement." As there seems to be a vague unrest in Baltimore as to the artistic status of this time-honored organization at the present time, you will, I am sure, be interested in reading what that most distinguished of critics, H. T. Parker, of the Boston Transcript, wrote of what he described as "a band renewed, an afternoon of tonal power, splendor and finesse." I shall quote here but a few paragraphs of the writer's exhaustive criticism of the performance, but enough ot indicate the place now occupied in the musical world by the Boston Symphony: "The first two symphony concerts of the autumn were interesting, gave pleasure. The third, yesterday afternoon, rose to splendor of impression, evoked ardor of response. . . . Above the stage, up and down the auditorium, the atmosphere was electric—even on a Friday afternoon in Boston. The orchestra struck communicating fire, and in the heats of it added new virtues to the old. Not only did it play with familiar richness and power of tone, with large sweep and impinging emphasis and contrast. It played also—and for the first time as a refilled band—with quick, fine impulse to modulation, gradient, transition; with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs. In measures within the "Divertissement"—music, often of suave, pliant elegance—it regained feeling for euphony, ear and hand for shimmering tone—not the least of its ancient glories. Once more, in this piece by Ropart, came the phrasing among the strings and the wood-winds that in times past was like the human voice in song. . . . The fitful reverberations, the restless rhythms, the long range of Sibelius' symphony lay equally within this imparting power—the darksome and storming Allegro, the pale and penetrating Andante, the clumping Scherzo, the plunging, screaming Finale. The composer himself could hardly have heard in imagination a sharper edge upon the violins, a larger vigor in the basses, a voice more wan and piercing in oboes and clarinets, a richer sonority in the horns, a more ominous or trenetic drumbeat. So did the orchestra, severally and collectively, distinguish itself. With such zest, imagination and scope of characterizing power did the conductor enter into the music of the day. These three weeks Mr. Monteux has been making ready his new band; yesterday it emerged in the quality to which at last he has brought it and which he bids fair further to enrich."

I trust that at some later concert we may hear the Scriabine and Ropartz numbers, for Mr. Parker, in concluding his remarks about the orchestra before taking up the question of the "selections," adds: "If New York two weeks hence is to know the Boston Orchestra of 1920 as it really is, it should hear it in Sibelius, Scriabine and Ropartz." But, then, you see Mr. Parker, like most people who go frequently to concerts, appreciates the moderns. Just what particular coterie of concertgoers—one can scarcely call them music lovers—the program makers are trying to please, where year after year, as regularly as June follows May, they select the same classic numbers for the delectation of Baltimoreans, is not quite apparent. We shall probably have to depend upon Mr. Monteux and his "renewed band" to extend our knowledge of composers, for it looks now as if the other orchestras were not going to play anything but Beethoven symphonies and the compositions of the ancients!

She gave it with restraint, a quiet loveliness of melodic line, while the Handel aria from "Julius Caesar" was nobly dramatic in its breadth, the facile execution delightfully even and yet filled with the melody that may pervade this music. Mme. Homer's singing with the orchestral background was a treat.

Beethoven's genial Eighth was the symphony. It was given with suave charm, with delicacy and with a rugged gusto that brought out the finale in a jocose spirit, as though the master composer was having high holiday with each and every group of the orchestral family. The overture of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" completed a program delightfully balanced, impressively delivered. It was the first in the series of five concerts by this orchestra, presented through Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

[36]

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A symphony concert of popular character will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, November 21, at 3 o'clock, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the receipts to be added to the pension fund for retired players, according to the traditional practice of the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will make the program memorable by conducting "Scheherazade," the famous suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is considered his masterpiece. Another brilliant and spectacular score is the tone poem of Saint-Saens, "The Youth of Hercules." Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" will also be played, and there will be a noted soloist, with additional numbers, to be announced soon.

AMER. Oct. 30.

From NOV - 4 [illegible]K
Times
New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at Carnegie Hall tonight for the first time this season, which marks the fortieth year of the organization founded by Major Higginson.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 4 [illegible] A

MUSICAL NOTES.

Owing to illness, Miss Helen Stanley will be unable to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening, at the Academy of Music. Miss Mabel Garrison has been engaged to take Miss Stanley's place, and will sing: Aria, "Mia Speranza Adorata," by Mozart, and "Charmant Oiseau," from "The Pearl of Brazil," by David.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Telegram
New York City

Orchestra from Boston Thrills with New Music

Though the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not gained back all of its prewar efficiency, there was a decided improvement over last year noted at last night's concert in Carnegie Hall, the first of the season for the men from Boston: The programme would have been called modern, and by some futuristic, a few years ago, but last night, in comparison with recent Italian orchestral novelties of Casella de Malpiero. it had almost a classic ring. There was a symphony by Jan Sibelius, Finnish composer, one of the modern writers of the North and among the most original, in spite of his melodiousness, of all present day musicians. It was his first symphonic effort and, consequently, his most melodious and his simpliest. It is an exceptionally interesting piece of modern music writing. But what surprised the audience last night most was the excellent reading of Pierre Monteux, leader of the Boston Symphony, now starting his second season with that orchestra.

Mr. Monteux previously had made his most telling appeal with the American musical public as conductor of the Ballet Russe. In classical symphonic works of [illegible]nanic hue he is not exceptionally [illegible]g, but in modern things he has [illegible]d a forecful, direct manner of [illegible]tion. An improved orchestra [illegible]m in making the Sibelius work [illegible]

[illegible] in another work of the North, [illegible]bine's "Poem of Ecstasy," Mr. [illegible]teux gave a very creditable account [illegible]his interpretative powers. Parts of it were thrilling. "The Poem of Ecstasy" is a riot of orchestral color. It is teeming with new and unusual effects. Yet unlike most recent orchestral things, it has a directness and a compactness that set it off as a work of serious purpose. It has an appeal to the emotions, and still it moves in formal lines. It is not merely a mood picture, or a bit of orchestral coloring like so much of the new music. Scriabine had a sense of proportions. He was different from his contemporaries because what he had to say demanded a new style.

Though last night's programme was far from any conventional pattern, it was very interesting, and it was enjoyed by a large audience. In its new capacity as propagator of modernity in music the Boston Symphony Orchestra has lost some of its fine classic spirit, but it has gained a brilliancy and a new interest for those who find music as it is written today absorbing.

From NOV 5
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSICAL NOTES.

With Miss Mabel Garrison as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season this evening, at the Academy of Music. Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. This so-called "Little Symphony" is practically popular on account of its slow movement, which is said to be a burlesque of the metronome, newly invented by Maelzel at the time of its composition. Caesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, finely orchestrated by the French composer-conductor, Gabriel Pierne, will also be played, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"

Evening Globe NOV
New York

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The first symphony of Sibelius, the Finn, heading the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first local concert of the season, in Carnegie Hall last evening, wears wonderfully well. In spite of every objection that can be brought against it, and some find the obvious leaning on Tchaikovsky an objection, this northern symphony is a singularly rich and beautiful work. The symphonies of Sibelius are a most important contribution to the symphonic repertory of the last twenty years. Let us hope they will be played here oftener.

Mr. Monteux conducted a stirring performance of this first symphony. The andante in particular pleased the large audience and won an ovation. The following allegro in its turn went brilliantly. People who credit the stories that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone to pot should hear it play!

The programme continued with Lekeu's "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-songs of Anjou." This agreeable composition, which Walter Damrosch introduced here two years ago, is well calculated to find favor with audiences. Still, that of last evening seemed only mildly delighted. The real event of the concert was the final number—Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy."

When Scriabine was in this country a dozen or more years ago an attempt was made to interest the public in his works and his performance of them by dubbing him "the Russian Chopin." Nevertheless, it was not until his "futuristic" orchestral works got talked about that he became locally famous. Scriabine was a dreamer of dreams and a seer of visions. Ecstasy was with him chronic. In conversation he has been known to beg a perfectly respectful listener not to call him mad.

When he was here his dream was a species of mass which should express his religion, his conception of the universe. The audience should be an integral part of the performance, seated under a crystal dome and over a floor which should be a mirror—thus giving the illusion of a globular auditorium, concert room, chapel, whatnot. The mass should have a text, but since no existing language known unto Scriabine—and being a Russian he knew several—was adequate to this text, he was then composing a special language of his own for the mighty occasion. Is it any wonder he should interrupt his ecstasy to ask to be not thought mad? Unfortunately he seems never to have met Dr. Freud.

Scriabine died without realizing this dream of a universal mass. (One hopes it would have been nothing like that mass-symphony of Gustav Mahler that this town once suffered). He did write a tone poem with lights, which awaits an adequate performance in New York. Aside from that work, his "Poem of Ecstasy" perhaps approaches nearest the realization of his ideals. He based it on a long programmatic poem, which he wrote in Russian and which is not sung, but merely printed as a key. He also based it in part on matter mined from Richard Wagner! Which will move some of us to the easy formula that we prefer our Wagner without Scriabine.

Be that as it may, it is well to hear this work adequately performed. Mr. Monteux is a specialist in modern music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave under his direction a performance that was marked not only by technical excellence, but by superb enthusiasm and impetus. A more eloquent argument for the music of Scriabine one could not imagine.

From NOV
Evening Post
New York

Extremes Meet

Before the war the word billion was seldom seen except in books on astronomy. During the war it was introduced freely into financial articles, and recently it has loomed up in the musical world. It will soon be a billion times that the foreign trip of the New York Symphony Orchestra has been paraded before the public's eyes and ears. Yesterday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, it once more occupied the centre of the stage. A beautiful golden wreath from Mr. Flagler, the president of the society, was handed, with a speech, to Walter Damrosch, who responded with a speech, in which he explained why his orchestra is better than any in Europe, but modestly admitted that there are good conductors over there, too.

Mr. Damrosch's programme was the first of a series designed to illustrate the evolution of orchestras and orchestral music. It didn't begin with Adam, because Adam was an opera composer, born in 1803. Rameau opened the ball (symphonic music, you know, sprang from the dances) with some ballet airs from "Dardanus," dating back to 1739, graceful music, which was gracefully played. Far more interesting, however, was the next number, Gluck's immortal overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," which served to show off to advantage the excellent wood-wind players in Mr. Damrosch's orchestra. It is in the wood-wind branch of the family that the older orchestral writers chiefly excel; the colors in the Gluck overture were most soothing to listen to and Mr. Damrosch brought out well the wailing strains uttered by these players. Not so flawless was the execution of Bach's concerto No. 1 for horns, oboes, bassoons, and strings or that of Handel's concerto in F for strings and double choir of wind instruments. The final orchestral number was Haydn's "Clock" symphony. There was much applause for the soloist, Louise Homer. The choice of her second number, the air "Empio" from Handel's "Julius Cæsar" was not a good one, as the florid bars in it did not suit the singer's voice. She gave much pleasure with Gluck's "Che Faro senza Eurydice," with which she has so often delighted audiences at the Metropolitan.

Extremes not only met in Carnegie Hall yesterday but clashed violently. While the afternoon programme boycotted all composers born later than 1732, the revised evening programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rioted in modern music: the first Symphony of Sibelius, Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It was not a happy programme, for it lacked contrast, and none of the three compositions could possibly be mistaken for a masterwork. Each of them is much adoo about almost nothing. The Sibelius work is, however, more sane than his later symphonic works, particularly the fourth. Its last movement was admirably played by the orchestra. It is not the orchestra which made Boston famous, but M. Monteux has evidently labored hard to make the new men dwell amicably with those who remain of the old organization. Truly virtuosic was the playing of the Scriabin thing—but it wasn't worth playing. It has been known here since 1908, when the Russian Symphony Orchestra played it, and need not be described again. Like most of Scriabin's works it is an ingenious and sometimes dazzling attempt to hide his lack of genuine musical ideas under an orgiastic outburst of technical stunts and dissonantal innovations. Any one who objects to this judgment may find balm for his wounds in the book on Scriabin by Eaglefield Hull, a "Mus. Doc. Oxon.," who ranks Scriabin with Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, and Chopin, and declares that he has "brought about a complete renewal of the hearing faculty which will fertilize not only one field, but the whole of the musical art." Can you beat that?

Morning Telegraph
New York

NOV 5 [illegible] A

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Conducts at Initial Concert—Splendid Program at Carnegie Hall.

With a fine organization of excellently trained musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, opened its New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening before a brilliant audience.

The program was one of splendid worth, composed of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, a "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou," by Lekeu, and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54.

Other concerts of the Carnegie Hall series will be given on Thursday evenings, December 2, January 6, February 3 and March 17, and Saturday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 5 and March 19. Conductor Monteux has made many plans regarding new scores and long established masterpieces which promise to make the series most interesting.

HERALD
[illegible]ss New York City
NOV 5 [illegible]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

Pierre Monteux Leads Musicians in First Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the first time this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme consisted of Sibelius's symphony in E minor, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou and Scriabine's "Poeme d'Extase." The music was chosen by the conductor, Pierre Monteux, with cunning. It invited no comparisons with recent performances. It was not familiar to the majority of listeners, who were therefore not too exacting in their demands for perfection in presentation.

It is pleasant to be able to say that in some respects the orchestra sounded better than last season. Only a few new players were in the ranks, but none the less the general quality of tone, and especially that of the strings, was improved. The improvement was not as astonishing as Bostonian recorders would have us believe, but it was distinctly discernible. The wood wind and the brass are substantially the same.

The performance of the Sibelius symphony was vigorous and sonorous. It was not notable for finish or for transparency, but it had the rude strength of the north and it voiced the moods of the work well.

From
EVENING MAIL,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

WE seem to be a welcoming music public. When Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came upon the stage of Carnegie last night, there was cordial greeting in the air.

All modern composers starred the programme, which opened with Jean Sibelius's First Symphony, had the exquisite Symphonic Fantasia on Two Anjou Folk-songs by Lekeu and closed with Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase."

In the strings, the attack was often uneven, destroying much of the glory of the Sibelius. There was something of the old single, singing voice in the Lekeu and in bits of the Scriabin.

Even such sophisticated audiences as the Boston Symphony ones have primitive reactions. They were swept into flaming enthusiasm by the wild crash at the end.

There were occasional ragged spots in the performance, to which these audiences, with their minds full of traditions, are unaccustomed, but Mr. Monteux has his moments of inspiration.

From NOV 5 [illegible]K
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

N. Y. AND BOSTON ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS

Damrosch Illustrates Beginning of the Symphony—Monteux Plays Modern Music.

Mr. Monteux, for this first visit of the Boston Orchestra to Carnegie Hall this season, brought with him Jan Sibelius's First Symphony, not heard here in some time; Guillaume Lekeu's rather labored fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It was rather a heavy draught of modernism for Mr. Monteux's audience, somewhat, but not very greatly smaller than in other years. The orchestra has been considerably made over since last season's upheaval, but it is still—or perhaps, again an exceptional band—not so pure as to string tone as once it was, not so fine in precision and unanimity, but a vigorous instrument under this vigorous conductor's hand.

Vigor, rhythmic bite and dramatic urge were of chief mark in the orchestra's account of what it had to do last night. The Sibelius symphony is a moody music, it holds many a gloomy and despairing emotional picture, yet it is, nevertheless, a beautiful facture. But Mr. Monteux gave it a somewhat rough-and-ready hug, fondled it with a studded baton. This was rather cavalier treatment, but it served to present its sturdy aspect as a too-refined manhandling might not have done.

Scriabin's ecstatics is impotent music, for [illegible] lamentably to arise to the heights it sets itself. Scriabin has, it is true, delivered himself of a perfectly good orgy, but it is not interesting, and an orgy just isn't, unless it is at least that. He builds it soundly enough, on the basic truth that orgies are matters or repetition; this is all repetition and with repetition's proper climax. But repetition, to be interesting, depends on what it is that is repeated. Scriabin's do not seem very much to matter. One does one's utmost to regard the Scriabin cult's appraisal of its idol as more than the outcome of overweening enthusiasm, but the music itself always stultifies the attempt. Scriabin's esoteric theories and intent do not transpire as the music stumbles its way toward its fruit[illegible] [illegible] last night's audience was [illegible] bored, which is [illegible]

EVENING WORLD
New York City

Boston Symphony In First Concert; Damrosch's Day

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. It must have been evident to Pierre Monteux, the conductor, as he came upon the stage, that he was facing an unfamiliar audience. Since the internment of Dr. Karl Muck and the loss of the financial support so freely given for so long a period by Major Higginson, there have been dissensions among the players and divided counsels among the new promoters that have threatened to disrupt the organization. Happily, it has survived. For years the Boston Symphony was the leading orchestra of America, perhaps of the world. That proud position it does not hold to-day. Most of its brilliance and no little of effectiveness have been lost for the present. There remains a capable band of musicians for Mr. Monteux to weld into a more nearly perfect instrument. Meanwhile, much of the support that it got from New York music lovers who are prominent socially has been diverted to another visiting band, the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux presented an unhackneyed programme, for which much thanks. He began with the first symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer, who reflects national characteristics in all that he writes. This work was published in 1902. It has tune and rhythmic charm, holds no little of poetic suggestion, and is cleverly orchestrated, but lacks strength. Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou followed, an engaging musical love story, without tragedy, that begins with a noisy ball and ends in a murmur of solitude. The last number was Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy," which Modest Altschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra once played here. It is a musical phantasmagoria of the struggles of the spirit which relegates Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" to the realms of innocuous desuetude, such turmoil and travail are depicted. If the agonizing throes were those of a body instead of a spirit, the nearest physician would prescribe an effective, everyday cure

---

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Those who went into Carnegie Hall expecting to hear a weakened Boston Symphony Orchestra must have been surprised. For over the summer the places of the members lost through a demand for union recognition or drafted into other organizations have been filled by capable players. The band was revealed last evening as one of great potentialities. In the course of time and with the proper drilling the Boston orchestra ought to go far on the road toward its former superb estate. It has unrivalled tone especially in the string sections. Perhaps it would be better to state that its tonal quality possesses an individuality which sets the orchestra apart from its rivals.

Pierre Monteux has never conducted to better advantage than he did last evening. The program of Sibelius's E Minor Symphony, Lekeu's Fantasia and the "Poem of Ecstasy" of Scriabin was one calculated to disclose the conductor at his best. He loves the moderns, sympathizes with their eccentricities and knows how to make the points of their compositions count.

The Sibelius symphony is uneven. Within its pages are many of surpassing beauty unfortunately separated by others of musical futility. The slow movement is superb. We cannot read into this music the pictures it has inspired in certain commentators; in fact we are inclined to the belief that, given a background like Finland, these distorters of musical facts are likely to find anything in the music they desire. We need a little more analysis and loss of the psychoanalytic variety. The Sibelius Scherzo is as thin as skim milk.

Some day Scriabin will come into his own. The feeling of ecstasy is overwrought, possibly the mood is one that cannot be sustained except by a composer of the Wagnerian type. We have always preferred the "Poeme Divin," its predecessor. But this composer had an individuality that raised him apart from his contemporaries; his death was a tremendous blow to music. The great moments, however, save the composition. The orchestra comes to Brooklyn this evening.

TIGHT BINDING

SUN
ess New York City
NOV 5

Music

The Returning Bostonians.

For its fortieth season the Boston Symphony Orchestra came back by main-travelled ways to Carnegie Hall last night and gave there its first Thursday evening concert of the series. The circumstances were dramatic as well as musical. It was an orchestra augmented, rebuilt and, to a large extent, repopulated.

It will be remembered that immediately after the famous Fradkin fracas of last season the Boston orchestra carried out a plucky schedule at home and in New York, and during the intervening summer M. Monteux, the conductor, was abroad on the free handed errand of selecting some twenty-five new men. Also to find some new compositions by Frenchmen and Italians. What he has remade of this famous old orchestra seems to have pleased the Boston critics and public generally. His baton may not be tipped with fire, but it is twined with myrtle and ivy, and it commands what, at first hearing, seems the substance of a splendid new orchestra.

For this first concert of the New York eason M. Monteux conducted the arliest symphony of Sibelius, Lekeu's ymphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-Songs f Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of cstasy—a programme justly balanced etween melody and modernity. Sibeius's "Swan of Tuonela" has refused to ing its gloomy swan song for a number f seasons, but this symphony (the hirty-ninth opus of the Finnish comoser, according to Grove) is comparaively unfamiliar here. Yet he, if any ne, is the Liszt of the Snows, the Wager with caked eyes and frosty breath. ramatically, and with a sombre vionce, he takes small themes and fattens hem for cruel and climatic mauling. he results are little bonfires on great cebergs. The color can be seen afar, ut the warmth is powerless against an rctic chill. Mr. Monteux and his men ave it a rich reading, sonorous, spired; they did actually put poetry into s metres.

Lekeu's two folk songs of Anjou probbly sound far more stirring in their ncouth original. If they do not, then e greatly wrong M. Lekeu. And criabin's "Poeme d'Extase," which once arked the frontier of madness in mu, and which is described as expressing e "joy of untrammelled activity" . . . ow pinned it is, to-day, to the modern vement! Tacked, its whole length, to e letter of the modern lore. It is a ry long length, too. And in the words the composer, Eastwood Lane, "there e too many X's in that ecstasy!" or X is no longer an unknown quantity music. The X and the exclamation int are the chief letters of to-day's sical alphabet.

AGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV. 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Brooklyn Concert. loch Suite Played by National

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

e Boston Symphony Orchestra, e Monteux conductor, gave last ing in the Academy of Music the of this year's series of five con. The orchestral works on the ram included Beethoven's Eighth phony, Cesar Franck's Prelude, ale and Fugue (orchestrated by iel Pierne), and the Overture to ioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." In adn Mabel Garrison sang a Mozart "Ah! non sai qual pena sia," the "Charmant Oiseau" from Da "The Pearl of Brazil." Almost rge a subscription audience as of er years gave full measure of its roval of all that took place, gh the mightiest applause came Miss Garrison's contest with the in the closing measures of her nd aria. The coloratura is still an ct of worship with the general lace. Politicians ought to learn bility of tone-production.

point of fact, Miss Garrison sang well indeed. The voice seemed, ever, not in its best estate; there moments when the top lost its time color and even once wice was downright shrill. Style the singer, especially in her Mo and her florid passages were n-cut, crystalline in their outline he music's design. We know, in, of no better interpreter of this poser. Her singing of the David is an old story. Last evening she red in the opportunities to disher lower register; she apparentas been working on this end of voice. The procedure is dangerand may account for the faults in higher regions of song.

r. Monteux is no interpreter of the ics. Hence, the Beethoven was even brusque, with its symphontline blurred not a little. We like l-throated orchestra but we must clarity. There were liberties of and accentuation which in the t of other necessary qualities, we ble to forget and forgive. But not evening.

t performed a good piece of [illegible] familiar to those who hear tic. In its revised form it here some years ago by the k Symphony. Its best pages of the Chorale in which ective coloring is obtained the use of the organ and a piel, while perhaps the Fugue clearer and more finely ar. Mr. Monteux gave an exading; he always does, for tter of the recent Frenchmen. ty of the reconstructed oras discussed in these colterday.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 6 '20

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SEASON OPENS HERE

Mabel Garrison Soloist at Interesting Concert in the Academy.

Opening its thirty-third season in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, gave an interesting and at times superlatively well played concert last night in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. Beethoven, Franck and Berlioz were represented in the instrumental numbers, and Mabel Garrison, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, sang Mozart and David arias to orchestral accompaniment.

As in past seasons the concert was one of a series of five, and was under joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. It attracted an audience, chiefly of subscribers, well representative of local musical circles, though with numbers of empty seats in the rear and extreme front of the house.

Empty seats in pre-war days were rarities at Boston Symphony affairs here, but it must be remembered that the orchestra as it stands is practically a reconstituted body, yet to attain under its new leadership the unchallenged leadership of instrumental enembles that it enjoyed under Muck, Fiedler and their predecessors. Last night the impression of its playing was good, especially with regard to tone. Absolute and unflagging cohesiveness, for which the old Bostonians were famous, is yet to some, but there was more than a hint of the splendid emotional and intellectual balance of former days.

The programme aimed to please rather than to thrill or puzzle. Of Beethoven's Symphonies the one played, the eighth, is briefest and happiest. Conductor Monteux demonstrated prettily blended strings, clean and true with woodwind that seemed to lack distinction. He made of the playful "allegretto scherzando," that takes the place of a slow movement, a charmingly graceful instrumental lyric.

Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, as orchestrated by Gabrille Pierne, provided him with his big opportunity. The finale of the chorale, with organ and bells assisting, was the supreme moment of the evening. The fugue that followed meant a severer test of the success of the welding process the new orchestra has been undergoing. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" brought out fine volume, a world of vigorous attacking and some splendid harmonic effects.

Miss Garrison, an appealing figure in blue and white, was at her best in the "Charmant Oiseau" aria from David's "Pearl of Brazil," with flute obligato. Her flexible, youthful soprano is well remembered from her many appearances in Brooklyn, and she was generously applauded.

---

lic Ledger
iladelphia, Pa.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the other hand, shows a tremendous improvement, not from the last concerts of last season, when the organization was as badly "shot to pieces" as an orchestra can be and still survive, but from the average of its work since the days of the war, when the disruption began. The new concert-master, Richard Burgin, made a most favorable impression by the enthusiasm and sincerity of his playing. He apparently knows the technique of his position and should do much to bring the organization back to the place which it formerly held.

It is to be hoped that this time the Boston Orchestra will recover permanently from the troubles which have beset it since the early days of the war. As an organization it has probably done more than any other one in spreading the gospel of good music throughout this country in the many years of its existence by reason of the fact that it was always a "touring" orchestra and was virtually the first in the United States to make any real effort to give regular annual series in other cities than its home one. Their strings still do not play with the accuracy of attack, release nor intonation of the famous body of which Kneisel, Willy Hess and Witek were the leaders, but this can hardly be expected so soon after what the orchestra has gone through.

THE most interesting composition performed by the Boston Orchestra at its first concert was the Pierne instrumentation of the Cesar Franck Prelude, Chorale and Fugue and Philadelphia concert-goers had a fine opportunity to compare the instrumentation with the form for piano solo, as Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the composition in its original form at his recital in the Academy only the Wednesday evening before the Boston concert.

Under the color of the full orchestration which Mr. Pierne used, the work lost practically all its pianistic flavor and indeed sounded like an entirely different composition. It is doubtful if a person, not a pianist and therefore familiar with the work only from the standpoint of the hearer, would have recognized it without the title, at least until the unmistakable melody of the chorale began. The orchestrator made few changes in the work but as a rule followed the original as closely as it is possible to do when working with so different a medium.

The orchestrated work was well worth hearing although it is doubtful if it will appear on many programs, even exclusively French ones, in spite of the scarcity of French compositions of the first rank for orchestra.

From WORLD, NOV 7 1920
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

FIRST BOSTON MATINEE.

The offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall was not overwhelmingly interesting. The E flat symphony by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, is an ingratiating work, gorgeously scored, and permeated from first to last by Wagnerian influence; the slow movement seems a desperate endeavor to avoid the Prize Song from "The Mastersingers." But then Wagner is an accepted model for the younger choir of composers, who are usually considered original according to their ability to escape the fatal Richard. However, Enesco is a well equipped musician, and his color scheme falls richly on ears lacerated by cruel modernists.

A novelty was a poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by Edward Burlingame Hill, well known as an American composer and writer on musical subjects, now living at Cambridge, Mass. Mr. Hill is a stickler for form, and we recall an excellent overture of his. This poem, he tells us through the medium of Philip Hale's programme book, "approaches structurally the abridged sonata form," while the atmosphere, not the incidents of Poe's famous tale, is aimed at. This atmosphere is missing, though the abridged sonata form is not. The composition could have been as easily called "The Fall of the House of Haig" or Dewar as Usher. It is well made, rather thinly orchestrated, and the imaginative element is not the prime factor. What the unfortunate young American, Griffes, evoked in his "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"—first played here by Pierre Monteux—Mr. Hill lacks the power to equal, that is, to make both a picture and a mood. And he is obsessed, as is Mr. Bloch, with the clever celesta episode at the close of "The Rose Cavalier." A pretty effect it is—in the Strauss opera. The Hill poem was amply applauded, and like the Enesco symphony adequately interpreted.

We did not like the orchestral setting by Gabriel Pierne of Franck's familiar prelude, chorale and fugue. For one thing, we missed the metallic clangor of the original pianoforte in the fugue, which lacks cohesion in the Pierne arrangement, even sequence, it is so spread over the score. And the march-like Holy Grail motive comes out too plainly in the instrumentation. A piano piece, not big enough in ideas for the full orchestra, we should say.

The band, the strings especially, was in admirable form, playing with luscious tone quality in the Enesco music and brilliantly in Berlioz, whose "Benvenuto Cellini" overture closed the afternoon.

From
Times
NOV 7 1920
New York City

PLAY AMERICAN TONE-POEM.

Boston Symphony Gives Version of Poe's "Fall of House of Usher."

Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher," long promised as an opera by Debussy at the Metropolitan, where it never materialized, reached New York by other channels and in another form yesterday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall presented an American tone-poem on the same story.

The musical version by Edward Burlingame Hill, a composer living in Cambridge, Mass., was confessedly no dramatic depiction of incident, scene by scene, but rather an impression of the thrilling atmosphere of Poe's narrative. Two themes, characterizing Roderick and Madeleine Usher, were treated by Mr. Hill in musical form, "entirely without realism," to quote the program, "save possibly in the destruction of the house."

Mr. Monteux opened the matinee with the Rumanian, Enesco's symphony in E flat, Op. 13, first given here by the New York Symphony nine years ago, and followed a season later by that musicians "Rumanian Rhapsody" at the hands of the Bostonians. In conclusion yesterday, the orchestra played Pierne's transcription of Franck's piano "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue," and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Walter Damrosch and the New York Orchestra greeted yesterday morning in Aeolian Hall the first of their younger audiences at the Symphony Concerts for Children, a series now in its fourth year. The little audience had grown in size as well as in years, and the music presented to it included Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, parts of Haydn's symphony, "The Clock"; two Russian folksongs by Liadow and a polka by Strauss.

WERRENRATH NEXT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and evening, Nov. 19 and 20, Pierre Monteux will revive Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. No. 425). As soloist at this concert, Reinald Werrenrath, the favorite American baritone, who made a notable impression in the Metropolitan Opera Company, will sing a new series of songs by Daniel Gregory Mason entitled "Russians."

TRAV. NOV. 13

---

from
EAGLE, NOV [illegible]
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK-END

Boston Orchestra Plays New American Work—A Multitude of Sunday Concerts.

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

If some visitor from an outlying planet had landed in New York during the past week-end, he must have drawn the speedy conclusion that we are nothing if not musical, so many were the concerts and recitals. Saturday afternoon witnessed the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall and the London String Quartet in Aeolian. The Sunday matinees included a program by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall and in Carnegie one of piano music by Ervin Nyredghazi; while the evening was drenched with rain and concerts. Amelita Galli-Curci drew hordes to the Hippodrome and another record-breaking attendance marked the second of the popular series in Madison Square Garden. In the Times Square Theater Eva Grippon and other artists inaugurated a new series and in Henry Miller's Theater Frederick Cheesewright added even another piano recital to the current season overcrowded list.

Under the circumstances, the reviewer of things musical must be, and in this case is, delighted t opick and choose. We went to Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux gave an excellent reading of Enesco's Symphony in E-flat. The work is not new, but the infrequency of its performances made it practically a novelty. The Rumanian composer did not in this work seek after extremes of tone-color; instead he was content to build a score along standard legitimate lines. And the result, while uneven, has much to commend the composition. Of course, its pages are bathed in the fountains of Bayreuth. Yet we know few better sources for musical inspiration. We could hear the slow movement many times with pleasure.

In addition, the Boston Orchestra's program held a new American work—a symphonic poem by Edward Burlingame called "The Fall of the House of Usher." Poe was the light-house of inspiration, but there is no attempt by the Boston musician to outline a program, unless it be in the final and eventful crash. Mr. Hill is long on technique and short on thematic material. He makes an occasional incursion into modern colors, but apparently has not the courage or possibly the desire, to run to the extremes of some of his contemporaries. On the whole, the result has little significance.

NEW WORKS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Italian Pieces and Four Preludes by Gustave Strube

A programme of very exceptional interest was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was performed for the first time in Boston the highly imaginative and decorative composition of the modern Italian, Resphigi, "The Fountains of Rome," four impressionistic pieces bound together by ingenious musical devices, and entitled, respectively, "The Fountain of Valle Giulia at Dawn," "The Triton Fountain at Noon," "The Fountain of Trevi at Midday," "The Villa Medici Fountain at Sunset."

PRELUDES BY STRUBE

There were also performed for the first time in Boston four preludes for orchestra by Gustave Strube, composer and formerly violinist of the Boston Symphony, music which was very cordially received.

The final number was Richard Strauss' incomparable "Till Eulenspiegel," perhaps of all this composer's work the most perfect, unique in inspiration, in humor, in pathos, irony, and withal a legendary and fairy-like quality.

This work Mr. Monteux led brilliantly and with much sympathy for the composer's thought.

[38] POST NOV. 13

New Music for To-morrow

Between Brahms's fourth symphony and Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel," two novel pieces stand on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday: "The Fountains of Rome" by Ottorino Respighi and Four Preludes by Gustave Strube—the former new to Boston only, the latter to be played for the first time anywhere. Born in 1879 at Bologna, Respighi must be considered one of the New Italians, though judging from this score—written four years ago—he is less radical, less of an innovator, than Casella or Malipiero. Like his confrères, Respighi has listened to the seductive voice of Debussy, but he is too typically Italian to have made extensive use of the French master's formulas and methods. The composer has furnished a description of the piece, which is printed in the score. In substance it shows us four Roman fountains, the first seen at dawn, the third at noon and the fourth at evening. The second section, the "Triton Fountain," gives the composer opportunity for a brilliant allegorical picture of tritons and naiads; and the same picturesque beings, with Father Neptune himself, figure in the succeeding episode, "The Fountain of Trevi at Mid-day." The first section and the last are pure landscape, delightfully painted.

The instrumentation is highly effective, now of corruscating brilliance, now veiled and suggestive. Respighi employs the normal modern orchestra of strings, wood-wind and brass, but he adds to it an unusual array of what may be termed "decorative" instruments: two harps, a pianoforte, organ, triangle, cymbals, celesta, glockenspiel and a large bell. And furthermore, he frequently makes these instruments bear the brunt of his musical thought. Here, it would seem, is music that should please everyone; fresh enough for those who like the new, and not too "extreme" for those who cling to the old—an impressionism that is not unduly impressionistic.

During the years in which Gustave Strube sat among the volins in the Symphony Orchestra his compositions were frequently played and his music invariably gave pleasure by reason of sterling craftsmanship and pleasing fancy, though never revealing any incisive originality. Mr. Strube is one of the few moderns who have had the courage to write an unpretentious symphony, and his symphony in B minor is gratefully remembered. These four preludes are short, each lasting from three to four minutes; they have no programmatic intention and are marked simply: Molto Allegro, Quasi Adagio, Allegretto, and Allegro Energico. With the exception of the second, which starting quietly works up to a considerable climax, they are rather fragmentary, patterned more after the preludes of Chopin in their adherence to a certain figuration than after the more elaborate preludes of Rakhmaninov. They are modern in feeling and treatment; the first and fourth are characterized by a certain nervous energy; while the third is in dance rhythm—a sort of lively minuet. Played together as the composer designed them, they stand rather roughly as the four movements of a sinfonietta.

W. S. S.

Items and Announcements

New music by Ravel will be played for the first times in America at the Symphony Concerts of next week—his arrangement for orchestra of his own piano-pieces, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a title less signifying the burial place of that eighteenth-century composer than a garland woven in tones and laid upon it. New likewise to Bostonian ears will be Daniel Gregory Mason's five songs, "Russians," for baritone and orchestra. They are settings of verses by Witter Bynner, designed to characterize various and vivid Muscovite figures. Here, as in Chicago and New York last season, Mr. Werrenrath will sing them. Even the symphony of next week is relatively unfamiliar—Mozart's in C major, numbered 425 in Köchel's catalogue, unheard in Boston for twenty years, a favorite with Mr. Monteux in Paris. Enesco's whirling Roumanian Rhapsody will end the programme.

The "assisting artist" at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Symphony Hall, will be Guy Maier, the pianist, called for the first time into such creditable company. He will play the first and more familiar of Liszt's concertos.

TRANS. NOV 11.

WERRENRATH SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and evening, November 19 and 20, Pierre Monteux will revive Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. No. 425), which is considered one of his finest works. As soloist at this concert, Reinald Werrenrath, the favorite American baritone, who made a notable impression in the Metropolitan Opera House Company, will sing a new series of songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled "Russians." They are as follows: a. A Drunkard, b. A Concertina Player, c. A Revolutionary, d. A Boy, e. A Prophet. Another novelty will be Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tomb." The program will close with Enesco's Rumania Rhapsody.

AMER. NOV. 13

TIGHT BINDING

SUN
New York City
NOV

Music

The Returning Bostonians.

For its fortieth season the Boston Symphony Orchestra came back by main travelled ways to Carnegie Hall last night and gave there its first Thursday evening concert of the series. The circumstances were dramatic as well as musical. It was an orchestra augmented, rebuilt and, to a large extent, repopulated.

It will be remembered that immediately after the famous Fradkin fracas of last season the Boston orchestra carried out a plucky schedule at home and in New York, and during the intervening summer M. Monteux, the conductor, was abroad on the free handed errand of selecting some twenty-five new men. Also to find some new compositions by Frenchmen and Italians. What he has remade of this famous old orchestra seems to have pleased the Boston critics and public generally. His baton may not be tipped with fire, but it is twined with myrtle and ivy, and it commands what, at first hearing, seems the substance of a splendid new orchestra.

For this first concert of the New York season M. Monteux conducted the earliest symphony of Sibelius, Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy—a programme justly balanced between melody and modernity. Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela" has refused to sing its gloomy swan song for a number of seasons, but this symphony (the thirty-ninth opus of the Finnish composer, according to Grove) is comparatively unfamiliar here. Yet he, if any one, is the Liszt of the Snows, the Wagner with caked eyes and frosty breath. Dramatically, and with a sombre violence, he takes small themes and fattens them for cruel and climatic mauling. The results are little bonfires on great icebergs. The color can be seen afar, but the warmth is powerless against an arctic chill. Mr. Monteux and his men gave it a rich reading, sonorous, spirited; they did actually put poetry into its metres.

Lekeu's two folk songs of Anjou probably sound far more stirring in their uncouth original. If they do not, then we greatly wrong M. Lekeu. And Scriabin's "Poeme d'Extase," which once marked the frontier of madness in music, and which is described as expressing the "joy of untrammelled activity" . . . how pinned it is, to-day, to the modern movement! Tacked, its whole length, to the letter of the modern lore. It is a very long length, too. And in the words of the composer, Eastwood Lane, "there are too many X's in that ecstasy!" For X is no longer an unknown quantity in music. The X and the exclamation point are the chief letters of to-day's musical alphabet.

AGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y. Nov. 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Brooklyn Concert.
loch Suite Played by Na-onal

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

e Boston Symphony Orchestra,
e Monteux conductor, gave last ng in the Academy of Music the of this year's series of five con-
. The orchestral works on the ram included Beethoven's Eighth phony, Cesar Franck's Prelude, ale and Fugue (orchestrated by iel Pierne), and the Overture to ioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." In ad-n Mabel Garrison sang a Mozart
"Ah! non sai qual pena sia," the "Charmant Oiseau" from Da-
"The Pearl of Brazil." Almost rge a subscription audience as of er years gave full measure of its oval of all that took place, gh the mightiest applause came Miss Garrison's contest with the in the closing measures of her nd aria. The coloratura is still an ct of worship with the general lace. Politicians ought to learn bility of tone-production.
point of fact, Miss Garrison sang well indeed. The voice seemed, ever, not in its best estate; there moments when the top lost its ime color and even once wice was downright shrill. Style the singer, especially in her Mo and her florid passages were r-cut, crystalline in their outline he music's design. We know, in-
, of no better interpreter of this poser. Her singing of the David is an old story. Last evening she ed in the opportunities to disher lower register; she apparent-as been working on this end of voice. The procedure is danger-and may account for the faults in higher regions of song.
r. Monteux is no interpreter of the ics. Hence, the Beethoven was even brusque, with its symphontline blurred not a little. We like -throated orchestra but we must clarity. There were liberties of and accentuation which in the no necessary qualities, we were to forget and forgive. But not performed a good piece of familiar to those its revised form it here some years ago by the York Symphony. Its best pages the Chorale in which effective coloring is obtained use of the organ and a and more finely while perhaps the fugue
Mr. Monteux gave an ex-reading as always does, for of the recent Frenchmen the reconstructed or-was discussed in these col-

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SEASON OPENS HERE

Mabel Garrison Soloist at Interesting Concert in the Academy.

Opening its thirty-third season in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, gave an interesting and at times superlatively well played concert last night in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. Beethoven, Franck and Berlioz were represented in the instrumental numbers, and Mabel Garrison, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, sang Mozart and David arias to orchestral accompaniment.

As in past seasons the concert was one of a series of five, and was under joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. It attracted an audience, chiefly of subscribers., well representative of local musical circles, though with numbers of empty seats in the rear and extreme front of the house.

Empty seats in pre-war days were rarities at Boston Symphony affairs here, but it must be remembered that the orchestra as it stands is practically a reconstituted body, yet to attain under its new leadership the unchallenged leadership of instrumental enembles that it enjoyed under Muck, Fiedler and their predecessors. Last night the impression of its playing was good, especially with regard to tone. Absolute and unflagging cohesiveness, for which the old Bostonians were famous, is yet to some, but there was more than a hint of the splendid emotional and intellectual balance of former days.

The programme aimed to please rather than to thrill or puzzle. Of Beethoven's Symphonies the one played, the eighth, is briefest and happiest. Conductor Monteux demonstrated prettily blended strings, clean and true with woodwind that seemed to lack distinction. He made of the playful "allegretto scherzando," that takes the place of a slow movement, a charmingly graceful instrumental lyric.

Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, as orchestrated by Gabrille Pierne, provided him with his big opportunity. The finale of the chorale, with organ and bells assisting, was the supreme moment of the evening. The fugue that followed meant a severer test of the success of the welding processs the new orchestra has been undergoing. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" brought out fine volume, a world of vigorous attacking and some splendid harmonic effects.

Miss Garrison, an appealing figure in blue and white, was at her best in the "Charmant Oiseau" aria from David's "Pearl of Brazil," with flute obligato. Her flexible, youthful soprano is well remembered from her many appearances in Brooklyn, and she was generously applauded.

---

lic Ledger
iladelphia, Pa.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the other hand, shows a tremendous improvement, not from the last concerts of last season, when the organization was as badly "shot to pieces" as an orchestra can be and still survive, but from the average of its work since the days of the war, when the disruption began. The new concert-master, Richard Burgin, made a most favorable impression by the enthusiasm and sincerity of his playing. He apparently knows the technique of his position and should do much to bring the organization back to the place which it formerly held.

It is to be hoped that this time the Boston Orchestra will recover permanently from the troubles which have beset it since the early days of the war. As an organization it has probably done more than any other one in spreading the gospel of good music throughout this country in the many years of its existence by reason of the fact that it was always a "touring" orchestra and was virtually the first in the United States to make any real effort to give regular annual series in other cities than its home one. Their strings still do not play with the accuracy of attack, release nor intonation of the famous body of which Kneisel, Willy Hess and Witek were the leaders, but this can hardly be expected so soon after what the orchestra has gone through.

THE most interesting composition performed by the Boston Orchestra at its first concert was the Pierne instrumentation of the Cesar Franck Prelude Chorale and Fugue and Philadelphia concert-goers had a fine opportunity to compare the instrumentation with the form for piano solo, as Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the composition in its original form at his recital in the Academy only the Wednesday evening before the Boston concert.

Under the color of the full orchestration which Mr. Pierne used, the work lost practically all its pianistic flavor and indeed sounded like an entirely different composition. It is doubtful if a person, not a pianist and therefore familiar with the work only from the standpoint of the hearer, would have recognized it without the title, at least until the unmistakable melody of the chorale began. The orchestrator made few changes in the work but as a rule followed the original as closely as it is possible to do when working with so different a medium.

The orchestrated work was well worth hearing although it is doubtful if it will appear on many programs, even exclusively French ones, in spite of the scarcity of French compositions of the first rank for orchestra.

From WORLD, NOV 7
New York City

MUSIC
By James Gibbons Huneker

FIRST BOSTON MATINEE.

The offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall was not overwhelmingly interesting. The E flat symphony by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, is an ingratiating work, gorgeously scored, and permeated from first to last by Wagnerian influence; the slow movement seems a desperate endeavor to avoid the Prize Song from "The Mastersingers." But then Wagner is an accepted model for the younger choir of composers, who are usually considered original according to their ability to escape the fatal Richard. However, Enesco is a well equipped musician, and his color scheme falls richly on ears lacerated by cruel modernists.

A novelty was a poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by Edward Burlingame Hill, well known as an American composer and writer on musical subjects, now living at Cambridge, Mass. Mr. Hill is a stickler for form, and we recall an excellent overture of his. This poem, he tells us through the medium of Philip Hale's programme book, "approaches structurally the abridged sonata form," while the atmosphere, not the incidents of Poe's famous tale, is aimed at. This atmosphere is missing, though the abridged sonata form is not. The composition could have been as easily called "The Fall of the House of Haig" or Dewar as Usher. It is well made, rather thinly orchestrated, and the imaginative element is not the prime factor. What the unfortunate young American, Griffes, evoked in his "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"—first played here by Pierre Monteux—Mr. Hill lacks the power to equal, that is, to make both a picture and a mood. And he is obsessed, as is Mr. Bloch, with the clever celesta episode at the close of "The Rose Cavalier." A pretty effect it is—in the Strauss opera. The Hill poem was amply applauded, and like the Enesco symphony adequately interpreted.

We did not like the orchestral setting by Gabriel Pierne of Franck's familiar prelude, chorale and fugue. For one thing, we missed the metallic clangor of the original pianoforte in the fugue, which lacks cohesion in the Pierne arrangement, even sequence, it is so spread over the score. And the march-like Holy Grail motive comes out too plainly in the instrumentation. A piano piece, not big enough in ideas for the full orchestra, we should say.

The band, the strings especially, was in admirable form, playing with luscious tone quality in the Enesco music and brilliantly in Berlioz, whose "Benvenuto Cellini" overture closed the afternoon.

From
Times
New York City

PLAY AMERICAN TONE-POEM.

Boston Symphony Gives Version of Poe's "Fall of House of Usher."

Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher," long promised as an opera by Debussy at the Metropolitan, where it never materialized, reached New York by other channels and in another form yesterday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall presented an American tone-poem on the same story.

The musical version by Edward Burlingame Hill, a composer living in Cambridge, Mass., was confessedly no dramatic depiction of incident, scene by scene, but rather an impression of the thrilling atmosphere of Poe's narrative. Two themes, characterizing Roderick and Madeleine Usher, were treated by Mr. Hill in musical form, "entirely without realism," to quote the program, "save possibly in the destruction of the house."

Mr. Monteux opened the matinée with the Rumanian, Enesco's symphony in E flat, Op. 13, first given here by the New York Symphony nine years ago, and followed a season later by that musicians "Rumanian Rhapsody" at the hands of the Bostonians. In conclusion yesterday, the orchestra played Pierne's transcription of Franck's piano "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue," and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Walter Damrosch and the New York Orchestra greeted yesterday morning in Aeolian Hall the first of their younger audiences at the Symphony Concerts for Children, a series now in its fourth year. The little audience had grown in size as well as in years, and the music presented to it included Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, parts of Haydn's symphony, "The Clock"; two Russian folksongs by Liadow and a polka by Strauss.

WERRENRATH NEXT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and evening, Nov. 19 and 20, Pierre Monteux will revive Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. No. 425). As soloist at this concert, Reinald Werrenrath, the favorite American baritone, who made a notable impression in the Metropolitan Opera Company, will sing a new series of songs by Daniel Gregory Mason entitled "Russians."

TRAV. NOV. 13

From EAGLE, NOV
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK-END

Boston Orchestra Plays New American Work—A Multitude of Sunday Concerts.

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

If some visitor from an outlying planet had landed in New York during the past week-end, he must have drawn the speedy conclusion that we are nothing if not musical, so many were the concerts and recitals. Saturday afternoon witnessed the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall and the London String Quartet in Aeolian. The Sunday matinees included a program by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall and in Carnegie one of piano music by Ervin Nyredghazi; while the evening was drenched with rain and concerts. Amelita Galli-Curci drew hordes to the Hippodrome and another record-breaking attendance marked the second of the popular series in Madison Square Garden. In the Times Square Theater Eva Grippon and other artists inaugurated a new series and in Henry Miller's Theater Frederick Cheesewright added even another piano recital to the current season overcrowded list.

Under the circumstances, the reviewer of things musical must be, and in this case is, delighted t opick and choose. We went to Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux gave an excellent reading of Enesco's Symphony in E-flat. The work is not new, but the infrequency of its performances made it practically a novelty. The Rumanian composer did not in this work seek after extremes of tone-color; instead he was content to build a score along standard legitimate lines. And the result, while uneven, has much to commend the composition. Of course, its pages are bathed in the fountains of Bayreuth. Yet we know few better sources for musical inspiration. We could hear the slow movement many times with pleasure.

In addition, the Boston Orchestra's program held a new American work—a symphonic poem by Edward Burlingame called "The Fall of the House of Usher." Poe was the light-house of inspiration, but there is no attempt by the Boston musician to outline a program, unless it be in the final and eventful crash. Mr. Hill is long on technique and short on thematic material. He makes an occasional incursion into modern colors, but apparently has not the courage or possibly the desire, to run to the extremes of some of his contemporaries. On the whole, the result has little significance.

NEW WORKS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Italian Pieces and Four Preludes by Gustave Strube

A programme of very exceptional interest was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was performed for the first time in Boston the highly imaginative and decorative composition of the modern Italian, Resphigi, "The Fountains of Rome," four impressionistic pieces bound together by ingenious musical devices, and entitled, respectively, "The Fountain of Valle Giulia at Dawn," "The Triton Fountain at Noon," "The Fountain of Trevi at Midday," "The Villa Medici Fountain at Sunset."

PRELUDES BY STRUBE

There were also performed for the first time in Boston four preludes for orchestra by Gustave Strube, composer and formerly violinist of the Boston Symphony, music which was very cordially received.

The final number was Richard Strauss' incomparable "Till Eulenspiegel," perhaps of all this composer's work the most perfect, unique in inspiration, in humor, in pathos, irony, and withal a legendary and fairy-like quality.

This work Mr. Monteux led brilliantly and with much sympathy for the composer's thought.

POST NOV. 13.

New Music for Tomorrow

Between Brahms's fourth symphony and Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel," two novel pieces stand on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday: "The Fountains of Rome" by Ottorino Respighi and Four Preludes by Gustave Strube—the former new to Boston only, the latter to be played for the first time anywhere. Born in 1879 at Bologna, Respighi must be considered one of the New Italians, though judging from this score—written four years ago—he is less radical, less of an innovator, than Casella or Malipiero. Like his confrères, Respighi has listened to the seductive voice of Debussy, but he is too typically Italian to have made extensive use of the French master's formulas and methods. The composer has furnished a description of the piece, which is printed in the score. In substance it shows us four Roman fountains, the first seen at dawn, the third at noon and the fourth at evening. The second section, the "Triton Fountain," gives the composer opportunity for a brilliant allegorical picture of tritons and naiads; and the same picturesque beings, with Father Neptune himself, figure in the succeeding episode, "The Fountain of Trevi at Mid-day." The first section and the last are pure landscape, delightfully painted.

The instrumentation is highly effective, now of corruscating brilliance, now veiled and suggestive. Respighi employs the normal modern orchestra of strings, wood-wind and brass, but he adds to it an unusual array of what may be termed "decorative" instruments: two harps, a pianoforte, organ, triangle, cymbals, celesta, glockenspiel and a large bell. And furthermore, he frequently makes these instruments bear the brunt of his musical thought. Here, it would seem, is music that should please everyone; fresh enough for those who like the new, and not too "extreme" for those who cling to the old—an impressionism that is not unduly impressionistic.

During the years in which Gustave Strube sat among the volins in the Symphony Orchestra his compositions were frequently played and his music invariably gave pleasure by reason of sterling craftsmanship and pleasing fancy, though never revealing any incisive originality. Mr. Strube is one of the few moderns who have had the courage to write an unpretentious symphony, and his symphony in B minor is gratefully remembered. These four preludes are short, each lasting from three to four minutes; they have no programmatic intention and are marked simply: Molto Allegro, Quasi Adagio, Allegretto, and Allegro Energico. With the exception of the second, which starting quietly works up to a considerable climax, they are rather fragmentary, patterned more after the preludes of Chopin in their adherence to a certain figuration than after the more elaborate preludes of Rakhmaninov. They are modern in feeling and treatment; the first and fourth are characterized by a certain nervous energy; while the third is in dance rhythm—a sort of lively minuet. Played together as the composer designed them, they stand rather roughly as the four movements of a sinfonietta.

W. S. S.

Items and Announcements

New music by Ravel will be played for the first times in America at the Symphony Concerts of next week—his arrangement for orchestra of his own piano-pieces, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a title less signifying the burial place of that eighteenth-century composer than a garland woven in tones and laid upon it. New likewise to Bostonian ears will be Daniel Gregory Mason's five songs, "Russians," for baritone and orchestra. They are settings of verses by Witter Bynner, designed to characterize various and vivid Muscovite figures. Here, as in Chicago and New York last season, Mr. Werrenrath will sing them. Even the symphony of next week is relatively unfamiliar—Mozart's in C major, numbered 425 in Köchel's catalogue, unheard in Boston for twenty years, of old favorite with Mr. Monteux in Paris. Enesco's whirling Roumanian Rhapsody will end the programme.

The "assisting artist" at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Symphony Hall, will be Guy Maier, the pianist, called for the first time into such creditable company. He will play the first and more familiar of Liszt's concertos.

TRANS. NOV 11.

WERRENRATH SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Sympnony Hall next Friday afternoon and evening, November 19 and 20, Pierre Monteux will revive Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. No. 425), which is considered one of his finest works. As soloist at this concert, Reinald Werrenrath, the favorite American baritone, who made a notable impression in the Metropolitan Opera House Company, will sing a new series of songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled "Russians." They are as follows: a. A Drunkard, b. A Concertina Player, c. A Revolutionary, d. A Boy, e. A Prophet. Another novelty will be Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tomb." The program will close with Enesco's Rumania Rhapsody.

AMER. NOV. 13.

[38]

ORCHESTRA SCORES IN A SEVERE TEST

Symphony Concert Shows a Varied Range of Artistry

Brahms, Richard Strauss, Respighi and Strube Interpreted

Yesterday's Symphony concert was a severe test of the abilities of the reconstituted orchestra and its conductor, in which Mr Monteux and his men made a showing which ought to silence the few remaining detractors who have been bemoaning the "collapse" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The merits of the present orchestra are not the same as the chief virtues of the former one. There is no longer the same meticulous accuracy in detail and delicacy in dynamic gradations, though these qualities may in time be regained. No orchestra which has not retained substantially the same membership for a considerable period of time can hope for an ensemble as perfect as that attained under Muck in 1916-'17.

Yet if these classic qualities have been lost, the orchestra, by the coming of new and younger players and by the change in conductors, has gained others which can be dubbed romantic. There is more emotional energy than ever before, and a greater power of interpreting music which demands glow and color rather than a perfectly balanced and poised formal perfection and beauty.

Yesterday, the only movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony which did not sound dulled and a little muddled by contrast with former performances was the distinctly romantic andante, which seemed fresher and more exuberant than of old. "Till Eulenpiegel" became less of a stunt and more of an adventure than hitherto. It was as the composer has labeled it, "Merry pranks after the old-fashioned roguish manner."

Respighi's "Fountains" bubbled, and at moments slopped over, with an energy which almost hid the fact that the piece has little to commend it except an unusually varied bag of tricks in orchestration.

Mr Strube's "Four Preludes," well written music that might have been made the flat summit of academic correctness, took on added life from the performance. The audience, as might have been expected, found Brahms less attractive than he used to be under Muck; Respighi and Strube interesting; and Strauss a jest so intricate that not everyone could get the point. Nobody seemed to notice that Strauss is "now living in Germany." Music, thank Heaven, is again out of politics.

Next week Reinald Werrenwrath will sing five new songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, called "Russians." The orchestra will play an unfamiliar Mozart symphony, last heard in 1900; Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," and Enesco's thrice familiar "Roumanian Rhapsody."

GLOBE NOV. 13.

Guy Maier to Be Pension Fund Soloist

For the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 (the receipts to be devoted as usual to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra), Guy Maier, the rising young Boston pianist, is to me soloist. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other Eastern cities. At the declaration of war, Mr. Maier went to France and attracted considerable attention by his recitals in Paris and by his concerts for wounded soldiers near the front.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E-flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Bergin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Boston Symphony Programme

At the sixth regular pair of Bosto Symphony concerts in Symphony Hal next Friday afternoon and Saturda evening, Nov. 19 and 20, the soloist wi be Reinald Werrenrath, the youn American singer, who is without pee among the concert baritones in th country. He will sing with the orches tra "Russians," five songs by Danie Gregory Mason, entitled: (a) "A Drunkard," (b) "A Concertina Player," (c) "A Revolutionary," (d) "A Boy," (e) "A Prophet. Pierre Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major (K. No. 425) which, although not played at these concerts for some years, is considered one of the master's most charming works. A novelty at this concert will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite consisting of Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon. The concert will close with Enesco's brilliant Rumanian Rhapsody in A major.

POST NOV. 14

Events and Comments

Richard Burgin, who appears with de Gorgorza, at a concert for the benefit of the National Civic Federation Thursday evening at Symphony Hall, is already favorably known to the subscribers to the Symphony concerts. He replaced the departed Fradkin as concert master at the beginning of the present season, after experience in his native Europe as concert master under Nikisch, Fiedler and Richard Strauss, and as solo violinist in many cities. He is a pupil of Leopold Auer, under whom he studied four years. Jascha Heifetz is a friend and fellow pupil.

◆

Guy Maier, who is to be soloist at the Symphony Pension Fund concert Nov 21, is to give one of his admirable two piano recitals, partnered as usual by Lee Pattison, at Jordan Hall Nov 27. The great success of these concerts in this city has been duplicated by the good fortune attending similar ventures by Maier and Pattison in Paris and New York.

◆

A suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouschka," given here by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, will be played at the Symphony concerts, Nov 26 and 27. It is not yet settled who will play the exacting piano part.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixth program. Symphony in C major (Kochel No. 425), Mozart; "Russians" five songs with orchestral accompaniment, D. G. Mason; "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Ravel (first time here); Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco. Soloist, Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Sunday, Nov 21, at 3:30. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pension Fund concert. "Scheherezade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Pianoforte Concerto in E flat. Liszt; "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner. Soloist, Guy Maier, pianist.

GLOBE NOV, 14.

Boston Pianist Pension Fund Soloist

FOR the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, in aid of of its pension fund, Guy Maier, the young Boston pianist, is to be soloist. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals. At the declaration of war Mr. Maier went to France and gave recitals in Paris and concerts for wounded soldiers near the front. At this concert he will perform Liszt's concerto in E-flat with the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present a program including Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," with violin solos by the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin; the Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, who will sing with the orchestra "Russians," a song cycle by Daniel Gregory Mason. Pierre Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major. A novelty will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite. Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody in A major will also be played.

GUY MAIER, soloist at Pension Fund Symphony concert.

ADVERTISER NOV. 14

TO PLAY FOR PENSION FUND

Guy Maier to Be Soloist with Symphony Orchestra

GUY MAIER

No musician of Boston has made a more distinguished name for himself in recent years than Guy Maier, the pianist, who is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Pension Fund concert next Sunday afternoon. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other cities. Togther with Lee Pattison, he has specialized in concerts of music for two pianos, and the two young men, by their combined talents, have created a fresh interest in music in this form.

At the declaraton of war Mr. Maier went fo France and took an important part in the work with our army there. He helped in the organization of the great "leave centres" behind the front, and delighted wounded soldiers by his concerts in many encampments. In Paris he also attracted considerable attention by his recitals. Last year, several concerts for young people, with preliminary talks on the music to be played, afforded some of the delightful musical events of the season.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

At the sixth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 19 and 20, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American singer, who is without peer among the concert baritones in this country. He will sing with the orchestra "Russians," five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled—(a) A Drunkard.; (b) A Concertina Player; (c) A Revolutionary; (d) A Boy; (e) A. Prophet. Mr. Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major (K. No. 425), which, although not played at these concerts for some years, is considered one of the master's most charming works.

A novelty at this concert will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite consisting of Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon. The concert will close with Enesco's brilliant Roumanian Rhapsody in A major.

NOV 14 HERALD

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMS ANNOUNCED

Two Attractive Schedules Arranged for Friday and Saturday

The program of the Sumphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening includes two interesting unfamiliar pieces: Four Preludes by Gustav Strube, who for many years was a member of the orchestra and a conductor of the "Pops" and is now the teacher of composition at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore; these short preludes will have their first performance. Resphigi's "Fountains of Rome" is a symphonic poem portraying scenes at four fountains from Dawn to Sunset. Resphigi is one of the younger Italian composers who have attracted attention by imaginative force and modernity of technic. He now lives in Rome, where he teaches composition at the Academy of St. Cecilia. "The Fountains of Rome" has been performed successfully in New York and Chicago. The other compositions to be heard are Brahms 4th Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." Truly an attractive program.

---

rogrammes in Prospect

Circumstances have compelled Mr. Moneux to alter the programme he had lanned for the Symphony Concerts of next eek. He intended to include in it a new iece by the English composer, Arnold Bax. It is exacting music, requiring more reparation than the conductor and the rchestra can now give it. Accordingly e has deferred it to a later pair of conerts and substituted the familiar "symphonic fragment" from Franck's cantata, "The Redemption." Possibly Mr. Monteux would gratify many of his hearers if he substituted again and repeated Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," the new tone-poem in which both audiences rejoiced last week. Not a few—it is safe to say—would gladly hear it again while it is still fresh in memory. Opportunity for such pleasure may not recur in the course of the season and the band is better prepared with it than even with Franck's hackneyed music. As the programme for the concerts of Nov 26 and 27 now stands, it begins with the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka," proceeds with the fragment from "The Redemption" and ends with Mendelssohn's long and seldom heard octet for strings to be played by the full string choir in fresh revelation of present quality.

At their concert of music for two pianos

In turn, Mr. Burgin, appearing as violinist for the first time outside the Symphony Concerts, rediscovered Sarasate's fantasia upon airs from Bizet's "Carmen." Displayful pieces for the fiddlers are not so numerous or in themselves so interesting as to warrant the neglect of this amusing and rewarding music. But the virtuosi go by fashion, custom, even in ruts, and so, perhaps, this particular fantasia has been out of the mode. The wonder is that Mr. Kreisler has not anticipated Mr. Burgin with it, since it teems with the refinements of technical skill, tone, and inflection in which the elder violinist delights; while from end to end, he knows the "literature" of his instrument. Naturally the Spanish pages in Bizet's music attracted the Spanish violinist—the Habanera and the Sevillana for Carmen in the first act, the introduction to the scene before the bull-ring. Bizet's melodies sing clear in the fantasia; his rhythms beat brightly; here and there the tonal color even of a single instrument curiously recalls the opera house. Around these melodies and rhythms, yet never clouding or hindering them, Sarasate wove his arabesques of display for the technician's hand in feats of skill for the musician's sense of diversities of tone. It is the refinement and not the ostentation of technique that he seeks, the finesse and not the force of tone. Displayful piece the fantasia is, but display fine-strung.

Here as elsewhere Mr. Burgin proved himself able violinist, but one, as it seemed, more in place as leader of the string choir in an orchestra than as virtuoso in a chance concert. He played, beside the fantasia, Tartini's sonata "of the devil's trill" and the usual miscellany of short pieces. In one and all, he was an eminently sound violinist. He played with skill, with taste, with discretion, with understanding. He appreciated the matter and the manner of the music in hand. A sensitive ear shaped and shaded his tone. Arm, wrist and fingers did him faithful service. He overplayed and he underplayed nothing. Yet somehow, there was no vividness in all this virtue, no cle and lively impression. Mr. Burgin was literal with Tartini and Pugnani; he was dutiful to the minor composers—and no more. Only Sarasate's music struck sparks, at last, from his musical composure. . . . Upon Mr. de Gogorza in the familiar pieces to which he returned after his excursion with the Basques, there is no need to dwell. His present powers of song give zest to familiar pieces, gild mediocre numbers, answer to what is worthy of them—stimulate the wish that upon such music, oftener and more freshly, his choice might fall.

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 19

DE GOGORZA AND BURGIN IN RECITAL

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Richard Burgin, violinist, played to a large and appreciative audience last night at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the National Civic Federation. The concert was under the patronage of a long and distinguished list of Boston women. The arrangements were in charge of a committee of four, Mrs Philip S. Dalton, Mrs Allan Forbes, Mrs James Lawrence Jr and Mrs F. S. Mead.

About Mr de Gogorza's singing there is little new to be told in a city which has heard and liked him for more years than he might wish carefully counted. His voice is still the same mellow baritone, his way of singing still sedulously expressive of the dramatic content of the words.

He gave an interesting group of Basque folk songs, five of them sung in the original and one, for some reason, in French, which varied his repertory entertainingly. He also obliged with "La Paloma" at the end, as usual.

Mr Durgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time in recital. He showed the same marked degree of musical intelligence and the same conscientious workmanship that have distinguished his playing with the orchestra. His warm tone and delicate phrasing won him the favor of the audience, which seemed especially pleased with his first two groups.

GLOBE NOV. 19.

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Early Work of Mozart Given for First Time in Twenty Years

WERRENRATH SINGS SONGS BY MASON

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra; Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," Suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, op. 11, No. 1. Reinald Werrenrath was the singer.

The music by Mozart had not been played at Symphony for 20 years. The neglect is surprising, for, although this work was written hurriedly and before the famous three symphonies with which we are all familiar, it still has life and beauty; it is still a proof of Mozart's delicate sense of proportion; melodically it is eminently Mozartian. Mr. Monteux did not double the wind instruments; he employed those indicated by Mozart and reduced the string choir, a sane proceeding, for thus the music did not lose its character, nor did it lack strength.

The performance was in fine taste, and most euphonious. Strings and the oboes sang; melodic passages of Mozart must be sung as the old Italians understood that word. And of all the masters before Beethoven and of many down to the present time, Mozart demands perfection in performance: he gained beautiful effects with the utmost economy of means.

It is not easy to forget the singer in speaking of Mr. Mason's songs. Mr. Werrenrath was the first to sing them; he has made them his own. What would other baritones do with them? Mr. Mason chose verses of Mr. Bynner and endeavored to emphasize their meaning by the employment of a huge orchestra. A huge orchestra may be used discreetly in the accompaniment of a song, but it is not necessary either in accompaniment or in a symphonic work to have all the instruments at work all the time, as some composers think, especially the young men of symphonic poems and the post-Wagnerian composers of Germany. Mr. Mason has some lucky strokes in his instrumentation, but too often the voice was covered, nor was this the fault of the singer or of Mr. Monteux.

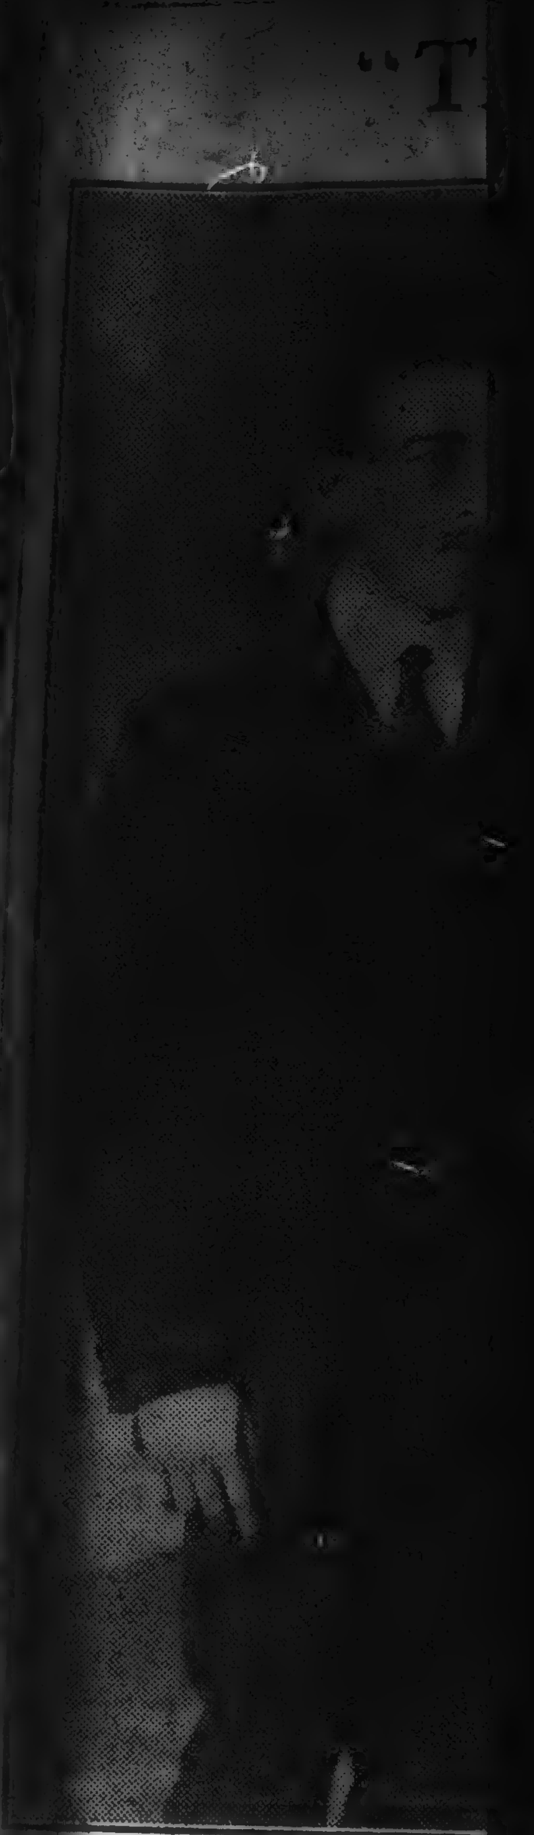
While the voice part is written frequently as if it were an orchestral instrument, with a disregard for easily sung and effective intervals, there are times when, with a simpler accompaniment, it would be sufficiently dramatic. Mr. Werrenrath's diction, as we all know, is unusually clear and significant, but such taxing demands are made upon him by Mr. Mason, that more than once the text was not intelligible.

Without question, the composer comprehended the spirit of the verses; he was able to differentiate; but the expression of his musical translation was too often labored, and even inconsequential, in spite of the stress and storm, the shouting and the orchestral fury. Mr. Werrenrath's part in the performance was worthy of the highest praise; so, too, was the orchestra's led by Mr. Monteux. The singer re-created Mr. Mason's music: he almost persuaded the hearer that it was inherently dramatic and eloquent. Especially noteworthy was Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation of "A Drunkard," and "A Revolutionary"; while in "A Prophet" he was an fanatical as any Hebrew in the desert or in a voluptuous city, trumpeting the Lord's approaching day of wrath.

Ravel wrote a Suite for piano; a Suite in six movements; each inscribed to the memory of a comrade killed in the war. He transcribed four of these movements for a small orchestra, and with what exquisite art! It was unfortunate for Mr. Mason that the display of this art followed the performance of his orchestral accompaniment. Is it possible that Ravel, giving the title "Couperin's Tomb" to this suite in the ancient manner, or as that great master of the clavecin might write for orchestra today, if he were a colleague of Ravel, infused a peculiar melancholy in two of the dance movements, remembering his dead friends? The Forlane, for example, was a very lively dance of the gondoliers in Venice, but no one hearing the Forlane of yesterday, played in accordance with Ravel's indication, would have believed this. Charming music is this Suite and it was charmingly performed. It deserved heartier appreciation than it gained, for, musically considered, it was the feature of the concert.

The performance of Enesco's rhapsody was extraordinarily brilliant. It was the fifth time at these concerts, but yesterday the rhapsody was played with a sweep and a dash, with a sense of color and a spirit of rhythmic intoxication that caused all previous performances to seem pale and phlegmatic.

The concert will be repeated tonigh The program of next week is announce as follows: Mendelssohn, Octet in E fl for strings, Op. 20; Franck, symphon piece from "The Redemption"; Stravi sky, orchestral suite from the ball "Petrouchka."



E. Hoffmann

By Unusual Coi

Thoughtless Subscribers

e World Wags:
rtly after noon last Fri ed to ride by Symphony Ha Huntington avenue steps there of people waiting for the en so they could get the of leftover seats. To wait o hours and more with the of being disappointed is a musical adoration that well de bation, praise and the rewa myself, being a very lucky ind managed to buy one of the last tickets left in the entire ha day night, and, consequently, expect to see every seat house. But not so. On evening last, as I was liste orchestra play Schuma
Fourth Symphony," I counted
I sat in the balcony on the 50 empty seats. Does this a pity? It means that 50 se holders, for some reason or unable to come, and, being so failed to turn in or give a tickets for that night. This for, certainly, there are enou devotees of music who would glad to come if they but had
, as the scene I saw on the indicates. Such a procedure one of the old proverbial tale Dog in the Manger."
not only is it unfair to those w not lucky enough to get tickets
p in the face (if so I may call Monteux and the orchestra a who both deserve every bit ndation and praise possible us such a treat as we get eve Any one who has ever act or been in any public perfor
well knows what a few emp or an otherwise full house will the enthusiasm and stimul
people, therefore, who cann eir seats, will be thoughtf and kind enough to either tu
beforehand or give them ne who can use them, then the n the thanks of the other ndividuals, who have to go with d Mr. Monteux and the who idge.

PHILIP L. SALTONSTALL

ALD NOV. 5

ORCHESTRA SCORES IN A SEVERE TEST

Symphony Concert Shows a Varied Range of Artistry

Brahms, Richard Strauss, Respighi and Strube Interpreted

Yesterday's Symphony concert was a severe test of the abilities of the reconstituted orchestra and its conductor, in which Mr Monteux and his men made a showing which ought to silence the few remaining detractors who have been bemoaning the "collapse" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The merits of the present orchestra are not the same as the chief virtues of the former one. There is no longer the same meticulous accuracy in detail and delicacy in dynamic gradations, though these qualities may in time be regained. No orchestra which has not retained substantially the same membership for a considerable period of time can hope for an ensemble as perfect as that attained under Muck in 1916-'17.

Yet if these classic qualities have been lost, the orchestra, by the coming of new and younger players and by the change in conductors, has gained others which can be dubbed romantic. There is more emotional energy than ever before, and a greater power of interpreting music which demands glow and color rather than a perfectly balanced and poised formal perfection and beauty.

Yesterday, the only movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony which did not sound dulled and a little muddled by contrast with former performances was the distinctly romantic andante, which seemed fresher and more exuberant than of old. "Till Eulenpiegel" became less of a stunt and more of an adventure than hitherto. It was as the composer has labeled it, "Merry pranks after the old-fashioned roguish manner."

Respighi's "Fountains" bubbled, and at moments slopped over, with an energy which almost hid the fact that the piece has little to commend it except an unusually varied bag of tricks in orchestration.

Mr Strube's "Four Preludes," well written music that might have been made the flat summit of academic correctness, took on added life from the performance. The audience, as might have been expected, found Brahms less attractive than he used to be under Muck; Respighi and Strube interesting; and Strauss a jest so intricate that not everyone could get the point. Nobody seemed to notice that Strauss is "now living in Germany." Music, thank Heaven, is again out of politics.

Next week Reinald Werrenwrath will sing five new songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, called "Russians." The orchestra will play an unfamiliar Mozart symphony, last heard in 1900; Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," and Enesco's thrice familiar "Roumanian Rhapsody."

GLOBE NOV. 13.

Guy Maier to Be Pension Fund Soloist

For the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 (the receipts to be devoted as usual to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra), Guy Maier, the rising young Boston pianist, is to me soloist. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other Eastern cities. At the declaration of war, Mr. Maier went to France and attracted considerable attention by his recitals in Paris and by his concerts for wounded soldiers near the front.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E-flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Bergin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Boston Symphony Programme

At the sixth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 19 and 20, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American singer, who is without peer among the concert baritones in this country. He will sing with the orchestra "Russians," five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled: (a) "A Drunkard," (b) "A Concertina Player," (c) "A Revolutionary," (d) "A Boy," (e) "A Prophet. Pierre Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major (K. No. 425) which, although not played at these concerts for some years, is considered one of the master's most charming works. A novelty at this concert will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite consisting of Prélude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon. The concert will close with Enesco's brilliant Rumanian Rhapsody in A major.

POST NOV. 14

Events and Comments

Richard Burgin, who appears with de Gorgorza, at a concert for the benefit of the National Civic Federation Thursday evening at Symphony Hall, is already favorably known to the subscribers to the Symphony concerts. He replaced the departed Fradkin as concert master at the beginning of the present season, after experience in his native Europe as concert master under Nikisch, Fiedler and Richard Strauss, and as solo violinist in many cities. He is a pupil of Leopold Auer, under whom he studied four years. Jascha Heifetz is a friend and fellow pupil.

◆

Guy Maier, who is to be soloist at the Symphony Pension Fund concert Nov 21, is to give one of his admirable two piano recitals, partnered as usual by Lee Pattison, at Jordan Hall Nov 27. The great success of these concerts in this city has been duplicated by the good fortune attending similar ventures by Maier and Pattison in Paris and New York.

◆

A suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouschka," given here by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, will be played at the Symphony concerts, Nov 26 and 27. It is not yet settled who will play the exacting piano part.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixth program. Symphony in C major (Kochel No. 425), Mozart; "Russians" five songs with orchestral accompaniment, D. G. Mason; "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Ravel (first time here); Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco. Soloist, Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Sunday, Nov 21, at 3:30. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pension Fund concert. "Scheherezade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, Liszt; "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner. Soloist, Guy Maier, pianist.

GLOBE NOV. 14.

Boston Pianist Pension Fund Soloist

FOR the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, in aid of of its pension fund, Guy Maier, the young Boston pianist, is to be soloist. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals. At the declaration of war Mr. Maier went to France and gave recitals in Paris and concerts for wounded soldiers near the front. At this concert he will perform Liszt's concerto in E-flat with the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present a program including Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," with violin solos by the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin; the Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, who will sing with the orchestra "Russians," a song cycle by Daniel Gregory Mason. Pierre Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major. A novelty will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite. Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody in A major will also be played.

GUY MAIER, soloist at Pension Fund Symphony concert.

ADVERTISER NOV. 14.

TO PLAY FOR PENSION FUND

Guy Maier to Be Soloist with Symphony Orchestra

GUY MAIER

No musician of Boston has made a more distinguished name for himself in recent years than Guy Maier, the pianist, who is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Pension Fund concert next Sunday afternoon. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other cities. Togther with Lee Pattison, he has specialized in concerts of music for two pianos, and the two young men, by their combined talents, have created a fresh interest in music in this form.

At the declaraton of war Mr. Maier went to France and took an important part in the work with our army there. He helped in the organization of the great "leave centres" behind the front, and delighted wounded soldiers by his concerts in many encampments. In Paris he also attracted considerable attention by his recitals. Last year, several concerts for young people, with preliminary talks on the music to be played, afforded some of the delightful musical events of the season.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

At the sixth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 19 and 20, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American singer, who is without peer among the concert baritones in this country. He will sing with the orchestra "Russians," five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled—(a) A Drunkard.; (b) A Concertina Player; (c) A Revolutionary; (d) A Boy; (e) A, Prophet. Mr. Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major (K. No. 425), which, although not played at these concerts for some years, is considered one of the master's most charming works.

A novelty at this concert will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite consisting of Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon. The concert will close with Enesco's brilliant Roumanian Rhapsody in A major.

NOV 14 HERALD

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMS ANNOUNCED

Two Attractive Schedules Arranged for Friday and Saturday

The program of the Sumphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening includes two interesting unfamiliar pieces: Four Preludes by Gustav Strube, who for many years was a member of the orchestra and a conductor of the "Pops" and is now the teacher of composition at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore; these short preludes will have their first performance. Resphigi's "Fountains of Rome" is a symphonic poem portraying scenes at four fountains from Dawn to Sunset. Resphigi is one of the younger Italian composers who have attracted attention by imaginative force and modernity of technic. He now lives in Rome, where he teaches composition at the Academy of St. Cecilia. "The Fountains of Rome" has been performed successfully in New York and Chicago. The other compositions to be heard are Brahms 4th Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." Truly an attractive program.

---

rogrammes in Prospect

Circumstances have compelled Mr. Mon- eux to alter the programme he had lanned for the Symphony Concerts of next eek. He intended to include in it a new iece by the English composer, Arnold ax. It is exacting music, requiring more reparation than the conductor and the rchestra can now give it. Accordingly e has deferred it to a later pair of con- erts and substituted the familiar "symphonic fragment" from Franck's cantata, "The Redemption." Possibly Mr. Monteux would gratify many of his hearers if he substituted again and repeated Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," the new tone-poem in which both audiences rejoiced last week. Not a few—it is safe to say—would gladly hear it again while it is still fresh in memory. Opportunity for such pleasure may not recur in the course of the season and the band is better prepared with it than even with Franck's hackneyed music. As the programme for the concerts of Nov 26 and 27 now stands, it begins with the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka," proceeds with the fragment from "The Redemption" and ends with Mendelssohn's long and seldom heard octet for strings to be played by the full string choir in fresh revelation of present quality.

At their concert of music for two pianos

In turn, Mr. Burgin, appearing as violinist for the first time outside the Symphony Concerts, rediscovered Sarasate's fantasia upon airs from Bizet's "Carmen." Displayful pieces for the fiddlers are not so numerous or in themselves so interesting as to warrant the neglect of this amusing and rewarding music. But the virtuosi go by fashion, custom, even in ruts, and so, perhaps, this particular fantasia has been out of the mode. The wonder is that Mr. Kreisler has not anticipated Mr. Burgin with it, since it teems with the refinements of technical skill, tone, and inflection in which the elder violinist delights; while from end to end, he knows the "literature" of his instrument. Naturally the Spanish pages in Bizet's music attracted the Spanish violinist—the Habanera and the Sevillana for Carmen in the first act, the introduction to the scene before the bull-ring. Bizet's melodies sing clear in the fantasia; his rhythms beat brightly; here and there the tonal color even of a single instrument curiously recalls the opera house. Around these melodies and rhythms, yet never clouding or hindering them, Sarasate wove his arabesques of display for the technician's hand in feats of skill for the musician's sense of diversities of tone. It is the refinement and not the ostentation of technique that he seeks, the finesse and not the force of tone. Displayful piece the fantasia is, but display fine-strung.

Here as elsewhere Mr. Burgin proved himself able violinist, but one, as it seemed, more in place as leader of the string choir in an orchestra than as virtuoso in a chance concert. He played, beside the fantasia, Tartini's sonata "of the devil's trill" and the usual miscellany of short pieces. In one and all, he was an eminently sound violinist. He played with skill, with taste, with discretion, with understanding. He appreciated the matter and the manner of the music in hand. A sensitive ear shaped and shaded his tone. Arm, wrist and fingers did him faithful service. He overplayed and he underplayed nothing. Yet somehow, there was no vividness in all this virtue, no clear and lively impression. Mr. Burgin was literal with Tartini and Pugnani; he was dutiful to the minor composers—and no more. Only Sarasate's music struck sparks, at last, from his musical composure. . . . Upon Mr. de Gogorza in the familiar pieces to which he returned after his excursion with the Basques, there is no need to dwell. His present powers of song give zest to familiar pieces, gild mediocre numbers, answer to what is worthy of them—stimulate the wish that upon such music, oftener and more freshly, his choice might fall.

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 19

DE GOGORZA AND BURGIN IN RECITAL

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Richard Burgin, violinist, played to a large and appreciative audience last night at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the National Civic Federation. The concert was under the patronage of a long and distinguished list of Boston women. The arrangements were in charge of a committee of four, Mrs Philip S. Dalton, Mrs Allan Forbes, Mrs James Lawrence Jr and Mrs F. S. Mead.

About Mr de Gogorza's singing there is little new to be told in a city which has heard and liked him for more years than he might wish carefully counted. His voice is still the same mellow baritone, his way of singing still sedulously expressive of the dramatic content of the words.

He gave an interesting group of Basque folk songs, five of them sung in the original and one, for some reason, in French, which varied his repertory entertainingly. He also obliged with "La Paloma" at the end, as usual.

Mr Durgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time in recital. He showed the same marked degree of musical intelligence and the same conscientious workmanship that have distinguished his playing with the orchestra. His warm tone and delicate phrasing won him the favor of the audience, which seemed especially pleased with his first two groups.

GLOBE NOV. 19.

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Early Work of Mozart Given for First Time in Twenty Years

WERRENRATH SINGS SONGS BY MASON

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra; Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," Suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, op. 11, No. 1. Reinald Werrenrath was the singer.

The music by Mozart had not been played at Symphony for 20 years. The neglect is surprising, for, although this work was written hurriedly and before the famous three symphonies with which we are all familiar, it still has life and beauty; it is still a proof of Mozart's delicate sense of proportion; melodically it is eminently Mozartian. Mr. Monteux did not double the wind instruments; he employed those indicated by Mozart and reduced the string choir, a sane proceeding, for thus the music did not lose its character, nor did it lack strength.

The performance was in fine taste, and most euphonious. Strings and the oboes sang; melodic passages of Mozart must be sung as the old Italians understood that word. And of all the masters before Beethoven and of many down to the present time, Mozart demands perfection in performance: he gained beautiful effects with the utmost economy of means.

It is not easy to forget the singer in speaking of Mr. Mason's songs. Mr. Werrenrath was the first to sing them; he has made them his own. What would other baritones do with them? Mr. Mason chose verses of Mr. Bynner and endeavored to emphasize their meaning by the employment of a huge orchestra. A huge orchestra may be used discreetly in the accompaniment of a song, but it is not necessary either in accompaniment or in a symphonic work to have all the instruments at work all the time, as some composers think, especially the young men of symphonic poems and the post-Wagnerian composers of Germany. Mr. Mason has some lucky strokes in his instrumentation, but too often the voice was covered, nor was this the fault of the singer or of Mr. Monteux.

While the voice part is written frequently as if it were an orchestral instrument, with a disregard for easily sung and effective intervals, there are times when, with a simpler accompaniment, it would be sufficiently dramatic. Mr. Werrenrath's diction, as we all know, is unusually clear and significant, but such taxing demands are made upon him by Mr. Mason, that more than once the text was not intelligible.

Without question, the composer comprehended the spirit of the verses; he was able to differentiate; but the expression of his musical translation was too often labored, and even inconsequential, in spite of the stress and storm, the shouting and the orchestral fury. Mr. Werrenrath's part in the performance was worthy of the highest praise; so, too, was the orchestra's led by Mr. Monteux. The singer re-created Mr. Mason's music: he almost persuaded the hearer that it was inherently dramatic and eloquent. Especially noteworthy was Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation of "A Drunkard," and "A Revolutionary"; while in "A Prophet" he was an fanatical as any Hebrew in the desert or in a voluptuous city, trumpeting the Lord's approaching day of wrath.

Ravel wrote a Suite for piano; a Suite in six movements; each inscribed to the memory of a comrade killed in the war. He transcribed four of these movements for a small orchestra, and with what exquisite art! It was unfortunate for Mr. Mason that the display of this art followed the performance of his orchestral accompaniment. Is it possible that Ravel, giving the title "Couperin's Tomb" to this suite in the ancient manner, or as that great master of the clavecin might write for orchestra today, if he were a colleague of Ravel, infused a peculiar melancholy in two of the dance movements, remembering his dead friends?

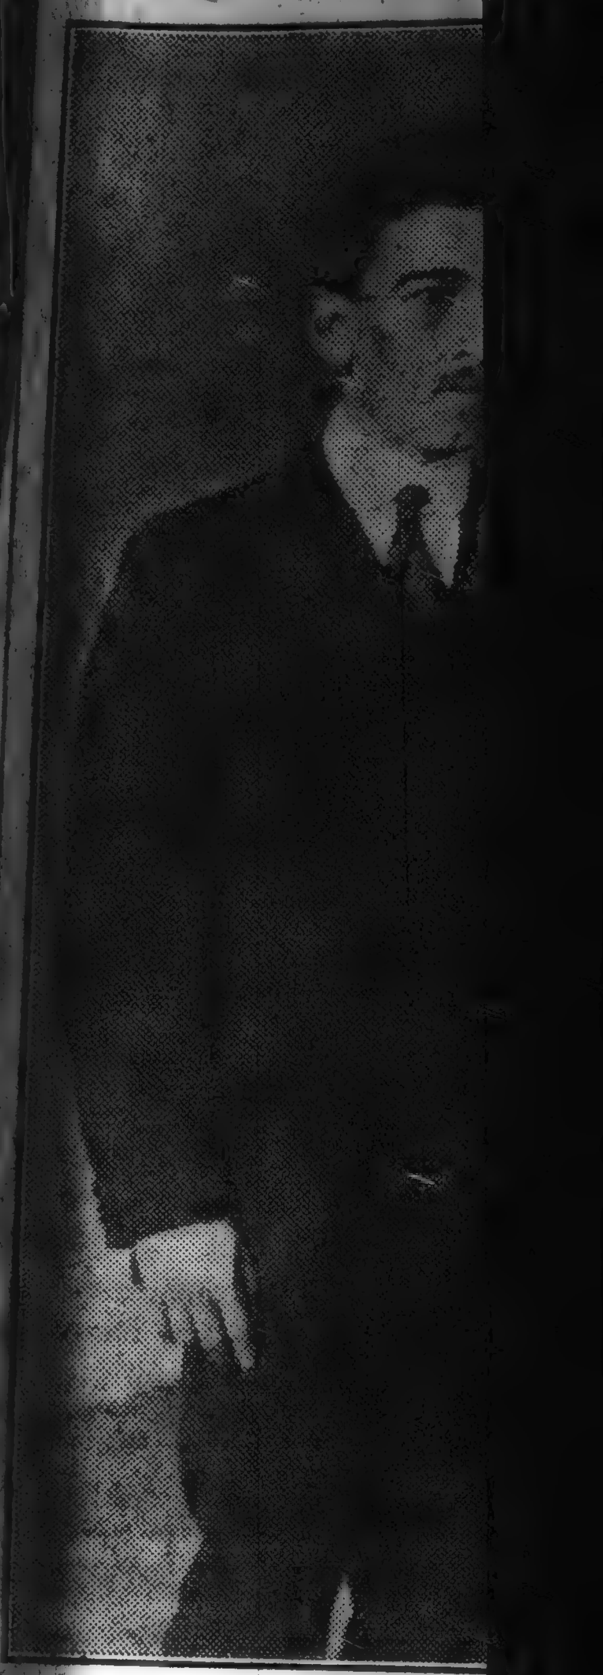
The Forlane, for example, was a very lively dance of the gondoliers in Venice; but no one hearing the Forlane of yesterday, played in accordance with Ravel's indication, would have believed this. Charming music is this Suite and it was charmingly performed. It deserved heartier appreciation than it gained, for, musically considered, it was the feature of the concert.

The performance of Enesco's rhapsody was extraordinarily brilliant. It was the fifth time at these concerts, but yesterday the rhapsody was played with a sweep and a dash, with a sense of color and a spirit of rhythmic intoxication that caused all previous performances to seem pale and phlegmatic.

The concert will be repeated tonigh

The program of next week is announce as follows: Mendelssohn, Octet in E fl for strings, Op. 20; Franck, symphon piece from "The Redemption"; Stravi sky, orchestral suite from the ball "Petrouchka."

"T



E. Hoffmann

By Unusual Coi

Thoughtless Subscribers

As the World Wags:

Shortly after noon last Fri chanced to ride by Symphony Hal the Huntington avenue steps there scores of people waiting for the to open so they could get the choice of leftover seats. To wait for two hours and more with the chance of being disappointed is a of musical adoration that well des approbation, praise and the rewa a seat.

I, myself, being a very lucky ind ual, managed to buy one of the last son tickets left in the entire ha Saturday night, and, consequently,
I did expect to see every seat o pied in the house. But not so. On urday evening last, as I was liste to the orchestra play Schuma
"Fourth Symphony," I counted where I sat in the balcony on the alone 50 empty seats. Does this seem a pity? It means that 50 se ticket holders, for some reason or o were unable to come, and, being so able, failed to turn in or give a their tickets for that night. This m true so, for, certainly, there are eno true devotees of music who would be too glad to come if they but had chance, as the scene I saw on the st well indicates. Such a procedure minds one of the old proverbial tale
the "Dog in the Manger."

But not only is it unfair to those w were not lucky enough to get tickets is a slap in the face (if so I may call to Mr. Monteux and the orchestra a whole, who both deserve every bit commendation and praise possible giving us such a treat as we get eve week. Any one who has ever act or been in any public perfor
well knows an otherwise full house will the thanks of the
the enthusiasm and stimul

people, therefore, who cann
eir seats, will be thought and kind enough to either tu
beforehand or give them
ne who can use them, then th individuals, who have to go wit and Mr. Monteux and the who

PHILIP L. SALTONSTALL
idge.

ALD NOV. 5

ORCHESTRA SCORES IN A SEVERE TEST

Symphony Concert Shows a Varied Range of Artistry

Brahms, Richard Strauss, Respighi and Strube Interpreted

Yesterday's Symphony concert was a severe test of the abilities of the reconstituted orchestra and its conductor, in which Mr Monteux and his men made a showing which ought to silence the few remaining detractors who have been bemoaning the "collapse" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The merits of the present orchestra are not the same as the chief virtues of the former one. There is no longer the same meticulous accuracy in detail and delicacy in dynamic gradations, though these qualities may in time be regained. No orchestra which has not retained substantially the same membership for a considerable period of time can hope for an ensemble as perfect as that attained under Muck in 1916-'17.

Yet if these classic qualities have been lost, the orchestra, by the coming of new and younger players and by the change in conductors, has gained others which can be dubbed romantic. There is more emotional energy than ever before, and a greater power of interpreting music which demands glow and color rather than a perfectly balanced and poised formal perfection and beauty.

Yesterday, the only movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony which did not sound dulled and a little muddled by contrast with former performances was the distinctly romantic andante, which seemed fresher and more exuberant than of old. "Till Eulenpiegel" became less of a stunt and more of an adventure than hitherto. It was as the composer has labeled it, "Merry pranks after the old-fashioned roguish manner."

Respighi's "Fountains" bubbled, and at moments slopped over, with an energy which almost hid the fact that the piece has little to commend it except an unusually varied bag of tricks in orchestration.

Mr Strube's "Four Preludes," well written music that might have been made the flat summit of academic correctness, took on added life from the performance. The audience, as might have been expected, found Brahms less attractive than he used to be under Muck; Respighi and Strube interesting; and Strauss a jest so intricate that not everyone could get the point. Nobody seemed to notice that Strauss is "now living in Germany." Music, thank Heaven, is again out of politics.

Next week Reinald Werrenwrath will sing five new songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, called "Russians." The orchestra will play an unfamiliar Mozart symphony, last heard in 1900; Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," and Enesco's thrice familiar "Roumanian Rhapsody."

GLOBE NOV. 13.

Guy Maier to Be Pension Fund Soloist

For the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 (the receipts to be devoted as usual to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra), Guy Maier, the rising young Boston pianist, is to me soloist. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other Eastern cities. At the declaration of war, Mr. Maier went to France and attracted considerable attention by his recitals in Paris and by his concerts for wounded soldiers near the front.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E-flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Bergin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Boston Symphony Programme

At the sixth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 19 and 20, the soloist will be Heinald Werrenrath, the young American singer, who is without peer among the concert baritones in this country. He will sing with the orchestra "Russians," five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled: (a) "A Drunkard," (b) "A Concertina Player," (c) "A Revolutionary," (d) "A Boy," (e) "A Prophet. Pierre Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major (K. No. 425) which, although not played at these concerts for some years, is considered one of the master's most charming works. A novelty at this concert will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite consisting of Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon. The concert will close with Enesco's brilliant Rumanian Rhapsody in A major.

POST NOV. 14

Events and Comments

Richard Burgin, who appears with de Gorgorza, at a concert for the benefit of the National Civic Federation Thursday evening at Symphony Hall, is already favorably known to the subscribers to the Symphony concerts. He replaced the departed Fradkin as concert master at the beginning of the present season, after experience in his native Europe as concert master under Nikisch, Fiedler and Richard Strauss, and as solo violinist in many cities. He is a pupil of Leopold Auer, under whom he studied four years. Jascha Heifetz is a friend and fellow pupil.

Guy Maier, who is to be soloist at the Symphony Pension Fund concert Nov 21, is to give one of his admirable two piano recitals, partnered as usual by Lee Pattison, at Jordan Hall Nov 27. The great success of these concerts in this city has been duplicated by the good fortune attending similar ventures by Maier and Pattison in Paris and New York.

A suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouschka," given here by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, will be played at the Symphony concerts, Nov 26 and 27. It is not yet settled who will play the exacting piano part.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixth program. Symphony in C major (Kochel No. 425), Mozart; "Russians" five songs with orchestral accompaniment, D. G. Mason; "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Ravel (first time here); Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco. Soloist, Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Sunday, Nov 21, at 3:30. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pension Fund concert. "Scheherezade," Rimsky Korsakoff; Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, Liszt; "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner. Soloist, Guy Maier, pianist.

GLOBE NOV. 14.

Boston Pianist Pension Fund Soloist

FOR the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, in aid of of its pension fund, Guy Maier, the young Boston pianist, is to be soloist. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals. At the declaration of war Mr. Maier went to France and gave recitals in Paris and concerts for wounded soldiers near the front. At this concert he will perform Liszt's concerto in E-flat with the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present a program including Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," with violin solos by the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin; Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, who will sing with the orchestra "Russians," a song cycle by Daniel Gregory Mason. Pierre Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major. A novelty will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite. Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody in A major will also be played.

GUY MAIER, soloist at Pension Fund Symphony concert.

ADVERTISER NOV. 14.

TO PLAY FOR PENSION FUND

Guy Maier to Be Soloist with Symphony Orchestra

GUY MAIER

No musician of Boston has made a more distinguished name for himself in recent years than Guy Maier, the pianist, who is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Pension Fund concert next Sunday afternoon. This, Mr. Maier's first appearance in Boston with the orchestra, follows a long and notable record of highly successful recitals, not only here but in New York and other cities. Togther with Lee Pattison, he has specialized in concerts of music for two pianos, and the two young men, by their combined talents, have created a fresh interest in music in this form.

At the declaraton of war Mr. Maier went to France and took an important part in the work with our army there. He helped in the organization of the great "leave centres" behind the front, and delighted wounded soldiers by his concerts in many encampments. In Paris he also attracted considerable attention by his recitals. Last year, several concerts for young people, with preliminary talks on the music to be played, afforded some of the delightful musical events of the season.

At this concert he will perform Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will make the afternoon exceptionally interesting by rendering Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," based upon tales from the Arabian Nights. Perhaps no score could display the individual talents of a virtuoso orchestra more strikingly than this colorful and pictorial masterpiece. Its notable violin solos will afford a special opportunity to hear the talents of the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, as a virtuoso. The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

At the sixth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 19 and 20, the soloist will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American singer, who is without peer among the concert baritones in this country. He will sing with the orchestra "Russians," five songs by Daniel Gregory Mason, entitled—(a) A Drunkard.; (b) A Concertina Player; (c) A Revolutionary; (d) A Boy; (e) A. Prophet. Mr. Monteux will revive a symphony by Mozart in C major (K. No. 425), which, although not played at these concerts for some years, is considered one of the master's most charming works.

A novelty at this concert will be Maurice Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," an orchestral suite consisting of Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon. The concert will close with Enesco's brilliant Roumanian Rhapsody in A major.

NOV 14 HERALD

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMS ANNOUNCED

Two Attractive Schedules Arranged for Friday and Saturday

The program of the Sumphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening includes two interesting unfamiliar pieces: Four Preludes by Gustav Strube, who for many years was a member of the orchestra and a conductor of the "Pops" and is now the teacher of composition at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore; these short preludes will have their first performance. Resphigi's "Fountains of Rome" is a symphonic poem portraying scenes at four fountains from Dawn to Sunset. Resphigi is one of the younger Italian composers who have attracted attention by imaginative force and modernity of technic. He now lives in Rome, where he teaches composition at the Academy of St. Cecilia. "The Fountains of Rome" has been performed successfully in New York and Chicago. The other compositions to be heard are Brahms 4th Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." Truly an attractive program.

Programmes in Prospect

Circumstances have compelled Mr. Monteux to alter the programme he had planned for the Symphony Concerts of next week. He intended to include in it a new piece by the English composer, Arnold Bax. It is exacting music, requiring more preparation than the conductor and the orchestra can now give it. Accordingly he has deferred it to a later pair of concerts and substituted the familiar "symphonic fragment" from Franck's cantata, "The Redemption." Possibly Mr. Monteux would gratify many of his hearers if he substituted again and repeated Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," the new tone-poem in which both audiences rejoiced last week. Not a few—it is safe to say—would gladly hear it again while it is still fresh in memory. Opportunity for such pleasure may not recur in the course of the season and the band is better prepared with it than even with Franck's hackneyed music. As the programme for the concerts of Nov 26 and 27 now stands, it begins with the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka," proceeds with the fragment from "The Redemption" and ends with Mendelssohn's long and seldom heard octet for strings to be played by the full string choir in fresh revelation of present quality.

At their concert of music for two pianos

In turn, Mr. Burgin, appearing as violinist for the first time outside the Symphony Concerts, rediscovered Sarasate's fantasia upon airs from Bizet's "Carmen." Displayful pieces for the fiddlers are not so numerous or in themselves so interesting as to warrant the neglect of this amusing and rewarding music. But the virtuosi go by fashion, custom, even in ruts, and so, perhaps, this particular fantasia has been out of the mode. The wonder is that Mr. Kreisler has not anticipated Mr. Burgin with it, since it teems with the refinements of technical skill, tone, and inflection in which the elder violinist delights; while from end to end, he knows the "literature" of his instrument. Naturally the Spanish pages in Bizet's music attracted the Spanish violinist—the Habanera and the Sevillana for Carmen in the first act, the introduction to the scene before the bull-ring. Bizet's melodies sing clear in the fantasia; his rhythms beat brightly; here and there the tonal color even of a single instrument curiously recalls the opera house. Around these melodies and rhythms, yet never clouding or hindering them, Sarasate wove his arabesques of display for the technician's hand in feats of skill for the musician's sense of diversities of tone. It is the refinement and not the ostentation of technique that he seeks, the finesse and not the force of tone. Displayful piece the fantasia is, but display fine-strung.

Here as elsewhere Mr. Burgin proved himself able violinist, but one, as it seemed, more in place as leader of the string choir in an orchestra than as virtuoso in a chance concert. He played, beside the fantasia, Tartini's sonata "of the devil's trill" and the usual miscellany of short pieces. In one and all, he was an eminently sound violinist. He played with skill, with taste, with discretion, with understanding. He appreciated the matter and the manner of the music in hand. A sensitive ear shaped and shaded his tone. Arm, wrist and fingers did him faithful service. He overplayed and he underplayed nothing. Yet somehow, there was no vividness in all this virtue, no clear and lively impression. Mr. Burgin was literal with Tartini and Pugnani; he was dutiful to the minor composers—and no more. Only Sarasate's music struck sparks, at last, from his musical composure. . . . Upon Mr. de Gogorza in the familiar pieces to which he returned after his excursion with the Basques there is no need to dwell. His present powers of song give zest to familiar pieces, gild mediocre numbers, answer to what is worthy of them—stimulate the wish that upon such music, oftener and more freshly, his choice might fall.

H. T. P.

2

TRANS. NOV. 19.

DE GOGORZA AND BURGIN IN RECITAL

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Richard Burgin, violinist, played to a large and appreciative audience last night at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the National Civic Federation. The concert was under the patronage of a long and distinguished list of Boston women. The arrangements were in charge of a committee of four, Mrs Philip S. Dalton, Mrs Allan Forbes, Mrs James Lawrence Jr and Mrs F. S. Mead.

About Mr de Gogorza's singing there is little new to be told in a city which has heard and liked him for more years than he might wish carefully counted. His voice is still the same mellow baritone, his way of singing still sedulously expressive of the dramatic content of the words.

He gave an interesting group of Basque folk songs, five of them sung in the original and one, for some reason, in French, which varied his repertory entertainingly. He also obliged with "La Paloma" at the end, as usual.

Mr Durgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time in recital. He showed the same marked degree of musical intelligence and the same conscientious workmanship that have distinguished his playing with the orchestra. His warm tone and delicate phrasing won him the favor of the audience, which seemed especially pleased with his first two groups.

GLOBE NOV. 19.

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Early Work of Mozart Given for First Time in Twenty Years

WERRENRATH SINGS SONGS BY MASON

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra; Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," Suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, op. 11, No. 1. Reinald Werrenrath was the singer.

The music by Mozart had not been played at Symphony for 20 years. The neglect is surprising, for, although this work was written hurriedly and before the famous three symphonies with which we are all familiar, it still has life and beauty; it is still a proof of Mozart's delicate sense of proportion; melodically it is eminently Mozartian. Mr. Monteux did not double the wind instruments; he employed those indicated by Mozart and reduced the string choir, a sane proceeding, for thus the music did not lose its character, nor did it lack strength.

The performance was in fine taste, and most euphonious. Strings and the oboes sang; melodic passages of Mozart must be sung as the old Italians understood that word. And of all the masters before Beethoven and of many down to the present time Mozart demands perfection in performance; he gained beautiful effects with the utmost economy of means.

It is not easy to forget the singer in speeaking of Mr. Mason's songs. Mr. Werrenrath was the first to sing them; he has made them his own. What would other baritones do with them? Mr. Mason chose verses of Mr. Bynner and endeavored to emphasize their meaning by the employment of a huge orchestra. A huge orchestra may be used discreetly in the accompaniment of a song, but it is not necessary either in accompaniment or in a symphonic work to have all the instruments at work all the time, as some composers think, especially the young men of symphonic poems and the post-Wagnerian composers of Germany. Mr. Mason has some lucky strokes in his instrumentation, but too often the voice was covered, nor was this the fault of the singer or of Mr. Monteux. While the voice part is written frequently as if it were an orchestral instrument, with a disregard for easily sung and effective intervals, there are times when, with a simpler accompaniment, it would be sufficiently dramatic. Mr. Werrenrath's diction, as we all know, is unusually clear and significant, but such taxing demands are made upon him by Mr. Mason that more than once the text was not intelligible.

Without question, the composer comprehended the spirit of the verses; he was able to differentiate; but the expression of his musical translation was too often labored, and even inconsequential, in spite of the stress and storm, the shouting and the orchestral fury. Mr. Werrenrath's part in the performance was worthy of the highest praise; so, too, was the orchestra's led by Mr. Monteux. The singer re-created Mr. Mason's music; he almost persuaded the hearer that it was inherently dramatic and eloquent. Especially noteworthy was Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation of "A Drunkard," and "A Revolutionary"; while in "A Prophet" he was an fanatical as any Hebrew in the desert or in a voluptuous city, trumpeting the Lord's approaching day of wrath.

Ravel wrote a Suite for piano: a Suite in six movements; each inscribed to the memory of a comrade killed in the war. He transcribed four of these movements for a small orchestra, and with what exquisite art! It was unfortunate for Mr. Mason that the display of this art followed the performance of his orchestral accompaniment. Is it possible that Ravel, giving the title "Couperin's Tomb" to this suite in the ancient manner

HERALD NOV.

E. Hoffmann

By Unusual Coi

Thoughtless Subscribers

At the World Wags:

Shortly after noon last Frid anced to ride by Symphony Hall
Huntington avenue steps there res of people waiting for the open so they could get the ice of leftover seats. To wait two hours and more with the ance of being disappointed is a musical adoration that well dese robation, praise and the rewar eat.

myself, being a very lucky indi managed to buy one of the last tickets left in the entire hall
Saturday night, and, consequently, w
I go I expect to see every seat o pied in the house. But not so. On S evening last, as I was liste
the orchestra play Schuma urth Symphony," I counted f ere I sat in the balcony on the f ne 50 empty seats. Does this m a pity? It means that 50 sea ket holders, for some reason or oth re unable to come, and, being so t failed to turn in or give aw r tickets for that night. This m so, for, certainly, there are enou devotees of music who would o too glad to come if they but had t nce, as the scene I saw on the ste indicates. Such a procedure ds one of the old proverbial tale
"Dog in the Manger."

It not only is it unfair to those w
not lucky enough to get tickets, slap in the face (if so I may call Mr. Monteux and the orchestra as le, who both deserve every bit mendation and praise possible f ing us such a treat as we get eve
Any one who has ever acte ed or been in any public perform well knows what a few empt in an otherwise full house will d the enthusiasm and stimulu
ved.

the people, therefore, who canno their seats, will be thoughtfu h and kind enough to either tur in beforehand or give them t one who can use them, then they earn the thanks of the individuals, who have to go with and Mr. Monteux and the whole estra.

PHILIP L. SALTONSTALL. bridge.

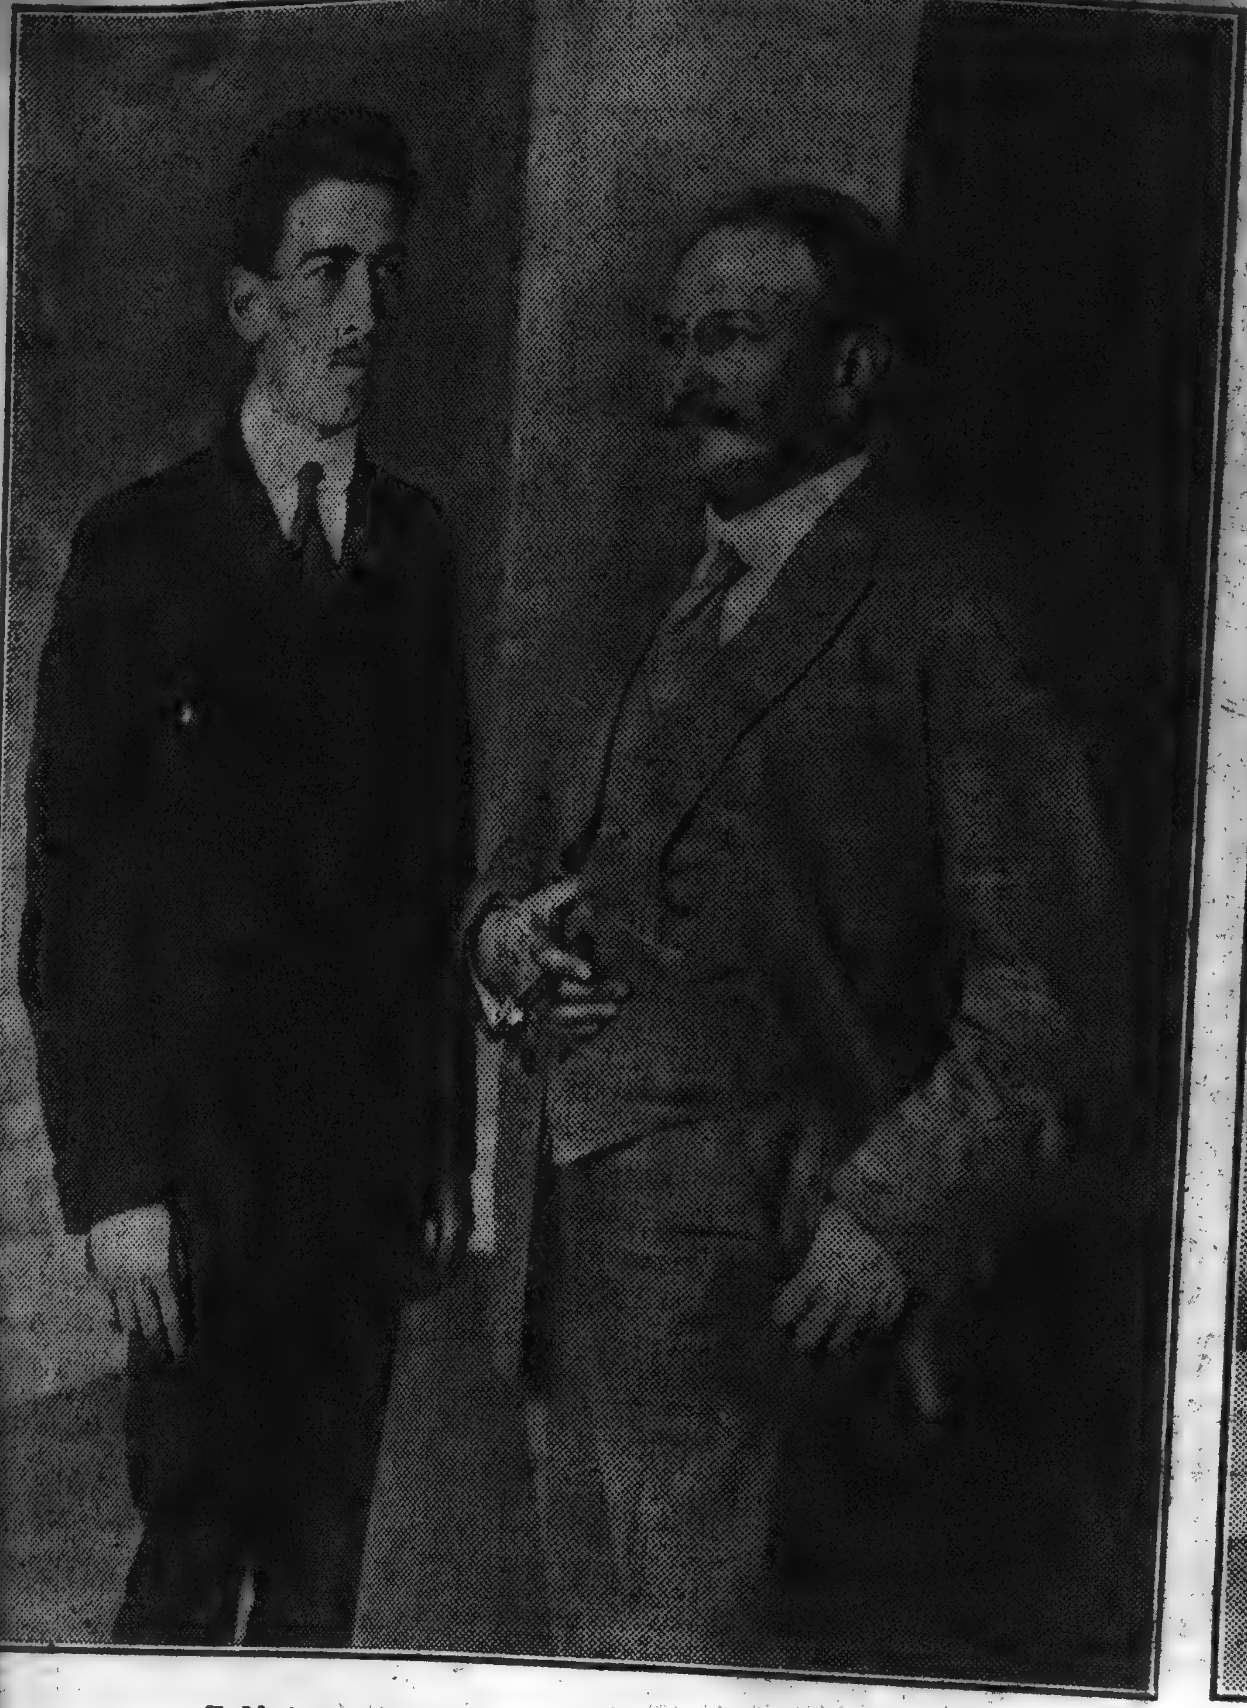
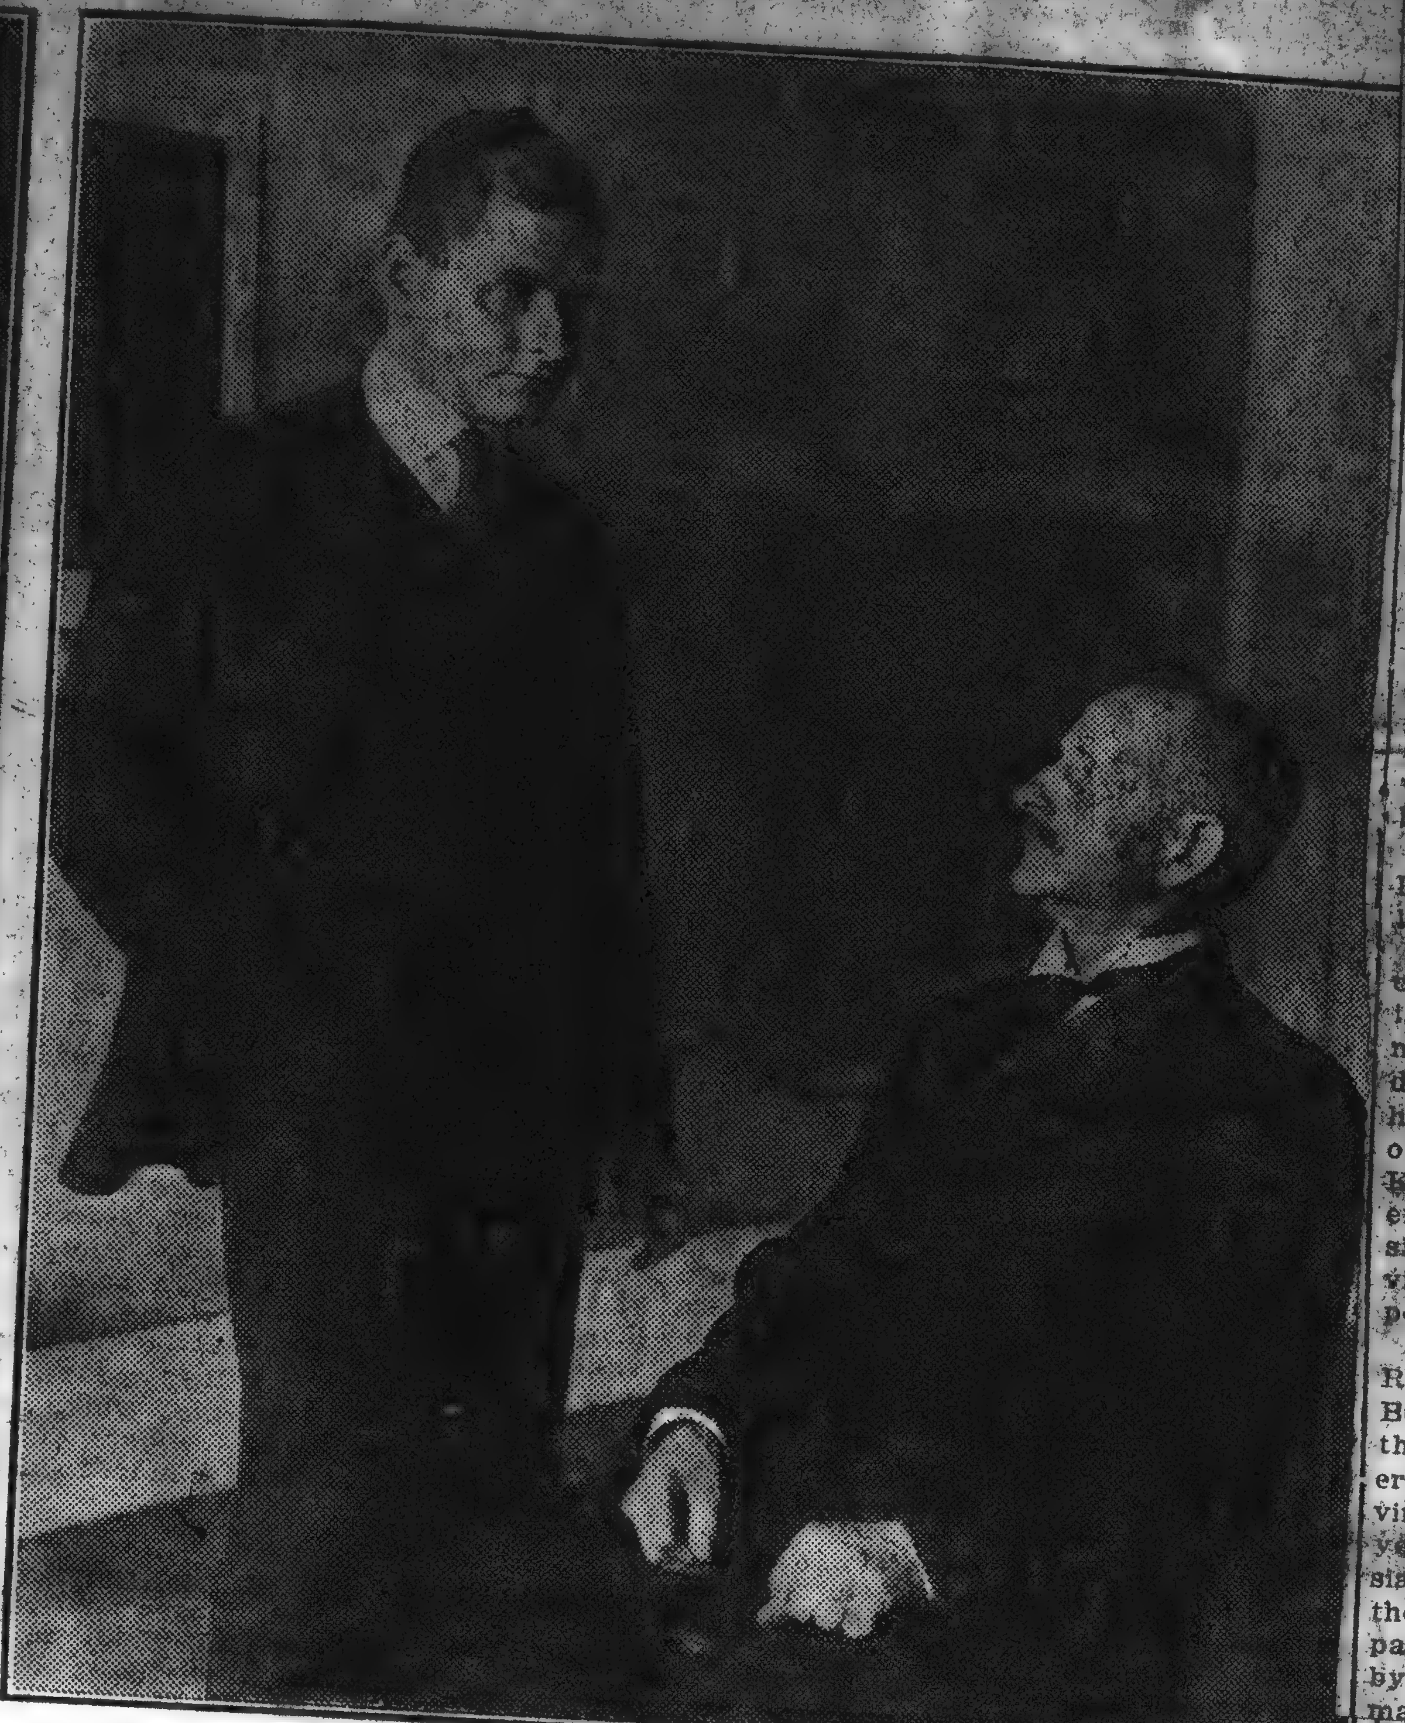
HERALD NOV. 5

[39]

"Train Up a Child in the Way He Should Go"



E. Hoffmann (Violin); J. Hoffmann (Violin)



S. Gerhardt (Viola); G. Gerhardt (Double Bass)

(Photographs by Colby)

Sons Follow Fathers Into the Symphony Orchestra

By Unusual Coincidence Two Fathers and Two Sons, as Specified Above, Are Playing Together, This Season, at Symphony Hall. Probably No Other Orchestra in America Contains Two Such Pairs.

TRANSCRIPT NOV. 19.

Thoughtless Subscribers

To the World Wags:

Shortly after noon last Friday I chanced to ride by Symphony Hall. On the Huntington avenue steps there were scores of people waiting for the doors to open so they could get the first choice of leftover seats. To wait thus for two hours and more with the great chance of being disappointed is a sign of musical adoration that well deserves approbation, praise and the reward of a seat.

I, myself, being a very lucky individual, managed to buy one of the last season tickets left in the entire hall for Saturday night, and, consequently, when I go I expect to see every seat occupied in the house. But not so. On Saturday evening last, as I was listening to the orchestra play Schumann's "Fourth Symphony," I counted from where I sat in the balcony on the floor some 50 empty seats. Does this not seem a pity? It means that 50 season ticket holders, for some reason or other, were unable to come, and, being so unable, failed to turn in or give away their tickets for that night. This must be so, for, certainly, there are enough true devotees of music who would only be too glad to come if they but had the chance, as the scene I saw on the steps well indicates. Such a procedure reminds one of the old proverbial tale of the "Dog in the Manger."

But not only is it unfair to those who were not lucky enough to get tickets, it is a slap in the face (if so I may call it) to Mr. Monteux and the orchestra as a whole, who both deserve every bit of commendation and praise possible for giving us such a treat as we get every week. Any one who has ever acted, recited or been in any public performance, well knows what a few empty seats in an otherwise full house will do to mar the enthusiasm and stimulus received.

If the people, therefore, who cannot use their seats, will be thoughtful enough and kind enough to either turn them in beforehand or give them to some one who can use them, then they will earn the thanks of the more unlucky individuals, who have to go without, and Mr. Monteux and the whole orchestra.

PHILIP L. SALTONSTALL.

Cambridge.

HERALD NOV. 6

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Guy Maier Soloist With Symphony Orchestra

An appropriate acclamation to the boisterous entrance of winter was the pension fund concert given for and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Brilliance, dash, dramatic power and heroic energy adorned each of the four numbers on the programme, and in each the orchestra had ample opportunity to blaze forth, collectively and individually in all the glory and perfection of its technique and temperament. It seemed attuned to the raging storm outside, and in sonorous and magnificent passages translated the elements into the melody of strong emotions. The audience which entirely filled the house, was thoroughly appreciative, judging from the prolonged applause whch recalled M. Monteux and the soloists many times, and was acknowledged by the entire orchestra.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" was given a wonderful performance, with its splendid underlying ring of the sea—now calmly rolling, now menacing and angry, finishing in the breathlessly dramatic wrecking of Sinbad's ship "against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior." It will be remembered that M. Monteux conducted the first ballet adaption of this piece as Diaghileff's company performed it. Some very fine violin solo passages in this number were rendered by Richard R. Burgin, the new concert master. In fact this was his first important solo work with the Symphony Orchestra.

The symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," by Saint-Saens, although possessing its dramatic moments, and an undercurrent of buoyant strength, was much more quiet than the exuberant Russian piece.

A happy addition to the programme was the Liszt concerto in E flat, played by Guy Maier, with the orchestra. In his brilliant and sympathetic execution of this characteristic Liszt concerto, which runs the gamut of practically all human emotions, he has added further laurels to his name. Clear and bell-like in the lighter passages, magnificently abandoned in the heavy parts, his touch shows as great a sensitiveness as his technique. The orchestra supported him with perfect sympathy.

The last number was one which is always a favorite at the Pops, but was doubly glorified with the augmented winter orchestra. Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" set an emphatic and brilliant period to a rarely fine and nicely balanced concert.

POST NOV. 20.

SYMPHONY HEARERS GIVEN NOVEL FEAST

Work of Mozart Revived After 20 Years

There was only one number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert which was not new to nearly everyone in the audience, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody. The symphony was one of the four Mozart wrote in the key of C major, not the familiar "Jupiter," but an earlier work unheard here since 1900, numbered 425 in the Kochel index.

Mason's "Russians" and Ravel's orchestral version of his piano pieces grouped under the fanciful title "Couperin's Tomb" were both new to Boston.

Mr Monteux, unlike his predecessors, used for the Mozart an orchestra no larger than those for which the composer wrote. He reduced the number of strings so as to restore the original balance between strings and woodwind. The innovation immediately justified itself by the greater grace and delicacy imparted to the performance, the best Monteux has yet given of an 18th century classic.

Reinald Werrenrath sang the Mason songs as though he were not quite convinced that they had unusual merit. Mr Mason has been at different times a pupil of Ethelbert Nevin and of Vincent D'Indy. From the latter he has learned a great and intricate variety of orchestral, harmonic and contrapuntal devices for concealing the sort of melodic imagination found in the work of the former. The singer's voice and reputation won him numerous recalls.

Ravel is probably the cleverest composer who ever succeeded in making a little genius go a long way by the aid of a great deal of skill. He reminds one in this respect of Saint Saens, over whom he has nowadays the advantage of employing tricks which have not had time yet to grow stale and commonplace. The "Tomb of Couperin" is a group of four immensely ingenious trifles, which has its full effect only on those observant of the technique employed. The music says almost nothing, but says it with superlative adroitness.

Enesco's Rhapsody is rather crudely entertaining light music by a composer less learned than Mason and less clever than Ravel. It was superbly played, better than we have ever heard it and enthusiastically applauded. But all three of these moderns fade into insignificance beside the genuine power and beauty of Mozart, even in a lesser work.

Next week the orchestra will play an octet by Mendelssohn for string orchestra; the Interlude from Franck's "Redemption"; and, for the first time here a suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

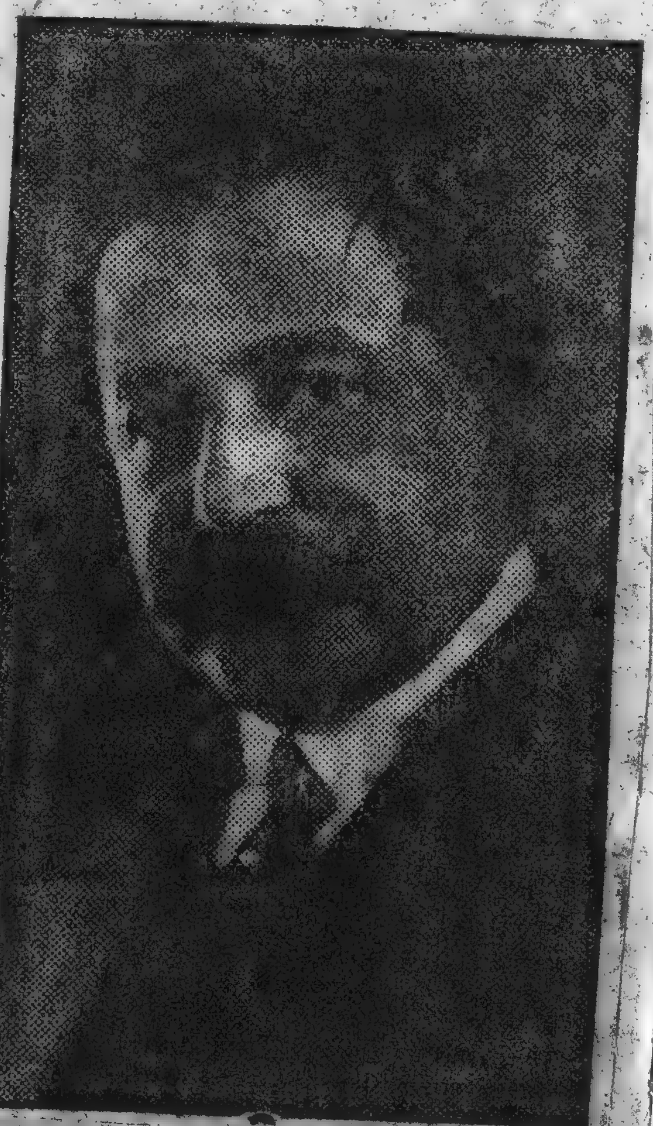
GLOBE NOV. 26.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program: Fourth Symphony, Schumann; "The Fall of the House of Usher," E. B. Hill (first time); concert aria, "Infelice," Mendelssohn; aria from "Eugen Oniegin," Tchaikowsky; Overture Leonore No. 3, Beethoven. Soloist, Helen Stanley, soprano.

GLOBE NOV. 24

Mr. Monteux

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra



COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has auspiciously begun the 40th season in its history, which is so closely connected for many years back with the musical development of this country. As usual, five concerts are to be given at Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1, at Seddons's news stand in the Butler Exchange building. The anniversary season, which will comprise a schedule of concerts of unprecedented size, began in brilliant fashion in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 8 and 9. On that occasion the full-numbered body of musicians and the superfine quality of their performance won alike the highest praise. These auspicious beginnings promise to make the coming season memorable indeed. Continuing in the post of conductor, to which he came last year, Pierre Monteux is again winning the acclaim of his audiences, not only by the inspired quality of his direction, but by his evident skill as a drillmaster and his discernment in the making of programs, which has already become a by-word in the musical world. During his sojourn in Europe last summer, Mr. Monteux found some highly itneresting new works by the living composers of Italy, France, England, Russia and Spain. These new scores, duly balanced by the older and finer music of the established orchestral repertory, may be expected to provide material for unusually engrossing programs. The appearance at each of the coming concerts in Providence of a notable singer or virtuoso will add an additional interest. The soprano will be Alice Nielsen, one of the talented and popular American singers, whose triumphs as prima donna of the opera in Boston are only equalled by her subsequent appearance in concert in each of our larger cities.

Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has no peer in popularity upon the concert stage, is also in the list, and his many appearances in opera, oratoria and recitals of his own, and also as soloist with this orchestra, are well remembered in the concert world.

Felix Fox, who played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last year, will be the only pianist.

Samuel Gardner, the young American violinist of highest talents, who is known hereabouts by the many many years he has lived in Providence, could not be more fittingly heard than as soloist with the great orchestra. The favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel and once a member of that eminent musician's quartet, he has since won a foremost place among violinists by his many recitals and appearances with orchestras.

Another violinist is to be heard—Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, all these virtuosi being unchanged from last year. Burgin, of Polish birth and Russian training, has recently come from the eastern part of Europe, in which part of the country he is considered by a long count the finest concert master.

PROV. Oct. 24. TRIB

Announcement has been made of the dates for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place this season at Infantry Hall, on Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1.

At each of the concerts there will be a prominent soloist assisting. The list includes Anna Nielson, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Felix Fox, pianist; Samuel Gardner, violinist, and Richard Burgin.

The soprano, Alice Nielsen, is a prima donna to whom the fame of the Boston Opera Company in its palmiest days was largely due. Since the opera in Boston ceased to be. Miss Neilsen has been singing in concerts in all parts of the United States.

Reinald Werrenrath has to his credit a long list of appearances in oratorio and in opera, as well as in recitals of his own. His interpretation of Antonio in Pagliacci at the Metropolitan Opera House made a considerable stir in New York, and he has sung a number of times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, notably when he took the part of Christ when the orchestra performed Bach's Saint Matthew Passion Music.

The pianist, Felix Fox, played as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last year.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, spent years of his life in Providence. Although brought to America in babyhood, when his parents were forced to take flight from persecution in Russia, Mr. Gardner has entirely identified himself with the musical life of this country. For a long time the favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel, he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet for a whole season during the absence of Mr. Letz. Since that time he has been soloist with larger orchestras and in recitals of his own.

There will be interest in the Providence debut of Richard Burgin, the new concert-master of the orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, the other virtuosi remaining in every case unchanged from last season. Mr. Burgin arrived recently from Eastern Europe.

A native of Poland, his training was mostly Russian, and at Petrograd he studied four years under Leopold Auer. He has played as concert master and soloist with the large orchestras in Petrograd, Helsingfors, Finland, also Christiania and Stockholm. He has played in Europe as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch—and under Richard Strauss. He has also performed with notable string quartets in the last two cities mentioned.

Pierre Monteux continues at the head of the orchestra. Returning from his summer's sojourn in Europe, he has brought with him some notable new scores from France and England, where he visited, and from Italy, Spain and Russia as well. The younger and bolder generation of Italian composers will best be represented at these concerts by Respighi di Sabata, Cassella and Malipiero; by the Frenchmen, Milhaud and Roger Ducasse; the Spaniard, deFalla; the Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and the English composers, Vaughn Williams, Bantock and Bok.

New American works to be heard are Mr. Hill's tone poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," and a symphonic version of Carpenter's "Birthday of the Infanta," thus arranged by the composer. Some scores of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, will be revived, notably his First and Third Symphonies. The classic masterpieces of long standing and enduring popularity with symphony audiences will have their due place upon Mr. Monteux's programmes.

JOURNEL NOV. 24.

Mr. Burgin was Fugnani; he was composers—and so te's music struck his musical com-
Mr. de Gogorza in which he returned the Basques, there His present powers familiar pieces, gild answer to what is mulate the wish that ner and more fresh-
ll. H. T. P.

ONCERT
YMPHONY

k of Mozart
First Time
nty Years

ATH SINGS
S BY MASON

IP HALE

of the Boston Sym-
Mr. Monteux, con-yesterday afternoon
The program was rt; Symphony in C ason, "Russians," five and orchestra; Ravel, Suite for orchestra
erica); Enesco, Rou-
A major, op. 11, No.
nrath was the singer.
Mozart had not been ny for 20 years. The ng, for, although this hurriedly and before e symphonies with familiar, it still has t is still a proof of sense of proportion;
eminently Mozartian.
not double the wind employed those indi-nd reduced the string ceeding, for thus the e its character, nor was in fine taste,
ous. Strings and the ul passages of Mozart
the old Italian under-
And of all the masters and of many down to Mozart demands perance; he gained beau-
the utmost economy.
o forget the singer in Mason's songs. Mr.
the first to sing them;
his own. What could do with them? Mr. es of Mr. Bynner and mphasize their meaning of a huge orchestra,
y be used discreetly
ment of a song, but either in accompanimphonic work to have s at work all the time
ey think, especially the phonic poems and the composers of Germany some lucky strokes hed, but too often the nor was the r or of Mr. Monteux
e part is written for were an orchestral disregard ve intervals, there simpler accompae sufficiently dramat Mason's diction, as we ly clear and significant demands are made that more than intelligible.
n, the composer
pirit of the verses fferentiate; but the musical translation ed, and even inco of the stress rrenrath's part in worthy of the hi
the orchestra
The singer re-he almost pers
it was inherently Especially Werrenrath's
"A Drunkard," written in "A Pro tical as any Hebr
a voluptuous city,
's approaching d
Suite for pi
ovements; each in of a comrade ki anscribed four of small orchestra
ite art! It wa
c, Mason that the followed the per chestral accompan that Ravel, giving Tomb" to the

D NOV

"Train Up a Child in the Way He Should Go"

E. Hoffmann (Violin); J. Hoffmann (Violin)

(Photographs by Colby)

S. Gerhardt (Viola); G. Gerhardt (Double Bass)

Sons Follow Fathers Into the Symphony Orchestra

By Unusual Coincidence Two Fathers and Two Sons, as Specified Above, Are Playing Together, This Season, at Symphony Hall. Probably No Other Orchestra in America Contains Two Such Pairs.

Thoughtless Subscribers

s the World Wags:

Shortly after noon last Friday I hanced to ride by Symphony Hall. On he Huntington avenue steps there were cores of people waiting for the doors o open so they could get the first hoice of leftover seats. To wait thus or two hours and more with the great hance of being disappointed is a sign f musical adoration that well deserves pprobation, praise and the reward of seat.

I, myself, being a very lucky individ-al, managed to buy one of the last sea-on tickets left in the entire hall for aturday night, and, consequently, when go I expect to see every seat occu-ied in the house. But not so. On Sat-rday evening last, as I was listening o the orchestra play Schumann's Fourth Symphony," I counted from here I sat in the balcony on the floor lone 50 empty seats. Does this not eem a pity? It means that 50 season icket holders, for some reason or other, ere unable to come, and, being so un-ble, failed to turn in or give away heir tickets for that night. This must e so, for, certainly, there are enough rue devotees of music who would only e too glad to come if they but had the hance, as the scene I saw on the steps ell indicates. Such a procedure reminds one of the old proverbial tale of he "Dog in the Manger."

But not only is it unfair to those who ere not lucky enough to get tickets, it s a slap in the face (if so I may call it) o Mr. Monteux and the orchestra as a hole, who both deserve every bit of ommendation and praise possible for iving us such a treat as we get every eek. Any one who has ever acted, ecited or been in any public perform-nce, well knows what a few empty eats in an otherwise full house will do o mar the enthusiasm and stimulus eceived.

If the people, therefore, who cannot se their seats, will be thoughtful nough and kind enough to either turn hem in beforehand or give them to ome one who can use them, then they ill earn the thanks of the more un-ucky individuals, who have to go with-ut, and Mr. Monteux and the whole rchestra.

PHILIP L. SALTONSTALL.
Cambridge.

HERALD NOV. 5

RANSCRIPT NOV. 19.

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Guy Maier Soloist With Symphony Orchestra

An appropriate acclamation to the boisterous entrance of winter was the pension fund concert given for and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Brilliance, dash, dramatic power and heroic energy adorned each of the four numbers on the programme, and in each the orchestra had ample opportunity to blaze forth, collectively and individually in all the glory and perfection of it's technique and temperament. It seemed attuned to the raging storm outside, and in sonorous and magnificent passages translated the elements into the melody of strong emotions. The audience which entirely filled the house, was thoroughly appreciative, judging from the prolonged applause whch recalled M. Monteux and the soloists many times, and was acknowledged by the entire orchestra.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" was given a wonderful performance, with its splendid underlying ring of the sea—now calmly rolling, now menacing and angry, finishing in the breathlessly dramatic wrecking of Sinbad's ship "against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior." It will be remembered that M. Monteux conducted the first ballet adaption of this piece as Diaghileff's company performed it. Some very fine violin solo passages in this number were rendered by Richard R. Burgin, the new concert master. In fact this was his first important solo work with the Symphony Orchestra.

The symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," by Saint-Saens, although possessing its dramatic moments, and an undercurrent of buoyant strength, was much more quiet than the exuberant Russian piece.

A happy addition to the programme was the Liszt concerto in E flat, played by Guy Maier, with the orchestra. In his brilliant and sympathetic execution of this characteristic Liszt concerto, which runs the gamut of practically all human emotions, he has added further laurels to his name. Clear and bell-like in the lighter passages, magnificently abandoned in the heavy parts, his touch shows as great a sensitiveness as his technique. The orchestra supported him with perfect sympathy.

The last number was one which is always a favorite at the Pops, but was doubly glorified with the augmented winter orchestra. Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" set an emphatic and brilliant period to a rarely fine and nicely balanced concert.

POST NOV. 20.

SYMPHONY HEARERS GIVEN NOVEL FEAST

Work of Mozart Revived After 20 Years

There was only one number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert which was not new to nearly everyone in the audience, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody. The symphony was one of the four Mozart wrote in the key of C major, not the familiar "Jupiter," but an earlier work unheard here since 1900, numbered 425 in the Kochel index.

Mason's "Russians" and Ravel's orchestral version of his piano pieces grouped under the fanciful title "Couperin's Tomb" were both new to Boston.

Mr Monteux, unlike his predecessors, used for the Mozart an orchestra no larger than those for which the composer wrote. He reduced the number of strings so as to restore the original balance between strings and woodwind. The innovation immediately justified itself by the greater grace and delicacy imparted to the performance, the best Monteux has yet given of an 18th century classic.

Reinald Werrenrath sang the Mason songs as though he were not quite convinced that they had unusual merit. Mr Mason has been at different times a pupil of Ethelbert Nevin and of Vincent D'Indy. From the latter he has learned a great and intricate variety of orchestral, harmonic and contrapuntal devices for concealing the sort of melodic imagination found in the work of the former. The singer's voice and reputation won him numerous recalls.

Ravel is probably the cleverest composer who ever succeeded in making a little genius go a long way by the aid of a great deal of skill. He reminds one in this respect of Saint Saens, over whom he has nowadays the advantage of employing tricks which have not had time yet to grow stale and commonplace. The "Tomb of Couperin" is a group of four immensely ingenious trifles, which has its full effect only on those observant of the technique employed. The music says almost nothing, but says it with superlative adroitness.

Enesco's Rhapsody is rather crudely entertaining light music by a composer less learned than Mason and less clever than Ravel. It was superbly played, better than we have ever heard it and enthusiastically applauded. But all three of these moderns fade into insignificance beside the genuine power and beauty of Mozart, even in a lesser work.

Next week the orchestra will play an octet by Mendelssohn for string orchestra; the Interlude from Franck's "Redemption"; and, for the first time here a suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

GLOBE NOV. 26.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program: Fourth Symphony, Schumann; "The Fall of the House of Usher," E. B. Hill (first time); concert aria, "Infelice," Mendelssohn; aria from "Eugen Oniegin," Tchaikowsky; Overture Leonore No. 3, Beethoven. Soloist, Helen Stanley, soprano.

GLOBE NOV. 24

Mr. Monteux

Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has auspiciously begun the 40th season in its history, which is so closely connected for many years back with the musical development of this country. As usual, five concerts are to be given at Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1, at Seddons's news stand in the Butler Exchange building. The anniversary season, which will comprise a schedule of concerts of unprecedented size, began in brilliant fashion in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 8 and 9. On that occasion the full-numbered body of musicians and the superfine quality of their performance won alike the highest praise. These auspicious beginnings promise to make the coming season memorable indeed. Continuing in the post of conductor, to which he came last year, Pierre Monteux is again winning the acclaim of his audiences, not only by the inspired quality of his direction, but by his evident skill as a drillmaster and his discernment in the making of programs which has already become a by-word in the musical world. During his sojourn in Europe last summer, Mr. Monteux found some highly itneresting new works by the living composers of Italy, France, England, Russia and Spain. These new scores, duly balanced by the older and finer music of the established orchestral repertory, may be expected to provide material for unusually engrossing programs. The appearance at each of the coming concerts in Providence of a notable singer or virtuoso will add an additional interest. The soprano will be Alice Nielsen, one of the talented and popular American singers, whose triumphs as prima donna of the opera in Boston are only equalled by her subsequent appearance in concert in each of our larger cities.

Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has no peer in popularity upon the concert stage, is also in the list, and his many appearances in opera, oratoria and recitals of his own, and also as soloist with this orchestra, are well remembered in the concert world.

Felix Fox, who played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last year, will be the only pianist.

Samuel Gardner, the young American violinist of highest talents, who is known hereabouts by the many many years he has lived in Providence, could not be more fittingly heard than as soloist with the great orchestra. The favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel and once a member of that eminent musician's quartet, he has since won a foremost place among violinists by his many recitals and appearances with orchestras.

Another violinist is to be heard—Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, all these virtuosi being unchanged from last year. Burgin, of Polish birth and Russian training, has recently come from the eastern part of Europe, in which part of the country he is considered by a long count the finest concert master.

PROV. Oct. 24. TRIB

Announcement has been made of the dates for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place this season at Infantry Hall, on Tuesday evenings of Nov. 16, Dec. 11, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, for which seats by subscription will be placed on sale beginning Monday, Nov. 1.

At each of the concerts there will be a prominent soloist assisting. The list includes Anna Nielson, soprano; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone; Felix Fox, pianist; Samuel Gardner, violinist, and Richard Burgin.

The soprano, Alice Nielsen, is a prima donna to whom the fame of the Boston Opera Company in its palmiest days was largely due. Since the opera in Boston ceased to be. Miss Neilsen has been singing in concerts in all parts of the United States.

Reinald Werrenrath has to his credit a long list of appearances in oratorio and in opera, as well as in recitals of his own. His interpretation of Antonio in Pagliacci at the Metropolitan Opera House made a considerable stir in New York, and he has sung a number of times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, notably when he took the part of Christ when the orchestra performed Bach's Saint Matthew Passion Music.

The pianist, Felix Fox, played as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last year.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, spent years of his life in Providence. Although brought to America in babyhood, when his parents were forced to take flight from persecution in Russia, Mr. Gardner has entirely identified himself with the musical life of this country. For a long time the favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel, he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet for a whole season during the absence of Mr. Letz. Since that time he has been soloist with larger orchestras and in recitals of his own.

There will be interest in the Providence debut of Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, who is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections, the other virtuosi remaining in every case unchanged from last season. Mr. Burgin arrived recently from Eastern Europe.

A native of Poland, his training was mostly Russian, and at Petrograd he studied four years under Leopold Auer. He has played as concert master and soloist with the large orchestras in Petrograd, Helsingfors, Finland, also Christiania and Stockholm. He has played in Europe as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch—and under Richard Strauss. He has also performed with notable string quartets in the last two cities mentioned.

Pierre Monteux continues at the head of the orchestra. Returning from his summer's sojourn in Europe, he has brought with him some notable new scores from France and England, where he visited, and from Italy. Spain and Russia as well. The younger and bolder generation of Italian composers will best be represented at these concerts by Respighi di Sabata, Cassella and Malipiero; by the Frenchmen, Milhaud and Roger Ducasse; the Spaniard, deFalla; the Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and the English composers, Vaughn Williams, Bantock and Bok.

New American works to be heard are Mr. Hill's tone poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," and a symphonic version of Carpenter's "Birthday of the Infanta," thus arranged by the composer. Some scores of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, will be revived, notably his First and Third Symphonies. The classic masterpieces of long standing and enduring popularity with symphony audiences will have their due place upon Mr. Monteux's programmes.

JOURNEL NOV. 24.

REDUCTION RATIO
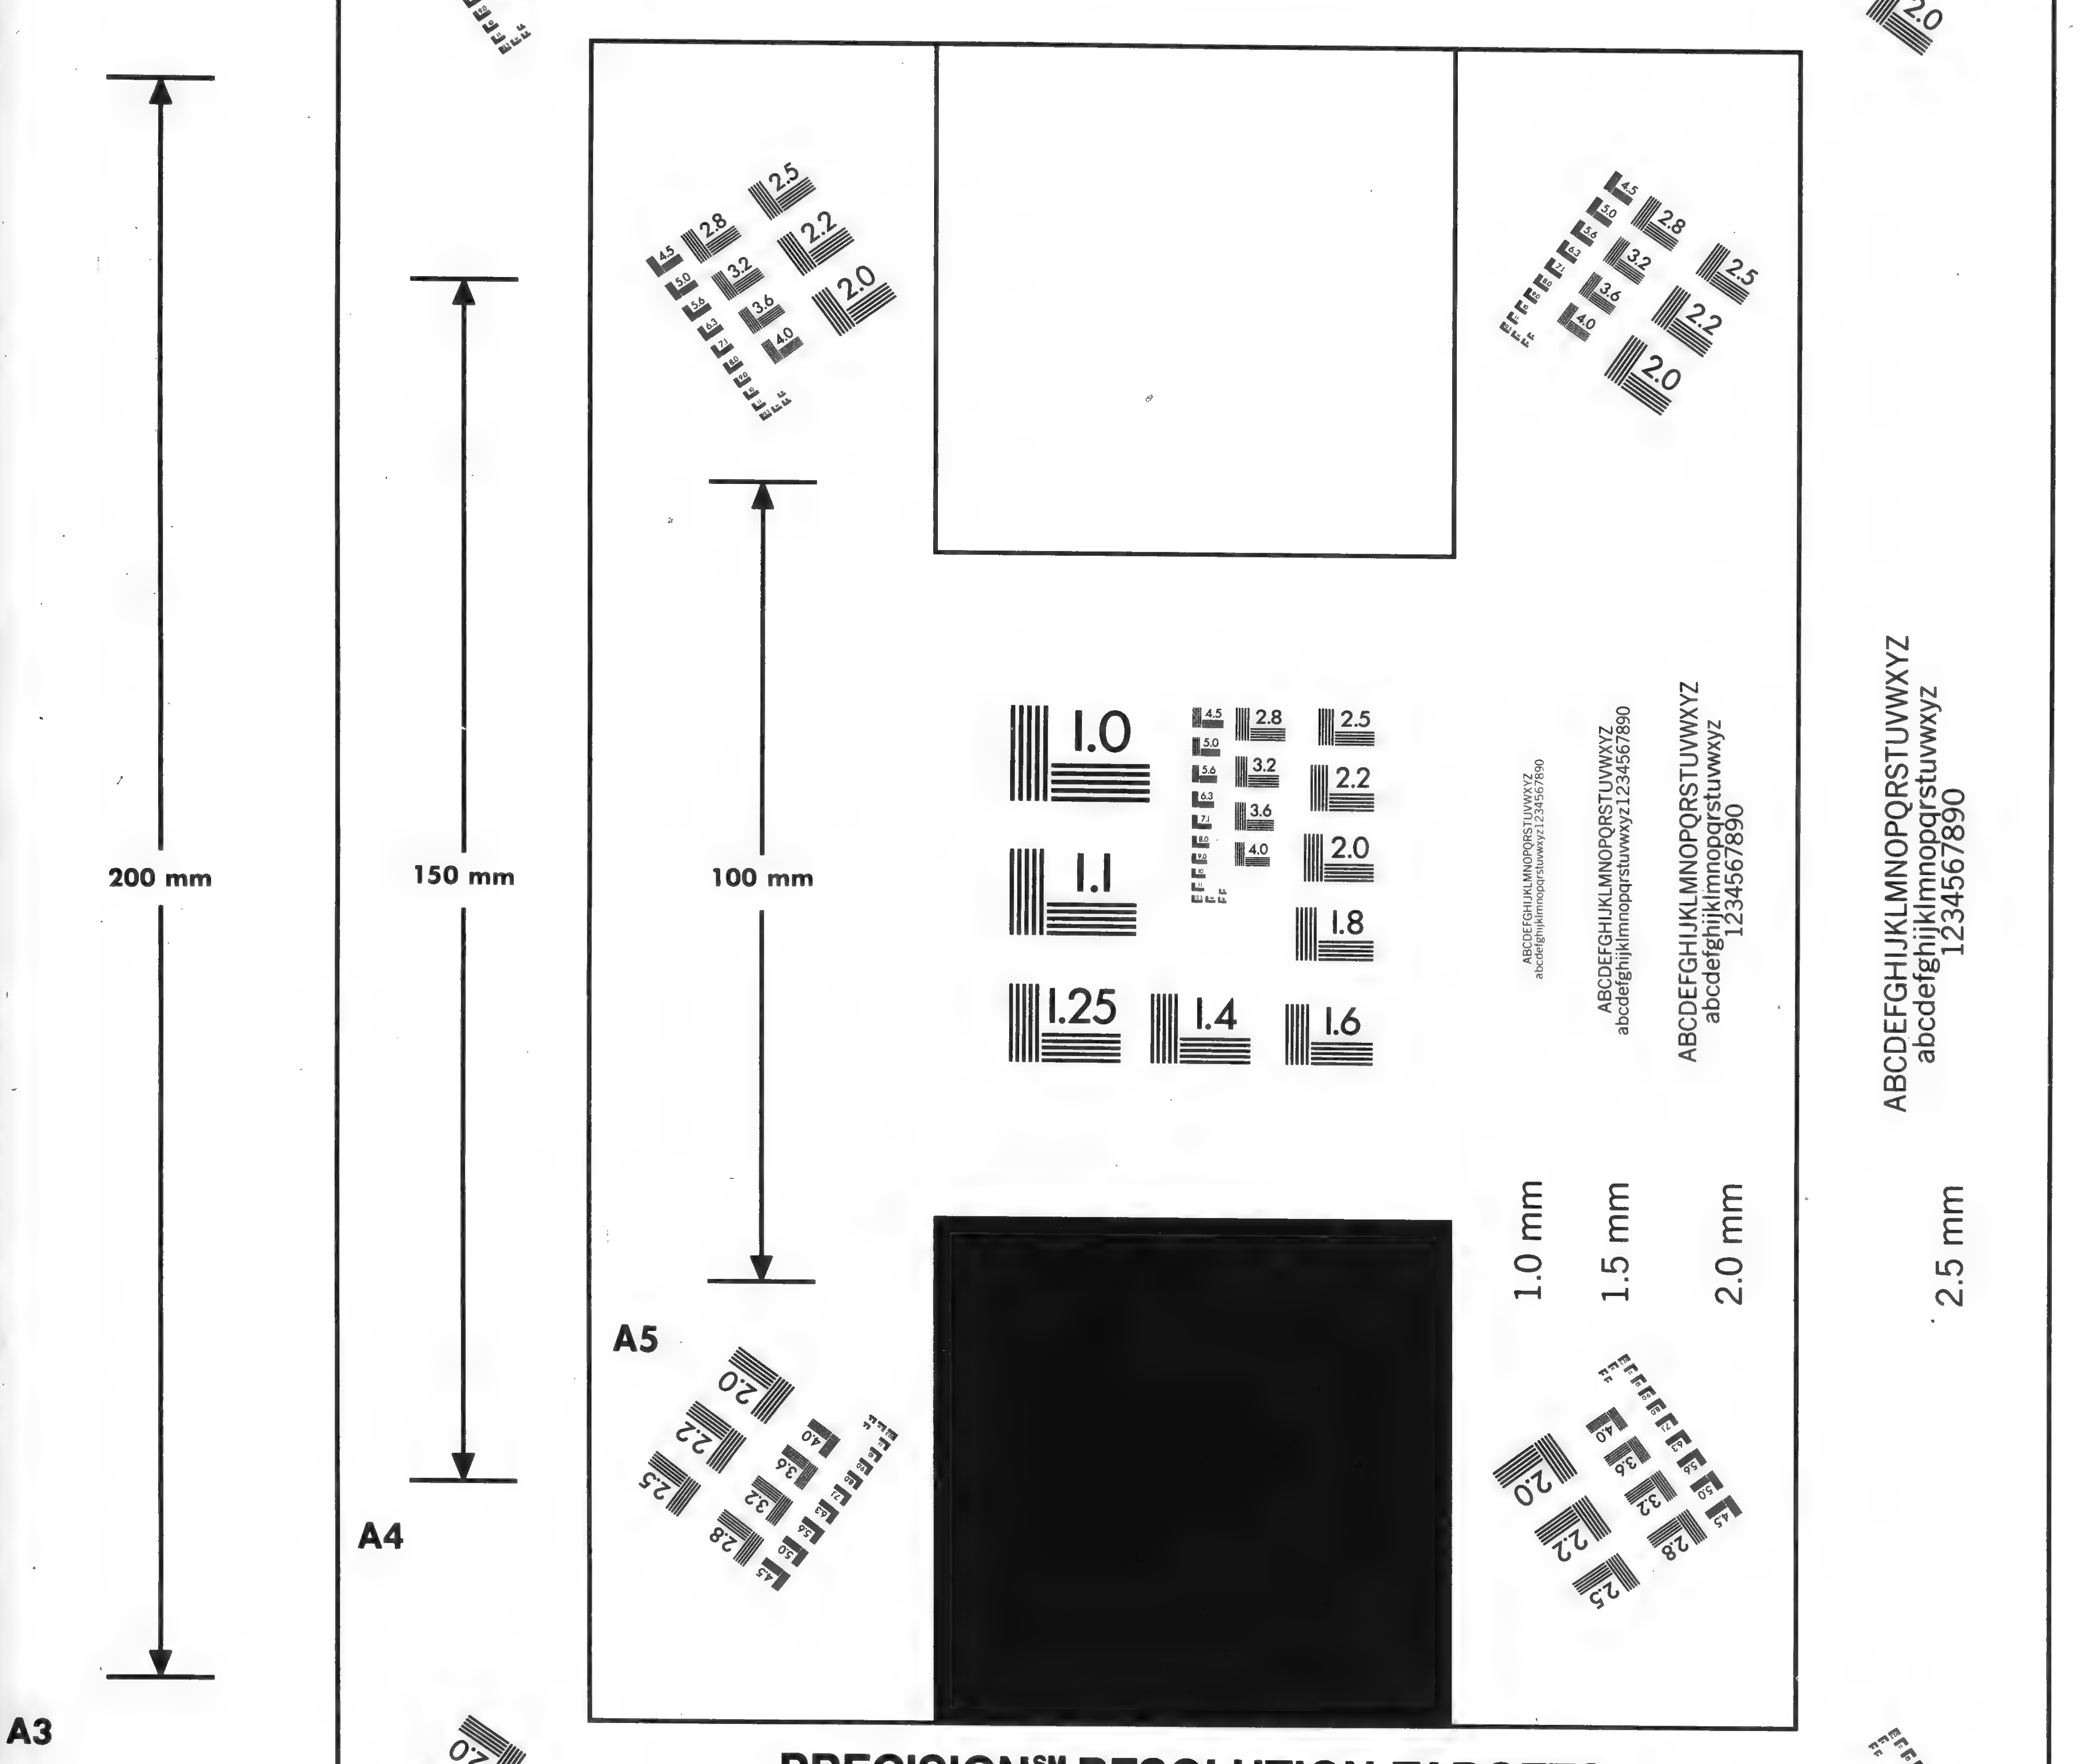
13x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC INSPIRED BY POE'S STORY

"Fall of House of Usher" Part of This Week's Symphony Concerts

MME. STANLEY TO BE THE SOLOIST

By PHILIP HALE

The symphony concerts this week should be of marked interest. Edward Burlingame Hill's symphonic poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher" will be performed for the first time; the symphony will be Schumann's romantic one in D minor; Mme. Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice" and Tatiana's letter from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugene Oniegen"; the demaining orchestral piece will be "Leonora" overture No. 3.

Poms and tales of Poe have attracted sevral ecomposers. Josef Holbrooke has chosen as subjects for symphonic poems "The Raven," "Ulalume," "The Masque of the Red Death," "The Bells" and written a dramatic choral symphony, "Homage to Poe"; settings of "The Haunted Palace," "Hymn," "The City in the Sea," "The Valley Nis." Rachmaninoff has made an elaborate choral setting of "The Bells"; Florent Schmitt's symphonic poem "The Haunted Palace," has been praised in Paris; one of Mr. Loeffler's bautiful songs is "To Helen"; there is more than one piano accompaniment for the recitation of "The Raven." Debussy was supposed to be at work on two operas based on tales by Poe, but it is said that the rumor was unfounded, or at least he kept no sketches for them. "Israfel" as a song has tempted Oliver King and Edgar Stillman Kelley. "Eldorado" has also fired musical ambition. A complete catalogue of music inspired by Poe would be interesting.

Mr. Hill, of course, has not attempted in his symphonic poem to follow Poe's tale step by step; but rather to express the prevailing mood of the marvelous story. The two chief themes might be entitled Roderick and Madeline; Edmund Clarence Stedman raised the question whether "The Fall of the House of Usher" with the inclusion of "The Haunted Palace" was not written as a musician might compose contatas, to develop the utmost value of the lyrical themes. "The prose of his (Poe's) romances at the most intense pitch seems to feel an insufficiency, and summons music and allegory to supplement its work."

It will be remembered that Roderick Usher in the story improvised wildly on the guitar. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Hill is not so literal as to add this instrument to his orchestra. "His (Usher's) long improvised dirges will ring forever in my ears. Amony other things, I hold painfully in mind a certain singular pervesion and amplification of the wild air of the last waltz of Von Weber." Many of us remember this waltz, known also as "Weber's Last Thought." It was in bound volumes with Perabo's "Bird" waltz, Beethoven's "Dream" waltz, d'Albert's "Sultan's" polka and other popular pieces in the sixties. But Weber never wrote the waltz attributed to him. The composer was C. G. Reissiger, who happened to play it to Weber's wife in Dresden shortly before her husband went to London, where he died. She asked Reissiger to give her a copy. He wrote it out, and as it was found among Weber's manuscripts it was attributed to him, until, and even after, Reissiger denied his authorship in letters to the press.

Mme Stanley is not a stranger in Boston. She took the part of the heroine in "The Jewels of the Madonna" at the Boston Opera House in March 1914; she afterwards sang here in concert with Harold Bauer and in recital; she was Mr. Laparra's companion when he gave a concert of his Spanish music in Symphonay Hall. Mendelssohn's concertaria has not been heard here at a Symphony concert within our recollection. It was composed to order for the Philharmonic Society of London and first sung there by Mme Caradori-Allan, who visited Boston in 1837, gave four concerts here in December and sang at two performances of "The Messiah" with the Handel and Hayden. She was described as a beautiful woman, whose voice was remarkably sweet and pure, whose vocal art was unimpeachable. She shone in concert rather than in opera. In the scene from Tschaiowsk's opera based on Poushkin's mance in verse, Tatiana writes to gene, the blase Byroni dandy from city, pouring out her passion. Haveceived the letter, Eugene gave her and cynical advice. Years after-he met her wedded and a brilgure in society. He made love but she would not listen.

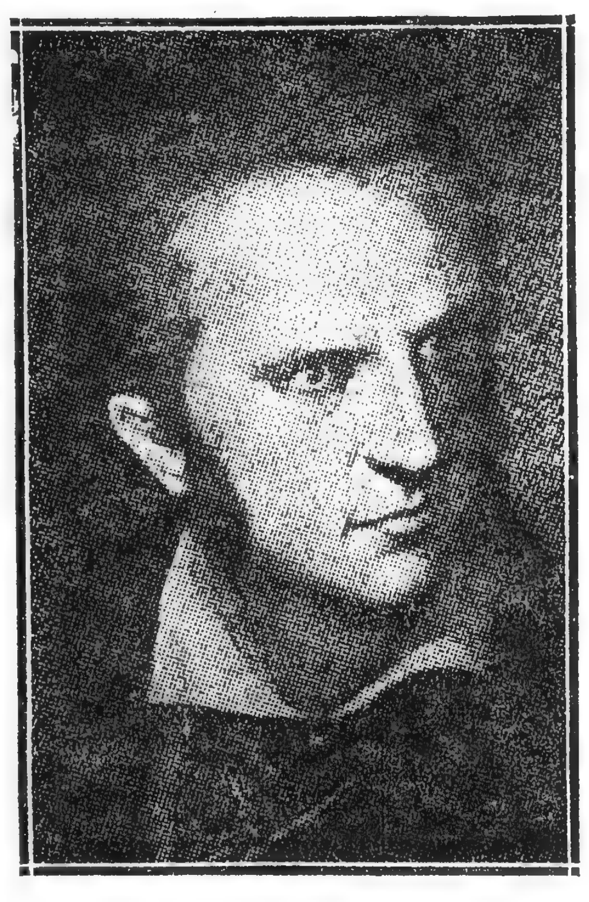
HERALD Oct. 28.

[41]

The Fall of the House of Usher

Story (1839) by Edgar Allan Poe—Poem for Orchestra (1920) by Edward Burlingame Hill

The Music to be Played, for the First Times Anywhere, at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday.



(Chalfract) Poe

As the Composer Sketches His Piece

My purpose in composing "The Fall of the House of Usher" was to present my personal impression of its atmosphere. The emotional complexity of Poe's story forbade, to my mind, any attempt at realistic description, or even a step-by-step delineation of mood and action. I sought rather to attain a coherent and logical presentation of musical ideas, hoping that the result might show some reflection of Poe's morbid but powerful imagination.

To this end the musical material shaped itself gradually into something very similar to a fairly common type of structure, sonata-form with development omitted. A first theme, preceded by an introduction employing the same notes in longer time-value, leads to a transition and a second theme, remotely associated with Madeline Usher. This second theme is developed, somewhat more than is normal in sonata-form, leading to a climax. The first theme returns, and with it the transition. After another climax comes a conclusion or coda, towards the end of which the second and first themes are brought together, fading away into silence.

I have used no unusual instruments, even the percussian is employed rather sparingly. I tried for individuality of color, rather than for sonority.

Hill (Bachrach)

From the Printed Page

DURING the whole of a dull, dark, and soundless day in the autumn of the year, when the clouds hung oppressively low in the heavens, I had been passing alone, on horseback, through a singularly dreary tract of country; and at length found myself, as the shades of the evening drew on, within view of the melancholy House of Usher. I know not how it was—but, with the first glimpse of the building, a sense of insufferable gloom pervaded my spirit. I say insufferable; for the feeling was unrelieved by any of that half-pleasurable, because poetic, sentiment, with which the mind usually receives even the sternest natural images of the desolate or terrible. I looked upon the scene before me—upon the mere house, and the simple landscape features of the domain—upon the bleak walls—upon the vacant eye-like windows—upon a few rank sedges—and upon a few white trunks of decayed trees—with an utter depression of soul which I can compare to no earthly sensation more properly than to the after-dream of the reveller upon opium—the bitter lapse into everyday life—the hideous dropping off of the veil. There was an iciness, a sinking, a sickening of the heart—an unredeemed dreariness of thought which no goading of the imagination could torture into aught of the sublime. What was it—I pause to think—what was it that so unnerved me in the contemplation of the House of Usher? It was a mystery all insoluble; nor could I grapple with the shadowy fancies that crowded upon me as I pondered.

I had so worked upon my imagination as really to believe that about the whole mansion and domain there hung an atmosphere peculiar to themselves and their immediate vicinity—an atmosphere which had no affinity with the air of heaven, but which had reeked up from the decayed trees, and the gray wall, and the silent tarn—a pestilent and mystic vapor, dull, sluggish, faintly discernible and leaden-hued.

Shaking off from my spirit what must have been a dream, I scanned more narrowly the real aspect of the building. Its principal feature seemed to be that of an excessive antiquity. The discoloration of ages had been great. Minute fungi overspread the whole exterior, hanging in a fine tangled web-work from the eaves. Yet all this was apart from any extraordinary dilapidation. No portion of the masonry had fallen; and there appeared to be a wide inconsistency between its still perfect adaptation of parts, and the crumbling condition of the individual stones. In this there was much that reminded me of the specious totality of old woodwork which has rotted for long years in some neglected vault, with no disturbance from the breath of the external air. Beyond this indication of extensive decay, however, the fabric gave little token of instability. Perhaps the eye of a scrutinizing observer might have discovered a barely perceptible fissure, which, extending from the roof of the building in front, made its way down the wall in a zigzag direction, until it became lost in the sullen waters of the tarn.

Roderick and Madeline

To an anomalous species of terror I found Roderick Usher a bounden slave. "I shall perish," said he, "I must perish in this deplorable folly. Thus, thus, and not otherwise, shall I be lost. I dread the events of the future, not in themselves, but in their results. I shudder at the thought of any, even the most trivial, incident, which may operate upon this intolerable agitation of soul. I have, indeed, no abhorrence of danger, except in its absolute effect—in terror. In this unnerved—in this pitiable condition—I feel that the period will sooner or later arrive when I must abandon life and reason together, in some struggle with the grim phantasm, FEAR."

I learned, moreover, at intervals, and through broken and equivocal hints, another singular feature of his mental condition. He was enchained by certain superstitious impressions in regard to the dwelling which he tenanted, and whence, for many years, he had never ventured forth—in regard to an influence whose suppositious force was conveyed in terms too shadowy here to be re-stated—an influence which some peculiarities in the mere form and substance of his family mansion, had, by dint of long sufferance, he said, obtained over his spirit—an effect which the physique of the gray walls and turrets, and of the dim tarn into which they all looked down, had, at length, brought about upon the morale of his existence.

He admitted, however, although with hesitation, that much of the peculiar gloom which thus afflicted him could be traced to a more natural and far more palpable origin—to the severe and long-continued illness—indeed to the evidently approaching dissolution—of a tenderly beloved sister—his sole companion for long years—his last and only relative on earth. "Her decease," he said, with a bitterness which I can never forget, "would leave him (him the hopeless and the frail) the last of the ancient race of the Ushers." While he spoke, the lady Madeline (for so was she called) passed slowly through a remote portion of the apartment, and, without having noticed my presence, disappeared. I regarded her with an utter astonishment not unmingled with dread—and yet I found it impossible to account for such feelings. A sensation of stupor oppressed me, as my eyes followed her retreating steps. When a door, at length, closed upon her, my glance sought instinctively and eagerly the countenance of the brother—but he had buried his face in his hands, and I could only perceive that a far more than ordinary wanness had overspread the emaciated fingers through which trickled many passionate tears.

Midnight Burial

At the request of Usher, I personally aided him in the arrangements for the temporary entombment. The body having been encoffined, we two alone bore it to its rest. The vault in which we placed it (and which had been so long unopened that our torches, half smothered in its oppressive atmosphere, gave us little opportunity for investigation), was small, damp, and entirely without means of admission for light; lying, at great depth, immediately beneath that portion of the building in which was my own sleeping apartment. It had been used, apparently, in remote feudal times, for the worst purposes of a donjon-keep, and, in later days, as a place of deposit for powder, or some other highly combustible substance, as a portion of its floor, and the whole interior of a long archway through which we reached it, were carefully sheathed with copper. The door, of massive iron, had been also, similarly protected. Its immense weight caused an unusually sharp grating sound, as it moved upon its hinges.

Having deposited our mournful burden upon tressels within this region of horror, we partially turned aside the yet unscrewed lid of the coffin, and looked upon the face of the tenant. A striking similitude between the brother and sister now first arrested my attention; and Usher, divining, perhaps, my thoughts, murmured out some few words from which I learned that the deceased and himself had been twins, and that sympathies of a scarcely intelligible nature had always existed between them. Our glances, however, rested not long upon the dead—for we could not regard her unawed. The disease which had thus entombed the lady in the maturity of youth, had left, as usual in a [illegible] of a strictly cataleptical character, the mockery of a faint blush upon the bosom and the face, and that suspiciously lingering smile upon the lip which is so terrible in death. We replaced and screwed down the lid, and, having secured the door of iron, made our way, with toil, into the scarcely less gloomy apartments of the upper portion of the house.

Tempest

The impetuous fury of the entering gust nearly lifted us from our feet. It was, indeed, a tempestuous yet sternly beautiful night, and one wildly singular in its terror and its beauty. A whirlwind that apparently collected its force in our vicinity; for there were frequent and violent alterations in the direction of the wind; and the exceeding density of the clouds (which hung so low as to press upon the turrets of the house) did not prevent our perceiving the life-like velocity with which they flew careering from all points against each other, without passing away into the distance. I say that even their exceeding density did not prevent our perceiving this—yet we had no glimpse of the moon or stars—nor were there any flashing forth of the lightning. But the under surfaces of the huge masses of agitated vapor, as well as all terrestrial objects immediately around us, were glowing in the unnatural light of a faintly luminous and distinctly visible gaseous exhalation which hung about and enshrouded the mansion.

Crisis

No sooner had these syllables passed my lips, than—as if a shield of brass had indeed, at the moment, fallen heavily upon a floor of silver—I became aware of a distinct, hollow, metallic, and clangorous, yet apparently muffled reverberation. Completely unnerved, I leaped to my feet; but the measured rocking movement of Usher was undisturbed. I rushed to the chair in which he sat. His eyes were bent fixedly before him, and throughout his whole countenance there reigned a stony rigidity. But, as I placed my hand upon his shoulder, there came a strong shudder over his whole person; a sickly smile quivered about his lips; and I saw that he spoke in a low, hurried, and gibbering murmur, as if unconscious of my presence. Bending closely over him, I at length drank in the hideous import of his words.

"Not hear it?—yes, I hear it, and have heard it. Long—long—long—many minutes, many hours, many days, have I heard it—yet I dared not—oh, pity me, miserable wretch that I am!—I dared not, I dared not speak! We have put her living in the tomb! Said I not that my senses were acute? I now tell you that I heard her first feeble movements in the hollow coffin. I heard them—many, many days ago—yet I dared not—I dared not speak! And now—tonight — Ethelred — ha! ha! — the breaking of the hermit's door, and the death cry of the dragon, and the clangour of the shield!—say, rather, the rending of her coffin and her struggles within the coppered archway of the vault! Oh whither shall I fly? Will she not be here anon? Is she not hurrying to upbraid me for my haste? Have I not heard her footstep on the stair? Do I not distinguish that heavy and horrible beating of her heart? Madman!" here he sprang furiously to his feet and shrieked out his syllables, as if in the effort he were giving up his soul—"Madman! I tell you that she now stands without the door!"

As if in the superhuman energy of his utterance there had been found the potency of a spell—the huge antique panels to which the speaker pointed, threw slowly back, upon the instant, their ponderous and ebony jaws. It was the work of the rushing gust—but then without those doors there did stand the lofty and enshrouded figure of the lady Madeline of Usher. There was blood upon her white robes, and the evidence of some bitter struggle upon every portion of her emaciated frame. For a moment she remained trembling and reeling to and fro upon the threshold, then, with a low, moaning cry, fell heavily inward upon the person of her brother, and in her violent and now final death agonies, bore him to the floor a corpse, and a victim to the terrors he had anticipated.

Catastrophe

From that chamber, and from that mansion, I fled aghast. The storm was still abroad in all its wrath as I found myself crossing the old causeway. Suddenly there shot along the [illegible] wild light, and I turned [illegible] whence [illegible] gleam so unusual could have issued; for the vast house and its shadows were alone behind me. The radiance was that of the full, setting, and blood-red moon which now shone vividly through that once barely-discernible fissure of, which I have before spoken as extending from the roof of the building, in a zigzag direction, to the base. While I gazed, this fissure rapidly widened—there came a fierce breath of the whirlwind—the entire orb of the satellite burst at once upon my sight—my brain reeled as I saw the mighty walls rushing asunder—there was a long tumultuous shouting sound like the voice of a thousand waters—and the deep and dank tarn at my feet closed sullenly and silently over the fragments of "The House of Usher."

ITEMS ABOUT MUS

More Novel Pieces from Mr.
The Reconquest of New York Generation in Paris—Malipie
Orchestral Concerts in Theatr

NEXT week the Symphon will go for the first time to New York, Philadelp
other cities southward to wh monthly visits It will not be in Boston until Friday and Sa 12 and 13. Then Mr. Monteux' will traverse Brahms's fourt four Preludes by Mr. Strube linist in the orchestra, now c servatory in Baltimore; a
"The Fountains of Rome," Italian," Respighi; and Stra
"Til Eulenspiegel's Merry P ductor and orchestra were year in Brahms's first sym should not be less so in the long it has been Mr. Strube hand his new pieces to the S chestra for first and deserv ance. Respighi's music—a sy in form and not too "modern" and manner—pictures "the Valle Giulia at dawn; the Tr
at morn; the Fountain of Tre and the Fountain at the Vi sunset." As for Strauss, in hall, as in most other place overpast.

Since in New York the S chestra has in measure to public of old, Mr. Monteu decided to disclose it first in our own time in which, rath classics, it now excels. Thus, gramme for New York trave symphony in E minor played Boston, Lekeu's Fantasia a "Poem of Ecstasy." Similar ond programme he has set phony, Mr. Hill's tone-poe of the House of Usher" a pieces, Pierné's orchestral ar Franck's Prelude, Choral an Berlioz's romantical overtur Cellini."

Casella's "Italian Rhapso come, thanks to Mr. Jacchia familiar piece at the Pop Co ton. Last Tuesday, however in New York heard it for from Mr. Stokowski and the Orchestra. With reason Mr. of it in The Times:

> The music is graphic,
> There is apparently no d > gramme, no depiction of s > succession of moods, sullen > sion, mad delirium, powerf > and sustained. The orchest > is often striking, novel in e > work of a strong hand ce > touch. The performance w > liant one.

T

HILL'S "USHER" SYMPHONY CO

Brilliant Performa
the Orchestra

Beethoven, Schumann and Contribute to Progra

Helen Stanley, announced for yesterday's Symphony co unable to appear on account Mr Monteux replaced her two the familiar version for orche of the Prelude and "Liebesto Wagner's "Tristan and Isold change was not altogether for the novel piece of the after Hill's "The Fall of the House o which was sandwiched betw masterpieces of the first orde ven's "Leonore No. 3" overtu excerpts from "Tristan."
It is always a severe test compositions to be performe

G Oct 3

concert with any of the better
s of Beethvoen, Bach or Wagner.
in the audience are likey to feel these masters have already said greater force all that almost any mer has to offer. It is moreover rly difficult for a modern com-who employs, as most of them do, er's idiom, to compete with "Trisard under other circumstances, the iduality of orchestral color and the rent presentation of musical ideas

"The Fall of the House of Usher"
d doubtless have made a deeper im-sion. Mr Hill's music is well made.
is a connoisseur of orchestral ef-
He is not without imagination.
yesterday the new piece left an aue eager for its Beethoven and Wagpolitely apathetic.
umann's Symphony in D minor, fain musical history as one of the st examples of the cross-quotation interweaving of themes between ments, sounds as though it had composed for the pianoforte and rather laboriously, orchestrated.
cannot help feeling that if the ad-le material it contains had been for another set of "Symphonic s" the results would have been completely satisfying. Schumann, oe and Heine, had an imagination able of long sustained flights.
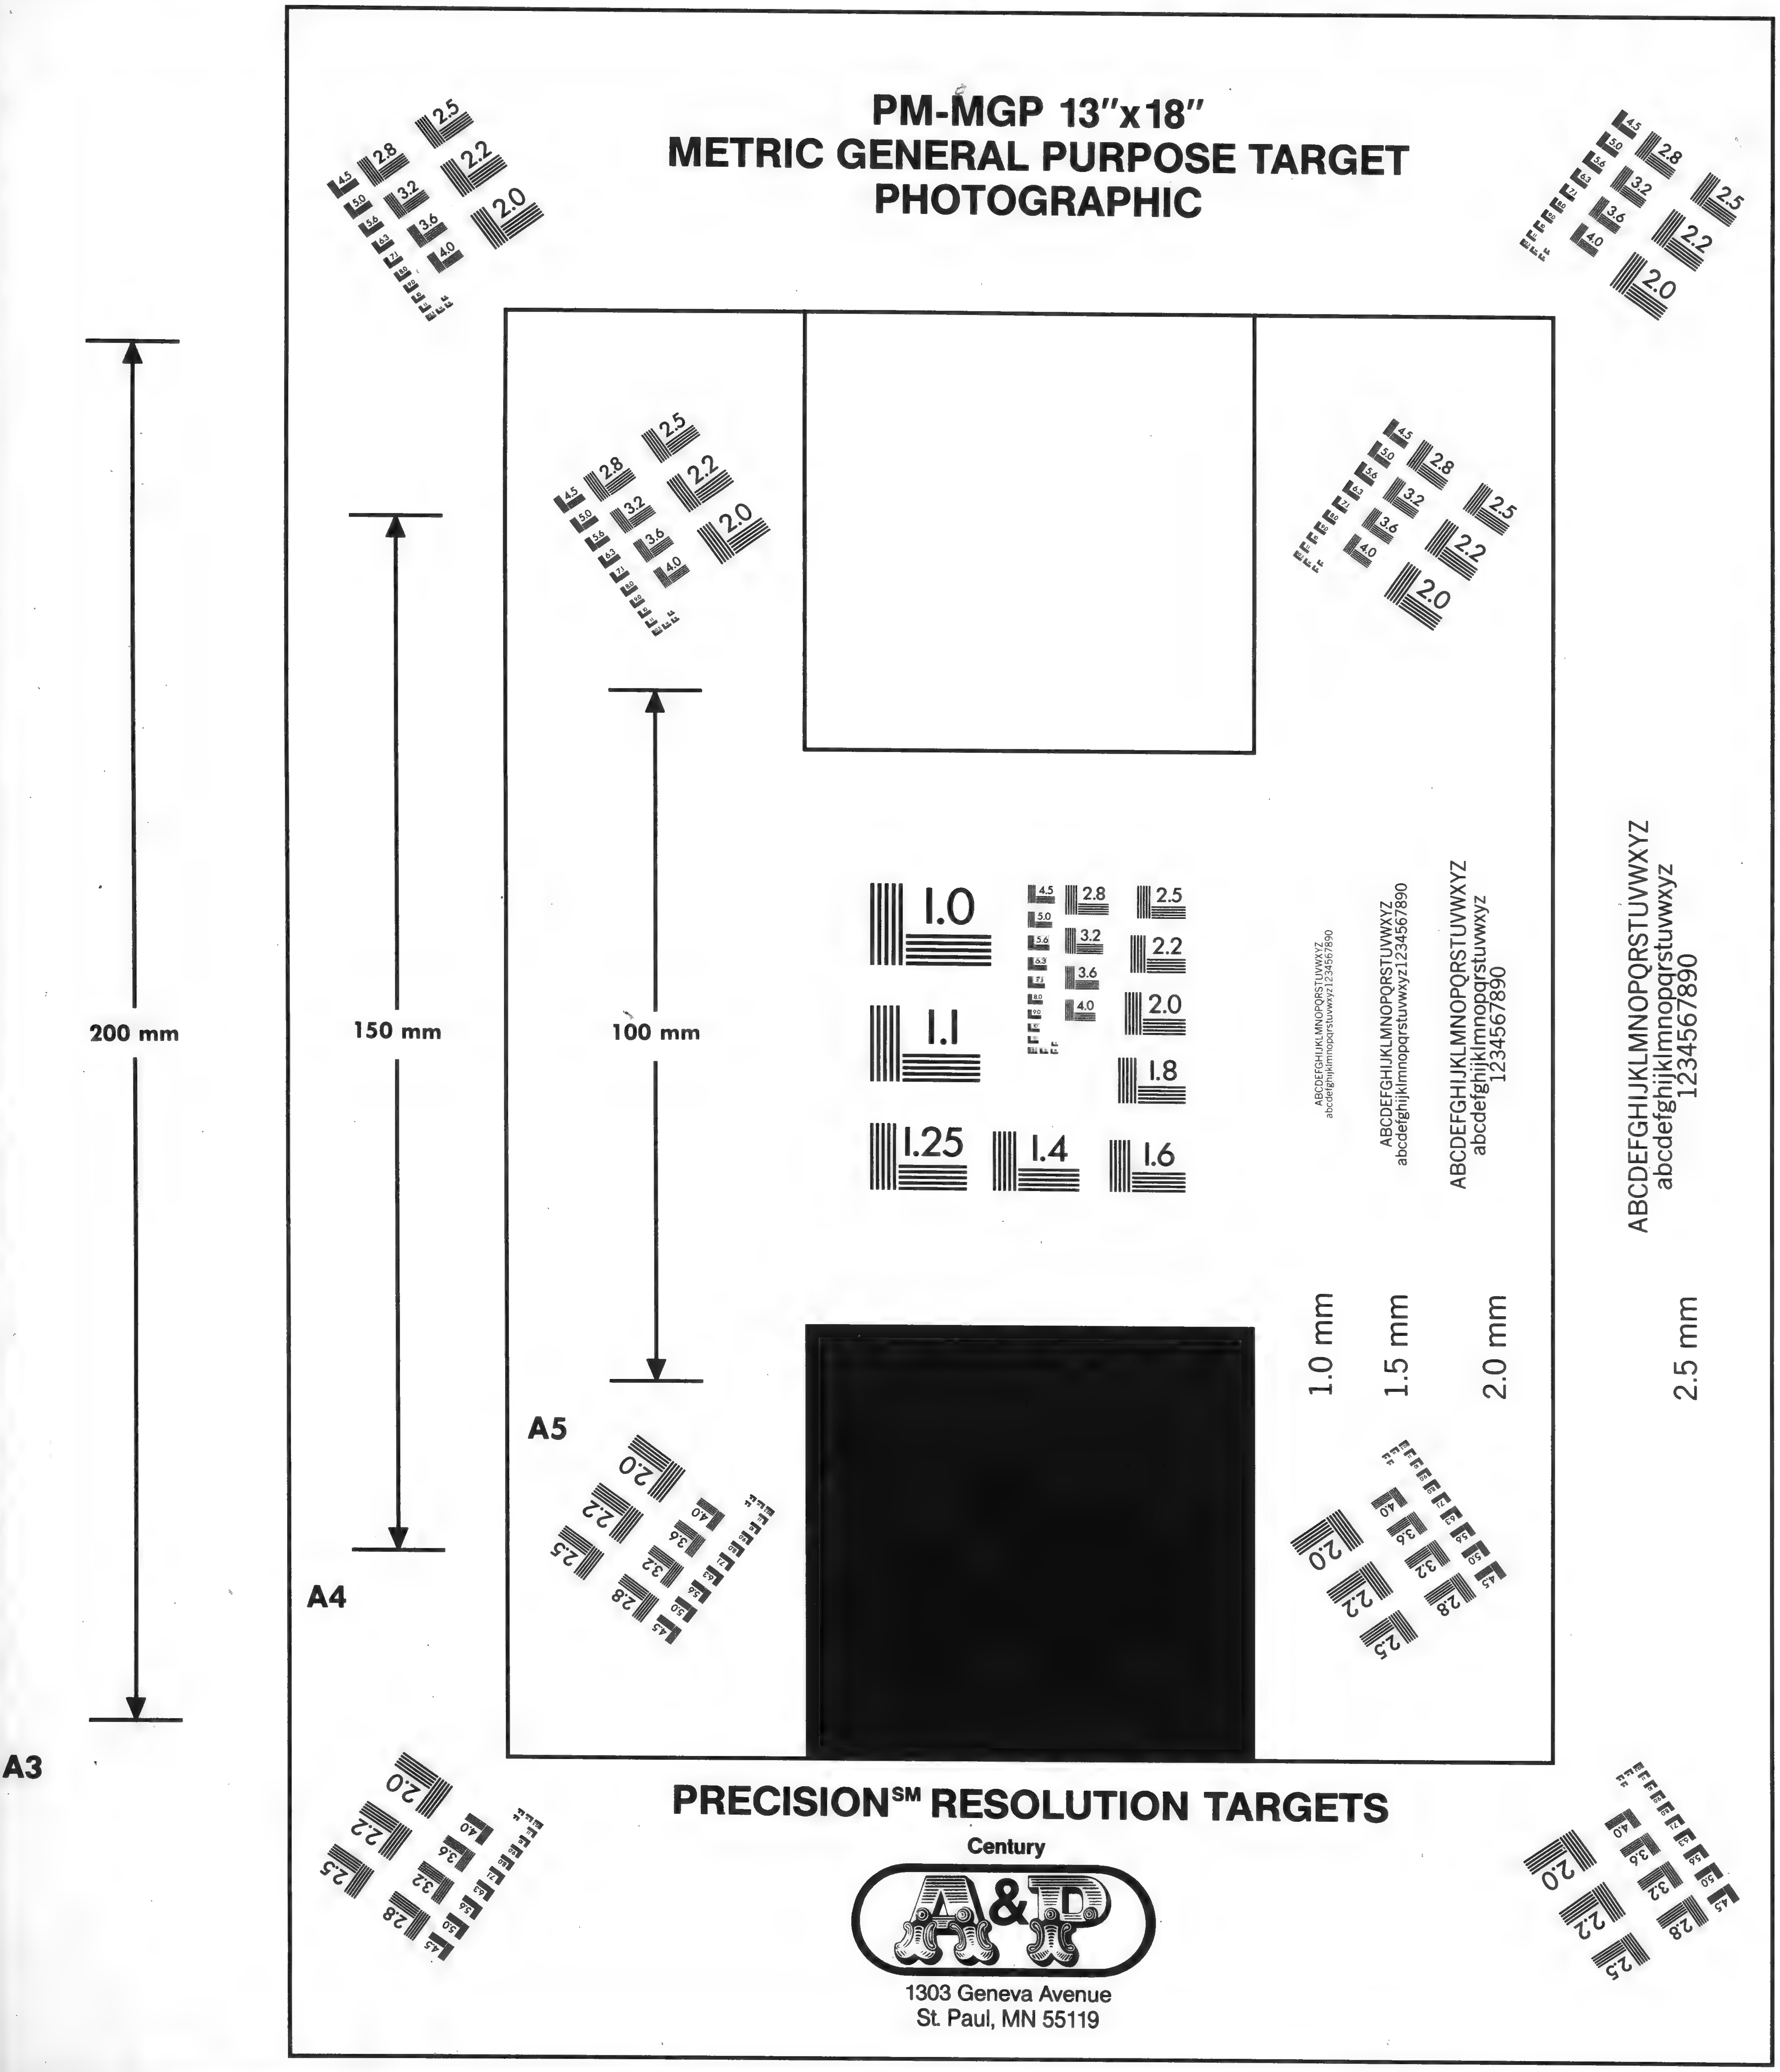
performance of all these works brilliance and verve which atoned occasional lack of absolute prein detail. Particularly noteworthy e exquisite solo work of the new t master, Mr Burgin, in "The Fall House of Usher." He obviously either of his immediate prede-, Yitek and Fradkin. are no concerts next week. The program for Nov 12 and 13 includes Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and new pieces by Custav Strube and Respighi.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
6.3
3.6
2.0
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TIGHT BINDING

...S ABOUT MUSIC

Pieces from Mr. Monteux—
uest of New York—A Rising
in Paris—Malipiero Again—Concerts in Theatres

ek the Symphony Orchestra for the first time this season York, Philadelphia and the outhward to which it makes s. It will not be heard again il Friday and Saturday, Nov. en Mr. Monteux's programme Brahms's fourth symphony; by Mr. Strube, of old vio-rchestra, now chief of a con-Baltimore; a tone-picture, ins of Rome," by the "new pighi; and Strauss's scherzo, egel's Merry Pranks." Con-rchestra were eloquent last ms's first symphony; they less so in the fourth. For een Mr. Strube's custom to pieces to the Symphony Or-irst and deserving perform-hi's music—a symphonic poem ot too "modern" in substance -pictures "the Fountain of t dawn; the Triton Fountain Fountain of Trevi at midday, ntain at the Villa Medici at for Strauss, in the concert-ost other places, the war is ew York the Symphony Or-in measure to reconquer its , Mr. Monteux has wisely close it first in the music of in which, rather than in the w excels. Thus, his first pro-New York traverses Sibelius's E minor played last week in u's Fantasia and Skriabin's tasy." Similarly on his sec-ne he has set Enesco's sym-Hill's tone-poem, "The Fall e of Usher" and, for older 's orchestral arrangement of lude, Choral and Fugue and antical overture, "Benvenuto Italian Rhapsody" has be-to Mr. Jacchia, a relatively at the Pop Concerts in Bos-esday, however, an audience heard it for the first time kowski and the Philadelphia Vith reason Mr. Aldrich wrote Times:

c is graphic, imaginative. pparently no definite pro-depiction of scenes, but a f moods, sullen gloom, pas-delirium, powerfully evoked ed. The orchestral coloring king, novel in effect. It is strong hand certain in its performance was a bril-

Oct.

4TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of "Fall of House of Usher" Is Impressive

COMPOSER CALLED FORTH BY APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Sym-hony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conduc-or, took place yesterday afternoon in ymphony Hall. The program was as ollows: Beethoven, Leonora Overture, No. 3; Hill, "The Fall of the House of sher" (first performance); Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan nd Isolde"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4. Wagner's music was ubstituted for two arias which should ave been sung by Mme. Helen Stanley. he was prevented from singing by a udden attack of tonsilitis.

Henley says in the pr face to his col-ection of English lyrics: "After Keats here is no fresh note until we hear om over the Atlantic, the artful, subtle, rresistible song of Poe; the New Music which none that has heard it can for-et." It is a question whether Poe was ver more musical in his poems, even n "The Haunted Palace," than in his rose "Shadow" and "Silence," and certain tales. Yet composers have een tempted to translate his verbal music into tonal. They have been reatly daring.

Poe himself said: "Give musical ex-pression any undue decision, imbue it with any very determinate tone, and you deprive it at once of its ethereal, its deal, its intrinsic and essential char-acter. It now becomes a tangible and asily appreciable idea, a thing of the arth, earthy." Mr. Hill did not fall into he error of attempting in his symphonic poem to follow Poe's marvellous story cene by scene, from the visitor's first iew of the house and the tarn to the inal tragedy. The composer's aim was o give an impression of the mood in its errifing crescendo. If this music had no title, the hearer would not necessar-ly think of the tale, but the music would suggest the expression of fear, of wild mental perturbation, of something ragically sinister; it would hint in the ery beginning at impending doom. This Mr. Hill has achieved without descend-ng to sensational treatment. He has aid that he associated the two themes with the melancholy Roderick and the lowly dying Madeline. In his use o the themes we recognize the unhappy Usher, tortured by the terror, which a first vague, becomes at last a horrid certainty; while the music for the sister, the lady Madeline, expresses admirably her ghost-like character; her shadowy apparition, even before she was entomb-ed. Nor in the introduction of musical realism, the description of the house, falling to end forever and inevitably the tragedy of the last inmates, does Mr. Hill cease to be musical.

This tone poem is to us an imagina-ve work, conceived and carried out in spirit of Poe. It does not rival the upreme art shown in the construction of the tale itself; if it does not inspire same feeling of mysterious horror; f the musical falls below the verbal elicity of expression. The answer is hat the tale itself is music, and in is field Poe is "lonely and incompar-le," as Swineburne said of Coleridge. If there is to be adverse criticism, e might wish away a certain orna-ntation of figures, filigree, especially the wood-wind, that seem on one aring incongruous, foreign to the pre-iling mood.

he performance was poetic and im-ssive. The composer was obliged to knowledge the applause.

he interpretation of the familiar, bu ver too familiar, overture was exceed-y dramatic; Mr. Monteux gave reading of the "Tristan" music. s a pleasure to hear again the sym-ony of Schumann, with its lovel ricism. The first movement and th ale were played in true virtuoso spiri t the two middle movements are th es in which the genius of Schumann more clearly disclosed.

The concert will be repeated tonight. here will be no concerts next week. he program of Nov. 5, 6, will be as llows. Brahms, Symphony in E minor, o. 4; Strube, Four Preludes (first per-rmance); Respighi, "Fountains of ome," (first time in Boston); Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

HERALD. Oct. 30

---

r Monteux has ventured to include work by a living German composer, rauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," in the mphony program for the next con-rts, Nov 12 and 13. As he did when reintroduced Wagner last year, he s put it last on the program, so that ny who do not wish to hear it may ave without missing anything else. It eems probable, however, in view of the requent unopposed performance at the Pops" of the waltzes from "Der Rosen-avalier" that there will be no protests nd no indignant ... umbers ... other ... Fourth Sym- ... "Four Prel- ... "The Foun- ... l, one of the ... composers' ... e in Boston

GLOBE Oct. 31

NEW WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Hill's Poem After Poe Given First Public Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry Burlingame Hill's symphonic poem, after Poe, "The Fall of the House of Usher," was played for the first time at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, announced to appear, was suddenly taken ill, so that the programme was entirely orchestral. It opened with Beethoven's 3d Leonore overture, and included, in addition to this and Mr. Hill's work, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony.

HINTS AND SUGGESTIONS

Mr. Hill's music is not any slavish attempt to give tonal suggestions or illustrations of episodes of Poe's poem. Mr. Hill's is too sensitive an intelligence to attempt such a thing. He has attempted to convey mood. He hints, as he explains himself in a programme rote, at the figure of Usher's sister, Madeleine, and this is the most salient, the most emotional passage of his work. He suggests elsewhere the fate that hangs over the haunted castle, the wildness of the night, not a melodramatic wildness, but a wildness as intense as it is unreal, and at last the destruction of the thematic castle, which sinks in a harmonic tarn.

Reading again the haunting tale of Poe, one wonders, in the first place, how a composer would have the courage to attempt a musical synthesis of its moods, and then one wonders how a man who could compose at all could avoid being inspired to composition by this supreme work of art.

Thus the man who invokes the spirit of Poe and then essays music faces tremendous odds. Poe has already made music. To add more music to his is to try to transmute one art into another, in a place where it would be about as easy to transmute silver into gold. And then the composer has to complete and fulfill the needs of the imagination which have been awakened in the reader.

It may be possible to do this. It is not singular to us, however, that, as we receive a first impression, Mr. Hill has failed. Or perhaps we do not fully grasp his purpose. He has written, in our estimation, with feeling which is poetic, but which hardly reaches the heights of wild fantasy and the stab of the beauty, so strange, so macabre, of an incomparable tale.

For the rest, Mr. Hill has achieved beautiful orchestration, distinguished alike by its fineness of touch and its certainty of method, modern harmony, a warm gleam of human, tragic beauty in the musical portrayal of the doomed Madeleine, very well placed in the composition, very apposite to the musico-poetic conception. But there we stop. For us, the composition lacks the commanding force, the powerful stamp of an all-condemning fate which is inherent in every line of the legend. It is artistic. There are moments of foreboding of omen when the bass drum pounds on the heart. Yet we are left cold.

The performance of Beethoven's overture was not distinguished by exceptional eloquence or beauty of tone. It was good, leaning toward mediocrity. The "Tristan" music had been prepared on short notice. A certain roughness was inevitable, but the Liebestod was played with feeling and a musician's knowledge of the color possibilities of the score.

Schumann's D minor symphony is an exquisite fancy, fragile, peculiarly intimate. It seems strange that a great orchestra could be so personal. And Mr. Monteux has long ere this shown his special understanding of Schumann.

Post, Oct. 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY

After returning from its first southern trip, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings, Nov. 12 and 13. The symphony will be the fourth of Brahms. There will be two new works—"Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, which will then be played for the first time, and a symphonic poem by the daring young Italian composer, Resphigi, which describes "The Fountains of Rome." The closing number will be Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

HERALD Oct. 31

SYMPHONY GIVES FOURTH CONCERT

Yesteday afternoon marked the fourth concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A delightful program was well interpreted by the musicians.

It is an easily comprehended fact that Mr. Monteux is a director possessed of great broad-mindedness and one who presents the works of all composers with equal feeling and skill. One would hesitate to say that he excells in any particular form of interpretation in that he attains such perfection in all, but, if there is one form it is the Operatic Overture.

Yesterday, Miss Helen Stanley was to have been the soloist with the orchestra, but her sudden illness made necessary a change in the program. The first number was the Overture to Beethoven's Opera "Leonore," the added number the "Prelude and Love-Duet" from Wagners "Tristran and Isolde." Mr. Monteux's interpretation of both these numbers was gloriously brilliant.

The first performance of a "Poem for Orchestra," by Edward Burlingame Hill was given. This composition was inspired by Edgar Allen Poe's story "The Fall of the House of Usher." The composer says that his purpose was to present a personal impression of its atmosphere and a desire to attain a coherent and logical presentation of musical ideas reflecting Poe's melancholy and powerful imagination. Mr. Hill has succeeded well for the composition is full of the moody morbidness that characterizes Poe's writings. Mr. Hill attended the performance and received the warm applause of the audience in person.

The last number was Schumann's "D Minor Symphony," number 4. This Symphony is in four movements. Schumann requested that his work always be played without pauses and its splendid performance as rendered by the orchestra yesterday as Schumann intended.

There will not be another concert until Nov. 12, as the orchestra is to go out on tour next week.

TRAV. Oct. 30.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux will give a concert of a popular character on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Symphony Hall, at 3 o'clock, the receipts to be devoted to the pension fund for retired players, according to the regular practice of the orchestra.

On this occasion Pierre Monteux will conduct "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite which is considered the masterpiece of the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff. This score, based upon the "Arabian Nights," with its Oriental colorings, is without peer as spectacular music for a virtuoso orchestra. Another pictorial and striking number will be the tone poem of Saint-Saens, "The Youth of Hercules." Wagner will be represented by his overture to "Rienzi." A noted soloist is also to be engaged and will be announced soon.

POST Oct. 31

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert of a popular character on Sunday afternoon, November 21, in Symphony Hall, the receipts to be devoted to the pension fund. "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite by Rimski-Korsakoff; Saint-Saens' tone poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture will be played. A noted soloist is also to be engaged.

ADVERTISER Oct. 31

Here in Boston

Speculation and assertion to the contrary notwithstanding, no decision has been taken by Mr. Monteux and the management of the Symphony Orchestra as to a concert or two of choral music in the course of the season. As soon as it is made, it will be made known to all interested.

Poor Old Boy!

The other day in New York, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra had the temerity to play Casella's "Italian Rhapsody," a piece that Bostonian audiences have heard for some years—even at "Pop Concerts"—with every sign of pleasure and tranquillity. None the less it drove Mr. Krehbiel writing in The Tribune to these comic furies:

TRANS. Oct. 31.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fifth program. Fourth Symphony, Brahms; Four Preludes (first time), Strube; "The Fountains of Rome" (first time here), Resphigi; "Till Eulenspiegel," Richard Strauss. There is no soloist.

The program for the Boston Symphony pension fund concert, Nov 21, contains Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. There is to be a soloist, as yet unannounced.

It is to be hoped that Mr Monteux will plan a memorial program for the Symphony concerts of Dec 17 and 18, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, Dec 16, 1770.

HERALD NOV. 7.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

Pierre Monteux Leads Musicians in First Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the first time this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme consisted of Sibelius's symphony in E minor, Lekeu's symphnoci fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou and Scriabine's "Poeme d'Extase." The music was chosen by the conductor, Pierre Monteux, with cunning. It invited no comparisons with recent performances. It was not familiar to the majority of listeners, who were therefore not too exacting in their demands for perfection in presentation.

It is pleasant to be able to say that in some respects the orchestra sounded better than last season. Only a few new players were in the ranks, but none the less the general quality of tone, and especially that of the strings, was improved. The improvement was not as astonishing as Boston recorders would have us believe, but it was distinctly discernible. The wood wind and the brass are substantially the same.

The performance of the Sibelius symphony was vigorous and sonorous. It was not notable for finish nor for transparency, but it had the rude strength of the north and it voiced the moods of the work well. The slow movement was particularly well played and received that discriminating applause for which Boston Symphony audiences here are noted.

There will be more to say about Boston's musical glory when the orchestra is heard again to-morrow afternoon. Some will doubtless continue to wish that Mr. Monteux had more imagination and a more flexible beat. But it has been proclaimed out of the wisdom of the East that he is a great conductor and cities to the southward should not cavil.

N.Y. HERALD NOV. 5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Conducts at Initial Concert—Splendid Program at Carnegie Hall.

With a fine organization of excellently trained musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, opened its New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening before a brilliant audience.

The program was one of splendid worth, composed of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, a "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou," by Lekeu, and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54.

Other concerts of the Carnegie Hall series will be given on Thursday evenings, December 2, January 6, February 3 and March 17, and Saturday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 5 and March 19. Conductor Monteux has made many plans regarding new scores and long established masterpieces which promise to make the series most interesting.

N.Y. TELEGRAPH. NOV. 5.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN ONE DAY

Bostonians and the Damrosch Orchestra Follow Each Other in Quick Succession and Contrast at Carnegie Hall Concerts

By MAX SMITH.

ON the heels of Walter Damrosch, who launched the Symphony Society's "Historical Cycle" with a matinee in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, Franco-Bostonian conductor, brought over his band of musicians last night from the Hub for their first musical ministration of the season.

The arrangement was interesting as it gave an opportunity to hear the visitors with the impressions of the afternoon still fresh. But a pretty severe test it proved to be for the organization that once had no equal in this country, the more so because our own orchestra lived up to its highst standards, especially in Bach's Concerto No. 1F, for horns, oboes, bassoons, solo violin and strings.

AMER. N.Y. NOV. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit of the season to New York yesterday and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra showed many new faces as a result of the reorganization it has undergone since its troubles of last Spring; the list of players printed in the program book contains a much larger proportion of Anglo-Saxon names than have appeared in its roster before, or in those of most orchestras that play in New York.

Mr. Monteux presented a program of modern music generally unfamiliar: Sibelin's first symphony, Leken's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou and Schriabin's "Poeme de l'Ecstase." All these compositions suggested the proclivity of the modern to "excess of discourse" when they get well started. It was notable in the last movement and to a less degree in other movements of Sibelin's symphony.

It is music of a lowering spirit, showing its Northern origin. The first movement seems the strongest in the character of its themes, the ingenuity of their development, the grandiose close, matched by the audante with its suggestion of folk melody, though there is discursiveness in its length. The following allegro has the character of a scherzo and has been called wild and heavily fantastical; there is grimness in the last movement, but its power is dissipated by its extension beyond the value of its material. The symphony is twenty years old; but there is vigor in it that is not stated, and an individual tang in the music that is engrossing.

There is an unquestionable personal stamp, too, upon Lekeu's fantasia which has not a few elements of beauty; but its distinction is not always maintained and it suffers from its too great length.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" had its first performance in New York a dozen years ago. It has aged considerably since then and no longer strikes terror to the bourgeois so much as it breeds boredom on account of the extravagant lengths to which a tenuous musical idea is pursued. The musical germ is in itself slender, being little more than a succession of chromatic anticipations and suspensions on chords of the ninth and eleventh and other high numbers. His kinship with the bacchanale in the later version of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" has been observed; some may discern a connection with Lisztian methods. There are ordustral ingenuities and refinements that are often striking, but the musical value is singularly small. What the philosophical or theosophical value of it may be is not evident. Scriabin was disposed to attribute cosmical significance to his later orchestral works that they seem to possess less of as time gnaws them.

The playing of these things by the orchestra was such as to give pleasure to its friends. The tone of the whole organization is improved and has mellowed; the tone of the strings in particular is finer. There are many youthful faces among the string players; and while they may not represent the quality of Berlioz's "Young Lions of the Conservatorie," they may be expected to go farther. There is still something for Mr. Montenx to do in refirming and polishing his performances, but he had to begin on an organization largely new. It takes time, but meanwhile it has been made evident that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not extinct.

N.Y. TIMES NOV. 5.

TWO novel numbers stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: "Four Preludes for Orchestra," by Guhtave Strube and "Fountains of Rome," tone-pictures by the Italian, Respighi. The Preludes are short; they will be played for the first time anywhere; while the composer is easy to recall as violinist and conductor in Boston before he became director of a music-school. Respighi is one of the "symphonic Italians" of the newer generation and his music recalls the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn; the Triton Fountain at morn; the Fountain of Trevi at midday; and the Fountain of the Villa Medici at sunset. The novel pieces fill the middle places in the concerts. Brahms's familiar Fourth Symphony will precede them and Strauss's high-humored, fantastical and adroit "Till Eulenspiegel" will follow them. The life and death of that merry knave has not been told in tones in Boston since the United States joined in the war upon Germany.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will go to Cambridge for the second in the series of Symphony Concerts at Sanders Theatre. Their numbers are Sibelius's symphony in E minor; Mr. Hill's new tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," suggested by Poe's like-named tale, and Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. Mme. Eva Gauthier, imaginative, accomplished and individual singer will assist the orchestra at Cambridge. Her pieces are an air from Donizett's bridge Crist's amusing songs from a Chinese Mother Goose.

TRANS. NOV. 5.

TIGHT BINDING

S ABOUT MUSIC

Pieces from Mr. Monteux—
uest of New York—A Rising
in Paris—Malipiero Again—
oncerts in Theatres

ek the Symphony Orchestra for the first time this season York, Philadelphia, and the outhward to which it makes
s. It will not be heard again il Friday and Saturday, Nov.
en Mr. Monteux's programme Brahms's fourth symphony;
by Mr. Strube, of old viorchestra, now chief of a con-Baltimore; a tone-picture, ns of Rome," by the "new pighi; and Strauss's scherzo, egel's Merry Pranks." Conrchestra were eloquent last ms's first symphony; they less so in the fourth. For een Mr. Strube's custom to pieces to the Symphony Orirst and deserving perform-hi's music—a symphonic poem ot too "modern" in substance
-pictures "the Fountain of t dawn; the Triton Fountain Fountain of Trevi at midday, ntain at the Villa Medici at for Strauss, in the concert-ost other places, the war is ew York the Symphony Or-n measure to reconquer its

, Mr. Monteux has wisely close it first in the music of in which, rather than in the w excels. Thus, his first pro-
New York traverses Sibelius's E minor played last week in u's Fantasia and Skriabin's stasy." Similarly on his sec-ne he has set Enesco's sym-Hill's tone-poem, "The Fall e of Usher" and, for older
's orchestral arrangement of lude, Choral and Fugue and antical overture, "Benvenuto

Italian Rhapsody" has beto Mr. Jacchia, a relatively at the Pop Concerts in Bos-esday, however, an audience heard it for the first time kowski and the Philadelphia
Vith reason Mr. Aldrich wrote
Times:

c is graphic, imaginative.
pparently no definite pro-depiction of scenes, but a f moods, sullen gloom, pasdelirium, powerfully evoked
d. The orchestral coloring king, novel in effect. It is strong hand certain in its performance was a bril-

. Oct.

s. Oct.

appen tonight as cle ss an a bow was of hitting s, but aln-foot hole bulkheads in the bay.
d from the wn lines to d the others

inth Page.

Hol
Sun
Globe
dealer

AT

ns

4TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of "Fall of House of Usher" Is Impressive

COMPOSER CALLED FORTH BY APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Leonora Overture, No. 3; Hill, "The Fall of the House of Usher" (first performance); Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4. Wagner's music was substituted for two arias which should have been sung by Mme. Helen Stanley. She was prevented from singing by a sudden attack of tonsilitis.

Henley says in the preface to his collection of English lyrics: "After Keats there is no fresh note until we hear from over the Atlantic, the artful, subtle, irresistible song of Poe; the New Music which none that has heard it can forget." It is a question whether Poe was ever more musical in his poems, even in "The Haunted Palace," than in his prose "Shadow" and "Silence," and in certain tales. Yet composers have been tempted to translate his verbal music into tonal. They have been greatly daring.

Poe himself said: "Give musical expression any undue decision, imbue it with any very determinate tone, and you deprive it at once of its ethereal, its ideal, its intrinsic and essential character. It now becomes a tangible and easily appreciable idea, a thing of the earth, earthy." Mr. Hill did not fall into the error of attempting in his symphonic poem to follow Poe's marvellous story scene by scene, from the visitor's first view of the house and the tarn to the final tragedy. The composer's aim was to give an impression of the mood in its terrifing crescendo. If this music had no title, the hearer would not necessarily think of the tale, but the music would suggest the expression of fear, of wild mental perturbation, of something tragically sinister; it would hint in the very beginning at impending doom. This Mr. Hill has achieved without descending to sensational treatment. He has said that he associated the two themes with the melancholy Roderick and the slowly dying Madeline. In his use of the themes we recognize the unhappy Usher, tortured by the terror, which a first vague, becomes at last a horrid certainty; while the music for the sister, the lady Madeline, expresses admirably her ghost-like character; her shadowy apparition, even before she was entombed. Nor in the introduction of musical realism, the description of the house, falling to end forever and inevitably the tragedy of the last inmates, does Mr. Hill cease to be musical.

This tone poem is to us an imaginative work, conceived and carried out in the spirit of Poe. It does not rival the supreme art shown in the construction of the tale itself; if it does not inspire the same feeling of mysterious horror; if the musical falls below the verbal felicity of expression. The answer is that the tale itself is music; and in this field Poe is "lonely and incomparable," as Swineburne said of Coleridge. If there is to be adverse criticism, one might wish away a certain ornamentation of figures, filigree, especially in the wood-wind, that seem on one hearing incongruous, foreign to the prevailing mood.

The performance was poetic and impressive. The composer was obliged to acknowledge the applause.

The interpretation of the familiar, but never too familiar, overture was exceedingly dramatic. Mr. Monteux gave a reading of the "Tristan" music. It was a pleasure to hear again the symphony of Schumann, with its lovely lyricism. The first movement and the finale were played in true virtuoso spirit; the two middle movements are those in which the genius of Schumann is more clearly disclosed.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Nov. 5, 6, will be as follows. Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4; Strube, Four Preludes (first performance); Respighi, "Fountains of Rome," (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

HERALD. Oct. 30.

NEW WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Hill's Poem After Poe Given First Public Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry Burlingame Hill's symphonic poem, after Poe, "The Fall of the House of Usher," was played for the first time at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, announced to appear, was suddenly taken ill, so that the programme was entirely orchestral. It opened with Beethoven's 3d Leonore overture, and included, in addition to this and Mr. Hill's work, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Schumann's D minor symphony.

HINTS AND SUGGESTIONS

Mr. Hill's music is not any slavish attempt to give tonal suggestions or illustrations of episodes of Poe's poem. Mr. Hill's is too sensitive an intelligence to attempt such a thing. He has attempted to convey mood. He hints, as he explains himself in a programme rote, at the figure of Usher's sister, Madeleine, and this is the most salient, the most emotional passage of his work. He suggests elsewhere the fate that hangs over the haunted castle, the wildness of the night, not a melodramatic wildness, but a wildness as intense as it is unreal, and at last the destruction of the thematic castle, which sinks in a harmonic tarn.

Reading again the haunting tale of Poe, one wonders, in the first place, how a composer would have the courage to attempt a musical synthesis of its moods, and then one wonders how a man who could compose at all could avoid being inspired to composition by this supreme work of art.

Thus the man who invokes the spirit of Poe and then essays music faces tremendous odds. Poe has already made music. To add more music to his is to try to transmute one art into another, in a place where it would be about as easy to transmute silver into gold. And then the composer has to complete and fulfill the needs of the imagination which have been awakened in the reader.

It may be possible to do this. It is not singular to us, however, that, as we receive a first impression, Mr. Hill has failed. Or perhaps we do not fully grasp his purpose. He has written, in our estimation, with feeling which is poetic, but which hardly reaches the heights of wild fantasy and the stab of the beauty, so strange, so macabre, of an incomparable tale.

For the rest, Mr. Hill has achieved beautiful orchestration, distinguished alike by its fineness of touch and its certainty of method, modern harmony, a warm gleam of human, tragic beauty in the musical portrayal of the doomed Madeleine, very well placed in the composition, very apposite to the musico-poetic conception. But there we stop. For us, the composition lacks the commanding force, the powerful stamp of an all-condemning fate which is inherent in every line of the legend. It is artistic. There are moments of foreboding of omen when the bass drum pounds on the heart. Yet we are left cold.

The performance of Beethoven's overture was not distinguished by exceptional eloquence or beauty of tone. It was good, leaning toward mediocrity. The "Tristan" music had been prepared on short notice. A certain roughness was inevitable, but the Liebestod was played with feeling and a musician's knowledge of the color possibilities of the score.

Schumann's D minor symphony is an exquisite fancy, fragile, peculiarly intimate. It seems strange that a great orchestra could be so personal. And Mr. Monteux has long ere this shown his special understanding of Schumann.

Post Oct. 30

SYMPHONY GIVES FOURTH CONCERT

Yesteday afternoon marked the fourth concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A delightful program was well interpreted by the musicians.

It is an easily comprehended fact that Mr. Monteux is a director possessed of great broad-mindedness and one who presents the works of all composers with equal feeling and skill. One would hesitate to say that he excells in any particular form of interpretation in that he attains such perfection in all, but, if there is one form it is the Operatic Overture.

Yesterday, Miss Helen Stanley was to have been the soloist with the orchestra, but her sudden illness made necessary a change in the program. The first number was the Overture to Beethoven's Opera "Leonore," the added number the "Prelude and Love-Duet" from Wagners "Tristran and Isolde." Mr. Monteux's interpretation of both these numbers was gloriously brilliant.

The first performance of a "Poem for Orchestra," by Edward Burlingame Hill was given. This composition was inspired by Edgar Allen Poe's story "The Fall of the House of Usher." The composer says that his purpose was to present a personal impression of its atmosphere and a desire to attain a coherent and logical presentation of musical ideas reflecting Poe's melancholy and powerful imagination. Mr. Hill has succeeded well for the composition is full of the moody morbidness that charactizes Poe's writings. Mr. Hill attended the performance and received the warm applause of the audience in person.

The last number was Schumann's "D Minor Symphony," number 4. This Symphony is in four movements. Schumann requested that his work always be played without pauses and its splendid performance as rendered by the orchestra yesterday as Schumann intended.

There will not be another concert until Nov. 12, as the orchestra is to go out on tour next week.

TRAV. Oct. 30.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux will give a concert of a popular character on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Symphony Hall, at 3 o'clock, the receipts to be devoted to the pension fund for retired players, according to the regular practice of the orchestra.

On this occasion Pierre Monteux will conduct "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite which is considered the masterpiece of the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff. This score, based upon the "Arabian Nights," with its Oriental colorings, is without peer as spectacular music for a virtuoso orchestra. Another pictorial and striking number will be the tone poem of Saint-Saens, "The Youth of Hercules." Wagner will be represented by his overture to "Rienzi." A noted soloist is also to be engaged and will be announced soon.

POST Oct. 31

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert of a popular character on Sunday afternoon, November 21, in Symphony Hall, the receipts to be devoted to the pension fund. "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite by Rimski-Korsakoff; Saint-Saens' tone poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture will be played. A noted soloist is also to be engaged.

ADVERTISER Oct. 31

Here in Boston

Speculation and assertion to the contrary notwithstanding, no decision has been taken by Mr. Monteux and the management of the Symphony Orchestra as to a concert or two of choral music in the course of the season. As soon as it is made, it will be made known to all interested.

Poor Old Boy!

The other day in New York, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra had the temerity to play Casella's "Italian Rhapsody," a piece that Bostonian audiences have heard for some years—even at "Pop Concerts"—with every sign of pleasure and tranquillity. None the less it drove Mr. Krehbiel writing in The Tribune to these comic furies:

TRANS. Oct. 31

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fifth program. Fourth Symphony, Brahms; Four Preludes (first time), Strube; "The Fountains of Rome" (first time here), Respighi; "Till Eulenspiegel," Richard Strauss. There is no soloist.

The program for the Boston Symphony pension fund concert, Nov 21, contains Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. There is to be a soloist, as yet unannounced.

It is to be hoped that Mr Monteux will plan a memorial program for the Symphony concerts of Dec 17 and 18, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, Dec 16, 1770.

HERALD NOV. 7

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

Pierre Monteux Leads Musicians in First Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the first time this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme consisted of Sibelius's symphony in E minor, Lekeu's symphnoci fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou and Scriabine's "Poeme d'Extase." The music was chosen by the conductor, Pierre Monteux, with cunning. It invited no comparisons with recent performances. It was not familiar to the majority of listeners, who were therefore not too exacting in their demands for perfection in presentation.

It is pleasant to be able to say that in some respects the orchestra sounded better than last season. Only a few new players were in the ranks, but none the less the general quality of tone, and especially that of the strings, was improved. The improvement was not as astonishing as Boston recorders would have us believe, but it was distinctly discernible. The wood wind and the brass are substantially the same.

The performance of the Sibelius symphony was vigorous and sonorous. It was not notable for finish nor for transparency, but it had the rude strength of the north and it voiced the moods of the work well. The slow movement was particularly well played and received that discriminating applause for which Boston Symphony audiences here are noted.

There will be more to say about Boston's musical glory when the orchestra is heard again to-morrow afternoon. Some will doubtless continue to wish that Mr. Monteux had more imagination and a more flexible beat. But it has been proclaimed out of the wisdom of the East that he is a great conductor and cities to the southward should not cavil.

N.Y. HERALD NOV. 5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Conducts at Initial Concert—Splendid Program at Carnegie Hall.

With a fine organization of excellently trained musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, opened its New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening before a brilliant audience.

The program was one of splendid worth, composed of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, a "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou," by Lekeu, and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54.

Other concerts of the Carnegie Hall series will be given on Thursday evenings, December 2, January 6, February 3 and March 17, and Saturday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 5 and March 19. Conductor Monteux has made many plans regarding new scores and long established masterpieces which promise to make the series most interesting.

NY. TELEGRAPH. NOV. 5.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN ONE DAY

Bostonians and the Damrosch Orchestra Follow Each Other in Quick Succession and Contrast at Carnegie Hall Concerts

By MAX SMITH.

ON the heels of Walter Damrosch, who launched the Symphony Society's "Historical Cycle" with a matinee in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, Franco-Bostonian conductor, brought over his band of musicians last night from the Hub for their first musical ministration of the season.

The arrangement was interesting as it gave an opportunity to hear the visitors with the impressions of the afternoon still fresh. But a pretty severe test it proved to be for the organization that once had no equal in this country, the more so because our own orchestra lived up to its highst standards, especially in Bach's Concerto No. 1F, for horns, oboes, bassoons, solo violin and strings.

AMER. N.Y. NOV. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit of the season to New York yesterday and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra showed many new faces as a result of the reorganization it has undergone since its troubles of last Spring; the list of players printed in the program book contains a much larger proportion of Anglo-Saxon names than have appeared in its roster before, or in those of most orchestras that play in New York.

Mr. Monteux presented a program of modern music generally unfamiliar: Sibelin's first symphony, Leken's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou and Schriabin's "Poeme de l'Ecstase." All these compositions suggested the proclivity of the modern to "excess of discourse" when they get well started. It was notable in the last movement and to a less degree in other movements of Sibelin's symphony.

It is music of a lowering spirit, showing its Northern origin. The first movement seems the strongest in the character of its themes, the ingenuity of their development, the grandiose close, matched by the audante with its suggestion of folk melody, though there is discursiveness in its length. The following allegro has the character of a scherzo and has been called wild and heavily fantastical; there is grimness in the last movement, but its power is dissipated by its extension beyond the value of its material. The symphony is twenty years old; but there is vigor in it that is not stated, and an individual tang in the music that is engrossing.

There is an unquestionable personal stamp, too, upon Lekeu's fantasia which has not a few elements of beauty; but its distinction is not always maintained and it suffers from its too great length.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" had its first performance in New York a dozen years ago. It has aged considerably since then and no longer strikes terror to the bourgeois so much as it breeds boredom on account of the extravagant lengths to which a tenuous musical idea is pursued. The musical germ is in itself slender, being little more than a succession of chromatic anticipations and suspensions on chords of the ninth and eleventh and other high numbers.

His kinship with the bacchanale in the later version of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" has been observed; some may discern a connection with Lisztian methods. There are ordustral ingenuities and refinements that are often striking, but the musical value is singularly small. What the philosophical or theosophical value of it may be is not evident. Scriabin was disposed to attribute cosmical significance to his later orchestral works that they seem to possess less of as time gnaws them.

The playing of these things by the orchestra was such as to give pleasure to its friends. The tone of the whole organization is improved and has mellowed; the tone of the strings in particular is finer. There are many youthful faces among the string players; and while they may not represent the quality of Berlioz's "Young Lions of the Conservatorie," they may be expected to go farther. There is still something for Mr. Montenx to do in refirming and polishing his performances, but he had to begin on an organization largely new. It takes time, but meanwhile it has been made evident that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not extinct.

N.Y. TIMES NOV. 5.

TWO novel numbers stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: "Four Preludes for Orchestra," by Guhtave Strube and "Fountains of Rome," tone-pictures by the Italian, Respighi. The Preludes are short; they will be played for the first time anywhere; while the composer is easy to recall as violinist and conductor in Boston before he became director of a music-school. Respighi is one of the "symphonic Italians" of the newer generation and his music recalls the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn; the Triton Fountain at morn; the Fountain of Trevi at midday; and the Fountain of the Villa Medici at sunset. The novel pieces fill the middle places in the concerts. Brahms's familiar Fourth Symphony will precede them and Strauss's high-humored, fantastical and adroit "Till Eulenspiegel" will follow them. The life and death of that merry knave has not been told in tones in Boston since the United States joined in the war upon Germany.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will go to Cambridge for the second in the series of Symphony Concerts at Sanders Theatre. Their numbers are Sibelius's symphony in E minor; Mr. Hill's new tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," suggested by Poe's like-named tale, and Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. Mme. Eva Gauthier, imaginative, accomplished and individual singer will assist the orchestra at Cambridge. Her pieces are an air from Donizett's bridge Crist's amusing songs from a Chinese Mother Goose.

TRANS. NOV. 5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

After returning from its first southern trip, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings, Nov. 12 and 13. The symphony will be the fourth of Brahms. There will be two new works—"Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, which will then be played for the first time, and a symphonic poem by the daring young Italian composer, Resphigi, which describes "The Fountains of Rome." The closing number will be Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

HERALD Oct. 31.

---

r Monteux has ventured to include work by a living German composer, rauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," in the mphony program for the next conrts, Nov 12 and 13. As he did when reintroduced Wagner last year, he s put it last on the program, so that y who do not wish to hear it may ave without missing anything else. It ems probable, however, in view of the equent unopposed performance at the Pops" of the waltzes from 'Der Rosenavalier" that there will be no protests d no indignant departures. The other umbers will be Brahms' Fourth Symhony, and two novelties, 'Four Pre-des" by Gustav Strube and 'The Founains of Rome," by Respighi, one of the oung modernist Italian composers itherto known only by name in Bosto

GLOBE Oct. 31

42

Boston Symphony Programme

Having completed the first southern trip, which occupied last week and which was marked by brilliantly successful concerts in each city of its travels, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Pierre Monteux has compiled an unusually interesting programme, to begin with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor. He will also conduct the first performances of "Four Preludes for Orchestra," by Gustave Strube, the noted composer, who was once a member of the orchestra, and, for another novelty, a symphonic poem by the Italian composer, Respighi, which describes four of the fountains of Rome, as follows: The fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn; the Triton fountain at morn; the fountain of Trevi at midday; the Villa Medici fountain at sunset. The brilliant closing number will be Richard Strauss' fantastic work, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Pension Fund Programme

No orchestral score is more dazzling, and magnificent in oriental coloring than "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is to be the feature of the Symphony concert to be given next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30 o'clock in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. This music describes the following events from the Arabian Nights: I.—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship; II.—The Story of the Kalander-Prince; III.—The Young Prince and the Young Princess; IV.—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior; Conclusion. Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert Saint-Saens' striking symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." A soloist soon to be announced will make the concert the more eventful.

POST NOV. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Brahms' Fourth Symphony, which has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons, will be the feature of the program. "Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, and a symphonic poem by the young Italian composer, Respighi, will be the novelties. Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," will also be played.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

No orchestral score is richer in Oriental coloring than "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is to be the feature of the Symphony concert to be given next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi." A soloist will also appear.

ADVERTISER NOV. 7

AN ORCHESTRA RENEWED

NEW METTLE OF THE BOSTON BAND

Praise for It in New York and Other Cities Such as It Has Not Received in Three Years—Signs of Regained Audiences and Returning Prestige Through the Concerts of Last Week—Mr. Hill's New Tone-Poem as Various Reviewers Heard It

SINCE the days of Dr. Muck the Boston Orchestra has not been so well received upon any journey southward as it was through the "trip" of last week. As usual, it gave one concert in Philadelphia, one in Washington, one in Baltimore, one in Brooklyn and two in New York. In all five cities, whatever the programme, the audiences gave every sign of pleasure, while the reviewers in the newspapers were as hearty in applause. In Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn these audiences are rising toward former numbers and quality. In New York, while there are still empty places in Carnegie Hall, the orchestra is already holding a substantial public, and regaining its prestige of old. Moreover, in every city visited, and especially in New York, the listeners were quick to discover the new mettle of the band and to speak and write accordingly. Those who had held faithful through the decline of the orchestra under Rabaud and Fradkin and the misfortunes besetting it at the end of last season, found new reason for their faith; while those who have recently belittled it and mistrusted the effort of Mr. Monteux, the trustees and the management to regain former standards had reason to revise their opinions. In New York, in particular, the newspapers with almost one voice bear witness to this change of view.

For the first of the two concerts on Thursday evening last, the programme comprised Sibelius's symphony in E minor, Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy"—all pieces heard in Boston last month and well exhibiting the present powers of orchestra and conductor. Of them Mr. Aldrich wrote in The Times:

> The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made its first visit of the season to New York and given its first concert in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra showed many new faces as a result of the reorganization it has undergone since its troubles of last spring; the list of players printed in the programme-book contains a much larger proportion of Anglo-Saxon names than have appeared in its roster before, or in those [illegible] orchestras that play in New [illegible]. The playing of the orchestra was such as to give [illegible] to its friends. The tone of the whole organization is improved and has mellowed; the tone of the strings in particular is finer. There are many youthful faces among the string players; and while they may not represent the quality of Berlioz's "Young Lions of the Conservatory," they may be expected to go farther. There is still something for Mr. Monteux to do in refining and polishing his performances, but he had to begin on an organization largely new. It takes time, but meanwhile it has been made evident that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not extinct.

In The Tribune and also in review of this first concert, Mr. Krehbiel remarked: "Under Mr. Monteux's direction the men from Boston, almost completely rehabilitated in their long maintained excellence, gave a fine account of themselves. The string band, with its new leader, Mr. Burgin, is a splendid body, its tone full and elastic. Boston may still be proud of its orchestra." In degree Mr. Henderson, writing in The Herald, was like-minded:

> It is pleasant to be able to say that in some respects the orchestra sounded better than last season. Only a few new players were in the ranks, but none the less the general quality of tone, and especially that of the strings, was improved. The improvement was not as astonishing as Boston recorders would have us believe, but it was distinctly discernible. The wood wind and the brass are substantially the same.
>
> The performance of the Sibelius symphony was vigorous and sonorous. It was not notable for finish or transparency, but it had the rude strength of the north and it voiced the moods of the work well. The slow movement was particularly well played and received that discriminating applause for which Boston Symphony audiences here are noted.

Finally, in The World, Mr. Huneker wrote with a word about individuals in the band;

> The band, under the skilled beat of Pierre Monteux, is a better one than last season for reasons too numerous to mention just now. There is a new concert-master, Mr. Burgin, but the demon drummer who stuns the tympani into submission is still to be heard in Central Park. It was good to see again the face of an old friend beloved by New York music-lovers, Alwin Schroeder, who is still at the first desk of the violoncellists. The great artist of the oboe, who blows pastoral landscapes and Watteau garlanded gardens, sighing swains and melting shepherdesses through his tiny reed, Georges Longy, is at his old post, and there are other familiar faces among the various choirs.
>
> The chief thing, however, is that as an instrument the orchestra is more homogeneous in tone, swifter and more sensitive in its repsonse to Mr. Monteux's baton. That gentleman conducted with unusual fire, and if on his orchestral palette the colors sometimes ran and blurred it should be set down to the tension of a first night. The massed tone of the strings is satisfying in euphony and concrete quality, and there was a splendid sonorousness in the brass wind. Color was palpably aimed at and color, not linean effect, nor the traceries in a delicate tonal pattern.

Mr. Hill and Poe

For the matinée on Saturday Mr. Monteux set on the programme Enesco's symphony, Mr. Hill's new tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," Pierné's orchestral arrangement of Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue and Berlioz's overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini." The reviewer for The Times was engaged elsewhere and gave his readers only a bare record of the concert; while Mr. Krehbiel and Mr. Huneker in The Tribune and The World respectively wrote chiefly of the music in hand and of Mr. Hill's tone-poem. "He is," says Mr. Huneker, "a stickler for form, and we recall an excellent overture of his. This poem, he tells us 'approaches structurally the abridged sonata form,' while the atmosphere, not the incidents of Poe's famous tale, is aimed at. This atmosphere is missing, though the abridged sonata form is not. The composition could have been as easily called 'The Fall of the House of Haig' or Dewar as Usher. It is well made, rather thinly orchestrated, and the imaginative element is not the prime factor. What the unfortunate young American, Griffes, evoked in 'The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan'—first played here by Pierre Monteux—Mr. Hill lacks the power to equal, that is, to make both a picture and a mood. And he is obsessed with the clever celesta episode at the close of 'The Rose-Cavalier.' A pretty effect it is—in Strauss's opera. Mr. Hill's poem was amply applauded, and like Enesco's symphony adequately interpreted."

"It is descriptive music," writes Mr. Krehbiel in The Tribune of the tone-poem, "but in the intention of the composer a delineation of moods, which he found in Poe's story, with intentional realism of the picturesque characters only in the sonorous climax and end, which was built upon the phrases of emotions which had served their psychological purpose earlier. They did not show in the ruin which they were designed at last to depict, but disclosed themselves, there, as we thought, in their highest potency. The thematic material did not seem very pregnant, but it was at least plastic, and Mr. Hill showed ingenuity and learning in his moulding of it. The instrumentation was colorful, but a somewhat excessive use of the tintinabulating celesta led even superficial hearers to think of Strauss's marvelously successful device of sprinkling harmonic dew in "Rosenkavalier" and to that extent diminished Mr. Hill's claim to originality. But to make original use of celesta tones is about as difficult a task nowadays as to create a sensation with a harp glissando."

TRANS. NOV. 8.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

EVA GAUTHIER IN NEW LIGHTS AT CAMBRIDGE

Donizetti, Chinese Mother-Goose and the Symphony Orchestra — George Fergusson, Better with Programme Than Song —A Young Italian in Chicago—Mozart and Mme. Hempel—"Petrouchka" from Mr. Monteux—Other Impending Pleasures

TWO pieces by American composers stood on the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert in Cambridge — Edward Burlingame Hill's "The Fall of the House of Usher," recently played in Boston and New York, and Bainbridge Crist's set of songs from the Chinese Mother Goose, sung by Mme. Eva Gauthier. In the many comments that have been made on Mr. Hill's new tone-poem there appears to have been nearly unanimous opinion that he has failed to communicate in his music the exact spirit of Poe's tale, that he has been unable to translate into tone its atmosphere of boding and horror. But in all justice to Mr. Hill, could he do otherwise than fail? It has more than once been said that the function of music is to idealize and transfigure, that the expression of evil is inimical to its very nature. We know that Wagner failed with Mime and Verdi with Iago. Certain terrifying effects are possible in music—especially in opera, where the action necessarily aids—but they are achieved through specific "shuddery" effects—string tremolos, dissonant harmony, chromatic scales, muted horns, ominous beatings of the bass drum, and similar paraphernalia. As proof that the atmosphere of horror can be thus created and sustained we have only to turn to the second act of "Tosca." But a symphonic piece cannot be moulded from such material, and Mr. Hill is too good a musician to attempt such a thing. His music seizes on whatever in Poe's story is really available for its purpose and gives it fitting expression. For the rest, the tale and the music remain distinct and apart.

In their original version for voice and piano, Mr. Crist's quaintly fanciful settings of these Chinese rhymes have been made known to us by Mr. Werrenrath and others. Last season Mme. Gauthier sang them in an arrangement for "chamber-orchestra," according to the present fashion. If we are not mistaken, the performance was the first in which a full orchestral accompaniment was used. At first blush it might seem that here was an invasion of the traditional dignity of the Symphony Concerts, but the audience received the songs with open arms. Mr. Crist's music was its own justification, and Mme. Gauthier is to be thanked for her courage in singing it. Two numbers of the set, a little more broadly farcical than the others, were omitted. Last night we had "Lady-Bug," "Baby is Sleeping," "What the Old Cow Said," "Of What Use Is a Girl?" and "The Mouse." Mr. Crist's instrumentation enhances the point and wit of his musical settings; there is an ingenious use of Oriental coloring. The reference to the North Wind in the song of the Cow gave the composer opportunity for a miniature tempest in which the voice of the singer was for a moment lost, but the air soon cleared. Mr. Crist was fortunate in such an interpreter for his songs as Mme. Gauthier; they were sung musically and tactfully, yet with full appreciation of their humor.

Was it to prove that her devotion to the moderns does not debar her from singing music of the old Italian school that induced Mme. Gauthier to sing an aria from Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia"? If it was, she gained her point. Her performance of this antiquated piece was brilliant in the extreme and conspicuous for tonal beauty. It was a bit of a shock to hear in the opening measures of the aria the first phrase of Rossini's "Quis est Homo." But whether or not Rossini stole it, he improved upon it. Mr. Runciman once wrote of the "stream of brackish water that daily flowed from Donizetti's pen." If the other music of "Lucrezia Borgia" is as glaringly inappropriate to the dramatic situation, let us hope that the opera will not be revived for Mme. Galli-Curci.

Pieces from recent Boston programmes filled the remainder of the concert—for beginning Sibelius's vivid and vital Symphony in E minor, for conclusionn Beethoven's puissant Overture to "Leonore," No. 3. The comment of Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, quoted in the programme book, that Sibelius "has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vasty open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew," seemed singularly apt last evening. In the smaller auditorium the symphony seemed cramped and constrained. If ever music suggested space and cries for it, it is this. W. S. S.

Items and Announcements

Two weeks hence at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 19 and 20, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play a suite drawn from Stravinsky's celebrated ballet, "Petrouchka." Unless recollection slips, none of the music has yet been heard in America outside the theatre. Years ago in Paris Mr. Monteux ventured the whole ballet as a concert-piece and then learned that many measures are so intertwined with the action upon the stage as to be without substance or meaning elsewhere. With this acquired wisdom he and Stravinsky have now assembled a suite from such parts of the music as speak for themselves in either concert-hall or theatre. Since no opera company and no ballet ministers to Boston, only from the Symphony Orchestra may we hear Stravinsky's music.

TRANS. NOV. 12.

[43]

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

NEW MUSIC, LIKED MUSIC AND PROBLEM

The Conductor's Dilemma with Repetitions—As Malipiero Sounds in a Recent Set of "Impressions"—A Faithful Young Violinist — Parisian "Ultra-Moderns" — Mr. Hofmann in English Ears — Paderewski Abandons the Piano

AT the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, Respighi's tone-poem "Fountains of Rome," pleased the audience no less than it did on Friday afternoon. It is hard to remember when a new symphonic piece has sounded so agreeably in almost every ear or won such hearty and spontaneous plaudits. As some said, not since the first days of Mr. Carpenter's sportive suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," had the listening company given so many signs of general and particular satisfaction. It is three or four years since the American's music was so received in Boston from Mr. Damrosch and Dr. Muck. Alike from this reception and from intrinsic desert, the inference ran that it would become a repertory piece to be heard, as occasion proffered, in subsequent seasons. Yet, as matter of fact, "Adventures in a Perambulator" has not once been repeated, while it is quite within the range of probability that "Fountains of Rome" will never return to the Symphony Concerts. For a composer with his way to make in symphonic music, it is accounted high good fortune to have one or another of his pieces accepted and played by discriminating conductors. Yet how much more signal would be his happy state, did they ever repeat it after it has plainly proved merit and as certainly pleased the public!

The conditions working to this undesirable end are not far to seek. Every conductor of symphony concerts is expected in the course of a season to traverse by sample the classics from Bach and Händel through Brahms, Wagner and Franck. He is expected likewise to do his duty by the established moderns like Strauss or Debussy, Ravel or Rimsky-Korsakov. Furthermore, he is bound to produce sundry unheard pieces by the composers of our own time and even to effect a revival or two from the ancients. At the same time his programmes must not be too long; while as often as not "assisting artists" devour his hour-and-three-quarters without scruple. He knows as well as the rest of us that such music as "Adventures in a Perambulator" or "Fountains of Rome" or Mr. Griffes's tone-poem of Kubla-Khan deserve repetition and would pleasure hearers. Yet how, between these other pressures, is he to find room for them? He hopes, he defers, he plans and re-plans, but somehow the desired opportunity seldom comes. And with every year, as the sum of playable and desirable music waxes, this problem of repetition becomes more difficult of solution. In the programme-book of last week as appendix to the note on Mr. Strube's new Preludes stood a list of his pieces previously heard "at these concerts." Not a few deserved repetition, yet very few have received it. To run down the table was like a cursory survey of memorial-stones. The problem remains—the problem. Yet if one dared suggest less performances of classics of the second order, how the upholders of the good, the true and the beautiful—if only it be fifty or a hundred years old—would claw and scream. H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 15.

Monteux's New Music

The orchestral novelty of the Symphony Concerts this week is Ravel's Suite, "The Tomb of Couperin," originally published for the piano and subsequently arranged for orchestra by the composer. At least in music, new wine can sometimes be put into old bottles; and that is what Ravel has accomplished in this Suite. The four pieces—Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon—are all in the manner, as the 20th century may imitate it of Couperin and Rameau. The Forlane is a dance of Italian origin not often encountered; it runs in six-eight time and is as the indication Allegretto suggests, of a graceful character. The other pieces need no comment. Ravel's harmony is modern, but with a strongly diatonic cast, and nowhere is he very far from the spirit of his models. His orchestral requirements are modest: two flutes, an oboe and English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, one trumpet, harp and strings—practically the orchestra of Mozart, yet the scoring is that of today. In short, the Suite is adroit, charming music that should give immediate pleasure.

Another new piece—or rather series of pieces—will also be heard, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra, with verse by Witter Bynner, music by Daniel Gregory Mason and Mr. Werrenrath as singer. When he sang them in New York with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last winter, Mr. Spaeth wrote the following note about the songs for The Transcript:

> Mr. Bynner's poems, if they can be called such, are couched in the colloquial, conversational style that made the horrors of his "Tiger" so realistic. As in that play, a vein of sardonic humor runs through most of them, something not easily caught in musical terms. The series, which appeared originally in the Metropolitan Magazine, describes in the first person the sensations of a Drunkard, a Concertina-Player, a Revolutionary, a Boy and a Prophet.
>
> Mr. Mason has attempted only here and there to suggest a definite Russian atmosphere in his music for these free-hand sketches. The Russian quality is most marked in the second and third songs. The second ("The Concertina-Player") in particular is built upon a theme which might easily be an actual Russian folk-song, and treated somewhat in the manner of Chaikovsky, with an occasional hint of Musorgsky himself. The aimless wandering of the tramp musician sounds perhaps in the monotonous bass, and the whimsicalities of the monologue are fairly closely followed in the declaration, particularly at the end, when the musician proudly offers this delicious testimony of his powers: "I often play for beggars, and they pay me!"
>
> "The Drunkard" is remarkable chiefly for the cruelly high range of the vocal part. Here the text cries out for a rollicking tune of the folk type, with more regard for rhythmic individuality than accuracy of declamation. "The Revolutionary" has much national atmosphere, but the text suffers from such trite phrases as "Nothing has hurt like your misunderstanding me," and "It would not be so hard." There is a solemn, almost gloomy mood here, which contrasts with the rest of Mr. Mason's music. "A Boy" is picturesque and imaginative, containing the lightest and happiest touches of the series, both in words and in music, yet less significant than some of the others in actual content.
>
> Mr. Bynner saved his flamboyant satire for the final poem, "A Prophet." In this burlesque of religious fanaticism, he makes his hero, after commanding universal suicide in preparation for the end of the world, utter this unique farewell:
>
> I take my leave of you, I lead the way,
> Hand me the rope, make sure the noose
> will slip,
> Forgive me if I have not saved your souls,
> And I forgive you for not listening.
> My mother I forgive for bearing me,
> My father for begetting me,
> Mankind for being like me.
> So farewell! Receive me, God!
>
> Mr. Mason revels in the opportunities for realistic suggestion in these lines, as well as in the preceding details of "the knife, the gun ,the rope," and he hangs his prophet finally with a musical timing of the drop worthy of a Berlioz or a Strauss. Technically this music, like most of the rest, is an impressive feat. A close analysis might disclose the fact that Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation has more to do with the success of the cycle than the work of either poet or composer.

TRANS. NOV. 18

NEW WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Reinald Werrenrath Is Soloist at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Jordan Hall, and he sang a cycle of songs, "Russians," by Daniel Gregory, heard for the first time in this city. Ravel's music, originally composed for piano, and now orchestrated, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," was played for the first time in America.

A little known symphony of Mozart in C major (Kochel No. [illegible]) opened the programme and an amazing performance of Enesco's A major Roumanian Rhapsody brought it to a close.

[illegible] WERRENRATH'S SINGING

[illegible] Werrenrath gave proof [illegible] remarkable talent, his intelligence, musicianship, his mastery of [illegible] which has become more [illegible] year. The songs of Mr. Mason could hardly have had a more [illegible] poetic, appreciative, enthusiastic interpretation. Fortunate the composer with such an artist to present his music to the public! Unfortunate the public which has to listen to such deadly music by a composer!

The audience applauded Mr. Werrenrath very warmly. He would have had an even greater success with better material.

For Small Orchestra

Mozart's symphony was played by an orchestra reduced in numbers [illegible] be more in consonance with [illegible] instrumentation and style, and the experiment was very successful. [illegible] tors of orchestral concerts in large [illegible] hesitate to reduce a modern [illegible] orchestra, admittedly too [illegible] thick for the fineness and trans[illegible] of Mozart's scoring, because [illegible] the tone will be lost in the large [illegible] torium. It did not prove so [illegible] The performance was as admirable [illegible] was effective, and the symphony [illegible] be heard more often.

It may not be the "Jupiter" [illegible] which is in the same key. It [illegible] equal the great three symphonies [illegible] Mozart wrote and which are [illegible] over and over again—the "Jupiter" [illegible] the symphonies in G minor [illegible] Nevertheless Mozart did write [illegible] phonies than those three, [illegible] everything Mozart wrote [illegible] genius in it to warrant [illegible] C major symphony heard [illegible] delightful work, as it was played.

POST NOV

POST

Washington, D. C.

OCT 10

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Programme

Having completed the first southern trip, which occupied last week and which was marked by brilliantly successful concerts in each city of its travels, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Pierre Monteux has compiled an unusually interesting programme, to begin with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor. He will also conduct the first performances of "Four Preludes for Orchestra," by Gustave Strube, the noted composer, who was once a member of the orchestra, and, for another novelty, a symphonic poem by the Italian composer, Resphigi, which describes four of the fountains of Rome, as follows: The fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn; the Triton fountain at morn; the fountain of Trevi at midday; the Villa Medici fountain at sunset. The brilliant closing number will be Richard Strauss' fantastic work, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Pension Fund Programme

No orchestral score is more dazzling, and magnificent in oriental coloring than "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is to be the feature of the Symphony concert to be given next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30 o'clock in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. This music describes the following events from the Arabian Nights: I.—The Sea and Sinbad's Ship; II.—The Story of the Kalander-Prince; III.—The Young Prince and the Young Princess; IV.—Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior; Conclusion. Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert Saint-Saens' striking symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." A soloist soon to be announced will make the concert the more eventful.

POST NOV. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Brahms' Fourth Symphony, which has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons, will be the feature of the program. "Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, and a symphonic poem by the young Italian composer, Respighi, will be the novelties. Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," will also be played.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

No orchestral score is richer in Oriental coloring than "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which is to be the feature of the Symphony concert to be given next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall, in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi." A soloist will also appear.

ADVERTISER NOV. 7

AN ORCHESTRA RENEWED

NEW METTLE OF THE BOSTON BAND

Praise for It in New York and Other Cities Such as It Has Not Received in Three Years—Signs of Regained Audiences and Returning Prestige Through the Concerts of Last Week—Mr. Hill's New Tone-Poem as Various Reviewers Heard It

SINCE the days of Dr. Muck the Boston Orchestra has not been so well received upon any journey southward as it was through the "trip" of last week. As usual, it gave one concert in Philadelphia, one in Washington, one in Baltimore, one in Brooklyn and two in New York. In all five cities, whatever the programme, the audiences gave every sign of pleasure, while the reviewers in the newspapers were as hearty in applause. In Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn these audiences are rising toward former numbers and quality. In New York, while there are still empty places in Carnegie Hall, the orchestra is already holding a substantial public, and regaining its prestige of old. Moreover, in every city visited, and especially in New York, the listeners were quick to discover the new mettle of the band and to speak and write accordingly. Those who had held faithful through the decline of the orchestra under Rabaud and Fradkin and the misfortunes besetting it at the end of last season, found new reason for their faith; while those who have recently belittled it and mistrusted the effort of Mr. Monteux, the trustees and the management to regain former standards had reason to revise their opinions. In New York, in particular, the newspapers with almost one voice bear witness to this change of view.

For the first of the two concerts on Thursday evening last, the programme comprised Sibelius's symphony in E minor, Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy"—all pieces heard in Boston last month and well exhibiting the present powers of orchestra and conductor. Of them Mr. Aldrich wrote in The Times:

> The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made its first visit of the season to New York and given its first concert in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra showed many new faces as a result of the reorganization it has undergone since its troubles of last spring; the list of players printed in the programme-book contains a much larger proportion of Anglo-Saxon names than have appeared in its roster before, or in those of most orchestras that play in New York. The playing of the orchestra was such as to give pleasure to its friends. The tone of the whole organization is improved and has mellowed; the tone of the strings in particular is finer. There are many youthful faces among the string players; and while they may not represent the quality of Berlioz's "Young Lions of the Conservatory," they may be expected to go farther. There is still something for Mr. Monteux to do in refining and polishing his performances, but he had to begin on an organization largely new. It takes time, but meanwhile it has been made evident that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not extinct.

In The Tribune and also in review of this first concert, Mr. Krehbiel remarked: "Under Mr. Monteux's direction the men from Boston, almost completely rehabilitated in their long maintained excellence, gave a fine account of themselves. The string band, with its new leader, Mr. Burgin, is a splendid body, its tone full and elastic. Boston may still be proud of its orchestra." In degree Mr. Henderson, writing in The Herald, was like-minded:

> It is pleasant to be able to say that in some respects the orchestra sounded better than last season. Only a few new players were in the ranks, but none the less the general quality of tone, and especially that of the strings, was improved. The improvement was not as astonishing as Boston recorders would have us believe, but it was distinctly discernible. The wood wind and the brass are substantially the same.
>
> The performance of the Sibelius symphony was vigorous and sonorous. It was not notable for finish or transparency, but it had the rude strength of the north and it voiced the moods of the work well. The slow movement was particularly well played and received that discriminating applause for which Boston Symphony audiences here are noted.

Finally, in The World, Mr. Huneker wrote with a word about individuals in the band:

> The band, under the skilled beat of Pierre Monteux, is a better one than last season for reasons too numerous to mention just now. There is a new concert-master, Mr. Burgin, but the demon drummer who stuns the tympani into submission is still to be heard in Central Park. It was good to see again the face of an old friend beloved by New York music-lovers, Alwin Schroeder, who is still at the first desk of the violoncellists. The great artist of the oboe, who blows pastoral landscapes and Watteau garlanded gardens, sighing swains and melting shepherdesses through his tiny reed, Georges Longy, is at his old post, and there are other familiar faces among the various choirs.
>
> The chief thing, however, is that as an instrument the orchestra is more homogeneous in tone, swifter and more sensitive in its repsonse to Mr. Monteux's baton. That gentleman conducted with unusual fire, and if on his orchestral palette the colors sometimes ran and blurred it should be set down to the tension of a first night. The massed tone of the strings is satisfying in euphony and concrete quality, and there was a splendid sonorousness in the brass wind. Color was palpably aimed at and color, not linean effect, nor the traceries in a delicate tonal pattern.

Mr. Hill and Poe

For the matinée on Saturday Mr. Monteux set on the programme Enesco's symphony, Mr. Hill's new tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," Pierné's orchestral arrangement of Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue and Berlioz's overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini." The reviewer for The Times was engaged elsewhere and gave his readers only a bare record of the concert; while Mr. Krehbiel and Mr. Huneker in The Tribune and The World respectively wrote chiefly of the music in hand and of Mr. Hill's tone-poem. "He is," says Mr. Huneker, "a stickler for form, and we recall an excellent overture of his. This poem, he tells us 'approaches structurally the abridged sonata form,' while the atmosphere, not the incidents of Poe's famous tale, is aimed at. This atmosphere is missing, though the abridged sonata form is not. The composition could have been as easily called 'The Fall of the House of Haig' or Dewar as Usher. It is well made, rather thinly orchestrated, and the imaginative element is not the prime factor. What the unfortunate young American, Griffes, evoked in 'The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan'—first played here by Pierre Monteux—Mr. Hill lacks the power to equal, that is, to make both a picture and a mood. And he is obsessed with the clever celesta episode at the close of 'The Rose-Cavalier.' A pretty effect it is—in Strauss's opera. Mr. Hill's poem was amply applauded, and like Enesco's symphony adequately interpreted."

"It is descriptive music," writes Mr. Krehbiel in The Tribune of the tone-poem, but in the intention of the composer a delineation of moods, which he found in Poe's story, with intentional realism of the picturesque characters only in the sonorous climax and end, which was built upon the phrases of emotions which had served their psychological purpose earlier. They did not show in the ruin which they were designed at last to depict, but disclosed themselves, there, as we thought, in their highest potency. The thematic material did not seem very pregnant, but it was at least plastic, and Mr. Hill showed ingenuity and learning in his moulding of it. The instrumentation was colorful, but a somewhat excessive use of the tintinabulating celesta led even superficial hearers to think of Strauss's marvelously successful device of sprinkling harmonic dew in "Rosenkavalier" and to that extent diminished Mr. Hill's claim to originality. But to make original use of celesta tones is about as difficult a task nowadays as to create a sensation with a harp glissando."

TRANS. NOV. 8.

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

EVA GAUTHIER IN NEW LIGHTS AT CAMBRIDGE

Donizetti, Chinese Mother-Goose and the Symphony Orchestra — George Ferguson, Better with Programme Than Song —A Young Italian in Chicago—Mozart and Mme. Hempel—"Petrouchka" from Mr. Monteux—Other Impending Pleasures

TWO pieces by American composers stood on the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert in Cambridge — Edward Burlingame Hill's "The Fall of the House of Usher," recently played in Boston and New York, and Bainbridge Crist's set of songs from the Chinese Mother Goose, sung by Mme. Eva Gauthier. In the many comments that have been made on Mr. Hill's new tone-poem there appears to have been nearly unanimous opinion that he has failed to communicate in his music the exact spirit of Poe's tale, that he has been unable to translate into tone its atmosphere of boding and horror. But in all justice to Mr. Hill, could he do otherwise than fail? It has more than once been said that the function of music is to idealize and transfigure, that the expression of evil is inimical to its very nature. We know that Wagner failed with Mime and Verdi with Iago. Certain terrifying effects are possible in music—especially in opera, where the action necessarily aids—but they are achieved through specific "shuddery" effects—string tremolos, dissonant harmony, chromatic scales, muted horns, ominous beatings of the bass drum, and similar paraphernalia. As proof that the atmosphere of horror can be thus created and sustained we have only to turn to the second act of "Tosca." But a symphonic piece cannot be moulded from such material, and Mr. Hill is too good a musician to attempt such a thing. His music seizes on whatever in Poe's story is really available for its purpose and gives it fitting expression. For the rest, the tale and the music remain distinct and apart.

In their original version for voice and piano, Mr. Crist's quaintly fanciful settings of these Chinese rhymes have been made known to us by Mr. Werrenrath and others. Last season Mme. Gauthier sang them in an arrangement for "chamber-orchestra," according to the present fashion. If we are not mistaken, the performance was the first in which a full orchestral accompaniment was used. At first blush it might seem that here was an invasion of the traditional dignity of the Symphony Concerts, but the audience received the songs with open arms. Mr. Crist's music was its own justification, and Mme. Gauthier is to be thanked for her courage in singing it. Two numbers of the set, a little more broadly farcical than the others, were omitted. Last night we had "Lady-Bug," "Baby is Sleeping," "What the Old Cow Said," "Of What Use Is a Girl?" and "The Mouse." Mr. Crist's instrumentation enhances the point and wit of his musical settings; there is an ingenious use of Oriental coloring. The reference to the North Wind in the song of the Cow gave the composer opportunity for a miniature tempest in which the voice of the singer was for a moment lost, but the air soon cleared. Mr. Crist was fortunate in such an interpreter for his songs as Mme. Gauthier; they were sung musically and tactfully, yet with full appreciation of their humor.

Was it to prove that her devotion to the moderns does not debar her from singing music of the old Italian school that induced Mme. Gauthier to sing an aria from Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia"? If it was, she gained her point. Her performance of this antiquated piece was brilliant in the extreme and conspicuous for tonal beauty. It was a bit of a shock to hear in the opening measures of the aria the first phrase of Rossini's "Quis est Homo." But whether or not Rossini stole it, he improved upon it. Mr. Runciman once wrote of the "stream of brackish water that daily flowed from Donizetti's pen." If the other music of "Lucrezia Borgia" is as glaringly inappropriate to the dramatic situation, let us hope that the opera will not be revived for Mme. Galli-Curci.

Pieces from recent Boston programmes filled the remainder of the concert—for beginning Sibelius's vivid and vital Symphony in E minor, for conclusionn Beethoven's puissant Overture to "Leonore," No. 3. The comment of Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, quoted in the programme book, that Sibelius "has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vasty open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew," seemed singularly apt last evening. In the smaller auditorium the symphony seemed cramped and constrained. If ever music suggested space and cries for it, it is this. W. S. S.

Items and Announcements

Two weeks hence at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 19 and 20, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play a suite drawn from Stravinsky's celebrated ballet, "Pétrouchka." Unless recollection slips, none of the music has yet been heard in America outside the theatre. Years ago in Paris Mr. Monteux ventured the whole ballet as a concert-piece and then learned that many measures are so intertwined with the action upon the stage as to be without substance or meaning elsewhere. With this acquired wisdom he and Stravinsky have now assembled a suite from such parts of the music as speak for themselves in either concert-hall or theatre. Since no opera company and no ballet ministers to Boston, only from the Symphony Orchestra may we hear Stravinsky's music.

TRANS. NOV. 12.

[43]

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

NEW MUSIC, LIKED MUSIC AND PROBLEM

The Conductor's Dilemma with Repet tions—As Malipiero Sounds in a Recen Set of "Impressions"—A Faithful Youn Violinist — Parisian "Ultra-Moderns" — Mr. Hofmann in English Ears — Pade rewski Abandons the Piano

AT the Symphony Concert of Saturda evening, Respighi's tone-poem "Fountains of Rome," pleased th audience no less than it did o Friday afternoon. It is hard to remembe when a new symphonic piece has sounde so agreeably in almost every ear or wo such hearty and spontaneous plaudits. A some said, not since the first days of Mr Carpenter's sportive suite, "Adventures i a Perambulator," had the listening com pany given so many signs of general and particular satisfaction. It is three or four years since the American's music was so received in Boston from Mr. Damrosch and Dr. Muck. Alike from this reception and from intrinsic desert, the inference ran that it would become a repertory piece to be heard, as occasion proffered, in subsequent seasons. Yet, as matter of fact, "Adventures in a Perambulator" has not once been repeated, while it is quite within the range of probability that "Fountains of Rome" will never return to the Symphony Concerts. For a composer with his way to make in symphonic music, it is accounted high good fortune to have one or another of his pieces accepted and played by discriminating conductors. Yet how much more signal would be his happy state, did they ever repeat it after it has plainly proved merit and as certainly pleased the public!

The conditions working to this undesirable end are not far to seek. Every conductor of symphony concerts is expected in the course of a season to traverse by sample the classics from Bach and Händel through Brahms, Wagner and Franck. He is expected likewise to do his duty by the established moderns like Strauss or Debussy, Ravel or Rimsky-Korsakov. Furthermore, he is bound to produce sundry unheard pieces by the composers of our own time and even to effect a revival or two from the ancients. At the same time his programmes must not be too long; while as often as not "assisting artists" devour his hour-and-three-quarters without scruple. He knows as well as the rest of us that such music as "Adventures in a Perambulator" or "Fountains of Rome" or Mr. Griffes's tone-poem of Kubla-Khan deserve repetition and would pleasure hearers. Yet how, between these other pressures, is he to find room for them? He hopes, he defers, he plans and re-plans, but somehow the desired opportunity seldom comes. And with every year, as the sum of playable and desirable music waxes, this problem of repetition becomes more difficult of solution. In the programme-book of last week as appendix to the note on Mr. Strube's new Preludes stood a list of his pieces previously heard "at these concerts." Not a few deserved repetition, yet very few have received it. To run down the table was like a cursory survey of memorial-stones. The problem remains—the problem. Yet if one dared suggest less performances of classics of the second order, how the upholders of the good, the true and the beautiful—if only it be fifty or a hundred years old—would claw and scream. H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 15

Monteux's New Music

The orchestral novelty of the Symphony Concerts this week is Ravel's Suite, "The Tomb of Couperin," originally published for the piano and subsequently arranged for orchestra by the composer. At least in music, new wine can sometimes be put into old bottles; and that is what Ravel has accomplished in this Suite. The four pieces—Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon—are all in the manner, as the 20th century may imitate it of Couperin and Rameau. The Forlane is a dance of Italian origin not often encountered; it runs in six-eight time and is as the indication Allegretto suggests, of a graceful character. The other pieces need no comment. Ravel's harmony is modern, but with a strongly diatonic cast, and nowhere is he very far from the spirit of his models. His orchestral requirements are modest: two flutes, an oboe and English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, one trumpet, harp and strings—practically the orchestra of Mozart, yet the scoring is that of today. In short, the Suite is adroit, charming music that should give immediate pleasure.

Another new piece—or rather series of pieces—will also be heard, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra, with verse by Witter Bynner, music by Daniel Gregory Mason and Mr. Werrenrath as singer. When he sang them in New York with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last winter, Mr. Spaeth wrote the following note about the songs for The Transcript:

> Mr. Bynner's poems, if they can be called such, are couched in the colloquial, conversational style that made the horrors of his "Tiger" so realistic. As in that play, a vein of sardonic humor runs through most of them, something not easily caught in musical terms. The series, which appeared originally in the Metropolitan Magazine, describes in the first person the sensations of a Drunkard, a Concertina-Player, a Revolutionary, a Boy and a Prophet.
>
> Mr. Mason has attempted only here and there to suggest a definite Russian atmosphere in his music for these free-hand sketches. The Russian quality is most marked in the second and third songs. The second ("The Concertina-Player") in particular is built upon a theme which might easily be an actual Russian folk-song, and treated somewhat in the manner of Chaikovsky, with an occasional hint of Musorgsky himself. . . . The aimless wandering of the tramp musician sounds perhaps in the monotonous bass, and the whimsicalities of the monologue are fairly closely followed in the declaration, particularly at the end, when the musician proudly offers this delicious testimony of his powers: "I often play for beggars, and they pay me!"
>
> "The Drunkard" is remarkable chiefly for the cruelly high range of the vocal part. Here the text cries out for a rollicking tune of the folk type, with more regard for rhythmic individuality than accuracy of declamation. "The Revolutionary" has much national atmosphere, but the text suffers from such trite phrases as "Nothing has hurt like your misunderstanding me," and "It would not be so hard." There is a solemn, almost gloomy mood here, which contrasts with the rest of Mr. Mason's music. "A Boy" is picturesque and imaginative, containing the lightest and happiest touches of the series, both in words and in music, yet less significant than some of the others in actual content.
>
> Mr. Bynner saved his flamboyant satire for the final poem, "A Prophet." In this burlesque of religious fanaticism, he makes his hero, after commanding universal suicide in preparation for the end of the world, utter this unique farewell:
>
> I take my leave of you, I lead the way,
> Hand me the rope, make sure the noose
> will slip,
> Forgive me if I have not saved your souls.
> And I forgive you for not listening.
> My mother I forgive for bearing me,
> My father for begetting me,
> Mankind for being like me.
> So farewell! Receive me, God!
>
> Mr. Mason revels in the opportunities for realistic suggestion in these lines, as well as in the preceding details of "the knife, the gun ,the rope," and he hangs his prophet finally with a musical timing of the drop worthy of a Berlioz or a Strauss. Technically this music, like most of the rest, is an impressive feat. A close analysis might disclose the fact that Mr. Werrenrath's interpretation has more to do with the success of the cycle than the work of either poet or composer.

NOV. 18

NEW WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Reinald Werrenrath Is Soloist at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Jordan Hall, and he sang a cycle of songs, "Russia," by Daniel Gregory, heard for the first time in this city. Ravel's suite, originally composed for piano, and now orchestrated, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," was played for the first time in America.

A little known symphony of Mozart in C major (Kochel No. opened the programme and an amazing performance of Enesco's A major Roumanian Rhapsody brought it to a close.

MR. WERRENRATH'S SINGI

Werrenrath gave proof again of his remarkable talent, his intellig his musicianship, his mastery of voice which has become more each year. The songs of Mr. Mason hardly have had a more sym pathetic, appreciative, enthusiastic terpretation. Fortunate the composer with such an artist to present his w to public! Unfortunate the pu who has to listen to such deadly music by a composer!

The audience applauded Mr. Werrenrath very warmly. He would have an even greater success with better material.

For Small Orchestra

Mozart's symphony was played by orchestra reduced in numbers be more in consonance with instrumentation and style, and the periment was very successful. Conductors of orchestral concerts in large hesitate to reduce a modern orchestra, admittedly too heavy thick for the fineness and trans of Mozart's scoring, because the tone will be lost in the large torium. It did not prove so The performance was as admirable was effective, and the symphony be heard more often.

It may not be the "Jupiter" which is in the same key. It equal the great three symphonies Mozart wrote and which over and over again—the "Jupiter" the symphonies in G minor Nevertheless Mozart did write phonies than those three, and everything Mozart wrote has genius in it to warrant a C major symphony heard yes delightful work, as it was played.

is hard t ween Ravel our movem
"Le Tomb war, and b whom he ha ements. Of four the Menuet is grave
y. The other dances a orous and li e miraci skill.
e more one hears of Ra marvels at the versa
d, his almost magical fact that he never rep
his music, seeming inva emely well the particu himself. Here we ha t archaic "Prelude," nuet" and "Rigaudon.
there is irony; there is ployment of extremely d vals and harmonies w them with incredibly Modern in harmonic ic never steps out of d frame, and at times ghts of rare and haun
h are the beauties of ospective "Menuet" and ting middle section of ," the section in which solo was delivered w le art.

Really Heard for Fir

Finally, there was such ce of Enesco's Rumania had not been heard inted at at these conce
ler, had played the piece had even gone on "Pop" had seemed very long, w t contrast or developm
s, its folktunes.
Yesterday it was coheren
elopment, exhilarating, addening, if you like, in gree. It is real peasant Roumanian folk-music, have a Slavic twist a ll appear to come from fa Persia or Turkey, let u revel becomes always wilde primitive energy and aban music seizes everyone, as wild dancers in ano
Then there is the orchest most intriguing, exciting, orchestration, which sets off genuis the musical ideas.
Enesco's music had been fore at these concerts: it for the first time yesterday, deserving by Mr. Monteux a was the audience's tribute, only to an individual perfor for the wonderful way in conductor is developing the

POST NOV

POST
Address: Washington, D

The Boston Symphony O
which is to give five concert
New National Theater during ing fortieth season the follow Tuesday evenings, November vember 30, January 4, Februar
March 15, with Mesdames Hel ley and Hulda Lashanska, and Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti a Dohnanyi as soloists, perfor opening concerts in Boston day and Saturday with brillia cess.
Pierre Monteux, the conduct the illustrious orchestra wh in full ranks under him, were with one accord. The only ne this season among the leaders various sections is Richard the concert master, who recen rived after his long voyage fro rn Europe, in which part world he is considered to be one count, the finest concert

STAR, OCT 10
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony.

Boston Symphony Orches
concerts at the Ne Theater during its season on Tuesday
r 2, November 30, Janu
y 1 and March 15, with Hulda Lashanska and Jean Bedetti and Erno soloists.
Monteux is the conduct newcomer this season s of the various secti Burgin, the concert m ntly arrived after a long eastern Europe.
n parentage and a nat
Mr. Burgin's training ce largely in Russia career has been co conditions in the ea Finland and Scandi teacher was Lotti, an ous teacher Leopold
t Petrograd, he st

[illegible] fairly closely followed ration, particularly as the the musician proudly offers us testimony of his powers:
play for beggars, and they Drunkard" is remarkable the cruelly high range of part. Here the text cries rollicking tune of the folk more regard for rhythmic ty than accuracy of decla-

"The Revolutionary" has tional atmosphere, but the s from such trite phrases as has hurt like your misun-g me," and "It would not be There is a solemn, almost mood here, which contrasts rest of Mr. Mason's music.
is picturesque and imaginataining the lightest and hapches of the series, both in l in music, yet less significant e of the others in actual con-ynner saved his flamboyant

the final poem, "A Prophet," burlesque of religious fanati-makes his hero, after com-universal suicide in prepara-he end of the world, utter this arewell:
y leave of you, I lead the way,
the rope, make sure the noose slip,
ne if I have not saved your souls,
rgive you for not listening,
er I forgive for bearing me,
r for begetting me,
for being like me.
ell! Receive me, God!

son revels in the opportunities listic suggestion in these lines, as in the preceding details of ife, the gun, the rope," and he is prophet finally with a musi-ning of the drop worthy of a or a Strauss. Technically this like most of the rest, is an ime feat. A close analysis might the fact that Mr. Werrenrath's etation has more to do with the of the cycle than the work of poet or composer.

ANS. NOV. 18

W WORK LAYED BY SYMPHONY

nald Werrenrath Is Soloist at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

ald Werrenrath, bariton oloist at the concert given b oston Symphony Orchestr Monteux conductor, yeste ternoon in Jordan Hall, a g a cycle of songs, "Russi niel Gregory, heard for me in this city. Ravel's s ally composed for piano, rchestrated, "Le Tombeau rin," was played for the n America.
ittle known symphony
t in C major (Kochel No.
d the programme and ng performance of Ene
ajor Roumanian Rhap
t it to a close.

WERRENRATH'S SING

Werrenrath gave proof a arkable talent, his intell cianship, his mastery which has become more
The songs of Mr.
have had a more appreciative, enthusias Fortunate the co an artist to present hi ic! Unfortunate the to listen to such dea
by a composer!
audience applauded Mr.
ery warmly. He would ha
n greater success with bett

For Small Orchestra

art's symphony was played stra reduced in numbers so ore in consonance with Mo
mentation and style, and th ent was very successful. Co f orchestral concerts in larg te to reduce a modern sym stra, admittedly too heavy for the fineness and transpa zart's scoring, because th one will be lost in the l
m. It did not prove so erformance was as admi
ffective, and the symph ard more often.
ay not be the "Jupiter"
is in the same key.
the great three symph wrote and which and over again—the "
[illegible] in G minor [illegible] art did write [illegible] three.

[illegible] to understand the rela[illegible] ween Ravel's dedication of a suite four movements in the ancient man-, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with e war, and brave comrades who died, whom he has dedicated the different ovements. Of the four movements, nly the Menuet is grave and melanholy. The other dances are lively and umorous and little miracles of genius nd skill.

The more one hears of Ravel the more e marvels at the versatility of his mind, his almost magical technic, and he fact that he never repeats himself n his music, seeming invariably to do extremely well the particular task he ets himself. Here we have a seme-what archaic "Prelude," "Forlane," "Menuet" and "Rigaudon." There is wit; there is irony; there is the wanton employment of extremely dissonant intervals and harmonies which result from them with incredibly piquant effect. Modern in harmonic texture, the music never steps out of its old-fashioned frame, and at times it rises to heights of rare and haunting beauty.
Such are the beauties of the sad and retrospective "Menuet" and of the captivating middle section of the "Rigaudon," the section in which Mr. Longy's oboe solo was delivered with incomparable art.

Really Heard for First Time

Finally, there was such a performance of Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody as had not been heard or scarcely hinted at at these concerts. Muck, Fiedler, had played the piece repeatedly. It had even gone on "Pop" programme. It had seemed very long, without sufficient contrast or development of its ideas, its folktunes.

Yesterday it was coherent in its development, exhilarating, intoxicating, maddening, if you like, in the highest degree. It is real peasant music, and like Roumanian folk-music, one theme will have a Slavic twist and another will appear to come from farther away, from Persia or Turkey, let us say. The revel becomes always wilder, and the primitive energy and abandon of the music seizes everyone, as it would seize wild dancers in another land. Then there is the orchestration, the most intriguing, exciting, provocative orchestration, which sets off with sheer genius the musical ideas.

Enesco's music had been played before at these concerts: it was heard for the first time yesterday, and amply deserving by Mr. Monteux and his men was the audience's tribute, tribute not only to an individual performance, but for the wonderful way in which this conductor is developing the orchestra.

POST. NOV 20,

From POST
Address: Washington, D.C.
Date Oct 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts at the New National Theater during its coming fortieth season the following five Tuesday evenings, November 3, November 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15, with Mesdames Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska, and Messrs. Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists, performed its opening concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday with brilliant success.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and the illustrious orchestra which sat in full ranks under him, were praised with one accord. The only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master, who recently arrived after his long voyage from eastern Europe, in which part of the world he is considered to be, by a long count, the finest concert master.

STAR, OCT 10 1920 L
Washington, D.C.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts at the New National Theater during its coming fortieth season on Tuesday evenings November 2, November 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15, with Helen Stanley, Hulda Lashanska and Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists.

Pierre Monteux is the conductor and the only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master, who recently arrived after a long voyage from eastern Europe.

Of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has taken place largely in Russia, and part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the east of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. His first teacher was Lotti, and his most famous teacher Leopold Auer, with whom in Petrograd, he studied four years.

From Public Ledger EVENING
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 16 1920 M

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in the Academy of Music on November 1, November 29, January 3, January 31 and March 14, opened its fortieth season with notable success in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, October 8-9.

From AMERICAN OCT 17 1920 M
Baltimore, Md.

In Symphony Hall, Boston, October 8 and 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts at the Lyric Theater on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 16, impressed all hearers at the opening of the season. The reviewers in the Boston papers praised the quality of the personnel and performance as follows:

Mr. Olin Downes, critic of the Boston Post, wrote:

"When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or elst Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-1920. The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of the various members of the wind chorus. Above all, and a great test, anyhow, was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fullness of 'pianissimo passages.'"

---

om EVENING STAR
dress Washington, D. C. ate OCT 17 1920

Boston Symphony November 2.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Washington season of five concerts November 2, continuing November 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15.

Referring to its recent concerts in Boston, Olin Downes, critic of a Boston newspaper, wrote:

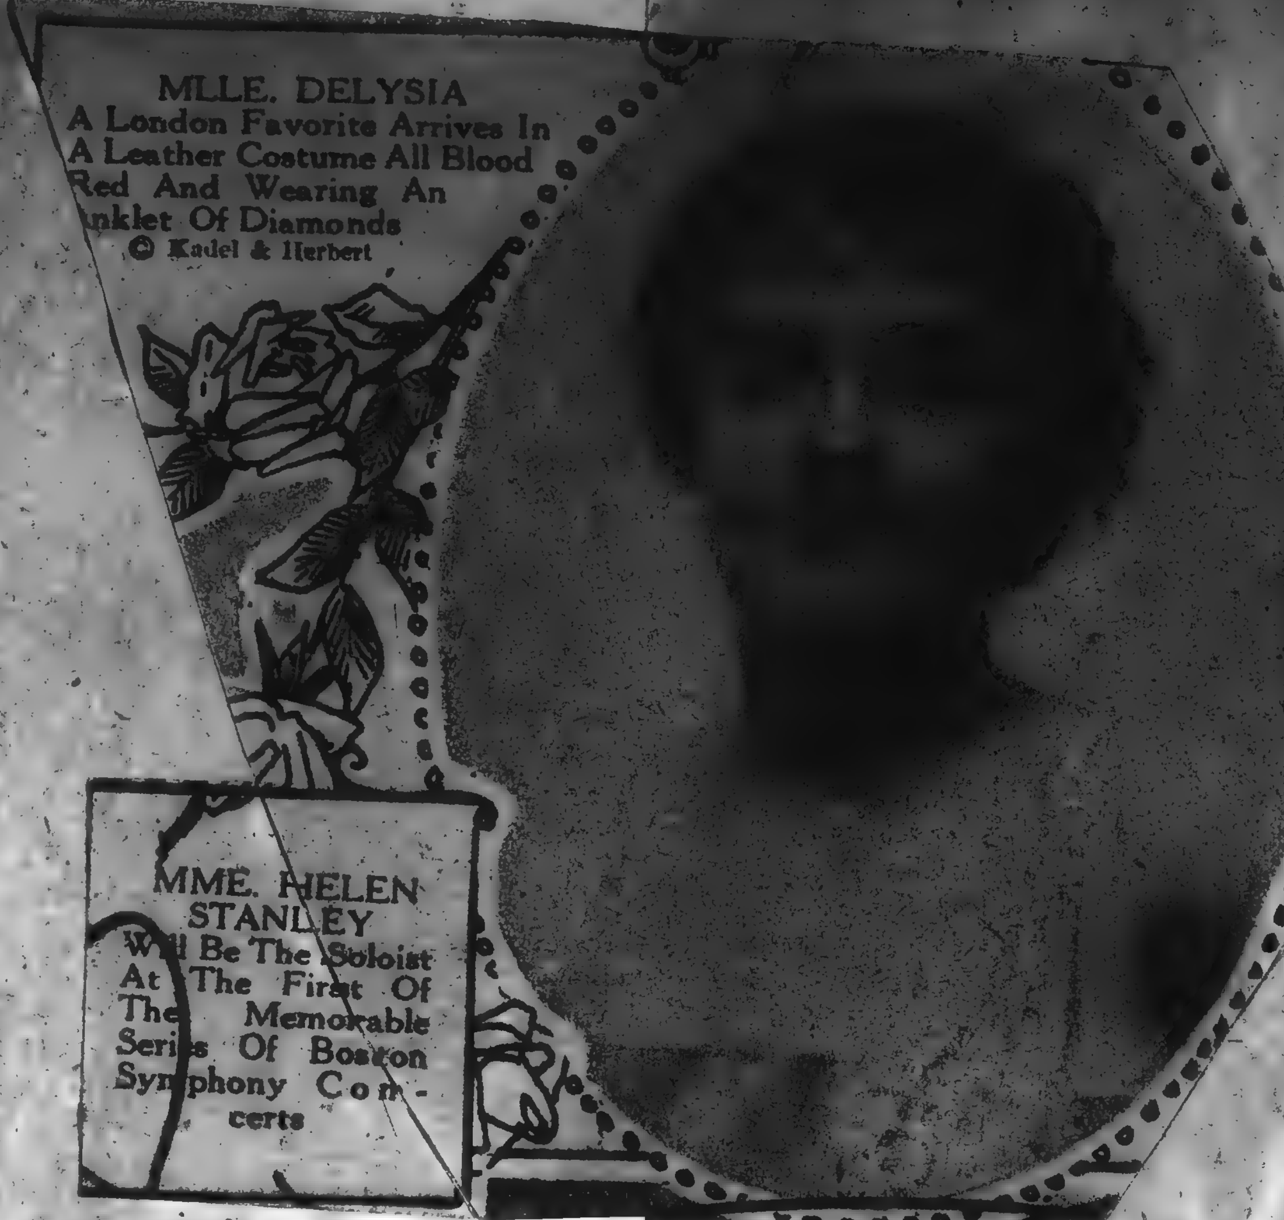
"When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20. The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of the various members of the wind chorus. Above all—and a great test anyhow—was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fullness of "pianissimo" passages.

Sun OCT 17 1920 M
Baltimore, Md.

On the evening of November 3 the first of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here will be held. The orchestra opened its season in Boston on October 8 and 9 in a pair of concerts that won general praise. Olin Downes, critic of the Boston Post, wrote:

"When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20. The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings."

From
Sun OCT 17
Baltimore, Md.



MLLE. DELYSIA
A London Favorite Arrives In A Leather Costume All Blood Red And Wearing An Anklet Of Diamonds
© Kadel & Herbert

MME. HELEN STANLEY
Will Be The Soloist At The First Of The Memorable Series Of Boston Symphony Concerts

---

From NOV 20 1920 M
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

OF COURSE, the chief difficulty of the early days, as well as some of the later ones, were financial, until Mr. Bok made the orchestra permanent by raising the endowment fund a year ago in a campaign which is now Philadelphia history, but there were other troubles, some of them musical.

For a few years after the establishment of the Philadelphia Orchestra the Boston Symphony, which had been giving the orchestral concerts de luxe of Philadelphia for a long time, began the annoying habit of playing almost exactly the same programs as those presented at the nearest concert of the infant Philadelphia Orchestra.

The reason for this singular procedure was never made public, but the writer, as a person interested in the music of this city for a considerable number of years, heard many competent musical judges of Philadelphia express their opinion and it was unanimous. The reader is entitled to three guesses without charge, as to what this reason was. Time works many changes, and it would be an interesting experiment (for some people) for the Boston Orchestra to try the same thing today.

* * *

NEVERTHELESS the Boston Symphony was, in a way, the barometer of the Philadelphia Orchestra. In the early days of the Philadelphia Orchestra the Boston organization, responding to the demand of the Philadelphia public for more symphony concerts, was giving a double series of concerts, one on Monday evenings, the traditional night of the Boston orchestra in Philadelphia, and the other on the Wednesday evening of the same week. The first indication that the Philadelphia Orchestra was becoming a power in Philadelphia music was in the discontinuance of the Wednesday evening series.

This may in a manner have been the fault of the Boston orchestra, for an entirely different program was given at each series, with the result that many of the Monday evening "regulars" held off to see what was going to be given on Wednesday evening. When an unattractive program was presented the natural result was that there was a relatively small attendance at both concerts, alhough the call for symphonic music in Philadelphia was so great that all the concerts were well patronized.

Nevertheless, this was the psychological moment for the Philadelphia Orchestra to come into existence. There was a demand in Philadelphia for more symphonic, or, rather, orchestral, music than could be supplied by the visiting organizations. The time and the place were ready and, fortunately for the music of Philadelphia, the right men were found to head the movement.

* * *

ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 22 1920 K
Evening Post
New York

For the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, has compiled the following programmes. For Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Lekeu's Symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou, César Franck's prelude, chorale, and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." For the Saturday matinée the First Symphony in E minor by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Times OCT 24 1920
New York City

Pierre Monteux's first evening program for the Boston Symphony on Nov. 4 in Carnegie Hall presents Beethoven's eight symphony, a fantasy on two folk-songs of Anjou by Lekeu, Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Liszt's "Tasso." On Nov. 6 there are Sibelius's first symphony, Scriabin's "Ecstasy," and a new work by Edward Burlingame Hill based on Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher."

From OCT 24
Brooklyn Life
New York City

HELEN STANLEY
soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, Friday evening, November fifth

---

POST
ess: Washington, D. C.
OCT 24

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made an engrossing program for the opening concert of the season at the new National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 2, at 4:30. Tickets are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, in Droop's Thirteenth and G stretts.

The symphony to be played will be the Eighth, the so-called "Little Symphony" of Beethoven, with which also Mr. Monteux opened the season in Boston. This masterpiece is especially remembered by the fantastic Larghetto, a burlesque of the metronome of Maelzel, newly invented at the time of its composition. The soloist of the afternoon will be Helen Stanley, the American soprano. She will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice," and the noted "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and close it with Liszt's "Tasso," one of the most impressively brilliant of his symphonic poems.

From OCT 24 1920 L
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made an engrossing program for the opening concert of the season at the New National Theater, which will take place next Tuesday afternoon, November 2, at 4:30, and for which tickets are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau in Droop's Thirteenth and G streets.

The symphony to be played will be the Eighth, the so-called "Little Symphony" of Beethoven, with which also Mr. Monteux opened the season in Boston. This masterpiece is especially remembered by the fantastic Larghetto, which is a burlesque of the metronome of Maelzel, newly invented at the time of its composition.

The soloist of the afternoon will be Helen Stanley, the American soprano who, since her brilliant debut with the Chicago Opera Company, has won the admiration of our concert audiences, season after season in all of our larger cites. She will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice" and the noted "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin."

Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and close it with Liszt's "Tasso," one of the most impressively brilliant of his symphonic poems.

From OCT 23 1920 D
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Frederick Gould Roby Dies Suddenly in Boston

For Twenty-five Years He Was Treasurer of Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Frederick Gould Roby, for twenty-five years treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly on Thursday in Symphony Hall.

It had been known by Mr. Roby's association that he was suffering from heart trouble, but no special anxiety had been felt regarding his condition, and his death was wholly unexpected.

Mr. Roby was fifty-seven years old. He was born in Cambridge, and had lived there until a few years ago, when he moved to Back Bay. He is survived by his wife, who was Miss Nellie Woodbury Gowdy.

Funeral services will be held at Mount Auburn Chapel this afternoon, which will be attended by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

om STANDARD ddress New York City
ate OCT 29 1920 A

Richard Burgin has been appointed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Frederick Fradkin, whose dismissal last year caused an upheaval in that organization. Burgin, who is twenty-eight years of age, was born in Warsaw, and from 1908 to 1912 studied the violin under Leopold Auer. He has made concert tours of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia and has played as concertmaster with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Symphony Orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 30 1920 K
Brooklyn Life
New York City

First Boston Symphony Concert

With Madam Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season on Friday evening, November fifth, at the Academy of Music. Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. This so-called "Little Symphony" is particularly popular on account of its slow movement, which is said to be a burlesque of the metronome newly invented by Maelzel at the time of its composition.

From [illegible]IRER
NOV 3 1920 K
[illegible]A, PA.

First Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening when Pierre Monteux, continuing as the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, will present the following programme: The Symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer, Enesco; Pierne's orchestral version of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Madame Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice" and the Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Oniegin."

ering of the tramp music; erhaps in the monotonous the whimsicalities of the are fairly closely followed laration, particularly at the the musician proudly offers ous testimony of his powers: play for beggars, and they Drunkard" is remarkable r the cruelly high range of part. Here the text cries rollicking tune of the folk h more regard for rhythmic ity than accuracy of decla- "The Revolutionary" has ational atmosphere, but the rs from such trite phrases as has hurt like your misun- ng me," and "It would not be There is a solemn, almost mood here, which contrasts rest of Mr. Mason's music, is picturesque and imagina- taining the lightest and hap- aches of the series, both in d in music, yet less significant ne of the others in actual con-

Bynner saved his flamboyant r the final poem, "A Prophet," burlesque of religious fanati- makes his hero, after com- universal suicide in prepara- the end of the world, utter this farewell:

y leave of you, I lead the way,
e the rope, make sure the noose
l slip,
me if I have not saved your souls.
orgive you for not listening.
er I forgive for bearing me,
er for begetting me,
for being like me.
vell! Receive me, God!

ason revels in the opportunities listic suggestion in these lines, as in the preceding details of life, the gun ,the rope," and he his prophet finally with a musi- ning of the drop worthy of a or a Strauss. Technically this like most of the rest, is an im- e feat. A close analysis might e the fact that Mr. Werrenrath's retation has more to do with the s of the cycle than the work of poet or composer.

RANS. NOV. 18

W WORK LAYED BY SYMPHONY

nald Werrenrath Is Soloist at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

ald Werrenrath, baritone oloist at the concert given b Boston Symphony Orchestr Monteux conductor, yeste fternoon in Jordan Hall, an ng a cycle of songs, "Russia aniel Gregory, heard for ime in this city. Ravel's sui ally composed for piano, orchestrated, "Le Tombeau rin," was played for the in America.

little known symphony rt in C major (Kochel No. d the programme and ng performance of Ene ajor Roumanian Rhap ht it to a close.

WERRENRATH'S SIN

Werrenrath gave proof a markable talent, his intelli sicianship, his mastery which has become more st ear. The songs of Mr. cardly have had a more p appreciative, enthusias tcion. Fortunate the co an artist to present hi toublic! Unfortunate the s to listen to such dead by a composer! audience applauded Mr. W very warmly. He would ha en greater success with bette

For Small Orchestra

art's symphony was played stra reduced in numbers so ore in consonance with Mo mentation and style, and th ent was very successful. Co of orchestral concerts in large ate to reduce a modern sym stra, admittedly too heavy for the fineness and transp ozart's scoring, because the one will be lost in the m. It did not prove so performance was as admi effective, and the symph eard more often. may not be the "Jupiter" n is in the same key. the great three symph rt wrote and which and over again—the "J mphonies in G minor ertheless Mozart did write ies than those three, thing Mozart wrote s in it to warrant a h ajor symphony heard ye ntful work, as it was

---

[To] understand the relation [bet]ween Ravel's dedication of a suite [of] four movements in the ancient man[ne]r, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with [the] war, and brave comrades who died, whom he has dedicated the different movements. Of the four movements, only the Menuet is grave and melancholy. The other dances are lively and humorous and little miracles of genius and skill.

The more one hears of Ravel the more one marvels at the versatility of his mind, his almost magical technic, and the fact that he never repeats himself in his music, seeming invariably to do extremely well the particular task he sets himself. Here we have a somewhat archaic "Prelude," "Forlane," "Menuet" and "Rigaudon." There is wit; there is irony; there is the wanton employment of extremely dissonant intervals and harmonies which result from them with incredibly piquant effect. Modern in harmonic texture, the music never steps out of its old-fashioned frame, and at times it rises to heights of rare and haunting beauty. Such are the beauties of the sad and retrospective "Menuet" and of the captivating middle section of the "Rigaudon," the section in which Mr. Longy's oboe solo was delivered with incomparable art.

Really Heard for First Time

Finally, there was such a performance of Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody as had not been heard or scarcely hinted at at these concerts. Muck, Fiedler, had played the piece repeatedly. It had even gone on "Pop" programme. It had seemed very long, without sufficient contrast or development of its ideas, its folktunes.

Yesterday it was coherent in its development, exhilarating, intoxicating, maddening, if you like, in the highest degree. It is real peasant music, and like Roumanian folk-music, one theme will have a Slavic twist and another will appear to come from farther away, from Persia or Turkey, let us say. The revel becomes always wilder, and the primitive energy and abandon of the music seizes everyone, as it would seize wild dancers in another land. Then there is the orchestration, the most intriguing, exciting, provocative orchestration, which sets off with sheer genuis the musical ideas.

Enesco's music had been played before at these concerts: it was heard for the first time yesterday, and amply deserving by Mr. Monteux and his men was the audience's tribute, tribute not only to an individual performance, but for the wonderful way in which this conductor is developing the orchestra.

OST. NOV 20

From POST

Address: Washington, D.C.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts at the New National Theater during its coming fortieth season the following five Tuesday evenings, November 3, November 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15, with Mesdames Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska, and Messrs. Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists, performed its opening concerts in Boston last Friday and Saturday with brilliant success.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and the illustrious orchestra which sat in full ranks under him, were praised with one accord. The only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master, who recently arrived afer his long voyage from eastern Europe, in which part of the world he is considered to be, by a long count, the finest concert master.

STAR, OCT 10

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts at the New National Theater during its coming fortieth season on Tuesday evenings November 2, November 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15, with Helen Stanley, Hulda Lashanska and Alfred Cortot, Jean Bedetti and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists.

Pierre Monteux is the conductor and the only newcomer this season among the leaders of the various sections is Richard Burgin, the concert master, who recently arrived after a long voyage from eastern Europe.

Of Polish parentage and a native of Warsaw, Mr. Burgin's training has taken place largely in Russia, and part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the east of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. His first teacher was Lotti, and his most famous teacher Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, he studied four years.

From

AMERICAN OCT 17 1920 M

Baltimore, Md.

In Symphony Hall, Boston, October 8 and 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts at the Lyric Theater on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 2 and March 16, impressed all hearers at the opening of the season. The reviewers in the Boston papers praised the quality of the personnel and performance as follows:

Mr. Olin Downes, critic of the Boston Post, wrote:

"When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or elst Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-1920. The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of the various members of the wind chorus. Above all, and a great test, anyhow, was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fullness of 'pianissimo passages.'"

[Fr]om EVENING STAR

[Ad]dress Washington, D. C.

[D]ate OCT 17

Boston Symphony November 2.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Washington season of five concerts November 2, continuing November 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15.

Referring to its recent concerts in Boston, Olin Downes, critic of a Boston newspaper, wrote:

"When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20. The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of the various members of the wind chorus. Above all—and a great test anyhow—was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fullness of "pianissimo" passages.

Sun OCT 17 1920 M

Baltimore, Md.

On the evening of November 3 the first of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here will be held. The orchestra opened its season in Boston on October 8 and 9 in a pair of concerts that won general praise. Olin Downes, critic of the Boston Post, wrote:

"When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20. The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings."

From

Public Ledger EVENING

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 16 1920 M

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in the Academy of Music on November 1, November 29, January 3, January 31 and March 14, opened its fortieth season with notable success in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, October 8-9.

From

Sun OCT 17 1920 M

Baltimore, Md.

MLLE. DELYSIA
A London Favorite Arrives In A Leather Costume All Blood Red And Wearing An Anklet Of Diamonds
© Kadel & Herbert

MME. HELEN STANLEY
Will Be The Soloist At The First Of The Memorable Series Of Boston Symphony Concerts

---

1881 NOV 20 1920 A M

From

Evening Public Ledger

Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

OF COURSE, the chief difficulty of the early days, as well as some of the [late]r ones, were financial, until Mr. Bok made the orchestra permanent by raising the endowment fund a year ago in a campaign which is now Philadelphia history, but there were other troubles, some of them musical.

For a few years after the establishment of the Philadelphia Orchestra the Boston Symphony, which had been giving the orchestral concerts de luxe of Philadelphia for a long time, began the annoying habit of playing almost exactly the same programs as those presented at the nearest concert of the infant Philadelphia Orchestra.

The reason for this singular procedure was never made public, but the writer, as a person interested in the music of this city or a considerable number of years, heard many competent musical judges of Philadelphia express their opinion and it was unanimous. The reader is entitled to three guesses without charge, as to what this reason was. Time works many changes, and it would be an interesting experiment (for some people) for the Boston Orchestra to try the same thing today.

* * *

NEVERTHELESS the Boston Symphony was, in a way, the barometer of the Philadelphia Orchestra. In the early days of the Philadelphia Orchestra the Boston organization, responding to the demand of the Philadelphia public for more symphony concerts, was giving a double series of concerts, one on Monday evenings, the traditional night of the Boston orchestra in Philadelphia, and the other on the Wednesday evening of the same week. The first indication that the Philadelphia Orchestra was becoming a power in Philadelphia music was in the discontinuance of the Wednesday evening series.

This may in a manner have been the fault of the Boston orchestra, for an entirely different program was given at each series, with the result that many of the Monday evening "regulars" held off to see what was going to be given on Wednesday evening. When an unattractive program was presented the natural result was that there was a relatively small attendance at both concerts, alhough the call for symphonic music in Philadelphia was so great that all the concerts were well patronized.

Nevertheless, this was the psychological moment for the Philadelphia Orchestra to come into existence. There was a demand in Philadelphia for more symphonic, or, rather, orchestral, music than could be supplied by the visiting organizations. The time and the place were ready and, fortunately for the music of Philadelphia, the right men were found to head the movement.

* * *

ESTABLISHED 1881

From OCT 22 1920 K

Evening Post

New York

For the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 4, and on Saturday afternoon, November 6, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, has compiled the following programmes. For Thursday, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Lekeu's Symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou, César Franck's prelude, chorale, and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." For the Saturday matinée the First Symphony in E minor by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, a new poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," by E. B. Hill, the American composer, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Times 1920

New York City

Pierre Monteux's first evening program for the Boston Symphony on Nov. 4 in Carnegie Hall presents Beethoven's eight symphony, a fantasy on two folksongs of Anjou by Lekeu, Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Liszt's "Tasso." On Nov. 6 there are Sibelius's first symphony, Scriabin's "Ecstasy," and a new work by Edward Burlingame Hill based on Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher."

From OCT 24

Brooklyn Life

New York City

HELEN STANLEY
soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, Friday evening, November fifth

---

POST

[Addre]ss: Washington, D. C.

OCT 24

Pierre Monteux, conductor of th[e] Boston Symphony Orchestra, ha[s] made an engrossing program for th[e] opening concert of the season at th[e] new National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 2, at 4:30. Tickets are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, in Droop's Thirteenth and G stretts.

The symphony to be played will be the Eighth, the so-called "Little Symphony" of Beethoven, with which also Mr. Monteux opened the season in Boston. This masterpiece is especially remembered by the fantastic Larghetto, a burlesque of the metronome of Maelzel, newly invented at the time of its composition. The soloist of the afternoon will be Helen Stanley, the American soprano. She will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice," and the noted "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and close it with Liszt's "Tasso," one of the most impressively brilliant of his symphonic poems.

From OCT 24 1920 L

TIMES,

Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made an engrossing program for the opening concert of the season at the New National Theater, which will take place next Tuesday afternoon, November 2, at 4:30, and for which tickets are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau in Droop's Thirteenth and G streets.

The symphony to be played will be the Eighth, the so-called "Little Symphony" of Beethoven, with which also Mr. Monteux opened the season in Boston. This masterpiece is especially remembered by the fantastic Larghetto, which is a burlesque of the metronome of Maelzel, newly invented at the time of its composition.

The soloist of the afternoon will be Helen Stanley, the American soprano who, since her brilliant debut with the Chicago Opera Company, has won the admiration of our concert audiences, season after season in all of our larger cites. She will sing Mendelssohn's "Infelice" and the noted "Letter" aria from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugen Oniegin."

Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and close it with Liszt's "Tasso," one of the most impressively brilliant of his symphonic poems.

From OCT 23 1920 D

TRIBUNE,

New York City

Frederick Gould Roby Dies Suddenly in Boston

For Twenty-five Years He Was Treasurer of Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Frederick Gould Roby, for twenty-five years treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly on Thursday in Symphony Hall.

It had been known by Mr. Roby's association that he was suffering from heart trouble, but no special anxiety had been felt regarding his condition, and his death was wholly unexpected.

Mr. Roby was fifty-seven years old. He was born in Cambridge, and had lived there until a few years ago, when he moved to Back Bay. He is survived by his wife, who was Miss Nellie Woodbury Gowdy.

Funeral services will be held at Mount Auburn Chapel this afternoon, which will be attended by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[Fr]om STANDARD

[A]ddress New York City

[D]ate OCT 29 1920 A

Richard Burgin has been appointed concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Frederick Fradkin, whose dismissal last year caused an upheaval in that organization. Burgin, who is twenty-eight years of age, was born in Warsaw, and from 1908 to 1912 studied the violin under Leopold Auer. He has made concert tours of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia and has played as concertmaster with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Symphony Orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Orchestra.

* * *

ESTABLISHED 1881

From OCT 30 1920 K

Brooklyn Life

New York City

First Boston Symphony Concert

With Madam Helen Stanley as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will give the opening concert of the season on Friday evening, November fifth, at the Academy of Music. Mr. Monteux will open the Brooklyn season with the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, with which also he opened the season in Boston. This so-called "Little Symphony" is particularly popular on account of its slow movement, which is said to be a burlesque of the metronome newly invented by Maelzel at the time of its composition.

From

First Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

The season of five Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will open tomorrow evening when Pierre Monteux, continuing as the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, will present the following programme: The Symphony in E flat by the Rumanian composer, Enesco; Pierne's orchestral version of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, and Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3. As the soloist of the evening, Madame Helen Stanley will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Infelice" and the Letter Scene from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Oniegin."

From OCT 24 1920
TRIBUNE,
New York City

A Discussion of the Merits And Value of Program Notes

Curious Annotations by a Press Agent; Philip Hale's Program Books; A Stupendous Program Note Minus the Music

By H. E. Krehbiel

The press agent who sent to the newspapers the announcement of an orchestral concert last week is evidently as fully convinced of the value of program notes as he is ignorant of their meaning. By program notes we mean, of course, the comments printed in programs (chiefly of symphonic concerts) or in pamphlets or leaflets which accompany the house bills. In the best of cases these notes contain hints touching the character of the compositions to be played, the purposes of the composers as exemplified in the titles of the compositions or confessions printed in the scores touching the things (poems, pictures, occurrences), which prompted them—"inspired" is the word generally used—historical data, anecdote sometimes illuminative of the subject but frequently not, and brief technical analyses. In the kind last mentioned the material used in the construction of the works is sometimes printed—a needful procedure, since there is no way of describing a melody, or even a melodic phrase which will bring it into the mind of a reader except the delineative (to the musically educated) and the reproductive (audible) to people in general. Programs thus annotated come to us from the principal orchestras of the country and all of them we find to be educationally valuable, though not all in the same degree.

We have seen much that is idle and worthless in publications of this order, but seldom anything diverting until the local contribution referred to reached us last week. We do not laugh at the writer of the notes because of a realization of the fact that he meant well but did not know either the English language or the needs of the occasion; we only marvel at the ignorance, audacity or carelessness of the press agent who tried to get them into the newspapers, obviously for the edification of the public or critics, or both. Here are the notes on four of the orchestral works set down in the program:

G. BURGMEIN: "Les Ninphes Dans Les Bois." (First execution in America.)

G. Burgmein, author of several symphonic works, has ideated this characteristic piece after having been inspirated by the reading of a story of Fairies. Of difficult execution, "Les Ninphes Dans Les Bois" has a richness of technic of an ideal form.

R. WAGNER: "Gloken and Gralsscene of Parsifal."

This piece is from the grand opera "Parsifal" belongs to the pages most inspirated that have ever been written. Of an absolute misticism its enchanting melody transport the souls to commotion.

A. NEPOMUCENO: "O Garatuja" (First execution in America.)

A. Nepomuceno is one of the most eminent composer of Brazil. This symphonic piece rewarded at the Exposition of Bruxelles in 1910, reveals to us the great musician and the eminent composer. The presentation of an author never heard here before is owed to conductor M. Michael Nicastro.

N. RIMSKY KORSAKOFF: "Capriccio Espagnole"

One of the most brilliant symphonic pieces is "Capriccio Espagnole." The motives of an absolute Spanish flavor captivate the listeners for their beauty and originality. Take notice of the "Gypsy Song" and "Fandango of the Asturias" Instrumented in a wonderful form oblige the executors and the soloists to the utmost of their ability.

The press agent's announcement accompanying this does not strain the English language so much as the notes, but it flounders about quite distressfully in trying to name the pieces which were to be played. One bit of information, of curious interest at least, both press agent and annotator neglected to give us. "G. Burgmein," who "ideated" the second composition in the list, is in the flesh Mr. Giulio Ricordi, head of the famous publishing house by whose suffrance (amply remunerated) we are privileged to hear the modern list of operas at the Metropolitan establishment. Why a clever Italian should disguise himself under a German pseudonymn we have never heard. The relations between Burgmein the composer and Ricordi the publisher must be ideal.

Philip Hale's Program Books

Of all the American program books those prepared by Mr. Philip Hale for the Boston Orchestra concerts are the most welcome to the music lover, and it is a gratifying provision which makes them obtainable at the end of every season neatly imprisoned in bookbinders' boards. In two respects they are now quite perfect. They are too discoursive to be read at a concert between numbers and the analyses which they contain do not set forth the themes in musical notation, though they are characterized (as to instrumentation, key, length or brevity, accompaniment, etc.) so as to be recognized when heard by any reasonably experienced and instructed listener. Still, as the books are not to be had until one is in the concert room (in Boston) or in the vicinity of Carnegie Hall (for circulation is denied it inside that place, which is sacrosanct to the advertisers in the house bill), the attendants at the Boston Orchestra's concerts must pick up their information about the music while in their chairs. To this end a short schematic arrangement would be more serviceable than pages of description. This would leave the best, because the most entertaining and instructive, parts of the pamphlets to be read and digested at leisure in the home circle.

We do not ride sedately with eyes on the main road when reading Mr. Hale's essays on the day's program; we are off with him in a canter on a hundred sidewise excursions gleaning pleasurably in a hundred fields tributary to the chief territory. Historical data are mingled with illuminative anecdote; titles suggest ingenious inquiry into things ancient and mythological, as well as modern and conventional. Metaphor does not suffice him. Should he have occasion to quote an allusion to the Hanging Gardens of Babylon we are sure of a delightful note on Nebuchadnezzar and his wife Anytis, the longing of the latter for her native hills among the fat, flat fields of Babylon and the means by which an indulgent husband, who ordinarily suggests only a Biblical king, turned into a mad vegetarian, and an operatic subject for Verdi. That's the way the fertile and inexhaustible mind of Hale works, and so each of his books is a thesaurus of things related to music, a box giving out the odors of the aloes, and myrrh and cassia, and frankincense and spices, which have been the cargoes of the vessels which imaginative men have set afloat for centuries. Hale is not only a musical annotator; he is a reservoir, a repertorium, a promptuary, a treasury, an arsenal of facts and fancies of all kinds. Coming around to the point from which we started, Mr. Hunsker, who mixes up old Hiram's "ivory, apes and peacocks" in his books, says it was Mr. Hale who invented the term "passionate press agent."

There is a great deal of music in the world, good music, which was never designed by the composer to be interpreted in words—that is, in terms of thought—for which writers who are given to what Horace Greeley condemned as "too much damned fine writing" have supplied programs in explanatory program notes. Occasionally we meet such a note and greet it with pleasure because it seems really to have been evoked by the music. It awakens some of the emotions which accompanied the hearing of the music and comes within a canon of approval which Schumann laid down. The music written nowadays is practically all programmatic and much of it is harking back to its origin in that it is becoming materialistic and utilizing natural sounds, sometimes crudely (Richard Strauss's windmills, bleating sheep, the clock striking the hour when baby is to be put to bed and the cow-bells in the Alpine pasture), sometimes by mere suggestion. These things scarcely need analytical notes to identify them. They are the thngs themselves, no matter how much the composer may have affected to idealize them. But when music enters the metaphysical field (we mean when composers profess to have made it do that) then the sluice-gates must be opened wide for attempts at exposition.

Ives "Essays Before a Sonata"

There are old-fashioned critics who think that all attempts at elucidation are vain in such cases because the composer is trying to make music transcend its powers, which reminds us that we have let months pass without comment on a book which in a sense is as unique as it is interesting and sprightly. It's a little volume of 124 octavo pages and professes to be a prefatory explanation to a pianoforte sonata. The author is Charles E. Ives. He calls the book Essays Before a Sonata, says that, combined with four pieces of pianoforte music which he calls a sonata, with an apology to the term, he has attempted to give an "impression of the spirit of transcendentalism that is associated in the minds of many with Concord, Mass., of one-half a century ago." He intended to print book and sonata (which has a title, Concord, Mass., 1843) together, but concluded that the volume would be too cumbersome. So we have the book without the music. Under the circumstances we feel justified in calling the collection of essays the most stupendous program note in existence. When the sonata is printed we expect to find its four movements labeled I, Allegro—Emerson; II, Scherzo—Hawthorne; III, Andante, the Alcotts; IV, Finale Allegro, Thoreau.

Inasmuch as the author does not seem to care to let us hear his music, or see it in the printed symbols, we are unable to derive as much comfort as we should like from his extremely candid and considerate dedication, which runs thus: "These prefatory essays were written by the composer for those who can't stand his music—and the music for those who can't stand his essays; to those who can't stand either the whole is respectfully dedicated." The essays are most engaging in style and full of pith. We liked them immensely and gladly forego the music which they are supposed to illuminate. A sonata which should undertake to-day any of the things which Mr. Ives has so capitally said in his book we could not contemplate or hear without a shudder.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 2
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS PHILA. SEASON

Pierre Monteux and His Musicians Give Fine Performance

AUDIENCE SMALL

Pierre Monteux brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy last night for the first concert of its season here. Mabel Garrison was the soloist, instead of Helen Stanley, who was unable to appear, due to a last-minute indisposition.

Miss Garrison sang the Mozart aira "Mia Spiranza Adorate," and "Charmant Oiseau," from David's "Pearl of Brazil." She sank very prettily, as is her custom, but without any particular brilliancy. The applause she received was enthusiastic.

Chief interest among the orchestral works centered in the Enesco Symphony in E flat. This work, written in the early part of the century, is one of the most effective modern works cast in symphonic form that has been heard here. It is entirely modern in feeling but there is genuine melodic inspiration and vitality that distinguishes the work from those in which the chief concern of the composer is to achieve atmosphere and mood. The work was heard in Philadelphia some eight years ago when Mr. Stokowski gave it a performance. It is to be hoped that our own orchestra will play it again in the near future.

Gabriel Pierne's orchestral setting of the Franck Prelude, Chorale and Fugue was the second number. This impressive piano work has been transmuted into orchestral form in a masterly manner by Franck's pupil. In the magnificent chorale, Mr. Monteux and his men gave an exalted performance. Beethoven's "Leonore Overture No. 3," played with a verve and spirit, closed th concert.

After the vicissiitudes undergone by this organization during the last three years unbounded credit must be given to Mr. Monteux for the quality of the performance last night. Mr. Burgin, the new concert-master, proved to be a real acquisition to the orchestra. His tone is robust and he plays with firm authority. The tone of the entire string section of the orchestra is fuller and richer than it was last year. It is to be expected that the raggedness that was sometimes apparent last night will be almost entirely eliminated before the season is very far along.

It is a pity that so small an audience was present to hear a program of such interest and artistic worth. Mr. Monteux is a most skillful program builder, as the past has revealed, and the Boston Symphony concerts deserve fuller attendance than was accorded their performance last evening.

From Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mabel Garrison as Soloist at Opening Concert of Season.

The Boston Orchestra returned to the Academy of Music last night, playing the first concert of the thirty-sixth season before Philadelphia audiences. The conductor, Pierre Monteux, and the artists comprising the organization were warmly received by an audience which again begins to resemble the audiences of a few seasons ago, before the disruption of the splendid orchestral body then known as the Boston Orchestra.

Monteux played first on the program the Enesco Symphony in E flat major, an essentially modern work of the French school and one of compelling interest, if not of overwhelming beauty of inspiration. Other orchestral selections were the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue of Cesar Franck, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne and made into a wonderfully effective orchestral work. The overture to Leonore, No. 3, was the concluding offering of the program.

Helen Stanley was replaced at the last moment by Mabel Garrison, who is a great favorite in Philadelphia. She gave two selections, Mozart's "Les Perenu" and Bizet's "Charmant Oiseau," from "The Pearl of Brazil." The charming style of Miss Garrison was admired, but more especially in the cloratura flights of the Bizet composition.

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Concert of Season, With Mabel Garrison as Soloist

THE PROGRAM

Symphony E-flat .... Enesco Prelude, Chorale and Fugue .... Franck
"Mia Speranza Adorata" .... Mozart
Mabel Garrison.
"Charmante Oiseau" .... David
Mabel Garrison.
Overture, Leonore No. 3 .... Beethoven

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last evening before a fair-sized audience. The soloist was Mabel Garrison, of the Metropolitan Opera Co., who took the place of Helen Stanley on ccount of the sudden illness of the latter. Miss Garrison was in the best of voice and sang with greater artistry than she has ever before shown in this city. Her selections were widely dissimilar in character, being the aria "Mia Speranza Adorata" of Mozart, with its lovely melody and dangerous simplicity, and the coloratura aria, "Charmante Oiseau," of Felicien David. Miss Garrison was perfectly at home in both styles, and gave the finest specimen of Mozart singing that has been heard in Philadelphia for a long time. Her voice control was unusually fine and the pianissimos in the upper register were exquisite in the Mozart number, which was sung with just the correct amount of temperament. The duet with the flute in the David selection was beautifully done, especially when it is considered that there was only a very short rehearsal possible. Miss Garrison shared the applause with Mr. Laurent at the close.

The novelty was the Enesco Symphony, which the Philadelphia Orchestra played here about eight years ago. Although it is an early work, it shows the characteristics which marked the composer in more mature years. The composition is modern and highly individual both in style and in content. There is great knowledge of the orchestra shown in it and some beautiful effects are produced. The rhythm of the first movement is one of the charms of the work. The second movement is somewhat vague, and the last one, a vigorous allegro, is probably the best of the three. It was well played and well received.

The orchestration of the well-known prelude, choral and fugue of Cesar Franck, by Pierne, showed some interesting things. The color of the very full orchestration which Pierne has used caused a decided loss in the pianistic character of the work, and several changes have been made in the apparent intent of the composer, such as the omitting entirely of the after melody note in the repetition of the theme of the choral. The composition as orchestrated was interesting rather than convincing. The Boston orchestra itself played better than at any time for at least two years, and while there was raggedness here and there, it shows signs of again taking its place among the great orchestras of the country.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK NOV 5
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Two Concerts Of Symphony Series He

TIGHT BINDING

ledger
hia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two Concert
Of Symphon Series He

SEVENTH AVE
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

BUNE,
New York City

ZEN, NOV 6
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

HUB ORCHESTRA SCORES BIG HIT

Boston Symphony Musicians Well Received at First Local Performance.

MUSIC LOVERS ATTEND

Mme. Louise Homer, Soloist, Warmly Greeted by Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first local performance of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon under the management of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene. Pierre Monteux was the conductor and Mme. Louise Homer, the soloist.

In past years it might have been possible to have written of the first symphony orchestra concert that the orchestra had not been together during the summer or there was a new conductor who was not yet in full sympathy with the players. But such excuses were unnecessary yesterday, for the performance was one that was characteristic of a well-seasoned, well-disciplined, and enthusiastic body of artists. The conductor was warmly welcomed and the audience manifested every sign of genuine appreciation after the performance of each number.

The first selection was the overture from Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, the one feature of the ill-fated opera by the same name which was well received when originally presented. Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93, followed. This is one of the brightest, most cheerful and most humorous works that this writer ever conceived.

The marvelous skill of the composer which is brought into play in his composition was exquisitely illustrated by the players under Monteau's baton. For the closing number Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2, was rendered. The opening of the composition is marked with expressions of great sadness and grief, which finally ends in music of glorious triumph. This orchestra of magnificent instrumentalists brought out to the fullest extent the wonderful qualities of this work.

The announcement, made from the stage, that Mme. Louise Homer would sing in place of the advertised soloist, caused enthusiastic applause, for the grandeur of the voice of this most magnificent of vocalists is well known to local audiences. It is to be doubted if Mme. Homer has ever been heard to better advantage in this city than she was yesterday when she sang Gluck's "Che Fero Eurydice" and Handel's "Julius Caesar" aria. ...ough tremendous applause ...the singer at the conclusion of these solos, the audience ...not rewarded with an encore.

From NOV 5 ... K
Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit of the season to New York yesterday and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra showed many new faces as a result of the reorganization it has undergone since its troubles of last Spring; the list of players printed in the program book contains a much larger proportion of Anglo-Saxon names than have appeared in its roster before, or in those of most orchestras that play in New York.

Mr. Monteux presented a program of modern music generally unfamiliar: Sibelius' first symphony, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou and Schriabin's "Poéme de l'Ecstase." All these compositions suggested the proclivity of the modern to "excess of discourse" when they get well started. It was notable in the last movement and to a less degree in other movements of Sibelius's symphony.

It is music of a lowering spirit, showing its Northern origin. The first movement seems the strongest in the character of its themes, the ingenuity of their development, the grandiose close, matched by the andante with its suggestion of folk melody, though there is discursiveness in its length. The following allegro has the character of a scherzo and has been called wild and heavily fantastical; there is grimness in the last movement, but its power is dissipated by its extension beyond the value of its material. The symphony is twenty years old; but there is vigor in it that is not stated, and an individual tang in the music that is engrossing.

There is an unquestionable personal stamp, too, upon Lekeu's fantasia which has not a few elements of beauty; but its distinction is not always maintained and it suffers from its too great length.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" had its first performance in New York a dozen years ago. It has aged considerably since then and no longer strikes terror to the bourgeois so much as it breeds boredom on account of the extravagant lengths to which a tenuous musical idea is pursued. The musical germ is in itself slender, being little more than a succession of chromatic anticipations and suspensions on chords of the ninth and eleventh and other high numbers.

His kinship with the bacchanale in the later version of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" has been observed; some may discern a connection with Lisztian methods. There are orchestral ingenuities and refinements that are often striking, but the musical value is singularly small. What the philosophical or theosophical value of it may be is not evident. Scriabin was disposed to attribute cosmical significance to his later orchestral works that they seem to possess less of as time gnaws them.

The playing of these things by the orchestra was such as to give pleasure to its friends. The tone of the whole organization is improved and has mellowed; the tone of the strings in particular is finer. There are many youthful faces among the string players; and while they may not represent the quality of Berlioz's "Young Lions of the Conservatorie," they may be expected to go farther. There is still something for Mr. Monteux to do in refining and polishing his performances, but he had to begin on an organization largely new. It takes time, but meanwhile it has made evident that the Boston Sy Orchestra is not extinct.

From AMERICAN
OCT 31
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the season here in the Academy under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who is continuing as conductor. The symphony will be Enesco's master work in E flat, and the other symphonic numbers Cesar Franck's Prelude Choral and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture, "Lenore," No. 3. Helen Stanley, American lyric soprano, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria "Infelice," and the "Letter Song" from Tchaikovski's opera "Eugen Onegin."

HELEN STANLEY, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

From NEW
BALTIMORE, MD.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not only demonstrates in his conducting the sort of musicianly attainment that commands respect, but he also proves constantly that he is a gentleman of charmingly gracious personality not in the least what his countrymen call "entete."

Another instance of this was given when M. Monteux, with the greatest willingness, consented to change the program he will present next Wednesday night by the substitution of Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E Flat, Op. 20 (a work I do not remember ever having heard), for the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor.

The request that the Brahms give way to something else because it had been played here a short time ago did not reach M. Monteux until after the program booklets had been printed; but he did not hesitate in granting it even though considerable trouble was caused by the change.

The public cannot be too grateful for a conductor influenced by a policy as generous as this. It should be clearly understood, however, that when repetitions of scores are avoided it is not due to a desire to obviate comparisons but rather with the aim of keeping the musical season as varied and as fresh as possible.

I've often thought there ought to be some sort of national clearing-house, as it were, whereby conductors could get together at the beginning of a season and, after kissing each other fondly upon their respective cheeks, solemnly promise and declare they would stand for no repetitions.

Only by some such arrangement will it be possible to prevent the performance of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique and Beethoven's Fifth 96 times in the same city during a single winter.

From NOV 3 M
Evening Sun NOV 3 M
Baltimore, Md.

THE THREE ARTS
MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

HELEN STANLEY is ill and will not be able to sing this evening with the Boston Symphony. Her place will be taken by Mabel Garrison, the distinguished Baltimore soprano, who is now a member of the Metropolitan forces and who has returned from Europe with additional laurels for her concert work in London and elsewhere. This evening she will sing an aria by Mozart and the "Charmant Oiseau" aria from David's "Perle du Bresil."

Richard Burgin

Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first Baltimore appearance when this orchestra opens its season of five concerts at the Lyric on November 3.

The evening of the same day the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five Lyric concerts with Pierre Monteux as director and with Richard Burgin, the latest important addition to the orchestra, occupying the concert master's chair. Mr. Burgin recently arrived from Scandinavia, where he organized the Burgin String Quartet of Stockholm and the Philharmonic Society of Christiania.

The Boston Symphony's soloists will be Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska, soprano; Jean Bedetti, cellist; Cortot and Dohnanyi, pianists.

[46

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From NEWS
NOV 6
Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, on Tuesday evenings, beginning Nov. 16, with the other dates Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, at which the soloists will be Reinald Werrenrath, Samuel Gardner, Alice Nielsen, Richard Burgin and Felix Fox, has brilliantly opened its season, not only in Boston but in a number of other cities. The present week included appearances in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn.

From NOV-7 M
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

JUST why is it that all orchestral conductors are afraid to put the much-discussed Scriabine compositions on Baltimore programs? The Boston Symphony played his "Poeme de l'Extase" in Boston and a night or two ago played it in New York, but when the orchestra came to Baltimore, something quite different had to be substituted for this triumphant work. There seems to be some kind of a legend extant that Baltimore ears will split when they hear very modern music, and so we go on in our ignorance of what the people in other cities are listening to, in ignorance of the things that are already becoming old-fashioned to others but which are as yet an unsealed book to us. Is this quite fair? Apparently most of the orchestras that play here are determined to give us nothing but purely academic compositions. Some

---

LEADER NOV-8 X
Pittsburg, Pa.

Discharged Players Sue Boston Symphony Orchestra for Wages

By International News Service

Boston, Mass., Nov. 5.—Rudolph Nagel, violoncello; Gustav F. Helm, trumpeter, and Fortunato Sordillo, trombone player, have each brought suits in the superior court for Suffolk county for $10,000 against the Boston Symphony orchestra for alleged breach of contract. They say they were hired for the seasons of 1919-1920 to 1921-1922, inclusive, but were discharged on March 5 last. Nagel and Sordillo were each paid $50 a week and Helm received $85.72 a week.

1881
From
Telegram 7
New York City

More evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into its own was manifest at the matinee concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall, when Mr. Pierre Monteux led the reorganized players through an interesting programme, and revealed the fact that the big band from Boston is again a united body with a mighty multi-colored voice.

America was represented by a new composer. Roumania led the programme of the Allies with the first place given to Enesco's symphony in E flat major, while France brought up the rear with Franck and Pierre collaborating, and Berlioz with his overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" taking the place of a benediction.

The new American composer is Edward Burlingame Hill, who puts into a tone poem the atmosphere which Edgar Allan Poe achieved with his tragic "Fall of the House of Usher." This famous short story gives the title to the tone poem.

Mr. Hill's work abounds in the harsh dissenances of the modern school. At times, however, there is an elusive beauty, very similar to Debussy at his best. The result is a fine piece of painting in music, very atmospheric.

Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, originally written for the piano and brilliantly transcribed for orchestra by Gabriel Pierené, abounds in beauty suggestive of the classic composers.

PENSION

No orchestral score and magnificent in orie than "Scheherazade," the suite by the Russian, Rimsk koff, which will be the feature concert Sunday afternoon, Nov. Symphony Hall at 3:30 o'clock, in aid the orchestra's pension fund.

Mr. Monteux will also conduct at this concert Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." A soloist soon to be announced will make the concert even more eventful.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Having completed the first southern trip, which occupied last week and which was marked by brilliantly successful concerts in each city of its travels, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Monteux has compiled an unusually interesting program, to begin with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor. He will also conduct the first performances of "Four Preludes for Orchestra" by Gustave Strube, who was once a member of the orchestra, and, for another novelty, a symphonic poem by the Italian Resphigi, which describes four of the fountains of Rome. The brilliant closing number will be Strauss's fantastic work, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

HERALD
ress New York City NOV 7

'House of Usher' in Music Form Played Here by Orchestra

Boston Symphony Gives E. B. Hill's Composition Based on Poe's Masterpiece.

At last "The Fall of the House of Usher" has been composed, but not by Debussy. For years his lyric drama was promised in the Metropolitan prospectus till the world began to believe it to be one of those Penelope scores of the family of Boito's "Nerone," that are never finished. The title is printed no more. Debussy has ceased to sing. But Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, Mass., in the summer of 1919 made a poem for orchestra on the theme of Poe's weird tale. It had its first performance in Boston on October 30 and was given here yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Hill is a musician of discretion. He composed with the intent chiefly to create a musical reproduction of the atmosphere of the story and only suggestively associated two themes with Roderick and Madeline. He fashioned the work in the short sonata form, that which contains no development section. Mr. Hill would have been a musician of greater discretion if he had permitted this masterpiece of American fiction to repose in the silence to which a vulgar and lewd generation of readers has consigned all such glories of our literature.

The Cambridge composer has written an elegant piece of music, logically constructed and orchestrated with true Bostonian cunning. The New England school of arts and crafts is famous through at least one seaboard, and its musical, pictorial and literary products are discussed over many afternoon teas and before ladies' clubs by prominent lecturers. In such circles much will be said of Mr. Hill's poem, but of Poe's creation little. The music is praiseworthy; the story is incomparable. Mr. Hill has made a commendable effort; Poe penned an immortal tale of mystery, a tragedy of gloom and horror, not rivalled by anything in the works of Maeterlinck or Ibsen.

As for Mr. Hill's pictorial climax, the actual fall of the house—many buildings have collapsed in music. Saint-Saens pulled down the palace at Gaza, and Rubinstein knocked over the Tower of Babel. Music has only one way of doing the thing. Literature has a thousand, and none surpasses Poe's. And that is the end of the story.

The other numbers on yesterday afternoon's list were Enesco's symphony in E flat, Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. The orchestra played the symphony fairly well and the work, not new, was worth hearing again. It is not a great creation, but it serves a purpose.

NEW YORK Journal
ESTABLISHED 1881
From Providence NOV-7

The opening of the season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 16 will follow performances not only in Boston but in a number of other cities. The orchestra completed the first regular tour of the Southern cities last week, which included appearances in Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York.

The virtosi of the orchestra is unchanged from former seasons except in the case of Richard Burgin, the new concert master, who is numbered among the five soloists to be heard in this city. The leaders of the sections are in some cases of many years' standing. The newest comers are Frederic Denayer and Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to act as first viola and first 'cello respectively. Fernand Thillois, who sits at the head of the second violin section, came in 1918.

Of longer standing in Boston are Max Kunze, leader of the double basses, and Julius Theodorowicz, second concert master, whose career in Boston dates back to his participation in the Kneisel Quartet. Alfred Holy, the first harp, is well known to all who are familiar with the orchestra, and the veteran among the wood-wind is Georges Longy, who has been named authoritatively as without peer among living oboists. Alfred Sand, the Russian virtuoso, is now serving his seventh year as first clarinet.

The newer comers are George Laurent, first flute; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, English horn, who are now in their third season with the orchestra. There are, strictly speaking, two English horn players, in that Mr. Speyer alternates with Mr. Frederick Mueller, who has played the wood-wind instrument for many years with the orchestra under many conductors.

Of the brass choir, Carl Hampe, as first trombone, is the oldest among leaders of the sections of the orchestra, while George Wendler, as first horn, comes second in length of service. Georges Mager is now serving his second season as first trumpet. Stefan Neumann is perhaps as familiar as any single member of the orchestra, on account of his agility and unerring accuracy upon the kettle drums

TIGHT BINDING

NOV
dger
hia, Pa.

TON SYMPHONY

of Season, With Mabel on as Soloist

S PROGRAM

........................Enesco
and Fugue........Franck Adorata" ....Mozart
bel Garrison.
eau" ....David
bel Garrison.
e No. 3..........Beethoven

Symphony Orchestra gave t of the season last eve-fair-sized audience. The abel Garrison, of the Meta Co., who took the place ley on ccount of the sudthe latter. Miss Garrison est of voice and sang with ry than she has ever be-this city. Her selections dissimilar in character, be-
"Mia Speranza Adorata" vith its lovely melody and implicity, and the colora-harmante Oiseau" of Fell-Miss Garrison was perfectly both styles, and gave the en of Mozart singing that eard in Philadelphia for a Her voice control was un-and the pianissimos in the ster were exquisite in the Mo-er, which was sung with just amount of temperament. The the flute in the David selecbeautifully done, especially s considered that there was ery short rehearsal possible.

ison shared the applause with nt at the close.
velty was the Enesco Sym-ich the Philadelphia Orchestra
e about eight years ago. Alis an early work, it shows cteristics which marked the in more mature years. The n is modern and highly inoth in style and in content.
great knowledge of the orches-in it and some beautiful ef-produced. The rhythm of the ement is one of the charms of . The second movement is vague, and the last one, a vigegro, is probably the best of It was well played and well chestration of the well-known choral and fugue of Cesar by Pierne, showed some inter-ngs. The color of the very full tion which Pierne has used decided loss in the pianistic of the work, and several ave been made in the apparent the composer, such as the entirely of the after melody the repetition of the theme of

l. The composition as orches-s interesting rather than con-
The Boston orchestra itself etter than at any time for at years, and while there was ss here and there, it shows again taking its place among orchestras of the country.

-110 SEVENTH AVE
NEW YORK
LISHED 1881
NOV 5
m BUNE,
w York City

wo Concert
Of Sympho Series He

d Mr. Nikisch.
e was a change in the program
Boston Orchestra's concert as it een announced. Mr. Bodanzky, brought forward Beethoven's symphony last Sunday night and ay afternoon Mr. Monteux seems e thought it unwise to give the a third hearing in so short a and substituted for it the first belius's symphonies. It is a comon of splendid virility and great y in thematic material as well as ment, the work of a strong, self-t creative artist, who does not to seek individual expression in nad adventure of the young revo-naries of France and Italy. H uch to say and a superb knowledg w to say it. Under Mr. Monteux tion the men from Boston, almo letely rehabilitated in their la tained excellence gave a fine t of themselves. The string b its new leader Mr. Burgin, did body, its tone full and ela on may still be proud of its tra. The fantasia on Angevin m by Lekeu, which followed the s y, was introduced here by Mr. B n two years ago. We admir hoped for its better acquaint , and last night's performance lessen our appreciation of its uities and beauties. The concert ught to an end by Scriabin's "Po xtase."

---

m HERALD
ress Washington, D. C.

HUB ORCHESTRA SCORES BIG HIT

Boston Symphony Musicians Well Received at First Local Performance.

MUSIC LOVERS ATTEND

Mme. Louise Homer, Soloist, Warmly Greeted by Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first local performance of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon under the management of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene. Pierre Monteux was the conductor and Mme. Louise Homer, the soloist.

In past years it might have been possible to have written of the first symphony orchestra concert that the orchestra had not been together during the summer or there was a new conductor who was not yet in full sympathy with the players. But such excuses were unnecessary yesterday, for the performance was one that was characteristic of a well-seasoned, well-disciplined, and enthusiastic body of artists. The conductor was warmly welcomed and the audience manifested every sign of genuine appreciation after the performance of each number.

The first selection was the overture from Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, the one feature of the ill-fated opera by the same name which was well received when originally presented. Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93, followed. This is one of the brightest, most cheerful and most humorous works that this writer ever conceived.

The marvelous skill of the composer which is brought into play in his composition was exquisitely illustrated by the players under Monteau's baton. For the closing number Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem No. 2, was rendered. The opening of the composition is marked with expressions of great sadness and grief, which finally ends in music of glorious triumph. This orchestra magnificent instrumentalists brought out to the fullest extent wonderful qualities of this work.

The announcement, made from stage, that Mme. Louise Homer would sing in place of the advertised soloist, caused enthusiastic applause, for the grandeur of the voice of this most magnificent of vocalists is well known to local audiences. It is to be doubted if Mme. Homer has ever been heard to better advantage in this city than she was yesterday when she sang Gluck's "Che Fero Eurydice" and Handel's "Julius Caesar" aria. Although tremendous applause greeted the singer at the conclusion of these solos, the audience was not rewarded with an encore number.

ESTABLISHED
From NOV 5
Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit of the season to New York yesterday and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra showed many new faces as a result of the reorganization it has undergone since its troubles of last Spring; the list of players printed in the program book contains a much larger proportion of Anglo-Saxon names than have appeared in its roster before, or in those of most orchestras that play in New York.

Mr. Monteux presented a program of modern music generally unfamiliar: Sibelius' first symphony, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou and Schriabin's "Poème de l'Estase." All these compositions suggested the proclivity of the modern to "excess of discourse" when they get well started. It was notable in the last movement and to a less degree in other movements of Sibelius's symphony.

It is music of a lowering spirit, showing its Northern origin. The first movement seems the strongest in the character of its themes, the ingenuity of their development, the grandiose close, matched by the andante with its suggestion of folk melody, though there is discursiveness in its length. The following allegro has the character of a scherzo and has been called wild and heavily fantastical; there is grimness in the last movement, but its power is dissipated by its extension beyond the value of its material. The symphony is twenty years old; but there is vigor in it that is not stated, and an individual tang in the music that is engrossing.

There is an unquestionable personal stamp, too, upon Lekeu's fantasia which has not a few elements of beauty; but its distinction is not always maintained and it suffers from its too great length.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" had its first performance in New York a dozen years ago. It has aged considerably since then and no longer strikes terror to the bourgeois so much as it breeds boredom on account of the extravagant lengths to which a tenuous musical idea is pursued. The musical germ is in itself slender, being little more than a succession of chromatic anticipations and suspensions on chords of the ninth and eleventh and other high numbers.

His kinship with the bacchanale in the later version of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" has been observed; some may discern a connection with Lisztian methods. There are orchestral ingenuities and refinements that are often striking, but the musical value is singularly small. What the philosophical or theosophical value of it may be is not evident. Scriabin was disposed to attribute cosmical significance to his later orchestral works that they seem to possess less of as time gnaws them.

The playing of these things by the orchestra was such as to give pleasure to its friends. The tone of the whole organization is improved and has mellowed; the tone of the strings in particular is finer. There are many youthful faces among the string players; and while they may not represent the quality of Berlioz's "Young Lions of the Conservatorie," they may be expected to go farther. There is still something for Mr. Monteux to do in refining and polishing his performances, but he had to begin on an organization largely new. It takes time, but meanwhile it has made evident that the Boston Sy Orchestra is not extinct.

From
PHIL PA.

Tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the season here in the Academy under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who is continuing as conductor. The symphony will be Enesco's master work in E flat, and the other symphonic numbers Cesar Franck's Prelude Choral and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture, "Lenore," No. 3. Helen Stanley, American lyric soprano, will sing Mendelssohn's concert aria "Infelice," and the "Letter Song" from Tchaikovski's opera "Eugen Onegin."

HELEN STANLEY, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

ZEN, NOV 6
oklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

of Series of Concerts at the Academy a Great Success.

e Boston Symphony Orchestra the first of its series of fine con at the Academy of Music last ing, and it is but faint praise to that the best traditions of the most musical organization in the ed States were maintained in the t. Piere Monteux was the con or and Mabel Garrison, the st.

e full programme follows:

hony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93. Beethoven
1 Allegro vivace e con brio
II. Allegretto scherzando
II. Tempo Dimenuetto
V. Allegro vivace
de, Chorale and Fugue........Franck
Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
"Mia Speranza Adorata"......Mozart nant Oiseau, from "The Pearl of zil" ....David Miss Garrison.

---

rom NE
BALTIMORE, MD

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not only demonstrates in his conducting the sort of musicianly attainment that commands respect, but he also proves constantly that he is a gentleman of charmingly gracious personality not in the least what his countrymen call "entete."

Another instance of this was given when M. Monteux, with the greatest willingness, consented to change the program he will present next Wednesday night by the substitution of Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E Flat, Op. 20 (a work I do not remember ever having heard), for the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor.

The request that the Brahms give way to something else because it had been played here a short time ago did not reach M. Monteux until after the program booklets had been printed; but he did not hesitate in granting it even though considerable trouble was caused by the change.

The public cannot be too grateful for a conductor influenced by a policy as generous as this. It should be clearly understood, however, that when repetitions of scores are avoided it is not due to a desire to obviate comparisons but rather with the aim of keeping the musical season as varied and as fresh as possible.

I've often thought there ought to be some sort of national clearing-house, as it were, whereby conductors could get together at the beginning of a season and, after kissing each other fondly upon their respective cheeks, solemnly promise and declare they would stand for no repetitions.

Only by some such arrangement will it be possible to prevent the performance of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique and Beethoven's Fifth 96 times in the same city during a single win-

---

From NOV 3
Evening Sun NOV 3
Baltimore, Md.

THE THREE ARTS
MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

HELEN STANLEY is ill and will not be able to sing this evening with the Boston Symphony. Her place will be taken by Mabel Garrison, the distinguished Baltimore soprano, who is now a member of the Metropolitan forces and who has returned from Europe with additional laurels for her concert work in London and elsewhere. This evening she will sing an aria by Mozart and the "Charmant Oiseau" aria from David's "Perle du Bresil."

Richard Burgin

Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first Baltimore appearance when this orchestra opens its season of five concerts at the Lyric on November 3.

Scandinavia, where he organized the Burgin String Quartet of Stockholm and the Philharmonic Society of Christiania.

The Boston Symphony's soloists will be Helen Stanley and Hulda Lashanska, soprano; Jean Bedetti, cellist; Cortot and Dohnanyi, pianists.

The evening of the same day the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five Lyric concerts with Pierre Monteux as director and with Richard Burgin, the latest important addition to the orchestra, occupying the concert master's chair. Mr. Burgin recently arrived from

[46

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
NEWS
From
NOV 6
Providence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, on Tuesday evenings, beginning Nov. 16, with the other dates Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12, at which the soloists will be Reinald Werrenrath, Samuel Gardner, Alice Nielsen, Richard Burgin and Felix Fox, has brilliantly opened its season, not only in Boston but in a number of other cities. The present week included appearances in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn.

---

rom
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

JUST why is it that all orchestral conductors are afraid to put the much-discussed Scriabine compositions on Baltimore programs? The Boston Symphony played his "Poeme de l'Extase" in Boston and a night or two ago played it in New York, but when the orchestra came to Baltimore, something quite different had to be substituted for this triumphant work. There seems to be some kind of a legend extant that Baltimore ears will split when they hear very modern music, and so we go on in our ignorance of what the people in other cities are listening to, in ignorance of the things that are already becoming old-fashioned to others but which are as yet an unsealed book to us. Is this quite fair? Apparently most of the orchestras that play here are determined to give us nothing but purely academic compositions. Some

---

LEADER NOV-8
Pittsburg, Pa.

Discharged Players Sue Boston Symphony Orchestra for Wages

By International News Service

Boston, Mass., Nov. 5.—Rudolph Nagel, violoncello; Gustav F. Helm, trumpeter, and Fortunato Sordillo, trombone player, have each brought suits in the superior court for Suffolk county for $10,000 against the Boston Symphony orchestra for alleged breach of contract. They say they were hired for the seasons of 1919-1920 to 1921-1922, inclusive, but were discharged on March 5 last. Nagel and Sordillo were each paid $50 a week and Helm received $85.72 a week.

1881
From 7
Telegram
New York City

More evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into its own was manifest at the matinee concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall, when Mr. Pierre Monteux led the reorganized players through an interesting programme, and revealed the fact that the big band from Boston is again a united body with a mighty multi-colored voice.

America was represented by a new composer. Roumania led the programme of the Allies with the first place given to Enesco's symphony in E flat major, while France brought up the rear with Franck and Pierre collaborating, and Berlioz with his overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" taking the place of a benediction.

The new American composer is Edward Burlingame Hill, who puts into a tone poem the atmosphere which Edgar Allan Poe achieved with his tragic "Fall of the House of Usher." This famous short story gives the title to the tone poem.

Mr. Hill's work abounds in the harsh dissonances of the modern school. At times, however, there is an elusive beauty, very similar to Debussy at his best. The result is a fine piece of painting in music, very atmospheric.

Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, originally written for the piano and brilliantly transcribed for orchestra by Gabriel Pierené, abounds in beauty suggestive of the classic composers.

PENSION

No orchestral score i and magnificent in orie than "Scheherazade," the suite by the Russian, Rimsk koff, which will be the feature concert Sunday afternoon, Nov.
Symphony Hall at 3:30 o'clock, in ai
the orchestra's pension fund.

Mr. Monteux will also conduct at this concert Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." A soloist soon to be announced will make the concert even more eventful.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Having completed the first southern trip, which occupied last week and which was marked by brilliantly successful concerts in each city of its travels, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Monteux has compiled an unusually interesting program, to begin with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor. He will also conduct the first performances of "Four Preludes for Orchestra" by Gustave Strube, who was once a member of the orchestra, and, for another novelty, a symphonic poem by the Italian Resphigi, which describes four of the fountains of Rome. The brilliant closing number will be Strauss's fantastic work, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

---

m HERALD
dress New York City NOV 7

'House of Usher' in Music Form Played Here by Orchestra

Boston Symphony Gives E. B. Hill's Composition Based on Poe's Masterpiece.

At last "The Fall of the House of Usher" has been composed, but not by Debussy. For years his lyric drama was promised in the Metropolitan prospectus till the world began to believe it to be one of those Penelope scores of the family of Boito's "Nerone," that are never finished. The title is printed no more. Debussy has ceased to sing. But Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, Mass., in the summer of 1919 made a poem for orchestra on the theme of Poe's weird tale. It had its first performance in Boston on October 30 and was given here yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Hill is a musician of discretion. He composed with the intent chiefly to create a musical reproduction of the atmosphere of the story and only suggestively associated two themes with Roderick and Madeline. He fashioned the work in the short sonata form, that which contains no development section. Mr. Hill would have been a musician of greater discretion if he had permitted this masterpiece of American fiction to repose in the silence to which a vulgar and lewd generation of readers has consigned all such glories of our literature.

The Cambridge composer has written an elegant piece of music, logically constructed and orchestrated with true Bostonian cunning. The New England school of arts and crafts is famous through at least one seaboard, and its musical, pictorial and literary products are discussed over many afternoon teas and before ladies' clubs by prominent lecturers. In such circles much will be said of Mr. Hill's poem, but of Poe's creation little. The music is praiseworthy; the story is incomparable. Mr. Hill has made a commendable effort; Poe penned an immortal tale of mystery, a tragedy of gloom and horror, not rivalled by anything in the works of Maeterlinck or Ibsen.

As for Mr. Hill's pictorial climax, the actual fall of the house—many buildings have collapsed in music. Saint-Saens pulled down the palace at Gaza, and Rubinstein knocked over the Tower of Babel. Music has only one way of doing the thing. Literature has a thousand, and none surpasses Poe's. And that is the end of the story.

The other numbers on yesterday afternoon's list were Enesco's symphony in E flat, Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. The orchestra played the symphony fairly well and the work, not new, was worth hearing again. It is not a great creation, but it serves a purpose.

NEW YORK Journal
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
NOV-7

The opening of the season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Infantry Hall on Nov. 16 will follow performances not only in Boston but in a number of other cities. The orchestra completed the first regular tour of the Southern cities last week, which included appearances in Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York.

The virtosi of the orchestra is unchanged from former seasons except in the case of Richard Burgin, the new concert master, who is numbered among the five soloists to be heard in this city. The leaders of the sections are in some cases of many years' standing. The newest comers are Frederic Denayer and Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to act as first viola and first 'cello respectively. Fernand Thillois, who sits at the head of the second violin section, came in 1918.

Of longer standing in Boston are Max Kunze, leader of the double basses, and Julius Theodorowicz, second concert master, whose career in Boston dates back to his participation in the Kneisel Quartet. Alfred Holy, the first harp, is well known to all who are familiar with the orchestra, and the veteran among the wood-wind is Georges Longy, who has been named authoritatively as without peer among living oboists. Alfred Sand, the Russian virtuoso, is now serving his seventh year as first clarinet.

The newer comers are George Laurent, first flute; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, English horn, who are now in their third season with the orchestra. There are, strictly speaking, two English horn players, in that Mr. Speyer alternates with Mr. Frederick Mueller, who has played the wood-wind instrument for many years with the orchestra under many conductors.

Of the brass choir, Carl Hampe, as first trombone, is the oldest among leaders of the sections of the orchestra, while George Wendler, as first horn, comes second in length of service. Georges Mager is now serving his second season as first trumpet. Stefan Neumann is perhaps as familiar as any single member of the orchestra, on account of his agility and unerring accuracy upon the kettle drums.

From TRIBUNE, NOV 7 1920 L
New York City

Work of Boston Orchestra on Its First Visit

Symphonies by Finnish and Rumanian Composers Draw Sharp Line Between Productions of Two Kinds

Opposite Ideas Shown

"The Fall of the House of Usher" Heard in Concert Given in This City

By H. E. Krehbiel

In their first visit to New York this season Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra have done a service which deserves a few words of comment. By giving a hearing to symphonies by the Finnish composer Sibelius and the Rumanian Enesco (the latter at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall) he has drawn a sharp line of demarcation between the progressive composers of a decade ago and the revolutionaries of to-day. It is not necessary to seek for the element called nationalism in order to emphasize the difference between the music of these two men and that of Casella, Malipiero and Ernest Bloch which has been brought before the popular judgment seat. That element is somewhat hazy to the general understanding and at the best and the vision is considerably obscured by the fact that the influences reflected in it are not those which can be traced to the peoples from whose loins the composers sprang. Sibelius discloses most obviously Scandinavian and Slavic influences; Enesco, Casella and Malipiero French and Russian; Bloch is Hebraic in his capacity to assimilate whatever popular idiom he chooses to exploit. The fact that he is a Swiss by nativity, racially a Hebrew and German in technical training has nothing to do with the fact that he has written music tinged by synagogal hymns, or a piece like the suite for viola and orchestra, which he would have us believe was evoked in him by dream-visions of the Far, Far East—Siam, possibly; Burmah, Java, Japan—what not. What he succeeded best in doing was to make what would be a capital Chinese ballet of the purposely grotesque order.

Differences in Music

The difference between the music of the revolutionaries of to-day and that of the aggressively forward young men of a decade or two ago is that it proceeds from two opposite conceptions of musical creation. In the Sibelius and Enesco symphonies it was obvious that expressive and plastic musical thoughts were deemed primarily essential, and that modes of expression, novel if possible, the product of skill warmed by imagination, were fitted to them. In the compositions which we have thought it a duty to condemn it is obviously novel utterance which is the first aim of the composers, and melodic substance, idea, motive, only a necessary stalking-horse. They seem to be striving, as a few writers of cubist prose, for a brief space, a few years ago, to arouse images, as they say, or quicken the fancy and emotions, by strange combinations of instrumental timbres. And as lurid colors strike the eye more quickly and forcibly than subdued, so the tendency of the would-be anarchs is to emphasize dissonances by shrieking them into our ears. These coloristic tricks are easily caught and copied, and hence this rude impressionism soon grows monotonous and wearisome.

Effort Toward Middle Course

In a new composition played by the Boston Orchestra yesterday we thought that we had observed an effort to follow a middle course. It was a piece, which for want of a more appropriate term, was called "The Fall of the House of Usher," from the poem of Edward Burlingame Hill, an American. Confessedly it was descriptive music, but in the intention of the composer a delineation of moods, which he found in Poe's story, with intentional realism of the picturesque characters only in the sonorous climax and end, which was built upon the phrases or emotions which had served their psychological purpose earlier. They did not show in the ruin which they were designed at last to depict, but disclosed themselves there, as we thought, in their highest potency. The thematic material did not seem very pregnant, but it was at least plastic, and Mr. Hill showed ingenuity and learning in his moulding of it. The instrumentation was colorful, but a somewhat excessive use of the tintinabulating celesta led even superficial hearers to think of Strauss's mervelously successful device of sprinkling harmonic dew in "Rosenkavalier" and to that extent diminished Mr. Hill's claim to originality. But to make original use of celesta tones is about as difficult a task nowadays as to create a sensation with a harp glissando.

Mr. Monteux's other numbers were an orchestral setting by Pierné of César Franck's "Prelude Chorale and Fugue" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 7 1920 A

PRINCIPALS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Although the sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of five Boston Symphony concerts at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12 (at which the soloists will be Reinald Werrenrath, Samuel Gardner, Alice Neilsen, Richard Burgin and Felix Fox), closes next Friday, a few desirable seats are still available.

The orchestra has already, at the beginning of this, its 40th season, played in a number of cities as well as Boston and has just completed its first "Southern tour," which includes appearances in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York. In every city the superfine qualities of this virtuoso organization, so prominent in our musical world, was enthusiastically praised. It is worth nothing that the illustrious virtuosi who lead the various section of the orchestra are unchanged from past seasons except in the single case of Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who is numbered among the soloists in Providence.

To lead the string sections in the orchestra, Fernand Thillois came from France to sit at the head of the second violin section in 1918, while Frederic Denayer and Jean Bedetti came likewise from Europe last autumn to be first viola and first 'cello respectively. These two fine musicians have more than confirmed their reputation abroad as worthy to be ranked among the few masters of their instruments now living.

Of longer standing in Boston are Max Kunze, leader of the double basses, and Julius Theodorowicz, second concertmaster, whose career in Boston dates back to his participation in the Kneisel Quartet. Alfred Holy, the illustrious first harp, is well known indeed to all who are familiar with the orchestra. The veteran among the wood-wind is Georges Longy, who has been named authoritatively as without peer among living oboists. Alfred Sand, the Russian virtuoso, is now serving his seventh year as first clarinet. The newcomers are Georges Laurent, first flute; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, English horn, who are now in their third season with the orchestra. There are, strictly speaking, two English-born players, in that Mr. Speyer alternates with Mr. Frederick Mueller, who has played his beautiful wood-wind instrument for many years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and under many directors.

Of the brass choir, Carl Hampe, as first trombone, is the veteran among leaders of the sections of the orchestra, while George Wendler, as first horn, comes second in length of service. Georges Mager is now serving his second season as brilliant first trumpet. Stefan Neymann is perhaps as familiar as any single member of the orchestra on account of his agility and unerring accuracy upon the kettle drums.

* * *

From
EVENING WORLD NOV 8 1920 H
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday offered a novelty, the American composer Edward Burlinghame Hill's poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," after Poe. Mr. Hill says he has tried only to give "an impression of the atmosphere of the story as a whole." The psychology involved in the music seemed hardly to be comprehended by the audience, which received the work rather coldly; but it shows serious intent and sound musicianship. For the rest Mr. Monteux's programme held Enesco's symphony in E flat major, Gabriel Pierne's orchestration of Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

From NOV 7 1920
Morning Telegraph
New York

Repeating its first New York program of Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, last evening gave further evidence of its worth to a large and representative audience in Carnegie Hall. Again the Sibelius Symphony with its melodious interchanging and effects, was well received, and the Scriabine "Poem of Ecstacy" did credit to both leader and musicians.

From American
New York City
NOV 7 1920 M

POE STORY IN MUSIC HAS HEARING HERE

Boston Symphony Men Play Hill's Orchestral Poem, "Fall of the House of Usher."

ENESCOU WORK BRILLIANT

London String Quartet Gives a Programme That Ranges from Mozart to Debussy.

By MAX SMITH.

Back in Manhattan, after the usual excursion to Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall gave its first matinee of the season.

As at Thursday night's concert Pierre Monteux avoided the classics, though he reached back as far as Berlioz for his final contribution, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

Except for Edward Burlingham's poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," which had its first hearing in New York, the programme might have been described as all-French. Still, Georges Enescou, represented by the symphony in E flat major, opus 13, is by birth and inheritance a Roumanian, though he is generally classified as Gallis; and Cesar Franck, whose prelude, chorale and fugue, transcribed for orchestra by Gabriel Pierne, completed the list of offerings, was born in Belgium and presumably had German blood in his veins.

The symphony of Enescou is not entirely new to the local public. It was produced here in 1911 by the Symphony Society, Walter Damrosch, conductor. To many who heard it yesterday, however, in a performance that put Pierre Monteux and his musicians in the best light, the work was practically a novelty.

It is a brilliant composition, finely wrought, colorfully orchestrated, and withal sane enough not to offend ears that balk at the latest discoveries in the realm of cacophony.

There are more than a few suggestions of Wagner to be sure. Indeed, the character of the music is decidedly more Teutonic than Gallic. But an occasional reminder that the genius of the Bayreuth master still exerts an influence is by no means disagreeable these days.

To place Hill's orchestral conception of Edgar Allan Poe's poem immediately after the Enescou music was a somewhat cruel test. This gifted American composer, pedagogue and writer has put some excellent works to his credit. But the score heard yesterday is hardly likely to rank among his most successful efforts, though it is of recent origin. The thematic material is trite, the instrumentation uninteresting, the harmonic scheme peculiarly monotonous.

From NOV-8 1920 M
News
Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it struck me at the concert last Wednesday, has "come back" fully. It is most unfair to hold against this fine old organization its work last season, when it was still in the throes of its war and post-armistice difficulties—raw, inadequately rehearsed, the musicians in large measure unaccustomed to each other and to their new director. It is most unfair, I say, to retain conclusions that might then have been formed.

The performance last week was, I thought, beautiful in tone, the volume was big and there were many splendid effects of color and shading. M. Monteux proved more conclusively than ever that he is entitled to rank with the ablest of present-day conductors.

It's a pity Mabel Garrison's engagement as soloist had not been announced longer in advance. It was an emergency, however, for Helen Stanley, who had been expected, was taken ill and it was not known until two days before the concert she would be unable to sing. Why will prima donnas insist upon waiting until the last moment to be taken ill?

Miss Garrison was in lovely voice, which means she sang her numbers exquisitely. [illegible] ering her season at the Metropolitan in splendid health, cheer[illegible] and sweet, as she always is, and evidently anticipating her work with keen joy. She told me her new roles would possibly include Lakme or The Doll in "Contes d'Hoffman." Do you remember how charming she was in this opera when she was with the Aborn Company prior to her Metropolitan elevation?

Evening Globe
New York
NOV 8 1920 X

Music.

The Boston Orchestra Heard in New Music.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings us grateful relief from the everlasting chestnut crop that flourishes with such persistent vigor in our concert rooms. Saturday afternoon the visiting band again filled the Carnegie auditorium with the enticement of unfamiliar strains. Some of these one may never want to hear again, but who is avid of nine out of ten of the over-driven, tortured, agonizing, mercy-craving classics? It is good to hear a piece of new music, if only once.

The programme Saturday was a case in point. Mr. Monteux introduced to New York "The Fall of the House of Usher," a "poem for orchestra," by Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, "after" Poe's famous tale. Ah, that little word "after"; it is fraught with peril! Always a stickler for form, Mr. Hill has cast his "poem" in the "abridged sonata form" and, it is officially stated, has sought to reproduce the atmosphere rather than the incidents of the story.

That Poe's tale should attract composers is not surprising. There is the lure of an easy achievement. No imaginative effort is needed; Poe supplied that! Perhaps because Debussy possessed imagination he never turned the story into an opera, as he at one time purposed. The burden which rests upon the composer is to evoke an appropriate atmosphere. In that Mr. Hill, despite some very latter-day effects of harmony and instrumentation, including the tiny tinkle of a celesta, and all the reinforcing splendor of the Boston strings fails. Neither the bodeful melancholy nor the ultimate terror is realized. There is less suggestion of the haunting figures of Roderick Usher and the Lady Madeline than of an extended flirtation between Stravinsky and a Waldteufel waltz. The audience (which might have been larger) received the work politely and without the pretense of a shiver.

The concert opened with the E flat symphony of that Roumanian Parisian, Georges Enesco, which, though unfamiliar, had been played here before. M. Enesco speaks frankly of his debt to Wagner and to Brahms, and he is scarcely less explicit in tone. In the second movement of this symphony forest and sea conspire once more with night against the fancied security of King Mark. As a whole, it is an agreeable work, rightly and richly scored.

Mr. Hill's poem followed, and then came the first performance here of an orchestral version by Gabriel Pierné of César Franck's well-known Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue for piano. M. Pierné is a master of orchestration, and there can be no doubt that he set about this task with loving reverence, and yet the fugue, as he has scored it, is singularly ineffective. Other pages breathe frankincence and move with a ritual pomp. But the indebtedness to the marching grail knights of Parsifal becomes in the orchestral version almost grotesquely plain. On the whole, the Pierné transcription suffers the usual lot of piano pieces done over for orchestra, even by a master hand. The performance led by Mr. Monteux was as sympathetic and persuasive as could be desired.

For the final number the conducto has recourse to the tried and true; brilliant performance of Berlioz "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, cappe with the relief of the familiar, the c max of a concert which had provide enough, but not too much, of t relief of the unfamiliar.

NEWS.
NOV 13 1920 A
Providence, R. I.

The Providence season of Bost Symphony concerts, which will op next Tuesday evening in Infant Hall at 8:15, will follow numero highly successful appearances this famous organization in many cities, culminating in the first regular Southern trip of the orchestra which was completed last week.

Pierre Monteux will open the Providence season with the fourth symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest in the orchestral repertory. He will also conduct Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3.

As soloist of the evening, Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone who has no equal in popularity on our concert stage, will sing Mozart's aria, "Aprite un po' quegliocchi," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and the popular love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Werrenrath has already made a notable name for himself by his appearances in recitals of his own, in oratorios, and as soloist with orchestras in all parts of the country. His debut as Toni in "Pagliacci," at the Metropolitan Opera House, was the event of the opera season in New York.

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
NOV 14 1920 A

By N. R. Pettis

The week to come—while not so full of musical events as its predecessor—will yet be conspicuous for the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, always hailed with delight by a host of musical people throughout the city and State as well as by a representative contingent of Providence people widely recognized as sponsors of the orchestra as successive seasons come and go.

* * *

REGINALD WERRENRATH.
New York Baritone.—He Will be the Soloist at the Opening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 14 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS TUESDAY.

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall, follows notably successful concerts in a number of cities by this famous orchestra. Completing its first southern trip a week ago, the public and press in New York and each city of its travels expressed the highest enthusiasm for the band in its present state.

Pierre Monteux, as generally admired as any conductor the orchestra has had, will open the Providence concert with the splendid Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest of all symphonies. Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, is also of special interest, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3, which, according to the plot of "Fidelio," Beethoven's only opera, expresses the joy of deliverance from imprisonment by the stirring trumpet calls from behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has no peer in popularity on our concert stage. Since his debut at the Worcester Festival in [illegible] he has toured the United States several times, singing jointly with Geraldine Farrar in many cities, and in 1918 traveling to the Pacific Coast. During the same winter he made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in the part of Tonio in "Pagliacci." His notable appearances in oratorio, as well as in recitals of his own, are equalled only in interest by his appearances as soloist with th's orchestra. At this concert he will sing the aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the famous love song "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

* * *

From BULLETIN, NOV 15 1920
R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE TO-MORROW

Famous Organization Fresh from Regular Trip Through South.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season in Infantry Hall at 8:15 to-morrow evening. This famous organization has just completed its first regular trip through the Southern States.

From NOV 7 L
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Work of Boston Orchestra on Its First Visit

Symphonies by Finnish and Rumanian Composers Draw Sharp Line Between Productions of Two Kinds

Opposite Ideas Shown

"The Fall of the House of Usher" Heard in Concert Given in This City

By H. E. Krehbiel

In their first visit to New York this season Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra have done a service which deserves a few words of comment. By giving a hearing to symphonies by the Finnish composer Sibelius and the Rumanian Enesco (the latter at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall) he has drawn a sharp line of demarcation between the progressive composers of a decade ago and the revolutionaries of to-day. It is not necessary to seek for the element called nationalism in order to emphasize the difference between the music of these two men and that of Casella, Malipiero and Ernest Bloch which has been brought before the popular judgment seat. That element is somewhat hazy to the general understanding and at the best and the vision is considerably obscured by the fact that the influences reflected in it are not those which can be traced to the peoples from whose loins the composers sprang. Sibelius discloses most obviously Scandinavian and Slavic influences; Enesco, Casella and Malipiero French and Russian; Bloch is Hebraic in his capacity to assimilate whatever popular idiom he chooses to exploit. The fact that he is a Swiss by nativity, racially a Hebrew and German in technical training has nothing to do with the fact that he has written music tinged by synagogal hymns, or a piece like the suite for viola and orchestra, which he would have us believe was evoked in him by dream-visions of the Far, Far East—Siam, possibly; Burmah, Java, Japan—what not. What he succeeded best in doing was to make what would be a capital Chinese ballet of the purposely grotesque order.

Differences in Music

The difference between the music of the revolutionaries of to-day and that of the aggressively forward young men of a decade or two ago is that it proceeds from two opposite conceptions of musical creation. In the Sibelius and Enesco symphonies it was obvious that expressive and plastic musical thoughts were deemed primarily essential, and that modes of expression, novel if possible, the product of skill warmed by imagination, were fitted to them. In the compositions which we have thought it a duty to condemn it is obviously novel utterance which is the first aim of the composers, and melodic substance, idea, motive, only a necessary stalking-horse. They seem to be striving, as a few writers of cubist prose, for a brief space, a few years ago, to arouse images, as they say, or quicken the fancy and emotions, by strange combinations of instrumental timbres. And as lurid colors strike the eye more quickly and forcibly than subdued, so the tendency of the would-be anarchs is to emphasize dissonances by shrieking them into our ears. These coloristic tricks are easily caught and copied, and hence this rude impressionism soon grows monotonous and wearisome.

Effort Toward Middle Course

In a new composition played by the Boston Orchestra yesterday we thought that we had observed an effort to follow a middle course. It was a piece, which for want of a more appropriate term, was called "The Fall of the House of Usher," from the poem of Edward Burlingame Hill, an American. Confessedly it was descriptive music, but in the intention of the composer a delineation of moods, which he found in Poe's story, with intentional realism of the picturesque characters only in the sonorous climax and end, which was built upon the phrases or emotions which had served their psychological purpose earlier. They did not show in the ruin which they were designed at last to depict, but disclosed themselves there, as we thought, in their highest potency. The thematic material did not seem very pregnant, but it was at least plastic, and Mr. Hill showed ingenuity and learning in his moulding of it. The instrumentation was colorful, but a somewhat excessive use of the tintinabulating celesta led even superficial hearers to think of Strauss's mervelously successful device of sprinkling harmonic dew in "Rosenkavalier" and to that extent diminished Mr. Hill's claim to originality. But to make original use of celesta tones is about as difficult a task nowadays as to create a sensation with a harp glissando.

Mr. Monteux's other numbers were an orchestral setting by Pierné of César Franck's "Prelude Chorale and Fugue" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

---

om TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I. ate NOV-7 1920

PRINCIPALS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Although the sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of five Boston Symphony concerts at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 8 and April 12 (at which the soloists will be Reinald Werrenrath, Samuel Gardner, Alice Neilsen, Richard Burgin and Felix Fox), closes next Friday, a few desirable seats are still available.

The orchestra has already, at the beginning of this, its 40th season, played in a number of cities as well as Boston and has just completed its first "Southern tour," which includes appearances in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York. In every city the superfine qualities of this virtuoso organization, so prominent in our musical world, was enthusiastically praised. It is worth nothing that the illustrious virtuosi who lead the various section of the orchestra are unchanged from past seasons except in the single case of Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who is numbered among the soloists in Providence.

To lead the string sections in the orchestra, Fernand Thillois came from France to sit at the head of the second violin section in 1918, while Frederic Denayer and Jean Bedetti came likewise from Europe last autumn to be first viola and first 'cello respectively. These two fine musicians have more than confirmed their reputation abroad as worthy to be ranked among the few masters of their instruments now living.

Of longer standing in Boston are Max Kunze, leader of the double basses, and Julius Theodorowicz, second concertmaster, whose career in Boston dates back to his participation in the Kneisel Quartet. Alfred Holy, the illustrious first harp, is well known indeed to all who are familiar with the orchestra. The veteran among the wood-wind is Georges Longy, who has been named authoritatively as without peer among living oboists. Alfred Sand, the Russian virtuoso, is now serving his seventh year as first clarinet. The newcomers are Georges Laurent, first flute; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, English horn, who are now in their third season with the orchestra. There are, strictly speaking, two English-born players, in that Mr. Speyer alternates with Mr. Frederick Mueller, who has played his beautiful wood-wind instrument for many years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and under many directors.

Of the brass choir, Carl Hampe, as first trombone, is the veteran among leaders of the sections of the orchestra, while George Wendler, as first horn, comes second in length of service. Georges Mager is now serving his second season as brilliant first trumpet. Stefan Neymann is perhaps as familiar as any single member of the orchestra on account of his agility and unerring accuracy upon the kettle drums.

* * *

From NOV 8 1920 H
EVENING WORLD
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday offered a novelty, the American composer Edward Burlinghame Hill's poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," after Poe. Mr. Hill says he has tried only to give "an impression of the atmosphere of the story as a whole." The psychology involved in the music seemed hardly to be comprehended by the audience, which received the work rather coldly; but it shows serious intent and sound musicianship. For the rest Mr. Monteux's programme held Enesco's symphony in E flat major, Gabriel Pierne's orchestration of Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

From NOV 7 1920
Morning Telegraph
New York

Repeating its first New York program of Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, last evening gave further evidence of its worth to a large and representative audience in Carnegie Hall. Again the Sibelius Symphony with its melodious interchanging and effects, was well received, and the Scriabine "Poem of Ecstacy" did credit to both leader and musicians.

From American
New York City
NOV 7 1920 M

POE STORY IN MUSIC HAS HEARING HERE

Boston Symphony Men Play Hill's Orchestral Poem, "Fall of the House of Usher."

ENESCOU WORK BRILLIANT

London String Quartet Gives a Programme That Ranges from Mozart to Debussy.

By MAX SMITH.

Back in Manhattan, after the usual excursion to Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall gave its first matinee of the season.

As at Thursday night's concert Pierre Monteux avoided the classics, though he reached back as far as Berlioz for his final contribution, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

Except for Edward Burlingham's poem for orchestra, "The Fall of the House of Usher," which had its first hearing in New York, the programme might have been described as all-French. Still, Georges Enescou, represented by the symphony in E flat major, opus 13, is by birth and inheritance a Roumanian, though he is generally classified as Gallis; and Cesar Franck, whose prelude, chorale and fugue, transcribed for orchestra by Gabriel Pierne, completed the list of offerings, was born in Belgium and presumably had German blood in his veins.

The symphony of Enescou is not entirely new to the local public. It was produced here in 1911 by the Symphony Society, Walter Damrosch, conductor. To many who heard it yesterday, however, in a performance that put Pierre Monteux and his musicians in the best light, the work was practically a novelty.

It is a brilliant composition, finely wrought, colorfully orchestrated, and withal sane enough not to offend ears that balk at the latest discoveries in the realm of cacophony.

There are more than a few suggestions of Wagner to be sure. Indeed the character of the music is decidedly more Teutonic than Gallic. But an occasional reminder that the genius of the Bayreuth master still exerts an influence is by no means disagreeable these days.

To place Hill's orchestral conception of Edgar Allan Poe's poem immediately after the Enescou music was a somewhat cruel test. This gifted American composer, pedagogue and writer has put some excellent works to his credit. But the score heard yesterday is hardly likely to rank among his most successful efforts, though it is of recent origin. The thematic material is trite, the instrumentation uninteresting, the harmonic scheme peculiarly monotonous.

From NOV-8 1920 M
News
Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it struck me at the concert last Wednesday, has "come back" fully. It is most unfair to hold against this fine old organization its work last season, when it was still in the throes of its war and post-armistice difficulties—raw, inadequately rehearsed, the musicians in large measure unaccustomed to each other and to their new director. It is most unfair, I say, to retain conclusions that might then have been formed.

The performance last week was, I thought, beautiful in tone, the volume was big and there were many splendid effects of color and shading. M. Monteux proved more conclusively than ever that he is entitled to rank with the ablest of present-day conductors.

It's a pity Mabel Garrison's engagement as soloist had not been announced longer in advance. It was an emergency, however, for Helen Stanley, who had been expected, was taken ill and it was not known until two days before the concert she would be unable to sing. Why will prima donnas insist upon waiting until the last moment to be taken ill?

Miss Garrison was in lovely voice, which means she sang her numbers exquisitely. [illegible]ering her season at the Metropolitan in splendid health, cheerful and sweet, as she always is, and evidently anticipating her work with keen joy. She told me her new roles would possibly include Lakme or The Doll in "Contes d'Hoffman." Do you remember how charming she was in this opera when she was with the Aborn Company prior to her Metropolitan elevation?

[47]

Evening Globe
New York
NOV 8 1920 X

Music.

The Boston Orchestra Heard in New Music.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings us grateful relief from the everlasting chestnut crop that flourishes with such persistent vigor in our concert rooms. Saturday afternoon the visiting band again filled the Carnegie auditorium with the enticement of unfamiliar strains. Some of these one may never want to hear again, but who is avid of nine out of ten of the over-driven, tortured, agonizing, mercy-craving classics? It is good to hear a piece of new music, if only once.

The programme Saturday was a case in point. Mr. Monteux introduced to New York "The Fall of the House of Usher," a "poem for orchestra," by Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, "after" Poe's famous tale. Ah, that little word "after"; it is fraught with peril! Always a stickler for form, Mr. Hill has cast his "poem" in the "abridged sonata form" and, it is officially stated, has sought to reproduce the atmosphere rather than the incidents of the story.

That Poe's tale should attract composers is not surprising. There is the lure of an easy achievement. No imaginative effort is needed; Poe supplied that! Perhaps because Debussy possessed imagination he never turned the story into an opera, as he at one time purposed. The burden which rests upon the composer is to evoke an appropriate atmosphere. In that Mr. Hill, despite some very latter-day effects of harmony and instrumentation, including the tiny tinkle of a celesta, and all the reinforcing splendor of the Boston strings fails. Neither the bodeful melancholy nor the ultimate terror is realized. There is less suggestion of the haunting figures of Roderick Usher and the Lady Madeline than of an extended flirtation between Stravinsky and a Waldteufel waltz. The audience (which might have been larger) received the work politely and without the pretense of a shiver.

The concert opened with the E flat symphony of that Roumanian Parisian, Georges Enesco, which, though unfamiliar, had been played here before. M. Enesco speaks frankly of his debt to Wagner and to Brahms, and he is scarcely less explicit in tone. In the second movement of this symphony forest and sea conspire once more with night against the fancied security of King Mark. As a whole, it is an agreeable work, rightly and richly scored.

Mr. Hill's poem followed, and then came the first performance here of an orchestral version by Gabriel Pierné of César Franck's well-known Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue for piano. M. Pierné is a master of orchestration, and there can be no doubt that he set about this task with loving reverence, and yet the fugue, as he has scored it, is singularly ineffective. Other pages breathe frankincence and move with a ritual pomp. But the indebtedness to the marching grail knights of Parsifal becomes in the orchestral version almost grotesquely plain. On the whole, the Pierné transcription suffers the usual lot of piano pieces done over for orchestra, even by a master hand. The performance led by Mr. Monteux was as sympathetic and persuasive as could be desired.

For the final number the conductor has recourse to the tried and true; a brilliant performance of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, capped with the relief of the familiar, the climax of a concert which had provided enough, but not too much, of the relief of the unfamiliar.

NEWS.

The Providence season of Boston Symphony concerts, which will open next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15, will follow numerous highly successful appearances of this famous organization in many cities, culminating in the first regular Southern trip of the orchestra which was completed last week.

Pierre Monteux will open the Providence season with the fourth symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest in the orchestral repertory. He will also conduct Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's overture to Lecnore No. 3.

As soloist of the evening, Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone who has no equal in popularity on our concert stage, will sing Mozart's aria, "Aprite un po' quegliocchi," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and the popular love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Werrenrath has already made a notable name for himself by his appearances in recitals of his own, in oratorios, and as soloist with orchestras in all parts of the country. His debut as Toni in "Pagliacci," at the Metropolitan Opera House, was the event of the opera season in New York.

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
NOV 14 1920

By N. B. Pettis

The week to come—while not so full of musical events as its predecessor—will yet be conspicuous for the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, always hailed with delight by a host of musical people throughout the city and State as well as by a representative contingent of Providence people widely recognized as sponsors of the orchestra as successive seasons come and go.

* * *

REGINALD WERRENRATH.
New York Baritone.—He Will be the Soloist at the Opening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.

TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R.I.
e NOV 14 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS TUESDAY.

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall, follows notably successful concerts in a number of cities by this famous orchestra. Completing its first southern trip a week ago, the public and press in New York and each city of its travels expressed the highest enthusiasm for the band in its present state.

Pierre Monteux, as generally admitted as any conductor the orchestra has had, will open the Providence concert with the splendid Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest of all symphonies. Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, is also of special interest, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3, which, according to the plot of "Fidelio," Beethoven's only opera, expresses the joy of deliverance from imprisonment by the stirring trumpet calls from behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has no peer in popularity on our concert stage. Since his debut at the Worcester Festival in 1907, he has toured the United States several times, singing jointly with Geraldine Farrar in many cities, and in 1918 traveling to the Pacific Coast. During the same winter he made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in the part of Tonio in "Pagliacci." His notable appearances in oratorio, as well as in recitals of his own, are equalled only in interest by his appearances as soloist with this orchestra. At this concert he will sing the aria, "Aprite un po' quegl'occhi" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the famous love song "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

* * *

From
BULLETIN, NOV 15 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE TO-MORROW

Famous Organization Fresh from Regular Trip Through South.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season in Infantry Hall at 8:15 to-morrow evening. The famous organization has just completed its first regular trip through the Southern States.

I.
1920 ot so full of ecessor—will opening con-

y Orchestra,
y a host of the city and a representative people widely of the orchestra
come and go.

RRENRATH.
—He Will be the
ing Concert of the Orchestra in In-esday Evening.

NE
ovidence, R. I.
OV 14 1920

PHONY SEASON OPENS
TUESDAY.

ce season of the Boston hestra, which will begin vening at 8:15 in Infantry
otably successful concerts
of cities by this famous pleting its first southern go, the public and press nd each city of its travels highest enthusiasm for the esent state.
eux, as generally admired
tor the orchestra has had,
Providence concert with Fourth Symphony of Brahms onsidered one of the finest nies. Cesar Franck's Pre-and Fugue, orchestrated by e, is also of special inter-hoven's Overture to Leonore
according to the plot of eethoven's only opera, exoy of deliverance from im-y the stirring trumpet calls the stage.
of this concert will be renrath, the young Ameri-
who has no peer in popur concert stage. Since his Worcester Festival in 1907,
ed the United States several g jointly with Geraldine any cities, and in 1918 trav-Pacific Coast. During the he made his debut at the Opera House in the part of Pagliacci." His notable apn oratorio, as well as in res own, are equalled only in his appearances as soloist rchestra. At this concert he e aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' Mozart's "Marriage of Fi-
the famous love song "Vision
rom Massenet's "Herodiade."

From
TIMES
Hartford Conn.
NOV13

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Concert Season in Auspicious Way

Fears for Famous Organization's Future Somewhat Dispelled by Performance in Carnegie Hall.

BY JULIUS HARTT.

The recent fortunes of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been matter of grave concern to its friends. The public that by long habit has come to look upon this organization as representing all that is finest in orchestral delineation of musical art has been seriously alarmed in view of the reactions of the war on this time-honored institution. The performances of the orchestra last season were not of such a character as altogether to quiet these fears. And it is, therefore, the more gratifying to record that the Boston Symphony orchestra's first New York concert this season at Carnegie hall went a long way toward dispelling the misgivings of the last year or more. In the first place, the personnel of the orchestra has undergone many changes. There are so few of the old and familiar faces now remaining in the band and such a large proportion of new players now fill the chairs long occupied by well-known instrumentalists, that the organization seems hardly recognizable as the Boston Symphony orchestra. In fact, the Boston orchestra seems to have undergone almost complete rehabilitation since Major Higginson ceased to father its fortunes and dominate its policies. To a still greater degree than last year, young or comparatively young, players now sit under Mr. Monteux's baton. The personnel of the band is distinctly less foreign in appearance than ever before. The Boston Symphony orchestra is beginning to look like an American institution. Its chauvinistic friends will find in all this ground for complacency and gratification. The test, however, comes with actual performance. A great orchestra can scarcely come into existence with the celerity of a mushroom bed. Nor has an all-American, all-French, all-German, or a band of an all-any-other national cast necessarily any advantage over an orchestra more cosmopolitan in its personnel and bringing together in its fabric varying strands of nationality. Quite the reverse. The ideal orchestra will be ideally compounded to the degree that it lays embargo upon the best talent of all countries. And this, for reasons too obvious to warrant enumeration, Major Higginson assembled what was probably the finest band of orchestral players in all musical history. The conditions were such when the Boston Symphony orchestra was organized and for years thereafter, that Major Higginson had only to beckon to the most accomplished instrumentalists in the musical world and, in a majority of instances, they promptly came to Boston in response to his gesture. It was this selective process, pursued on the broadest lines and with the rarest wisdom and discrimination, that gave the great conductors of the Boston orchestra the material with which to mould the surpassing orchestral medium that the Boston Symphony orchestra became.

But conditions have completely changed. And it is the change in conditions that has rendered difficult the task of the trustees of the Boston orchestra in their efforts to get the band back to anything like its former footing. No manager can now take his check book and contract blanks and, visiting the musical centers of the world, pick and choose the personnel of an orchestra. For there are too many bidders in the field and there are far from enough players of distinction to meet the demand. These, among other reasons unnecessary to mention, make it scarcely to be expected that the Boston orchestra will soon regain its old and unquestioned supremacy.

But in spite of drawbacks and handicaps, the Boston orchestra is coming back, as its first New York concert this season bore positive and gratifying witness. For this performance, Mr. Monteux presented a program of modern music consisting of the Sibelius symphony No. 1, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase." The works of modern composers tend to musical dissertation in extenso. The composer of the era seems often to be equally teased with the difficulty of taking hold and of letting go. And some of this embarrassment was to be felt in the works presented by Mr. Monteux on the present occasion.

The Sibelius symphony, though not beyond the suspicion of frequent discursiveness, is a work in which inspiration and imagination are caught and held in lucid form and ingratiating clarity. It is the characteristic voice of Sibelius, the rugged, sombre voice of the north that speaks. The genius of Scandinavian poetry, the spirit of the Sagas is reflected in this masterfully wrought workmanship of the Finnish composer. Sibelius is himself and none other in this symphony. The directness of his means, the distinctive certainty of his appeal, are everywhere apparent. He makes his orchestra eloquent with the noblest oratory, he unlooses all its lyric voices and he compells it to dramatic utterance of the greatest majesty. The oratory of M. Sibelius carries no suggestion of political jargon or of complex philosophical meanderings. His poetry refuses to divorc sanity and sentiment. And his dramati intensity never degenerates into resounding and undecipherable bombast. It may well be doubted, not only o the evidence of this symphony but o his later works, if M. Sibelius' predilections would even permit him to attempt biological or zoological realism through the medium of notation. In his first symphony, as everywhere else, M. Sibelius is busy with music, music expressed in definitely modern idiom. To be sure, but always music. The contemporary musical world should in consequence and in virtue of this great distinction rise up and call him blessed. Mr. Monteux and his players brought this music to effective hearing and it was in their performance of this work especially that the advancement of the orchestra since last year was most clearly and instantly to be felt.

The present writer is not familiar with the score of the Lekeu fantasia, and having heard the work but once, does not find himself possessed of any very decided conviction with regard to it. But there was already a good deal of music in the world before this work was given to the public. And the impression may be hazarded that neither the composition itself nor its performance by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony orchestra last week has materially added to the world's art treasury or contributed in any marked degree to the sum-total of permanent musical memory.

The Scriabin "Poeme," written in the composer's earlier period is a juvenile of modernity in comparison with the later Scriabin. And either Scriabin is far too complicated to hit off in a word. To ears inclined to old-fashioned tenets of musical significance Scriabin's ecstasy in this poem chiefly manifests itself in weird and interminable meanderings and philanderings which never seem to get beyond incidents more suggestive of certain happenings in Doubting Castle than of arrival at y Beulah-like state. Possibly the ecstasy is intended to be more mundane and less spiritual in its intimations. So be it. Those intent upon discovering ecstasy will make their discovery on some plane or other—perhaps. For others, M. Scriabin's astonishing virtuosity with his orchestral medium is far more likely to convey impressions of deliberate disintegration and reorganization in the chemistry of sound.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Journa
Providence, R. I.
NOV14

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin on Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry Hall, follows notably successful concerts in a number of other cities. Pierre Monteux will open the concert here with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest of all symphonies. Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, is also of special interest, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3, which, according to the plot of "Fidelio," Beethoven's only opera, expresses the joy of deliverance from imprisonment by the stirring trumpet calls from behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has won popularity on the concert stage. Sine his debut at the Worcester festival in 1907 he has toured the United States several times, singing jointly with Geraldine Farrar in many cities, and in 1918 travelling to the Pacific coast. During the same winter he made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in the part of Tonio in "Pagliacci." His appearance in oratorio, as well as in recitals of his own, are equalled in interest by his appearances as soloist with the Boston Orchestra. At this concert he will sing the aria "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the famous love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade."

Richard Burgin, the new concert master. is a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage. Mr. Burgin's career has been largely confined, by the fortunes of war, to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, winning fame as concert master in the large orchestras of each capital during the last 12 years.

He made his first acquaintance with the violin at the age of 5. His original teacher was Lotti, who, with Kreisler, was the fellow pupil of Massart, the great French teacher of the Wieniawski school. In 1902 he made his first public appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra in his native city. In 1908 he began four years of training under the great violin master, Leopold Auer, at Petrograd. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came just before his time, Seidel came later, while Jascha Heiftez was his fellow pupil and friend.

There folowed (in 1912) a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia. He played both as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Society.

He played as soloist with the Stockholm Opera House in the first public performance of the violin concerto of Sibelius, and likewise at Helsingfors, with the same work under the direction of the famous Finnish composer.

He was concert master under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise, under Richard Strauss, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Brooklyn Life
New York City
NOV13

The Boston Symphony's First Visit

It seemed strange to see vacant seats at the first of the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. True, they were not very numerous, bu there was not the throng of four years ago. It is t be hoped that Brooklyn music lovers are not allowing even a touch of apathy to develop in this di rection, for although war conditions unquestionabl worked harm in the case of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, the organization is back to form unde the direction of Piérre Monteux, and deserves th hearty support which has been its lot in Brookly for many years. Beethoven's Eighth Symphon gave last week's concert a wonderful first half an there was unfeigned delight with the second, allegretto scherzando, movement. The second half the program had unusual variety for a symphony co cert, ranging from the Gallic lightners of the Chant Mysoli from David's opera, "La Perle du Brésil," the solemnity of César Franck's prelude, chorale a fugue for pianoforte—orchestrated by Gabriel Pierr Mabel Garrison sang David's famous bird song wi the flute in a manner well calculated to bring out genuine loveliness of sentiment and tone and she ga like pleasure by a beautiful rendering of Mozart's "M Speranza Adorata." The Franck number and the fir one, the Berlioz overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," w finely played. On the whole there was an admiral beginning to the season.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
NOV 16 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE TO-DAY

Famous Organization Fresh from Regular Trip Through South.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season in Infantry Hall at 8:15 this evening. The famous organization has just completed its first regular trip through the Southern States.

Pierre Monteux will open the season here with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest in the orchestral repertory. He will also conduct Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

As soloist of the evening, Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone who has no equal in popularity on our concert stage, will sing Mozart's aria, "Aprite un Po'queglocchi," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and the popular love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade."

Mr. Werrenrath has already made a notable name for himself by his appearances in recitals of his own, in oratorios and as soloist with orchestras in all parts of the country. His debut as Tonio in "Pagliacci" at the Metropolitan Opera House was one of the events of the opera season in New York.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES
Indianapolis, Ind.
NOV16

France.

Orchestra Players Now Sound Discord

BOSTON, Nov. 16.—Rudolph Nagel, violoncello; Gustav F. Helm, trumpeter, and Fortunato Sordilo, trombone player, have each brought suits in the Superior Court for Suffolk County for $10,000 against the Boston Symphony Orchestra for alleged breach of contract. They say they were hired for the seasons of 1919-1920 to 1921-1922, inclusive, but were discharged on March 5, last. Nagel and Sordilo were each paid $50 a week and Helm received $85.72 a week.

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
NOV18

ALDA, BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 3, at 4:30 o'clock, the soloist will be Frances Alda, the famous soprano of the Metropolitan Opera [illegible] whose many notable ap[illegible]s prima donna with tha[illegible]pany are only equaled in interest by her concerts in various parts of the countr.

Pierre Monteux will revive for this concert the Symphony in C major by Mozart, which is considered one of the most charming works of the master. The novelty of the afternoon will be a symphonic fantasy on two "Folk-Songs of Anjou," by Guillaume Lekue, the genius among French composers, whose career was tragically cut short by an accident resulting in his death at an early age. The program will close with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3.

These concerts are under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, at Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
NOV16
Providence, R.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from its first regular tour of the Southern States, will open its Providence season at Infantry Hall tonight.

Accompanying the orchestra as soloist, Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, will sing Mozart's aria, "Aprie un Pe'queglecchi," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and the love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Masonet's Heriedade." Mr. Werrenrath's debut as Tonie in "Paggliacci" at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was one of the events of the opera season.

Pierre Monteaux will open the appearance here with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor. He will conduct Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

From
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
NOV17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASING

First of Providence Series Attracts Large Audience.

R. WERRENRATH SOLOIST

Singer Scores Unqualified Success in Rendition of Two Arias. Conductor Monteux Directs Orchestra in Presentation of One of Best Programmes Given Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, began its 40th Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The house was practically sold out in advance, a record in the history of the organization's visits here.

This splendid revival of interest in the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city dates from the time of its reorganization after the dismissal of Dr. Muck. The shakeup in the orchestra's personnel which followed put new life in its views, and since its Americanization a better spirit has been apparent among its members, and enthusiasm has been the keynote of its performances. Increased public interest and support is the happy result.

Last evening the full complement of men was present. The only change noted was Mr. Burgin's presence at the concertmaster's desk. The new first violinist will appear here as soloist at a later concert this season.

Mr. Monteux presented a fine programme with Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, as assisting soloist. It was as follows:

Brahms....Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico passionato.
Franck............Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart...........Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet.......Aria, "Vision Fugitive," fr m "Herodiade"
Beethoven..Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

It is said of Brahms that after hearing his symphony in E-minor for the first time he had doubts concerning its musical worth. It immediately sprang into public favor, however, and to-day stands as one of his best works. It might well be called a full-voiced symphony. The composer's mastery of instrumentation is always in evidence and the general effect is one of grandeur and changing orchestral color.

The string sections showed to good advantage under Mr. Monteux's vigorous and inspiring direction and the wood-wind and brass choirs spoke eloquently, particularly in the third movement.

Gabriel Pierne's transcription for orchestra of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for pianoforte proved a rich and enticing musical dish. The stately and dignified chorale was played with great effect and in the fugue the theme was tossed about and combined in most fascinating manner. Several delightful melodic bits for flute were brought out skilfully by the first flutist, Mr. Laurent.

Reinald Werrenrath scored an unqualified success in his two arias. His rise to fame has been steady during the past few years and his singing last evening was a pleasant surprise even to those who are familiar with his excellent previous concert performances in this city. He has gained splendidly in his art. His voice is handled with consummate skill and his interpretations of the operatic arias revealed him as a singer of unusual artistic insight.

The Mozart recitative and air was sung in polished style and with vocal charm. But in the passionate song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," he reached the height of his vocal and interpretative powers. It was a superb performance, in which vocal beauty, temperament and unerring judgment combined to delight his audience. He received tremendous applause at the close and returned several times in acknowledgment. For the final number the orchestra played the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3 bringing out its beauties in brilliant fashion.

NEW S NOV17
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT SEASON OPENING

Two score years of Boston Symphony concert music began in this city last night, with the opening concert of the season in Infantry Hall by that world-famed group of musicians. Pierre Monteux, the celebrated French conductor, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck, for many years head of the Symphony, has been seen here before in concerts last year, and his reception last night indicated that he has sprung into much popular favor among lovers of the best music.

Reinald Werrenwrath, baritone, the soloist in the first concert, also has been in Providence before with the Symphony. His rendition of Mozart's recitative and aria selections from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" were exhibitions of vocal skill, with a combined technique, temperament and interpretative ability far transcending his former work here.

The orchestra work showed, many thought, an improvement over the old days under Muck and there seemed to be a better spirit of co-operation among the individual members, responding instantly to every lead of the famous conductor.

Throughout the programme the coordinated parts of the orchestra, singly and by groups, was ever alert to bring out every shade of musical color intended by the master composers and succeeded so well that it is likely that every available seat will be taken for every concert this year, as they were last night. It was a big tribute to the genius of Monteux, [illegible]h early was recognized when he [illegible] his debut in Providence.

One has only to know the beauty of Brahms's "Symphony in E-Minor" and to be familiar with the splendid team work of the Boston Orchestra, to appreciate the beauty of the first number on the programme. The orchestra's best work, perhaps, was in the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue of Gabriel Pierne's transcription of the Cesar Franck selection. Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, was the closing number.

The programme follows:

Brahms .... Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico passionato
Franck..Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart. Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet .... Aria, "Vision Fugutive," from "Herodiade"
Beethoven .... Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

R. I.
1920 is not so full of predecessor—will the opening con-Orchestra, by a host of the city and a representative people widely

of the orchestra
come and go.

RRENRATH.
—He Will be the
ing Concert of the estra in In-esday Evening.

NE
rovidence, R. I.
NOV 14 1920

PHONY SEASON OPENS
TUESDAY.

e season of the Boston
estra, which will begin evening at 8:15 in Infantry
otably successful concerts
of cities by this famous mpleting its first southern ing public and press
each city of its travels enthusiasm for the
esent state.
as, as generally admired
r the orchestra has had,
Providence concert with Fourth Symphony of Brahms considered one of the finest nies. Cesar Franck's Pre-
and Fugue, orchestrated by e, is also of special inter-
hoven's Overture to Leonore
according to the plot of hoven's only opera, ex-of deliverance from im-by the stirring trumpet calls stage.
of this concert will be
renrath, the young Ameri-
who has no peer in popuconcert stage. Since his Worcester Festival in 1907,
the United States several jointly with Geraldine many cities, and in 1918 trav-Coast. During the
he made his debut at the Opera House in the part of
"Pagliacci." His notable ap-in oratorio, as well as in re-own, are equalled only in his appearances as soloist orchestra. At this concert he aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' Mozart's "Marriage of Fi-
the famous love song "Vision
from Massenet's "Herodiade."

From
TIMES
Hartford Conn.
NOV 13 1920 Y

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Concert Season in Auspicious Way

Fears for Famous Organization's Future Somewhat Dispelled by Performance in Carnegie Hall.

BY JULIUS HARTT.

The recent fortunes of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been matter of grave concern to its friends. The public that by long habit has come to look upon this organization as representing all that is finest in orchestral delineation of musical art has been seriously alarmed in view of the reactions of the war on this time-honored institution. The performances of the orchestra last season were not of such a character as altogether to quiet these fears. And it is, therefore, the more gratifying to record that the Boston Symphony orchestra's first New York concert this season at Carnegie hall went a long way toward dispelling the misgivings of the last year or more. In the first place, the personnel of the orchestra has undergone many changes. There are so few of the old and familiar faces now remaining in the band and such a large proportion of new players now fill the chairs long occupied by well-known instrumentalists, that the organization seems hardly recognizable as the Boston Symphony orchestra. In fact, the Boston orchestra seems to have undergone almost complete rehabilitation since Major Higginson ceased to father its fortunes and dominate its policies. To a still greater degree than last year, young or comparatively young, players now sit under Mr. Monteux's baton. The personnel of the band is distinctly less foreign in appearance than ever before. The Boston Symphony orchestra is beginning to look like an American institution. Its chauvinistic friends will find in all this ground for complacency and gratification. The test, however, comes with actual performance. A great orchestra can scarcely come into existence with the celerity of a mushroom bed. Nor has an all-American, all-French, all-German, or a band of an all-any-other national cast necessarily any advantage over an orchestra more cosmopolitan in its personnel and bringing together in its fabric varying strands of nationality. Quite the reverse. The ideal orchestra will be ideally compounded to the degree that it lays embargo upon the best talent of all countries. And this, for reasons too obvious to warrant enumeration. Major Higginson assembled what was probably the finest band of orchestral players in all musical history. The conditions were such when the Boston Symphony orchestra was organized and for years thereafter, that Major Higginson had only to beckon to the most accomplished instrumentalists in the musical world and, in a majority of instances, they promptly came to Boston in response to his gesture. It was this selective process, pursued on the broadest lines and with the rarest wisdom and discrimination, that gave the great conductors of the Boston orchestra the material with which to mould the surpassing orchestral medium that the Boston Symphony orchestra became.

But conditions have completely changed. And it is the change in conditions that has rendered difficult the task of the trustees of the Boston orchestra in their efforts to get the band back to anything like its former footing. No manager can now take his check book and contract blanks and, visiting the musical centers of the world, pick and choose the personnel of an orchestra. For there are too many bidders in the field and there are far from enough players of distinction to meet the demand. These, among other reasons unnecessary to mention, make it scarcely to be expected that the Boston orchestra will soon regain its old and unquestioned supremecy.

But in spite of drawbacks and handicaps, the Boston orchestra is coming back, as its first New York concert this season bore positive and gratifying witness. For this performance, Mr. Monteux presented a program of modern music consisting of the Sibelius symphony No. 1, Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folksongs of Anjou, and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase." The works of modern composers tend to musical dissertation in extenso. The composer of the era seems often to be equally teased with the difficulty of taking hold and of letting go. And some of this embarrassment was to be felt in the works presented by Mr. Monteux on the present occasion.

The Sibelius symphony, though not beyond the suspicion of frequent discursiveness, is a work in which inspiration and imagination are caught and held in lucid form and ingratiating clarity. It is the characteristic voice of Sibelius, the rugged, sombre voice of the north that speaks. The genius of Scandinavian poetry, the spirit of the Sagas is reflected in this masterfully wrought workmanship of the Finnish composer. Sibelius is himself and none other in this symphony. The directness of his means, the distinctive certainty of his appeal, are everywhere apparent. He makes his orchestra eloquent with the noblest oratory, he unlooses all its lyric voices and he compells it to dramatic utterance of the greatest majesty. The oratory of M. Sibelius carries no suggestion of political jargon or of complex philosophical meanderings. His poetry refuses to divorce sanity and sentiment. And his dramatic intensity never degenerates into resounding and undecipherable bombast. It may well be doubted, not only on the evidence of this symphony but on his later works, if M. Sibelius' predilections would even permit him to attempt biological or zoological realism through the medium of notation. In his first symphony, as everywhere else, M. Sibelius is busy with music, music expressed in definitely modern idiom, to be sure, but always music. The contemporary musical world should in consequence and in virtue of this great distinction rise up and call him blessed. Mr. Monteux and his players brought this music to effective hearing and it was in their performance of this work especially that the advancement of the orchestra since last year was most clearly and instantly to be felt.

The present writer is not familiar with the score of the Lekeu fantasia, and having heard the work but once, does not find himself possessed of any very decided conviction with regard to it. But there was already a good deal of music in the world before this work was given to the public. And the impression may be hazarded that neither the composition itself nor its performance by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony orchestra last week has materially added to the world's art treasury or contributed in any marked degree to the sum-total of permanent musical memory.

The Scriabin "Poeme," written in the composer's earlier period is a juvenile of modernity in comparison with the later Scriabin. And either Scriabin is far too complicated to hit off in a word. To ears inclined to old-fashioned tenets of musical significance Scriabin's ecstasy in this poem chiefly manifests itself in weird and interminable meanderings and philanderings which never seem to get beyond incidents more suggestive of certain happenings in Doubting Castle than of arrival at y Beulah-like state. Possibly the ecstasy is intended to be more mundane and less spiritual in its intimations. So be it. Those intent upon discovering ecstasy will make their discovery on some plane or other—perhaps. For others, M. Scriabin's astonishing virtuosity with his orchestral medium is far more likely to convey impressions of deliberate disintegration and reorganization in the chemistry of sound.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
NOV 13 1920
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Boston Symphony's First Visit

It seemed strange to see vacant seats at the first of the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. True, they were not very numerous, but there was not the throng of four years ago. It is to be hoped that Brooklyn music lovers are not allowing even a touch of apathy to develop in this direction, for although war conditions unquestionabl worked harm in the case of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, the organization is back to form unde the direction of Piérre Monteux, and deserves th hearty support which has been its lot in Brookly for many years. Beethoven's Eighth Symphon gave last week's concert a wonderful first half an there was unfeigned delight with the second, allegretto scherzando, movement. The second half the program had unusual variety for a symphony concert, ranging from the Gallic lightners of the Chant Mysoli from David's opera, "La Perle du Brésil," the solemnity of César Franck's prelude, chorale a fugue for pianoforte—orchestrated by Gabriel Pier Mabel Garrison sang David's famous bird song w the flute in a manner well calculated to bring out genuine loveliness of sentiment and tone and she ga like pleasure by a beautiful rendering of Mozart's "M Speranza Adorata." The Franck number and the fir one, the Berlioz overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," we finely played. On the whole there was an admiral beginning to the season.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
NOV 16 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE TO-DAY

Famous Organization Fresh from Regular Trip Through South.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season in Infantry Hall at 8:15 this evening. The famous organization has just completed its first regular trip through the Southern States.

Pierre Monteux will open the season here with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest in the orchestral repertory. He will also conduct Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

As soloist of the evening, Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone who has no equal in popularity on our concert stage, will sing Mozart's aria, "Aprite un Po'queglocchi," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and the popular love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade."

Mr. Werrenrath has already made a notable name for himself by his appearances in recitals of his own, in oratorios and as soloist with orchestras in all parts of the country. His debut as Tonio in "Pagliacci" at the Metropolitan Opera House was one of the events of the opera season in New York.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Journal
Providence, R. I.
NOV 14 1920

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin on Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry Hall, follows notably successful concerts in a number of other cities. Pierre Monteux will open the concert here with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor, considered one of the finest of all symphonies. Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, is also of special interest, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3, which, according to the plot of "Fidelio," Beethoven's only opera, expresses the joy of deliverance from imprisonment by the stirring trumpet calls from behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has won popularity on the concert stage. Sine his debut at the Worcester festival in 1907 he has toured the United States several times, singing jointly with Geraldine Farrar in many cities, and in 1918 travelling to the Pacific coast. During the same winter he made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in the part of Tonio in "Pagliacci." His appearance in oratorio, as well as in recitals of his own, are equalled in interest by his appearances as soloist with the Boston Orchestra At this concert he will sing the aria "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the famous love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade."

Richard Burgin, the new concert master. is a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage. Mr. Burgin's career has been largely confined, by the fortunes of war, to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, winning fame as concert master in the large orchestras of each capital during the last 12 years.

He made his first acquaintance with the violin at the age of 5. His original teacher was Lotti, who, with Kreisler, was the fellow pupil of Massart, the great French teacher of the Wieniawski school. In 1902 he made his first public appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra in his native city.

In 1908 he began four years of training under the great violin master, Leopold Auer, at Petrograd. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came just before his time, Seidel came later, while Jascha Heiftez was his fellow pupil and friend.

There folowed (in 1912) a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia. He played both as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Society.

He played as soloist with the Stockholm Opera House in the first public performance of the violin concerto of Sibelius, and likewise at Helsingfors, with the same work under the direction of the famous Finnish composer.

He was concert master under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise, under Richard Strauss, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES
Indianapolis, Ind.
France.

Orchestra Players Now Sound Discord

BOSTON, Nov. 16.—Rudolph Nagel, violoncello; Gustav F. Helm, trumpeter, and Fortunato Sordilo, trombone player, have each brought suits in the Superior Court for Suffolk County for $10,000 against the Boston Symphony Orchestra for alleged breach of contract. They say they were hired for the seasons of 1919-1920 to 1921-1922, inclusive, but were discharged on March 5, last. Nagel and Sordilo were each paid $50 a week and Helm received $85.72 a week.

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.
NOV 18 1920

ALDA, BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 3, at 4:30 o'clock, the soloist will be Frances Alda, the famous soprano of the Metropolitan Opera [illegible] whose many notable ap[illegible] prima donna with th[illegible] pany are only equaled in interest by her concerts in various parts of the country.

Pierre Monteux will revive for this concert the Symphony in C major by Mozart, which is considered one of the most charming works of the master. The novelty of the afternoon will be a symphonic fantasy on two "Folk-Songs of Anjou," by Guillaume Lekue, the genius among French composers, whose career was tragically cut short by an accident resulting in his death at an early age. The program will close with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3.

These concerts are under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, at Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
NOV 16 1920
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from its first regular tour of the Southern States, will open its Providence season at Infantry Hall tonight.

Accompanying the orchestra as soloist, Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, will sing Mozart's aria, "Aprie un Pe'queglecchi," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and the love song, "Vision Fugitive," from Masonet's Heriedade." Mr. Werrenrath's debut as Tonie in "Paggliacci" at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was one of the events of the opera season.

Pierre Monteaux will open the appearance here with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E-minor. He will conduct Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

From
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
NOV 17 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASING

First of Providence Series Attracts Large Audience.

R. WERRENRATH SOLOIST

Singer Scores Unqualified Success in Rendition of Two Arias. Conductor Monteux Directs Orchestra in Presentation of One of Best Programmes Given Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, began its 40th Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The house was practically sold out in advance, a record in the history of the organization's visits here.

This splendid revival of interest in the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city dates from the time of its reorganization after the dismissal of Dr. Muck. The shakeup in the orchestra's personnel which followed put new life in its views, and since its Americanization a better spirit has been apparent among its members, and enthusiasm has been the keynote of its performances. Increased public interest and support is the happy result.

Last evening the full complement of men was present. The only change noted was Mr. Burgin's presence at the concertmaster's desk. The new first violinist will appear here as soloist at a later concert this season.

Mr. Monteux presented a fine programme with Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, as assisting soloist. It was as follows:

Brahms....Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico passionato.
Franck............Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart...........Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet.......Aria, "Vision Fugitive," fr m "Herodiade"
Beethoven..Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

It is said of Brahms that after hearing his symphony in E-minor for the first time he had doubts concerning its musical worth. It immediately sprang into public favor, however, and to-day stands as one of his best works. It might well be called a full-voiced symphony. The composer's mastery of instrumentation is always in evidence and the general effect is one of grandeur and changing orchestral color.

The string sections showed to good advantage under Mr. Monteux's vigorous and inspiring direction and the wood-wind and brass choirs spoke eloquently, particularly in the third movement.

Gabriel Pierne's transcription for orchestra of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for pianoforte proved a rich and enticing musical dish. The stately and dignified chorale was played with great effect and in the fugue the theme was tossed about and combined in most fascinating manner. Several delightful melodic bits for flute were brought out skilfully by the first flutist, Mr. Laurent.

Reinald Werrenrath scored an unqualified success in his two arias. His rise to fame has been steady during the past few years and his singing last evening was a pleasant surprise even to those who are familiar with his excellent previous concert performances in this city. He has gained splendidly in his art. His voice is handled with consummate skill and his interpretations of the operatic arias revealed him as a singer of unusual artistic insight.

The Mozart recitative and air was sung in polished style and with vocal charm. But in the passionate song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," he reached the height of his vocal and interpretative powers. It was a superb performance, in which vocal beauty, temperament and unerring judgment combined to delight his audience. He received tremendous applause at the close and returned several times in acknowledgment. For the final number the orchestra played the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3 bringing out its beauties in brilliant fashion.

NEW
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT SEASON OPENING

Two score years of Boston Symphony concert music began in this city last night, with the opening concert of the season in Infantry Hall by that world-famed group of musicians. Pierre Monteux, the celebrated French conductor, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck, for many years head of the Symphony, has been seen here before in concerts last year, and his reception last night indicated that he has sprung into much popular favor among lovers of the best music.

Reinald Werrenwrath, baritone, the sololist in the first concert, also has been in Providence before with the Symphony. His rendition of Mozart's recitative and aria selections from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" were exhibitions of vocal skill, with a combined technique, temperament and interpretative ability far transcending his former work here.

The orchestra work showed, many thought, an improvement over the old days under Muck and there seemed to be a better spirit of co-operation among the individual members, responding instantly to every lead of the famous conductor.

Throughout the programme the coordinated parts of the orchestra, singly and by groups, was ever alert to bring out every shade of musical color intended by the master composers and succeeded so well that it is likely that every available seat will be taken for every concert this year, as they were last night. It was a big tribute to the genius of Monteux, h early was recognized when he his debut in Providence.

One has only to know the beauty of Brahms's "Symphony in E-Minor" and to be familiar with the splendid team work of the Boston Orchestra, to appreciate the beauty of the first number on the programme. The orchestra's best work, perhaps, was in the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue of Gabriel Pierne's transcription of the Cesar Franck selection. Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, was the closing number.

The programme follows:

Brahms .... Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico passionato
Franck..Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart. Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet............Aria, "Vision Fugutive," from "Herodiade"
Beethoven .... Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.
NOV 17 1920

CONCERT SEASON OPENED HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First of Series in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, opened its Providence season of 1920-21 in Infantry Hall last evening with the first in a series of five concerts. An audience was present which practically filled the hall, and Mr. Reginald Warrenrath, famous baritone of New York, and a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the soloist.

The orchestra under the splendid leadership of Mr. Monteux, is in better condition than in several seasons, chiefly, perhaps, because of the fact that its various parts, or choirs, have reached a perfection of tone and a sensitiveness in response to the leader that results in astonishing effects of orchestral color and harmony of tone.

Then, too, there is a new concert master, R. Bergen and Alwin Schroeder, that beloved and venerable master of the violoncello, is still at the first desk of the 'cellists. George Longy, that famous master of the oboe, for many years with the orchestra, is still at his old post and there are other gifted artists, long associated with the orchestra, still in their familiar places.

The concert opened with the superb Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, considered one of the finest of all symphonies, and the program, in full, was as follows:

Brahms ....
.... Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico passionato.
Franck ....
Prelude, Chorale and Fugue (Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart .... Recitative "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet ....
Aria, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade" Beethoven ....
.... Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

The Brahm's Fourth Symphony is wonderfully rich in thematic material, especially in the second movement, which is gorgeous in its orchestral coloring. It was given a magnificent performance by the orchestra, the beautiful tone production of the violins in the second movement holding the audience tense in its compelling charm, while the lovely flute solo in the last movement and the magnificently played finale called forth echoing applause and the conductor was repeatedly recalled at the end.

Caesar Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue," which followed the symphony, was superbly played, especially the Chorale part.

The final number, the Beethoven overture, came as a fitting finale to the program, its joyousness and melodic beauty being in delightful contrast to the massive effects of orchestration in the symphony and prelude. In this number, especially, an exquisite effect was produced by the introduction of the muffled trumpet calls from behind the stage.

Mr. Warrenrath, the soloist of the concert, created a vivid impression by his dignified presence and widely recognized vocal artistry. His voice is rich and smooth, his diction matchless and his feeling poetic. Moreover, he sang with authority, sincerity and dramatic power, especially in Massenet's "Heriodia," in which his superb voice rose splendidly above the orchestra. He was several times recalled at the end of his performance.

N. B. P.

From NOV 21
TRIBUNE,
New York City

For the second Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, December 2, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in E minor; Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," arranged as a suite for orchestra; Respigni's "Fountains of Rome," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." For the Saturday matinee on December 4 the program will comprise Mendelssohn's string octet in E flat and Lalo's violoncello concerto, with Jean Dedetti as soloist. The closing number will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." When Mr. Monteux conducted the Concerts Monteux at the Casino, in Paris, conductor and composer collaborated to make this symphonic version of his noted ballet. The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

Public Ledger 11/21/20
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 29, Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet in E-flat, to be played by the string orchestra alone. As soloist of the evening, Jean Bedetti, the noted cello virtuoso, who came from Europe last season to lead the cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play Lalo's Concerto in D-minor. The final number on the program will be a symphonic suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV. 20.

Jean Bedetti, solo 'cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 29. He will play Lalo's concerto in D minor. Mr. Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's octette for strings in E flat, and the concert will close with a symphonic suite from "Petrouchka" by Stravinsky.

From NOV 17 1920
BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, began its 40th Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The house was practically sold out in advance, a record in the history of the organization's visits here.

This splendid revival of interest in the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city dates from the time of its reorganization after the dismissal of Dr. Muck. The shakeup in the orchestra's personnel which followed put new life in its veins, and since its Americanization, a better spirit has been apparent among its members, and enthusiasm has been the keynote of its performances. Increased public interest and support is the happy result.

Last evening the full complement of men was present. The only change noted was Mr. Burgin's presence at the concertmaster's desk. The new first violinist will appear here as soloist at a later concert this season.

Mr. Monteux presented a fine programme with Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, as assisting soloist. It was as follows:

Brahms....Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico passionato.
Franck..............Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart...........Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet.......Aria, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade"
Beethoven..Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

It is said of Brahms that after hearing his symphony in E-minor for the first time he had doubts concerning its musical worth. It immediately sprang into public favor, however, and to-day stands as one of his best works. It might well be called a full-voiced symphony. The composer's mastery of instrumentation is always in evidence and the general effect is one of grandeur and changing orchestral color.

The string sections showed to good advantage under Mr. Monteux's vigorous and inspiring direction and the wood-wind and brass choirs spoke eloquently, particularly in the third movement.

Gabriel Pierne's transcription for orchestra of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for pianoforte proved a rich and enticing musical dish. The stately and dignified chorale was played with great effect and in the fugue the theme was tossed about and combined in most fascinating manner. Several delightful melodic bits for flute were brought out skilfully by the first flutist, Mr. Laurent.

Reinald Werrenrath scored an unqualified success in his two arias. His rise to fame has been steady during the past few years and his singing last evening was a pleasant surprise even to those who are familiar with his excellent previous concert performances in this city. He has gained splendidly in his art. His voice is handled with consummate skill and his interpretations of the operatic arias revealed him as a singer of unusual artistic insight.

The Mozart recitative and air was sung in polished style and with vocal charm. But in the passionate song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," he reached the height of his vocal and interpretative powers. It was a superb performance, in which vocal beauty, temperament and unerring judgment combined to delight his audience. He received tremendous applause at the close and returned several times in acknowledgment. For the final number the orchestra played the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3 bringing out its beauties in brilliant fashion.

NEW YORK NORTH AMERICAN
ESTABLISHED 1881
From PHILADELPHIA

At the second Boston Symphony concert here this season, to be given in the Academy on Monday evening, November 29, Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat, to be played by the string orchestra alone. As soloist of the evening, Jean Bedetti, the cellist, who came from Europe last seasoan to lead the cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play Lalo's Concerto in D minor. The final number on the program will be a symphonic suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky. Together in Paris some seasons ago, Mr. Monteux and the famous Russian composer went over this humorous ballet (which describes episodes at a country fair) and arranged this version for concert performances. It figured prominently in the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino. The important piano part, which is considered a landmark in the orchestral use of the instrument, will be taken by Raymond Havens.

From NOV 21
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony's program at the Academy the evening of Dec. 3 includes Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" Suite, Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasy on two folk-songs of Anjou, and the "Til Eulenspeigel" of Richard Strauss. In addition there will be solo numbers by Mary Jordan, contralto

---

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 20 1920
From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A program replete with variety and interest will make eventful the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 1. Pierre Monteux, on this occasion, will conduct the splendid Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, which has long been one of the favorites in the regular orchestral repertory. The novelty of the evening will be "Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, head of the composition department of Peabody Conservatory of Music here, which had its first public performance in Boston recently by this orchestra and will be played for the first time in Baltimore at the coming concert. In Boston the "Four Preludes" aroused considerable enthusiasm by virtue of the modern and daring style of the piece, by its marked individuality, and by its skillful scoring as well. It will be remembered that Mr. Strube was for many years a prominent violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the most popular conductors of the summer Pop Concerts in Boston. This concert will close with a symphonic suite from "Petrouchka," the noted ballet of Stravinsky, which describes in fantastic fashion a country fair in Russia. When Mr. Monteux was conducting the Concerts Monteux at the Casino in Paris, conductor and composer collaborated to make this symphonic version of his ballet. The important piano part, which revolutionizes the pianoforte as an orchestral instrument, will be taken by Mr. Raymond Havens. The soloist proper of the evening, however, will be Frances Alda, the famous prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, both by virtue of her operatic appearances and by her many concerts, has made a considerable name for herself hereabouts.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 21
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony Programs.

For the second Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, Dec. 2, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its conductor, Pierre Monteux, will perform the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor; Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," which has been arranged as a suite for orchestra by this noted French composer, and which will on this occasion have its first performance here; Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," which describes in tones The Fountain of Valle Ciulia at dawn; The Triton Fountain at morn; The Fountain of Trevi at midday; the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset; and finally, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." For the Saturday matinee on Dec. 4, the program will comprise Mendelssohn's String Octette in E flat, in which the string sections of the orchestra will be heard alone; Lalo's violoncello concerto, with Jean Bedetti, the noted 'cello virtuoso, who leads that section of the orchestra as soloist. The closing number will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." When Mr. Monteux conducted the Concerta Monteux at the Casino in Paris, conductor and composer collaborated to make this symphonic version of his noted ballet. The important part will be played by Raymond Havens.

SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From PHILADELPHIA, P

Boston Symphony Programme

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 29, Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octette in E-flat to be played by the string orchestra alone. As soloist of the evening Jean Bedetti, the noted 'cello virtuoso, who came from Europe last season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play Lalo's Concerto in D-minor. The final number on the programme will be a symphonic suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky. Together in Paris some seasons ago, Mr. Monteux and the famous Russian composer went over this humorous ballet (which describes episodes at a country fair) and arranged this version for concert performances. It figured prominently in the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino. The important piano part will be taken by Mr. Raymond Havens.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 21
From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DEC. 3.

Mary Jordan, the talented young contralto, whose fine voice has caused much favorable comment here, will appear as soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 3. Pierre Monteux has compiled a brilliant and engrossing orchestral program for this occasion. "Scheherazade" will stand at its head, the oriental and gorgeously colored symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which pictures tales from the Arabian Nights. The other symphonic numbers will be Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
NOV 21

Boston Symphony Concert.

Madame Frances Alda, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 30, at 4:30 o'clock. At this concert Pierre Monteux will revive Mozart's C-major Symphony (K. No. 425). He will perform as an interesting novelty, a Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou by Lekeu, one of the finest geniuses among the composers of his own country. The afternoon will close with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3.

From NOV
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Lyric—The second concert of the season of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra is announced for the afternoon of Sunday, November 28, when the soloists will be Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play the Mozart E flat two-piano concerto. The orchestral numbers will be the "Egmont Overture," by Beethoven; Sibelius' tone poem "Finlandia," and Tschaikowsky's Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

The second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 1, with Frances Alda as the soloist. The orchestral numbers announced are the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor; "Four Preludes," a new work by Gustav Strube, professor of harmony at the Peabody Conservatory of Music and director of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, and a symphonic suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 21
From Post
Washington, D. C.

Alda—Boston Symphony.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 30, at 4:30, the soloist will be Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Pierre Monteux will revive for this concert the Symphony in C major, by Mozart (K. No. 425), considered one of the most charming works of the master. The novelty of the afternoon will be a symponic fantasy on two folk-songs of Anjou, by Guillaume Lekeu. The program will close with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3. Tickets may be obtained at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's bureau, in Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets.

From Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

—At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday of next week, Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat, to be played by the string orchestra alone. As soloist of the evening Jean Bedetti, noted 'cello virtuoso, who came from Europe last season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play Lalo's Concerto in D minor. The final composition on the program will be a symphonic suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky. Together in Paris some seasons ago, Monteux and the famous Russian composer went over this humorous ballet (which describes episodes at a country fair) and arranged this version for concert performances. The work was prominent in the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino. The important piano part will be taken by Raymond Havens.

Commercial
New York NOV 22

Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteaux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following programs for the second pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Dec. 2 and 4. The Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Ravel's orchestral suite "Couperin's Tomb," arranged by the composer for orchestra, which will, on this occasion, have its first performance here. A pictorial score of considerable interest will be Respighi's "Fountains of Rome." The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Jean Bedetti, the noted virtuoso, who leads the 'cello section of the orchestra, will play with the orchestra as the soloist of the second concert, Lalo's violoncello concerto. Mendelssohn's octette for string orchestra in E flat, and a symphonic version of Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." This suite was arranged by the composer for Mr. Monteaux when he conducted the Concerts Monteux at the Casino in Paris. The piano part in the score will be played by Raymond Havens.

[49]

From NOV 23 1920
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mary Jordan Sings For Institute Audience

Mary Jordan, contralto, who is to be soloist at the December Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening appeared in recital at the Academy of Music, under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Songs by many composers were on her programme list—Saint-Saens, Wolf, Grieg, Debussy, Burleigh, Scott and others. The variety, which covered a wide range of musical nations in its selection, found most favor, perhaps, with Miss Jordan's listeners, in the simple and expressive Old Scotch and English ballads. All of her numbers were delivered in dignified and ingratiating manner. The singer was accompanied by Stella Barnard.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 27
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soloist at the concert of that organization next Monday evening in the Academy of Music. Mr. Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat for string and the novelty will be Igor Stravinsky's symphonic suite arranged from his ballet, "Petrouchka," by the composer and Mr. Monteux when the latter was conducting in Paris.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

Soloist

Mme. Frances Alda

Mme. Frances Alda, prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert at the Lyric next Wednesday night. She will sing the "Vissi d'Arte" and the "Prayer" from "La Tosca" and the "Prison Scene" from Boito's "Mefistole."

Pierre Monteux, the director, has selected a notable orchestral program, including Gustav Strube's latest work and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Ballet Suite.

1881 PHILADELPHIA, PA. NOV 27
From
BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the second concert of the season, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, will have Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, as soloist. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will revive at this concert Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat for string orchestra, and the novelty will be Igor Stravinsky's symphonic suite arranged from his ballet, "Petrouchka," in which the important piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

EVENING POST
New York City
NOV

Thursday eve
Saturday afterno
Hall, the sec
Symphony
under the lead
For the T
's Fourth Sym
also Richard
"Till Eulens
" The symph ains of Rome," ent the younge composers. It ains of Valle Triton Fountain
ain of Trevi a Medici Fountain
"Le Tombeau de its first perfor
at this concert.
the Saturday co
's Octet for String eard in lieu of a sy the 'cello vi
n Symphony Orch Violoncello Concert
phonic suite arra ballet sky from on this occasion formance in New Y d Havens taking music of the suit in Festival V ce, Petrouchka at ning. The Nurses' I Coachmen

EVENING MAIL
New York City
NOV 27

TON SYMPHONY
EXT Thursday even Saturday afternoon
the second regular phony concerts will Monteux. For rt Brahms's Fourth at will be played,
ss's tone poem, "Til Pranks," and
"The Fountains
hi. Ravel's "Le To will have its fir
w York at this conc
the Saturday co
Octette for Strings
ard in lieu of a sy ti, the 'cello virtuo
ymphony Orchestra
Concerto by Lalo.
arranged by Strav
"Petrouchka," will mance in New Yo Havens taking the

---

hingto

ston Sy es Alda olitan
s soloi the B in the N ernoon Alda eras om "M from t
Tosca Monteu
y in Koch
e after fant Anjou.
Leonore, om his the co

FRANC
N

T
Washington, D.
NO

Coming Conc

es Alda—Boston
es Alda will appe
second regular co Symphony Orche
the New Natio afternoon at 4
lda will sing
ong from Boito'
the prayer from Puccini's "La Tos will open this pr symphony in C in the Kochel of the afternoo symphonic fanta
s of Anjou. Th with Beethoven re No. 3, the fam only opera "Fide able from the bur reene- at Droo
d G streets north

TIGHT BINDING

NOV 23 A RD UNION
yn, N. Y.

ordan Sings For Institute Audience

Jordan, contralto, who is to st at the December Brooklyn
of the Boston Symphony
ra, last evening appeared in at the Academy of Music, un-spices of the Brooklyn Insti-Arts and Sciences. Songs by composers were on her pro-
e list—Saint-Saens, Wolf,
Debussy, Burleigh, Scott and
The variety, which covered
e range of musical nations in lection, found most favor, per-with Miss Jordan's listeners, in mple and expressive Old Scotch English ballads. All of her ers were delivered in dignified ngratiating manner. The singer accompanied by Stella Barnard.

NEW YORK
BLISHED 188 NOV 27 L
ning Public Ledger
hiladelphia, Pa.

an Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the Boston
phony Orchestra will be soloist at the ert of that organization next Monday
ng in the Academy of Music. Mr.
eux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet
flat for string and the novelty will be Stravinsky's symphonic suite arranged
his ballet, "Petrouchka," by the composer, and Mr. Monteux when the latter conducting in Paris.

BLISHED 1881

NOV 27

Soloist

Mme. Frances Alda

Mme. Frances Alda, prima
prano of the Metropolitan pera Company, will be the
the Boston Symphony Co
e Lyric next Wednesday
he will sing the "Vissi d'Arte"
om "La Tosca" and the "Prison
ene" from Boito's "Mefistofele." Pierre Monteux, the director, ha lected a notable orchestral pro
am, including Gustav Strube
test work and Stravinsky's "Pe
ouchka" Ballet Suite.

1881 NOV 27
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
om
LLETIN,
Pr I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr
ond concert of the season, at ademy of Music next Monday ev
g, will have Jean Bedetti, the lead
the 'cello section of the orchestra, oist. Pierre Monteux, the conducto l revive at this concert Mendelssohn tet in E flat for string orchestra, an novelty will be Igor Stravinsky mphonic suite arranged from h llet, "Petrouchka," in which the i tant piano part will be played ymond Havens.

EVENING POST
New York City

NOV 27

Next Thursday evening at 8:15 and next Saturday afternoon at 2:30, in Carnegie Hall, the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert will be Brahms's Fourth Symphony will be played; also Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The symphonic poem "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, will represent the younger generation of Italian composers. It represents the Fountains of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day, the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert, Mendelssohn's Octet for Strings in E flat will be heard in lieu of a symphony. Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play the Violoncello Concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite, arranged by Stravinsky from ballet "Petrouchka," will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, with Raymond Havens taking the piano part. The music of the suite describes: A Fair in Festival Week, Russian Dance, Petrouchka at Home, Towards Evening, The Nurses' Dance, Dance of the Coachmen Grooms

---

EVENING MAIL
New York City

NOV 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

NEXT Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E flat will be played, also Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome" by Respighi. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert, Medelssohn's Octette for Strings in E flat will be heard in lieu of a symphony. Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plays Violoncello Concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite, arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Petrouchka," will have its first performance in New York, with Raymond Havens taking the piano part.

STAR,
Washi

Bosto

Frances etropoli ppear as ert of t hestra in ay after Mme. A wo oper ng from rayer," fi
ni's "La Pierre M
ymphony
in the y of the mphonic ngs of e to Le erpt fro
l close

FRANCES ALDA
National

POST
ss: Washington, D. C.

NOV 28

Coming Concerts

Frances Alda—Boston Symphony.

Frances Alda will appear as soloist at the second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Mme. Alda will sing Marguerite's Prison song from Boito's "Mefistofele," and the prayer from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." Pierre Monteux will open this program with Mozart's symphony in C major, numbered 425 in the Kochel edition. The novelty of the afternoon will be Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou. The afternoon will end with Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3, the famous excerpt from his only opera "Fidelio." Seats are available from the bureau of Mrs. Wilson-Greene at Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets northwest.

From NOV 28
World
New York City

SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

Mary Jordan, Soloist, Will Be Heard in Two Arias.

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, to be given next Friday evening, Miss Mary Jordan, contralto, will be the soloist. The two arias will be "Oh, Mon Fils," from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," and the long-standing favorite from Saint Saens' "Samson and Delilah," "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix."

The symphonic event of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the performance of which will be of special interest because Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with Darghileff's Ballet Russe, will be heard for the first time here conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 18 NOV 28 L
From
Telegram
York City

Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E flat will be played, also Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, will represent the younger generation of Italian composers. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E Flat will be heard. Jean Bedetti, 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play as soloist at this concert the violoncello concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Petrouchka" will be heard.

From Herald
New York City
NOV 28

For the second Thursday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pierre Monteux, leader, at Carnegie Hall, on December 2, a programme will be given as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Ravel, suite "Tombeau de Couperin"; Respigni, "Fountains of Rome"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." For the Saturday matinee on December 4 the programme will be: Mendelssohn, String Octet E flat; Lalo, 'cello concerto, Jean Bedetti of the orchestra, soloist; Stravinsky, symphonic suite "Petrouchka," arranged from the ballet, music by the composer in collaboration with Mr. Monteux. The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

From NOV 28 1920
Times
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Three orchestras in three days are announced at the Brooklyn Academy, where the Boston Symphony plays next Friday evening, the New York Symphony on Saturday afternoon and the Philharmonic next Sunday.

The United States Marine Band, in a visit of two days to New York, will include another gala concert tomorrow evening at the Academy in Brooklyn.

From NOV 28 1920
Times
New York City

ORCHESTRA NOTES.

The Boston Symphony in its second visit to Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening has Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

For the Boston Symphony matinee here on Saturday, Mr. Monteux has Mendelssohn's string octet in E-flat, Lalo's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti, and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 28 M
From American
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programme in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening: Symphony No. 4, by Brahms; "Tombeau de Couperin," by Ravel; "Fountains of Rome," by Respighi; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss. On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Mendelssohn's string octette, concerto for 'cello and orchestra, Jean Bedetti, soloist, symphonic suite, "Petrouska," by Strawinsky.

EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 28 D

Boston Symphony.

On Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Luigi Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem which figures prominently in the works of the younger Italian School, describing the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day, the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. The real novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which work, orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces, will have its first performance in New York then. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

For the Saturday matinee the program will comprise Mendelssohn's Octet for string orchestra in E flat, Lalo's Violoncello Concerto, in which Jean Bedetti, now serving his second season as regular 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will be heard, and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" to be heard for the first time in New York on this occasion. This suite, arranged by the revolutionary Russian composer for the Concerts Monteux in Paris, describes various fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd.

From
Morning Telegraph
New York

Thursday evening, in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, will give the first of its second pair of concerts in New York this season.

On this occasion the program will present Brahms's Fourth Symphony in minor, Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a the Richard Strauss tone poem, "T Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The s ond concert will be given December at 2.30 P. M.

TRIBUNE, NOV
New York City

Boston Symphony Orches

Next Thursday evening at 8: Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Luigi Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem which figures prominently in the works of the younger Italian school, describing the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Foutain of Trevi at midday and the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. The real novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

At the Saturday matinee, December 4, at 2:30, the program will comprise Mendelssohn's Octette for string orchestra in E flat. Lalo's Violoncello Concerto, in which Jean Bedetti, now serving his second season as regular 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will be heard and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka." The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

NOV 28

Frances Alda Concert.

Frances Alda, the celebrated prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as soloist at the second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, November 30, at 4:30. Madame Alda will sing the most popular arias from two operas—Marguerite's Prison Song, from Boito's "Mefistophele," and the Prayer from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." Pierre Monteux will open this program with Mozart's Symphony in C major.

From NOV 28
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Academy of Music next Friday e ning, has a program arranged by Pie Monteux. There will be the "Arab Nights" suite of Rimsky-Korsak which the Ballet Russe used "Scheherazde," and also the Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The remaining orchestral number will be Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two fo songs of Anjou. The soloist will Mary Jordan, contralto.

From NOV 28 D
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MARY JORDAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY FRIDAY AT ACADEMY.

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to be given next Friday evening at 8:15, Miss Mary Jordan, the noted contralto, will sing as soloist with the great orchestra. The two arias will be "Oh, Mon Fils" from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," and the long-standing favorite from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah" "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix." The symphonic event of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoffs symphonic suite "Scheherazade," the performance of which on this occasion will be of special interest, in that Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with Darghileff's Ballet Russe, will be heard for the first time here conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra through this splendid score. The novelty of the evening will be Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou, a romantic piece, of direct beauty and appeal. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's humorous masterpiece "Till Eulenspiegee's Merry Pranks After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner."

From NOV 28
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

MARY JORDAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening at 8:15, Mary Jordan, the highly praised young American contralto, will sing two popular numbers as soloist with the orchestra. The first is from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera "The Prophet," "Oh, Mon Fils," and the other the universal favorite from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Voice."

There is considerable interest in the pending performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" at this concert, in that Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this score in its pure symphonic form for the first time here, although it has been heard under his leadership in the ballet version as produced by the Ballet Russe.

---

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 28

Mr. Raymond Havens, the brilliant young Boston pianist, formerly of Providence, has been engaged as the soloist for five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including a concert in New York City, Baltimore and Philadelphia.

From NOV 28
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Pierre Monteux has arranged a splendid programme for the second symphony concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 3. It will begin with Rimsky-Korsakoffs pictorial and gorgeously colored symphonic suite "Scheherazada," which depicts various episodes from the "Arabian Nights." This popular score, adapted more than any other to show off a virtuoso orchestra, will also give opportunity to hear the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, in the many beautiful episodes for solo violin. There will also be played a symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou by Lekeu, a foremost genius among the composers of France, whose career was cut short at its heighth by death. The concert will end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the famous fantastic tonal version of the old folk legend. The soloist of the evening will be Mary Jordan, the finely gifted contralto, whose artistry is so much admired in this city.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE JAN. 10

The primary event of the musical season in Hartford will be the concert to be given in Parsons's Theater on January 10 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This institution, so long eminent in the musical world, is now in the full tide of the season which commemorates its fortieth anniversary. Never have the concerts been more popular than this year and in no former season has too large a number been undertaken. The brilliant opening of the season in Boston was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks was as highly praised as the quality of the performances.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this success. Returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer, he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections of the orchestra is Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who arrived from the Eastern part of Europe, where he is considered by long count the best concertmaster, to participate at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the coming Hartford concert, Piastro, the miraculous Russian violinist, will play as soloist with the great orchestra. This genius of his instrument came to America for the first time this season and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia.

The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's, Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipts of checks and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

From J. N. Burk, press representative, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

m POST
ress: Washington, D. C.
e NOV 28

Music this week will include two important afternoon concerts. The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its second concert of the season in the National Theater Tuesday with Frances Alda, soprano, as soloist. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will give a recital in Poli's Theater Friday, the fourth concert in the Philharmonic course.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 29
From Commercial
New York

Boston Symphony

On Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux will conduct the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor, Lugi Respighi's "Fountain of Rome." The novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Havel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which work, orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces, will have its first performance in New York then. The concert will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

TIGHT BINDING

NOV 23 1920 A RD UNION
yn, N. Y.

Jordan Sings
For Institute Audience

Jordan, contralto, who is to st at the December Brooklyn
of the Boston Symphony
ra, last evening appeared in
at the Academy of Music, un
spices of the Brooklyn Insti
Arts and Sciences. Songs by composers were on her prone list—Saint-Saens, Wolf, Debussy, Burleigh, Scott and
The variety, which covered
e range of musical nations in lection, found most favor, per-
with Miss Jordan's listeners, in mple and expressive Old Scotch English ballads. All of her bers were delivered in dignified ngratiating manner. The singer accompanied by Stella Barnard.

NEW YORK
BLISHED 1881 NOV 27 1920 L
n
ning Public Ledger
hiladelphia, Pa.

an Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the Boston
phony Orchestra will be soloist at the ert of that organization next Monday
ing in the Academy of Music. Mr.
eux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet
flat for string and the novelty will be Stravinsky's symphonic suite arranged
his ballet, "Petrouchka," by the composer, and Mr. Monteux when the latter conducting in Paris.

NEW YORK
LISHED 1881

Soloist

Mme. Frances Alda

Mme. Frances Alda, prima
prano of the Metropolitan
pera Company, will be the
the Boston Symphony Co
e Lyric next Wednesday night
he will sing the "Vissi d'Arte" aria
om "La Tosca" and the "Prison
cene" from Boito's "Mefistole." Pierre Monteux, the director, has lected a notable orchestral pro
am, including Gustav Strube
test work and Stravinsky's "Pe
ouchka" Ballet Suite.

1881 PHILADELPHIA, PA. NOV 27
om
LLETIN,
Pr[redacted] R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr
cond concert of the season, at ademy of Music next Monday ev
g, will have Jean Bedetti, the lead
the 'cello section of the orchestra,
loist. Pierre Monteux, the conducto ll revive at this concert Mendelssohn tet in E flat for string orchestra, a e novelty will be Igor Stravinsky
mphonic suite arranged from h
llet, "Petrouchka," in which the i rtant piano part will be played ymond Havens.

EVENING POST
New York City

NOV 27 1920

Next Thursday evening at 8:15 and next Saturday afternoon at 2:30, in Carnegie Hall, the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms's Fourth Symphony will be played; also Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The symphonic poem "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, will represent the younger generation of Italian composers. It represents the Fountains of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day, the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert, Mendelssohn's Octet for Strings in E flat will be heard in lieu of a symphony. Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play the Violoncello Concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite, arranged by Stravinsky from ballet "Petrouchka," will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, with Raymond Havens taking the piano part. The music of the suite describes: A Fair in Festival Week, Russian Dance, Petrouchka at Home, Towards Evening. The Nurses' Dance, Dance of the Coachmen [illegible] Grooms"

EVENING MAIL
New York City

NOV 27 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

NEXT Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E flat will be played, also Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome" by Respighi. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert, Medelssohn's Octette for Strings in E flat will be heard in lieu of a symphony. Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plays Violoncello Concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite, arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Petrouchka," will have its first performance in New York, with Raymond Havens taking the piano part.

STAR,
Washi

Bosto
Frances Metropolit
ppear as ert of t hestra in ay aftern
Mme. A wo oper
ong fron rayer," fi
ni's "La Pierre M
ymphony
5 in the y of the mphonic
ngs of e to Le cerpt fro
l close

FRANCES ALDA
National

POST
ss: Washington, D. C.

NOV 28

Coming Concerts

Frances Alda—Boston Symphony.

Frances Alda will appear as soloist at the second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Mme. Alda will sing Marguerite's Prison song from Boito's "Mefistofele," and the prayer from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." Pierre Monteux will open this program with Mozart's symphony in C major, numbered 425 in the Kochel edition. The novelty of the afternoon will be Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou. The afternoon will end with Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3, the famous excerpt from his only opera "Fidelio." Seats are available from the bureau of Mrs. Wilson-Greene at Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets northwest.

From NOV 28 1920 L
World
New York City

SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

Mary Jordan, Soloist, Will Be Heard in Two Arias.

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, to be given next Friday evening, Miss Mary Jordan, contralto, will be the soloist. The two arias will be "Oh, Mon Fils," from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," and the long-standing favorite from Saint Saens' "Samson and Delilah," "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix."

The symphonic event of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the performance of which will be of special interest because Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with Darghileff's Ballet Russe, will be heard for the first time here conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 28 1920 L
From
Telegram
York City

Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E flat will be played, also Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, will represent the younger generation of Italian composers. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E Flat will be heard. Jean Bedetti, 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play as soloist at this concert the violoncello concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Petrouchka" will be heard.

From Herald
New York Cit
NOV 28 1920 M

For the second Thursday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pierre Monteux, leader, at Carnegie Hall, on December 2, a programme will be given as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Ravel, suite "Tombeau de Couperin"; Respigni, "Fountains of Rome"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." For the Saturday matinee on December 4 the programme will be: Mendelssohn, String Octet E flat; Lalo, 'cello concerto, Jean Bedetti of the orchestra, soloist; Stravinsky, symphonic suite "Petrouchka," arranged from the ballet, music by the composer in collaboration with Mr. Monteux. The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

From NOV 1920
Times
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Three orchestras in three days are announced at the Brooklyn Academy, where the Boston Symphony plays next Friday evening, the New York Symphony on Saturday afternoon and the Philharmonic next Sunday.

The United States Marine Band, in a visit of two days to New York, will include another gala concert tomorrow evening at the Academy in Brooklyn.

From NOV 28 1920
Times
New York City

ORCHESTRA NOTES.

The Boston Symphony in its second visit to Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening has Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

For the Boston Symphony matinee here on Saturday, Mr. Monteux has Mendelssohn's string octet in E-flat, Lalo's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti, and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 28 1920 M
From American
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programme in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening: Symphony No. 4, by Brahms; "Tombeau de Couperin," by Ravel; "Fountains of Rome," by Respighi; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss. On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Mendelssohn's string octette, concerto for 'cello and orchestra, Jean Bedetti, soloist; symphonic suite, "Petrouska," by Strawinsky.

EAGLE, NOV 28 1920 D
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

On Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Luigi Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem which figures prominently in the works of the younger Italian School, describing the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day, the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. The real novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which work, orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces, will have its first performance in New York then. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

For the Saturday matinee the program will comprise Mendelssohn's Octet for string orchestra in E flat. Lalo's Violoncello Concerto, in which Jean Bedetti, now serving his second season as regular 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will be heard, and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka," to be heard for the first time in New York on this occasion. This suite, arranged by the revolutionary Russian composer for the Concerts Monteux in Paris, describes various fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd.

From
Morning Telegraph
New York

Thursday evening, in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierr Monteux conducting, will give the firs of its second pair of concerts in Ne York this season.

On this occasion the program will pr sent Brahms's Fourth Symphony in minor, Respighi's "Fountains of Rom Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a the Richard Strauss tone poem, "T Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The s ond concert will be given Decembe at 2.30 P. M.

TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Orches

Next Thursday evening at 8: Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Luigi Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem which figures prominently in the works of the younger Italian school, describing the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Foutain of Trevi at midday and the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. The real novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

At the Saturday matinee, December 4, at 2:30, the program will comprise Mendelssohn's Octette for string orchestra in E flat. Lalo's Violoncello Concerto, in which Jean Bedetti, now serving his second season as regular 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will be heard and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka." The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

NOV 28

Frances Alda Concert.

Frances Alda, the celebrated prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as soloist at the second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, November 30, at 4:30. Madame Alda will sing the most popular arias from two operas—Marguerite's Prison Song, from Boito's "Mefistophele," and the Prayer from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." Pierre Monteux will open this program with Mozart's Symphony in C major.

From NOV 28
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Academy of Music next Friday e ning, has a program arranged by Pie Monteux. There will be the "Arab Nights" suite of Rimsky-Korsak which the Ballet Russe used "Scheherazde," and also the Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The remaining orchestral number will be L keu's symphonic fantasia on two fo songs of Anjou. The soloist will Mary Jordan, contralto.

From NOV 28 1920 D
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MARY JORDAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY FRIDAY AT ACADEMY.

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to be given next Friday evening at 8:15, Miss Mary Jordan, the noted contralto, will sing as soloist with the great orchestra. The two arias will be "Oh, Mon Fils" from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," and the long-standing favorite from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah" "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix." The symphonic event of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoffs symphonic suite "Scheherazade," the performance of which on this occasion will be of special interest, in that Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with Darghileff's Ballet Russe, will be heard for the first time here conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra through this splendid score. The novelty of the evening will be Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou, a romantic piece, of direct beauty and appeal. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's humorous masterpiece "Till Eulenspiegee's Merry Pranks [illegible] the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner."

From NOV 28 1920
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

MARY JORDAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening at 8:15, Mary Jordan, the highly praised young American contralto, will sing two popular numbers as soloist with the orchestra. The first is from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera "The Prophet," "Oh, Mon Fils," and the other the universal favorite from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Voice."

There is considerable interest in the pending performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" at this concert, in that Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this score in its pure symphonic form for the first time here, although it has been heard under his leadership in the ballet version as produced by the Ballet Russe.

---

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I. ate
NOV 28

Mr. Raymond Havens, the brilliant young Boston pianist, formerly of Providence, has been engaged as the soloist for five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including a concert in New York City, Baltimore and Philadelphia.

From NOV 28
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Pierre Monteux has arranged a splendid programme for the second symphony concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 3. It will begin with Rimsky-Korsakoffs pictorial and gorgeously colored symphonic suite "Scheherazada," which depicts various episodes from the "Arabian Nights." This popular score, adapted more than any other to show off a virtuoso orchestra, will also give opportunity to hear the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, in the many beautiful episodes for solo violin. There will also be played a symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou by Lekeu, a foremost genius among the composers of France, whose career was cut short at its heighth by death. The concert will end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the famous fantastic tonal version of the old folk legend. The soloist of the evening will be Mary Jordan, the finely gifted contralto, whose artistry is so much admired in this city.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 8
COURANT
Hartford, Conn

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE JAN. 10

The primary event of the musical season in Hartford will be the concert to be given in Parsons's Theater on January 10 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This institution, so long eminent in the musical world, is now in the full tide of the season which commemorates its fortieth anniversary. Never have the concerts been more popular than this year and in no former season has too large a number been undertaken. The brilliant opening of the season in Boston was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks was as highly praised as the quality of the performances.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this success. Returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer, he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections of the orchestra is Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who arrived from the Eastern part of Europe, where he is considered by long count the best concertmaster, to participate at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the coming Hartford concert, Piastro, the miraculous Russian violinist, will play as soloist with the great orchestra. This genius of his instrument came to America for the first time this season and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia.

The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's, Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipts of checks, and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

From J. N. Burk, press representative, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

m POST
ress: Washington, D. C.
e NOV 28

Music this week will include two important afternoon concerts. The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its second concert of the season in the National Theater Tuesday with Frances Alda, soprano, as soloist. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will give a recital in Poli's Theater Friday, the fourth concert in the Philharmonic course.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 29
From Commercial
New York

Boston Symphony

On Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux will conduct the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor, Lugi Respighi's "Fountain of Rome." The novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Havel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which work, orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces, will have its first performance in New York then. The concert will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

[50]

TIGHT BINDING

OV 23

RD UNION
n, N. Y.

ordan Sings or Institute Audience

ordan, contralto, who is to t at the December Brooklyn
of the Boston Symphony
a, last evening appeared in t the Academy of Music, un-pices of the Brooklyn Insti-Arts and Sciences. Songs by composers were on her pro-
e list—Saint-Saens, Wolf,
Debussy, Burleigh, Scott and
The variety, which covered range of musical nations in ection, found most favor, per-with Miss Jordan's listeners, in mple and expressive Old Scotch English ballads. All of her
ers were delivered in dignified gratiating manner. The singer ccompanied by Stella Barnard.

NEW YORK
LISHED 1881 NOV 27

ing Public Ledger
iladelphia, Pa.

Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the Boston ony Orchestra will be soloist at the t of that organization next Monday
g in the Academy of Music. Mr. ux will conduct Mendelssohn's Octet
flat for string and the novelty will be Stravinsky's symphonic suite arranged
his ballet, "Petrouchka," by the composer, and Mr. Monteux when the latter onducting in Paris.

NEW YORK
LISHED 1881

Soloist

Mme. Frances Alda

Mme. Frances Alda, prima donna prano of the Metropolitan Grand pera Company, will be the soloist the Boston Symphony Concert at e Lyric next Wednesday night.
e will sing the "Vissi d'Arte" aria
om "La Tosca" and the "Prison
ene" from Boito's "Mefistole." Pierre Monteux, the director, has ected a notable orchestral pro-am, including Gustav Strube's est work and Stravinsky's "Pe-ouchka" Ballet Suite.

1881
PHILADELPHIA, PA. m LLETIN,
Pr[illegible] R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
ond concert of the season, at the ademy of Music next Monday eve-g, will have Jean Bedetti, the leader he 'cello section of the orchestra, as oist. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, l revive at this concert Mendelssohn's et in E flat for string orchestra, and novelty will be Igor Stravinsky's mphonic suite arranged from his let, "Petrouchka," in which the im-tant piano part will be played by ymond Havens.

EVENING POST
New York City

NOV 27

Next Thursday evening at 8:15 and next Saturday afternoon at 2:30, in Carnegie Hall, the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms's Fourth Symphony will be played; also Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The symphonic poem "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, will represent the younger generation of Italian composers. It represents the Fountains of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day, the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert, Mendelssohn's Octet for Strings in E flat will be heard in lieu of a symphony. Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play the Violoncello Concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite, arranged by Stravinsky from ballet "Petrouchka," will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, with Raymond Havens taking the piano part. The music of the suite describes: A Fair in Festival Week, Russian Dance, Petrouchka at Home, Towards Evening, The Nurses' Dance, Dance of the Coachmen [illegible] Grooms

---

EVENING MAIL
New York City

NOV 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

NEXT Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E flat will be played, also Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome" by Respighi. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert, Medelssohn's Octette for Strings in E flat will be heard in lieu of a symphony. Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plays Violoncello Concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite, arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Petrouchka," will have its first performance in New York, with Raymond Havens taking the piano part.

STAR,
Washington, D. C.

NOV

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Frances Alda, prima donna of Metropolitan Opera Company, w appear as soloist at the second co cert of the Boston Symphony O chestra in the National Theater Tu day afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Mme. Alda will sing arias fr two operas — Marguerite's Pris Song from "Mefistofele" and "T Prayer," from the second act of Pu ini's "La Tosca."

Pierre Monteux will offer Mozart Symphony in C Major," number 25 in the Kochel edition. The no ty of the afternoon will be Lekeu ymphonic fantasia on two fo ngs of Anjou. Beethoven's Ove re to Leonore, No. 3, the famou cerpt from his only opera, "Fidelio ll close the concert.

POST
ess: Washington, D. C.

NOV 28

Coming Concerts

Frances Alda—Boston Symphony.

Frances Alda will appear as soloist at the second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Mme. Alda will sing Marguerite's "Prison song from Boito's "Meifistofele," and the prayer from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." Pierre Monteux will open this program with Mozart's symphony in C major, numbered 425 in the Kochel edition. The novelty of the afternoon will be Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou. The afternoon will end with Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3, the famous excerpt from his only opera "Fidelio." Seats are available from the bureau of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, at Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets northwest.

From NOV 28
World
New York City

SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

Mary Jordan, Soloist, Will Be Heard in Two Arias.

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, to be given next Friday evening, Miss Mary Jordan, contralto, will be the soloist. The two arias will be "Oh, Mon Fils," from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," and the long-standing favorite from Saint Saens' "Samson and Delilah," "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix."

The symphonic event of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the performance of which will be of special interest because Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with Darghileff's Ballet Russe, will be heard for the first time here conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 28
From
Telegram
York City

Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the second regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. For the Thursday concert Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E flat will be played, also Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, will represent the younger generation of Italian composers. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" will have its first performance in New York at this concert.

For the Saturday concert Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E Flat will be heard. Jean Bedetti, 'cello virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play as soloist at this concert the violoncello concerto by Lalo. A symphonic suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Petrouchka" will be heard.

From Herald
New York Cit
NOV 28

For the second Thursday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pierre Monteux, leader, at Carnegie Hall, on December 2, a programme will be given as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Ravel, suite "Tombeau de Couperin"; Respigni, "Fountains of Rome"; Strauss, "Till Eulen-Pranks." For the Sat-on December 4 the pro-
: Mendelssohn, String
alo, 'cello concerto, Jean orchestra, soloist; Stranic suite "Petrouchka," the ballet, music by the aboration with Mr. Mono part will be played by ns.

BLA
N THE LTOGETHER IT IS YORK HERALD.
E SAT BENEATH
D COMEDY, DRAM
NIABLE SUCCESS.
AMERICAN.
THE NEXT SEV
EVEN COMPARAB
WILL BE AN EXCE
ES TO WASHIN ATTRACTION.
CH
RUTH IN SIR JA
M IIDT

York City

OKLYN MUSIC.

estras in three days are an- the Brooklyn Academy, Boston Symphony plays next g, the New York Symphony afternoon and the Phil- t Sunday.

States Marine Band, in a visit of two days to New York, will include another gala concert tomorrow evening at the Academy in Brooklyn.

From NOV 28 1920
Times
New York City

ORCHESTRA NOTES.

The Boston Symphony in its second visit to Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening has Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

For the Boston Symphony matinee here on Saturday, Mr. Monteux has Mendelssohn's string octet in E-flat, Lalo's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti, and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 28
From American
New York City

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programme in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening: Symphony No. 4, by Brahms; "Tombeau de Couperin," by Ravel; "Fountains of Rome," by Respighi; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss. On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Mendelssohn's string octette, concerto for 'cello and orchestra, Jean Bedetti, soloist; symphonic suite, "Petrouska," by Strawinsky.

EAGLE, NOV 28
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

On Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Luigi Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem which figures prominently in the works of the younger Italian School, describing the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day, the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. The real novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which work, orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces, will have its first performance in New York then. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

For the Saturday matinee the program will comprise Mendelssohn's Octet for string orchestra in E flat, Lalo's Violoncello Concerto, in which Jean Bedetti, now serving his second season as regular 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will be heard, and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka," to be heard for the first time in New York on this occasion. This suite, arranged by the revolutionary Russian composer for the Concerts Monteux in Paris, describes various fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd.

From
Morning Telegraph
New York

Thursday evening, in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierr Monteux conducting, will give the firs of its second pair of concerts in Ne York this season.

On this occasion the program will pr sent Brahms's Fourth Symphony in minor, Respighi's "Fountains of Rome Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a the Richard Strauss tone poem, " Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The s ond concert will be given December at 2.30 P. M.

TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Orches

Next Thursday evening at 8: Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will present on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Luigi Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem which figures prominently in the works of the younger Italian school, describing the Fountain of Valle Giulia at dawn, the Triton Fountain at morn, the Foutain of Trevi at midday and the Villa Medici Fountain at sunset. The real novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

At the Saturday matinee, December 4, at 2:30, the program will comprise Mendelssohn's Octette for string orchestra in E flat. Lalo's Violoncello Concerto, in which Jean Bedetti, now serving his second season as regular 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will be heard and a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka." The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

NOV 28

Frances Alda Concert.

Frances Alda, the celebrated prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as soloist at the second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, November 30, at 4:30. Madame Alda will sing the most popular arias from two operas—Marguerite's Prison Song, from Boito's "Mefistophele," and the Prayer from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." Pierre Monteux will open this program with Mozart's Symphony in C major.

From NOV 28
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Academy of Music next Friday e ning, has a program arranged by Pie Monteux. There will be the "Arab Nights" suite of Rimsky-Korsak which the Ballet Russe used "Scheherazde," and also the " Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The remaining orchestral number will be L keu's symphonic fantasia on two fo songs of Anjou. The soloist will Mary Jordan, contralto.

From NOV 28
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MARY JORDAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY FRIDAY AT ACADEMY.

At the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to be given next Friday evening at 8:15, Miss Mary Jordan, the noted contralto, will sing as soloist with the great orchestra. The two arias will be "Oh, Mon Fils" from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera, "Le Prophete," and the long-standing favorite from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah" "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix."

The symphonic event of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoffs symphonic suite "Scheherazade," the performance of which on this occasion will be of special interest, in that Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with Darghileff's Ballet Russe, will be heard for the first time here conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra through this splendid score. The novelty of the evening will be Lekeu's Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk-Songs of Anjou, a romantic piece, of direct beauty and appeal. The concert will close with Richard Strauss's humorous masterpiece "Till Eulenspiegee's Merry Pranks [illegible] the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner."

From NOV 28
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

MARY JORDAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening at 8:15, Mary Jordan, the highly praised young American contralto, will sing two popular numbers as soloist with the orchestra. The first is from the second act of Meyerbeer's opera "The Prophet," "Oh, Mon Fils," and the other the universal favorite from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Voice."

There is considerable interest in the pending performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" at this concert, in that Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this score in its pure symphonic form for the first time here, although it has been heard under his leadership in the ballet version as produced by the Ballet Russe.

---

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 28

* * *

Mr. Raymond Havens, the brilliant young Boston pianist, formerly of Providence, has been engaged as the soloist for five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including a concert in New York City, Baltimore and Philadelphia.

From NOV 28
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Pierre Monteux has arranged a splendid programme for the second symphony concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 3. It will begin with Rimsky-Korsakoffs pictorial and gorgeously colored symphonic suite "Scheherazada," which depicts various episodes from the "Arabian Nights." This popular score, adapted more than any other to show off a virtuoso orchestra, will also give opportunity to hear the new concertmaster, Richard Burgin, in the many beautiful episodes for solo violin. There will also be played a symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou by Lekeu, a foremost genius among the composers of France, whose career was cut short at its heighth by death. The concert will end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the famous fantastic tonal version of the old folk legend. The soloist of the evening will be Mary Jordan, the finely gifted contralto, whose artistry is so much admired in this city.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV
COURANT
Hartford, Conn

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES HERE JAN. 10

The primary event of the musical season in Hartford will be the concert to be given in Parsons's Theater on January 10 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This institution, so long eminent in the musical world, is now in the full tide of the season which commemorates its fortieth anniversary. Never have the concerts been more popular than this year and in no former season has too large a number been undertaken. The brilliant opening of the season in Boston was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks was as highly praised as the quality of the performances.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this success. Returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer, he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections of the orchestra is Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who arrived from the Eastern part of Europe, where he is considered by long count the best concertmaster, to participate at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the coming Hartford concert, Piastro, the miraculous Russian violinist, will play as soloist with the great orchestra. This genius of his instrument came to America for the first time this season and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia.

The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's, Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipts of checks, and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

From J. N. Burk, press representative, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

m POST
ress: Washington, D. C.
e NOV 28

Music this week will include two important afternoon concerts. The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its second concert of the season in the National Theater Tuesday with Frances Alda, soprano, as soloist. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will give a recital in Poli's Theater Friday, the fourth concert in the Philharmonic course.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 29
From Commercial
New York

Boston Symphony

On Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its second pair of concerts here. Pierre Monteux will conduct the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor, Lugi Respighi's "Fountain of Rome." The novelty of the evening, however, will be Maurice Havel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which work, orchestrated by the composer from his piano pieces, will have its first performance in New York then. The concert will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From
TIMES NOV 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE SOON

Fortieth Anniversary Season of Famous Orchestra—Michael Piastro To Be Soloist.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now celebrating its fortieth anniversary season, will give a concert at Parsons's theater on January 10, with Michael Piastro, the Russian violinist, as soloist. Never in the forty years of this orchestra, which has so long taken an eminent place in the musical development of America, have the concerts been more popular, and never have a larger number been undertaken in one year. The opening of the season in Symphony hall, Boston, in early October was in every way a brilliant occasion and was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks) was as highly praised as the quality of the performances. Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this. [illegible] returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections is Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who arrived from the eastern part of Europe (where he is considered by long count the finest concertmaster) to participate in the opening Boston Symphony concerts.

Piastro, the soloist at the coming Hartford concert, came to America for the first time this season, and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia. The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's, Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipt of checks, and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

PLAYS MUSIC OF MODERNISTS

Symphony in Fifth Concert Gives Composition of Resphigi and Strube

BRILLIANT READING OF STRAUSS'S "TILL"

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Strube, Four Preludes for orchestra (first performance); Resphigi, "Fountains of Rome," symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Strube, who has been the teacher of composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music at Baltimore since 1913, when he left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, modestly describes his Preludes as "little." It is true that they are short, but he employs as great an orchestra as if he were writing a symphonic poem portraying the reign of Anarch or the Last Judgment. It is hardly necessary to add that the Preludes are ultra-modern in spirit and expression.

Mr. Strube started out 25 years or more ago to write serious music in the approved German conservatory manner. He then followed orthodox routine. Some years later he was fascinated by the music of Cesar Franck, Vincent d'Indy and other Frenchmen, regarded as heretics by the conservatories of his fatherland, the more so as these composers were then merely names in Germany, but as they were French, it was only reasonable to suspect them of atrocious, criminal debauchery in music. Mr. Strube has a receptive mind; his horizon broadened; his taste grew more fastidious; he experimented boldly, and he, too, without losing his solid acquirements, joined the ranks of the ultra-moderns.

These four Preludes are interesting, especially to those who have followed the development of the composer. Of the four, the second, which is of a pastoral nature, and the third, in minuet form, have the most decided character and are the most engrossing. There are charming melodic and orchestral effects in the pastorale, while the minuet has the requisite delicacy and grace. The other movements made a less favorable impression. They seemed less spontaneous, vaguely im-

Respighi's purpose in uniting his symphonic poem was to express "sentiments and visions" suggested to him by four of Rome's fountains, "contemplated at the hour in which their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape, or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer." It was a daring undertaking. How easy it would have been for him to fall into aqueous monotony! He has triumphed gloriously. Not only has he given a particular effect of color and atmosphere to each fountain; he has without any attempt to "Baedekerize" music, given unity and continuity to Italian impressionism. He has not been literal or too realistic; he has heard, seen and written as a poet enamoured of his city.

Modern in his harmonic scheme, a master of ultra-modern instrumentation, he has not forsaken melodic figures, the melody that is the Italian's birthright, and still makes a universal appeal. The harmonic devices are as his natural idiom; nowhere do we see him deliberately girding up his loins, and with knotted brow and sweat starting at every pore, saying: "I, too, will show them how modern I can be." His instrumentation is now effectively discreet, now gorgeously rich, never wildly and incongruously fantastical. Throughout the work there is the revelation of marked individuality. It is a pleasure to add that the superb performance and the worth of the music itself were fully appreciated by the great audience.

What a pity it is that Brahms in his fourth symphony did not stop after the second movement! The triangle and the piccolo do not relieve the clumsy dreariness of the Scherzo; the Finale, with the exception of a few variations, as the solemn passage for trombones, is a sad falling off from the first Allegro. Mr. Monteux gave an admirable reading of the work, bringing out clearly the innumerable details—and more than once Brahms is found treading water—sparring for wind—if the phrase may be allowed—without checking the musical flow. It was good to hear "Till Eulenspiegel" again. Would that Strauss had always written in this spirit of the true artist! The brilliant performance, as brilliant as any we remember under any other conductor, brought an end to a brilliant concert, a concert that was not too long.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for the concerts of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra (Reinald Werrenrath, singer); Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

HERALD NOV.13

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASING

First of Providence Series Attracts Large Audience.

R. WERRENRATH SOLOIST

Singer Scores Unqualified Success in Rendition of Two Arias. Conductor Monteux Directs Orchestra in Presentation of One of Best Programmes Given Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, began its 40th Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The house was practically sold out in advance, a record in the history of the organization's visits here.

This splendid revival of interest in the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city dates from the time of its reorganization after the dismissal of Dr. Muck. The shakeup in the orchestra's personnel which followed put new life in its views, and since its Americanization a better spirit has been apparent among its members, and enthusiasm has been the keynote of its performances. Increased public interest and support is the happy result.

Last evening the full complement of men was present. The only change noted was Mr. Burgin's presence at the concertmaster's desk. The new first violinist will appear here as soloist at a later concert this season.

Mr. Monteux presented a fine programme with Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, as assisting soloist. It was as follows:

Brahms....Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Allegro non troppo.
Andante moderato.
Allegro giocoso.
Allegro energico passionato.
Franck..............Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
(Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart............Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet.......Aria, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade"
Beethoven..Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

It is said of Brahms that after hearing his symphony in E-minor for the first time he had doubts concerning its musical worth. It immediately sprang into public favor, however, and to-day stands as one of his best works. It might well be called a full-voiced symphony. The composer's mastery of instrumentation is always in evidence and the general effect is one of grandeur and changing orchestral color.

The string sections showed to good advantage under Mr. Monteux's vigorous and inspiring direction and the wood-wind and brass choirs spoke eloquently, particularly in the third movement.

Gabriel Pierne's transcription for orchestra of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for pianoforte proved a rich and enticing musical dish. The stately and dignified chorale was played with great effect and in the fugue the theme was tossed about and combined in most fascinating manner. Several delightful melodic bits for flute were brought out skilfully by the first flutist, Mr. Laurent.

Reinald Werrenrath scored an unqualified success in his two arias. His rise to fame has been steady during the past few years and his singing last evening was a pleasant surprise even to those who are familiar with his excellent previous concert performances in this city. He has gained splendidly in his art. His voice is handled with consummate skill and his interpretations of the operatic arias revealed him as a singer of unusual artistic insight.

The Mozart recitative and air was sung in polished style and with vocal charm. But in the passionate song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," he reached the height of his vocal and interpretative powers. It was a superb performance, in which vocal beauty, temperament and unerring judgment combined to delight his audience. He received tremendous applause at the close and returned several times in acknowledgment. For the final number the orchestra played the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3 bringing out its beauties in brilliant fashion.

PROV. JOURNAL. NOV.17.

PENSION FUND CONCERT TOMORROW

The annual pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow at 3:30, will be an event of special interest in that Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with the Balle Russe, will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra through this splendid music for the first time. As the soloist proper of the afternoon, Guy Maier, the talented pianist, will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra.

TRAV. NOV.20

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MUSIC AND A SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENT

Mozart from a Small and Plastic Orchestra—Ravel Amuses with the Ways of the Ancients—Mr. Werrenrath's, Mr. Mason's and Mr. Bynner's "Russians"—Finally a Blaze of Roumanian Wildness

IN his usual quiet fashion Mr. Monteux has made another change for the better in the ways of the Symphony Concerts. Yesterday afternoon, for the first time, as it seemed, within the longest memory, a symphony of the eighteenth century was played by a relatively small orchestra. It happened to be a symphony of Mozart, written late in his fertile twenties and unheard hereabouts since 1900. According to the practice of his time he scored it for two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettle-drum and strings. According to precedent at Symphony Hall and almost everywhere else, Mr. Monteux should have employed nearly his full string choir and doubled the other parts to cope with this body of tone. Instead, he kept the paired wind instruments of Mozart's design and reduced violins, violas, violoncellos and double-basses until the whole band approximated in numbers and balance a concert-orchestra of the composer's day. It sufficed for sonority in every corner of the hall. It gained a lightness of tone that was truer and more natural voice to the music than sixty strings and a doubled wind choir can possibly be. It achieved a corresponding suppleness of pace, accent, modulation. The symphony moved fleetly, transparently. No longer did unescapable weight of tone stiffen plasticity, over-emphasize turn and transition, cloud harmonic brightness, dull light play with figures. As the symphony sounded to hearers at Linz in 1783, so now, in measure, it entered the ears of Bostonians in 1920. At Mr. Monteux's hands longstanding theory at last became altogether justifiable practice.

Throughout, for the change, the music pleased the more. This little symphony in C major—long a favorite with Mr. Monteux in Paris—has none of the gravity or the latent power of the three symphonies of Mozart's final years. It begins gently, slowly, songfully; the ensuing Allegro brings the zest of graceful invention and plastic progress. The slow movement sings simply, pensively. The Minuet is simpler still and not less gracious. The Finale ripples brightly, swiftly. Always it is as though the ear were taking the pure pleasure of music spun like an embroidery upon the air with fancy to shape it and charm to clothe it. The pleasure was the keener and ampler for the transparency, the pliancy, of the transmitting voices. For once, Mozart's fine and vibrant line was neither thickened nor stiffened; his playful or musing modulations were as little glints upon the surface of the music; figure and arabesque ran light and bright; there was sheen upon the harmonic and instrumental texture of the whole. To gain these qualities and to add to them felicity of pace and rhythm and grace of mood is to summon the simple charm, the musical delight of such a symphony. Mr. Monteux could hardly have made happier experiment.

Set magic upon some composer among the ancients—not Mozart this time, but say Monsieur Couperin of the Versailles of Louis XIV. and the Paris of the Regency. Let that magic possess him for the moment with the ways of the twentieth century in modulation, harmony, instrumental color, while otherwise he keeps his native simplicity, fancy, elegance. How would he have written? Perhaps much as Monsieur Ravel writes in the little suite played yesterday for the first time in America and called "Couperin's Tomb," which, being freely interpreted, is a garland of music wound about that resting-place. Originally, six short pieces for piano were twined into it. Discarding a Fugue and a Toccata, the composer re-made the other four—Prelude, Forlane, Minuet and Rigadoon—for an orchestra hardly larger than Mozart's and appropriately so. In the process Ravel has plied a sophisticated simplicity. He modulates often as with the tips of his fingers. Delicately he sets in characteristic harmonies. Finely he spins the instrumental strands, lays on no more than flecks of light and shade. Everywhere his touch is apt, sure, elegant. There are details of rare finesse and details as well of smiling fancy.

If Couperin hears through the cracks of his tomb, he has reason to be well pleased. "Had I known," he may even say to himself, "so should I have written." With equal reason he may take pleasure in the bright and graceful measures of the Prelude, the rhythmic animation of the lightly springing Forlana as the Venetians named their dance; the formal flow of the minuet, gentle and not too stately; the lively progress of the piping, twinkling Rigadoon. Ravel designs his tonal masquerade after the best models, wears it at happy and pleasurable ease. Yet now and then the familiar lines of his musical figure, so to say, and the sound of his own voice will betray him. Enough that he has been adroit, felicitous, amusing—a little master of playful finesse. Once upon a time he could write sardonic parodies of other men's music. With another turn of the same talent, he now chise's miniatures after Couperin.

Anything but miniatures were the five songs for baritone and orchestra, sung by Mr. Werrenrath, at last called to the Symphony Concerts as no solo voice in a choral piece but as "assisting artist" in his own right. Long since he deserved the call and an audience mindful of his deserts welcomed him warmly, expectantly. His own choice were these "Russians" and before he had proceeded far poet and composer clearly owed him much. The poet is Witter Bynner who wrote these "character-pieces" in free verse after a vivid, sympathetic book about Russia had engrossed and kindled him. In the first "The Drunkard," half fuddled with liquor, muses upon the unhappy state of one denied by his wife the shelter of his own roof. Yet does an inner warmth comfort him. In the second, a "Concertina-Player" sings of a lot by no means without compensations as he tramps the open road and even beggars throw him coppers for his music. In the third a condemned "Revolutionary" speaks to a father and especially to a mother—too far away to hear—of the love he bears them, of the deep and simple devotion within him. To the mother:

> I have no sweetheart except you and earth,
> And earth is a strange sweetheart.
> It sees me strong and young and beautiful,
> Yet has no wish for me.
> I must give up, go out.
> I who have cared so much!

The fourth is no more than vignette of gray sky, gray geese across it, gray water with a girl's white feet mirrored in it and gray-eyed boy watching, wondering. Last a "Prophet" exuberantly foretells a general doom and gives himself ardently to the sacrifice of a hangman's noose.

So far Mr. Bynner, ironic of humor with his drunkard; fantastic of humor with his prophet; lyric with his gray vision; ironic still, but warming with his tramp-musician, grave and glowing with his devoted prisoner. With the five also is he graphic and concentrated always. Then enter Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason with music that, in scheme, Mahler's "cycles" of songs for voice and orchestra may have suggested. Seemingly he knows as little of Russians at first hand as Mr. Bynner and in his measures a single hearing discovers small trace of Russian idiom outside the song of the concertina-player. Rather he works from the direct suggestion of the verse upon his powers of imagination and characterizaton in tones. Yet not so much in characterization as in running comment, illustrating, enforcing the progress of each song.

Don Juan springs into being in Strauss's tone-poem; human figures take shape and spirit in the songs of Wolf and Musorgsky. Mr. Mason can do no such office for Mr. Bynner's personages. No more can he illuminate them with Wagner's flashes of divination and projection. What he can do and does do is to mate his music closely to the verse, following the rough contours, heeding the irregular rhythms. At the same time, that music sharpens details as in the final song of the fanatic; widens the vision as when the tramp-musician sings of the sunny open road; sustains a gentle atmosphere as in the lyric in gray; underscores the drunkard's jerky musings; seeks but not quite gains the mingled glow and bitterness of the "Revolutionary's" longings. Variously, incessantly, and often graphically Mr. Mason's music is illustrative; yet minute and close-bound to the verse as it so must be, he holds it firmly and elastically together, keeps it in steady motion. Not often is it music of impinging imagination; rather it is music of mental energy and resource conceived, applied with no small will. By so much it is tour de force in kind.

Finally enters Mr. Werrenrath to begin where the others end. Mr. Bynner has sketched the characters; Mr. Mason has lighted and shaded them. It remains for the singer to call them to life, to give them individualizing speech and spirit. Like Mahler, the composer often treats the voice as though it were but another instrument in his orchestra. Mr. Bynner's verse is not readily "singable." Nothing daunted Mr. Werrenrath sets to his declamation. When he has done, drunkard and fanatic, wanderer and prisoner, the boy of the gray day have each lived their moment to ear and imagination. If Mr. Mason has done his feat of illustrative music, still more has Mr. Werrenrath done his of characterization in tones. All his powers of voice, command of song, vigors of imagination join together to this single end and accomplish it. The propulsive force that poet and composer miss he summons. They are heard and noted. He vanishes, while through him these Russians speak.

Another wildness ended the concert—the wildness of Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody. Up and down, forward and back, he whips bare and sinewy motive. Fiercely and more fiercely beat the rhythms. Modulations bite; suspensions tingle; repetitions drive home. The [illegible] crouches for breath, then springs forward ing ever higher. A conductor made of stone, an orchestra adamant, did they not catch fire from barbaric blaze. Rather Mr. Monteux his men flamed with it. He flung it though it were the wildest of ballets as in the old days laid on and spared as supple and sure as they were wonder the other two rhapsodies disappeared as failures. A composer hardly have more than one such within him.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Stravinsky's "Petruschka" from the Symphony Orchestra—A Matinee for the Pension Fund—Cyril Scott in His Own Piano Pieces—Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison Anew—The Art Museum Returns to Music

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week, the suite arranged by Stravinsky from the music to his ballet, "Petruschka" will be played for the first times in America. The first part is music of the fair with which on the stage the action begins. The second part follows the jealous and tortured puppet into his box. The third returns to the fair and the later dances. To disclose anew the notable quality of the string choir, it will be heard as a body in Mendelssohn's Octet, a novel piece nowadays in the concert-hall. The middle number of the programme is likely to be Respighi's tone-poem, "Fountains of Rome," generally liked a week ago and now eagerly demanded on all sides in repetition.

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in the first of the two annual concerts for the Pension Fund. The programme traverses pieces that will reveal the new quality of the band and please the general ear: Rimsky-Korsakow's glowing suite, "Scheherazade"; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules"; Wagner's resounding overture to "Rienzi" and Liszt's glittering concerto for piano in E flat with Guy Maier to play the solo part. Here in Boston he has not hitherto played with the orchestra.

TRAN. NOV.20

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR PENSION FUND

"Scheherazade" to Be Performed in All Oriental Beauty

Considerable interest centres in the performance of "Scheherazade" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30 at the annual pension fund concert, in that this will be the first performance of this popular suite by the orchestra under the guidance of Pierre Monteux who was so famous for his magnificent reading of this score in its ballet version when he conducted the Ballet Russe Orchestra.

The symphonic version of this oriental and gorgeously colored music of the Arabian Nights is of course its first and also its authentic form. Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote it solely for orchestral use, and only after his death in 1908 was it hashed into a "choreographic drama." His widow protested this desecration and used every legal means to prevent it, but without success. Indeed, the music is so descriptive in itself that dancing and scenery detract rather than add to its effectiveness.

There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, horn, trumpet, trombone—even the drums. The violin solo is the most important of these, and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. This will afford an opportunity to estimate the talents of Richard Burgin, who has newly come to that post of honor in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

GLOBE NOV.21

From TIMES NOV 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE SOON

Fortieth Anniversary Season of Famous Orchestra —Michael Piastro To Be Soloist.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now celebrating its fortieth anniversary season, will give a concert at Parsons's theater on January 10, with Michael Piastro, the Russian violinist, as soloist. Never in the forty years of this orchestra, which has so long taken an eminent place in the musical development of America, have the concerts been more popular, and never have a larger number been undertaken in one year. The opening of the season in Symphony hall, Boston, in early October was in every way a brilliant occasion and was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks) was as highly praised as the quality of the performances. Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this. [illegible] returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections is Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who arrived from the eastern part of Europe (where he is considered by long count the finest concertmaster) to participate in the opening Boston Symphony concerts.

Piastro, the soloist at the coming Hartford concert, came to America for the first time this season, and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia. The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's, Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipt of checks, and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

PLAYS MUSIC OF MODERNISTS

Symphony in Fifth Concert Gives Composition of Resphigi and Strube

BRILLIANT READING OF STRAUSS'S "TILL"

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Strube, Four Preludes for orchestra (first performance); Resphigi, "Fountains of Rome," symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Strube, who has been the teacher of composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music at Baltimore since 1913, when he left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, modestly describes his Preludes as "little." It is true that they are short, but he employs as great an orchestra as if he were writing a symphonic poem portraying the reign of Anarch or the Last Judgment. It is hardly necessary to add that the Preludes are ultra-modern in spirit and expression.

Mr. Strube started out 25 years or more ago to write serious music in the approved German conservatory manner. He then followed orthodox routine. Some years later he was fascinated by the music of Cesar Franck, Vincent d'Indy and other Frenchmen, regarded as heretics by the conservatories of his fatherland, the more so as these composers were then merely names in Germany, but as they were French, it was only reasonable to suspect them of atrocious, criminal debauchery in music. Mr. Strube has a receptive mind; his horizon broadened; his taste grew more fastidious; he experimented boldly, and he, too, without losing his solid acquirements, joined the ranks of the ultra-moderns.

These four Preludes are interesting, especially to those who have followed the development of the composer. Of the four, the second, which is of a pastoral nature, and the third, in minuet form, have the most decided character and are the most engrossing. There are charming melodic and orchestral effects in the pastorale, while the minuet has the requisite delicacy and grace. The other movements made a less favorable impression. They seemed less spontaneous, vaguely impressionistic.

Respighi's purpose in uniting his symphonic poem was to express "sentiments and 'visions'" suggested to him by four of Rome's fountains, "contemplated at the hour in which their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape, or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer." It was a daring undertaking. How easy it would have been for him to fall into aqueous monotony! He has triumphed gloriously. Not only has he given a particular effect of color and atmosphere to each fountain; he has without any attempt to "Baedekerize" music, given unity and continuity to Italian impressionism. He has not been literal or too realistic; he has heard, seen and written as a poet enamoured of his city.

Modern in his harmonic scheme, a master of ultra-modern instrumentation, he has not forsaken melodic figures, the melody that is the Italian's birthright, and still makes a universal appeal. The harmonic devices are as his natural idiom; nowhere do we see him deliberately girding up his loins, and with knotted brow and sweat starting at every pore, saying: "I, too, will show them how modern I can be." His instrumentation is now effectively discreet, now gorgeously rich, never wildly and incongruously fantastical. Throughout the work there is the revelation of marked individuality. It is a pleasure to add that the superb performance and the worth of the music itself were fully appreciated by the great audience.

What a pity it is that Brahms in his fourth symphony did not stop after the second movement! The triangle and the piccolo do not relieve the clumsy dreariness of the Scherzo; the Finale, with the exception of a few variations, as the solemn passage for trombones, is a sad falling off from the first Allegro. Mr. Monteux gave an admirable reading of the work, bringing out clearly the innumerable details—and more than once Brahms is found treading water—sparring for wind—if the phrase may be allowed—without checking the musical flow. It was good to hear "Till Eulenspiegel" again. Would that Strauss had always written in this spirit of the true artist! The brilliant performance, as brilliant as any we remember under any other conductor, brought an end to a brilliant concert, a concert that was not too long.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for the concerts of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major (K. 425); Mason, "Russians," five songs for baritone and orchestra (Reinald Werrenrath, singer); Ravel, "Couperin's Tomb," suite for orchestra (first time in America); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

HERALD NOV. 13

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASING

First of Providence Series Attracts Large Audience.

R. WERRENRATH SOLOIST

Singer Scores Unqualified Success in Rendition of Two Arias. Conductor Monteux Directs Orchestra in Presentation of One of Best Programmes Given Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, began its 40th Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The house was practically sold out in advance, a record in the history of the organization's visits here.

This splendid revival of interest in the Boston orchestra's concerts in this city dates from the time of its reorganization after the dismissal of Dr. Muck. The shakeup in the orchestra's personnel which followed put new life in its views, and since its Americanization a better spirit has been apparent among its members, and enthusiasm has been the keynote of its performances. Increased public interest and support is the happy result.

Last evening the full complement of men was present. The only change noted was Mr. Burgin's presence at the concertmaster's desk. The new first violinist will appear here as soloist at a later concert this season.

Mr. Monteux presented a fine programme with Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, as assisting soloist. It was as follows:

Brahms....Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, Op. 98
  Allegro non troppo.
  Andante moderato.
  Allegro giocoso.
  Allegro energico passionato.
Franck..............Prelude, Chorale and Fugue
  (Orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne)
Mozart...........Recitative, "Tutto e disposto"
  Aria, "Aprite un po'quegl'occhi" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Massenet.......Aria, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade"
Beethoven..Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72

It is said of Brahms that after hearing his symphony in E-minor for the first time he had doubts concerning its musical worth. It immediately sprang into public favor, however, and to-day stands as one of his best works. It might well be called a full-voiced symphony. The composer's mastery of instrumentation is always in evidence and the general effect is one of grandeur and changing orchestral color.

The string sections showed to good advantage under Mr. Monteux's vigorous and inspiring direction and the wood-wind and brass choirs spoke eloquently, particularly in the third movement.

Gabriel Pierne's transcription for orchestra of Cesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for pianoforte proved a rich and enticing musical dish. The stately and dignified chorale was played with great effect and in the fugue the theme was tossed about and combined in most fascinating manner. Several delightful melodic bits for flute were brought out skilfully by the first flutist, Mr. Laurent.

Reinald Werrenrath scored an unqualified success in his two arias. His rise to fame has been steady during the past few years and his singing last evening was a pleasant surprise even to those who are familiar with his excellent previous concert performances in this city. He has gained splendidly in his art. His voice is handled with consummate skill and his interpretations of the operatic arias revealed him as a singer of unusual artistic insight.

The Mozart recitative and air was sung in polished style and with vocal charm. But in the passionate song, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," he reached the height of his vocal and interpretative powers. It was a superb performance, in which vocal beauty, temperament and unerring judgment combined to delight his audience. He received tremendous applause at the close and returned several times in acknowledgment. For the final number the orchestra played the Beethoven overture to "Leonore," No. 3 bringing out its beauties in brilliant fashion.

PROV. JOURNAL. NOV. 17.

PENSION FUND CONCERT TOMORROW

The annual pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow at 3:30, will be an event of special interest in that Pierre Monteux, long famous as the conductor of "Scheherazade" in its ballet version with the Balle Russe, will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra through this splendid music for the first time. As the soloist proper of the afternoon, Guy Maier, the talented pianist, will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra.

TRAV. NOV. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MUSIC AND A SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENT

Mozart from a Small and Plastic Orchestra—Ravel Amuses with the Ways of the Ancients — Mr. Werrenrath's, Mr. Mason's and Mr. Bynner's "Russians"— Finally a Blaze of Roumanian Wildness

IN his usual quiet fashion Mr. Monteux has made another change for the better in the ways of the Symphony Concerts. Yesterday afternoon, for the first time, as it seemed, within the longest memory, a symphony of the eighteenth century was played by a relatively small orchestra. It happened to be a symphony of Mozart, written late in his fertile twenties and unheard hereabouts since 1900. According to the practice of his time he scored it for two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettle-drum and strings. According to precedent at Symphony Hall and almost everywhere else, Mr. Monteux should have employed nearly his full string choir and doubled the other parts to cope with this body of tone. Instead, he kept the paired wind instruments of Mozart's design and reduced violins, violas, violoncellos and double-basses until the whole band approximated in numbers and balance a concert-orchestra of the composer's day. It sufficed for sonority in every corner of the hall. It gained a lightness of tone that was truer and more natural voice to the music than sixty strings and a doubled wind choir can possibly be. It achieved a corresponding suppleness of pace, accent, modulation. The symphony moved fleetly, transparently. No longer did unescapable weight of tone stiffen plasticity, over-emphasize turn and transition, cloud harmonic brightness, dull light play with figures. As the symphony sounded to hearers at Linz in 1783, so now, in measure, it entered the ears of Bostonians in 1920. At Mr. Monteux's hands long-standing theory at last became altogether justifiable practice.

Throughout, for the change, the music pleased the more. This little symphony in C major—long a favorite with Mr. Monteux in Paris—has none of the gravity or the latent power of the three symphonies of Mozart's final years. It begins gently, slowly, songfully; the ensuing Allegro brings the zest of graceful invention and plastic progress. The slow movement sings simply, pensively. The Minuet is simpler still and not less gracious. The Finale ripples brightly, swiftly. Always it is as though the ear were taking the pure pleasure of music spun like an embroidery upon the air with fancy to shape it and charm to clothe it. The pleasure was the keener and ampler for the transparency, the pliancy, of the transmitting voices. For once, Mozart's fine and vibrant line was neither thickened nor stiffened; his playful or musing modulations were as little glints upon the surface of the music; figure and arabesque ran light and bright; there was sheen upon the harmonic and instrumental texture of the whole. To gain these qualities and to add to them felicity of pace and rhythm and grace of mood is to summon the simple charm, the musical delight of such a symphony. Mr. Monteux could hardly have made happier experiment.

Set magic upon some composer among the ancients—not Mozart this time, but say Monsieur Couperin of the Versailles of Louis XIV. and the Paris of the Regency. Let that magic possess him for the moment with the ways of the twentieth century in modulation, harmony, instrumental color, while otherwise he keeps his native simplicity, fancy, elegance. How would he have written? Perhaps much as Monsieur Ravel writes in the little suite played yesterday for the first time in America and called "Couperin's Tomb," which, being freely interpreted, is a garland of music wound about that resting-place. Originally, six short pieces for piano were twined into it. Discarding a Fugue and a Toccata, the composer re-made the other four—Prelude, Forlane, Minuet and Rigadoon—for an orchestra hardly larger than Mozart's and appropriately so. In the process Ravel has plied a sophisticated simplicity. He modulates often as with the tips of his fingers. Delicately he sets in characteristic harmonies. Finely he spins the instrumental strands, lays on no more than flecks of light and shade. Everywhere his touch is apt, sure, elegant. There are details of rare finesse and details as well of smiling fancy.

If Couperin hears through the cracks of his tomb, he has reason to be well pleased. "Had I known," he may even say to himself, "so should I have written." With equal reason he may take pleasure in the bright and graceful measures of the Prelude, the rhythmic animation of the lightly springing Forlana as the Venetians named their dance; the formal flow of the minuet, gentle and not too stately; the lively progress of the piping, twinkling Rigadoon. Ravel designs his tonal masquerade after the best models, wears it at happy and pleasurable ease. Yet now and then the familiar lines of his musical figure, so to say, and the sound of his own voice will betray him. Enough that he has been adroit, felicitous, amusing—a little master of playful finesse. Once upon a time he could write sardonic parodies of other men's music. With another turn of the same talent, he now chisels miniatures after Couperin.

Anything but miniatures were the five songs for baritone and orchestra, sung by Mr. Werrenrath, at last called to the Symphony Concerts as no solo voice in a choral piece but as "assisting artist" in his own right. Long since he deserved the call and an audience mindful of his deserts welcomed him warmly, expectantly. His own choice were these "Russians" and before he had proceeded far poet and composer clearly owed him much. The poet is Witter Bynner who wrote these "character-pieces" in free verse after a vivid, sympathetic book about Russia had engrossed and kindled him. In the first "The Drunkard," half fuddled with liquor, muses upon the unhappy state of one denied by his wife the shelter of his own roof. Yet does an inner warmth comfort him. In the second, a "Concertina-Player" sings of a lot by no means without compensations as he tramps the open road and even beggars throw him coppers for his music. In the third a condemned "Revolutionary" speaks to a father and especially to mother—too far away to hear—of the love he bears them, of the deep and simple devotion within him. To the mother:

> I have no sweetheart except you and earth,
> And earth is a strange sweetheart.
> It sees me strong and young and beautiful,
> Yet has no wish for me.
> I must give up, go out.
> I who have cared so much!

The fourth is no more than vignette of gray sky, gray geese across it, gray water with a girl's white feet mirrored in it and gray-eyed boy watching, wondering. Last a "Prophet" exuberantly foretells a general doom and gives himself ardently to the sacrifice of a hangman's noose.

So far Mr. Bynner, ironic of humor with his drunkard; fantastic of humor with his prophet; lyric with his gray vision; ironic still, but warming with his tramp-musician; grave and glowing with his devoted prisoner. With the five also is he graphic and concentrated always. Then enter Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason with music that, in scheme, Mahler's "cycles" of songs for voice and orchestra may have suggested. Seemingly he knows as little of Russians at first hand as Mr. Bynner and in his measures a single hearing discovers small trace of Russian idiom outside the song of the concertina-player. Rather he works from the direct suggestion of the verse upon his powers of imagination and characterizaton in tones. Yet not so much in characterization as in running comment, illustrating, enforcing the progress of each song.

Don Juan springs into being in Strauss's tone-poem; human figures take shape and spirit in the songs of Wolf and Musorgsky. Mr. Mason can do no such office for Mr. Bynner's personages. No more can he illuminate them with Wagner's flashes of divination and projection. What he can do and does do is to mate his music closely to the verse, following the rough contours, heeding the irregular rhythms. At the same time, that music sharpens details as in the final song of the fanatic; widens the vision as when the tramp-musician sings of the sunny open road; sustains a gentle atmosphere as in the lyric in gray; underscores the drunkard's jerky musings; seeks but not quite gains the mingled glow and bitterness of the "Revolutionary's" longings. Variously, incessantly, and often graphically Mr. Mason's music is illustrative; yet minute and close-bound to the verse as it so must be, he holds it firmly and elastically together, keeps it in steady motion. Not often is it music of impinging imagination; rather it is music of mental energy and resource conceived, applied with no small will. By so much it is tour de force in kind.

Finally enters Mr. Werrenrath to begin where the others end. Mr. Bynner has sketched the characters; Mr. Mason has lighted and shaded them. It remains for the singer to call them to life, to give them individualizing speech and spirit. Like Mahler, the composer often treats the voice as though it were but another instrument in his orchestra. Mr. Bynner's verse is not readily "singable." Nothing daunted Mr. Werrenrath sets to his declamation. When he has done, drunkard and fanatic, wanderer and prisoner, the boy of the gray day have each lived their moment to ear and imagination. If Mr. Mason has done his feat of illustrative music, still more has Mr. Werrenrath done his of characterization in tones. All his powers of voice, command of song, vigors of imagination join together to this single end and accomplish it. The propulsive force that poet and composer miss he summons. They are heard and noted. He vanishes, while through him these Russians speak.

Another wildness ended the concert—the wildness of Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody. Up and down, forward and back, he whips bare and sinewy motives. Fiercely and more fiercely beat the rhythms. Modulations bite; suspensions tingle; repetitions drive home. The music crouches for breath, then springs forward ing ever higher. A conductor made of stone, an orchestra adamant, did they not catch fire from barbaric blaze. Rather Mr. Monteux his men flamed with it. He flung it though it were the wildest of ballets; as in the old days laid on and spared as supple and sure as they were stout. wonder the other two rhapsodies disappeared as failures. A composer hardly have more than one such within him.

H. T. P

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Stravinsky's "Petruschka" from the Symphony Orchestra—A Matinee for the Pension Fund—Cyril Scott in His Own Piano Pieces—Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison Anew—The Art Museum Returns to Music

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week, the suite arranged by Stravinsky from the music to his ballet, "Petruschka" will be played for the first times in America. The first part is music of the fair with which on the stage the action begins. The second part follows the jealous and tortured puppet into his box. The third returns to the fair and the later dances. To disclose anew the notable quality of the string choir, it will be heard as a body in Mendelssohn's Octet, a novel piece nowadays in the concert-hall. The middle number of the programme is likely to be Respighi's tone-poem, "Fountains of Rome," generally liked a week ago and now eagerly demanded on all sides in repetition.

Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in the first of the two annual concerts for the Pension Fund. The programme traverses pieces that will reveal the new quality of the band and please the general ear: Rimsky-Korsakov's glowing suite, "Scheherazade"; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules"; Wagner's resounding overture to "Rienzi" and Liszt's glittering concerto for piano in E flat with Guy Maier to play the solo part. Here in Boston he has not hitherto played with the orchestra.

IAN NOV. 20

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR PENSION FUND

"Scheherazade" to Be Performed in All Oriental Beauty

Considerable interest centres in performance of "Scheherazade" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30 at the annual pension fund concert. In this this will be the first performance of this popular suite by the orchestra under the guidance of Pierre Monteux, who was so famous for his magnificent reading of this score in its ballet form when he conducted the Ballet Russe orchestra.

The symphonic version of this colorful and gorgeously colored music of the Arabian Nights is of course its first and also its authentic form. Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote it solely for orchestral use, and it was after his death in 1908 was it hashed into a "choreographic drama." His widow protested this desecration and used every legal means to prevent it, but without success. Indeed, the music is so descriptive in itself that dancing and scenery detract rather than add to its effectiveness.

There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, horn, trumpet, trombone—even the drums. The violin solo is the most important of these, and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. This will afford an opportunity to estimate the talents of Richard Burgin, who has newly come to that post of honor in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SE. NOV. 21

51

TIGHT BINDING

an orchestra would ey not catch fire from this Rather Mr. Monteux and with it. He flung it out as the wildest of ballets; they, ays laid on and spared not,
ure as they were stout. No other two rhapsodies have as failures. A composer may more than one such piece.

H. T. PARKER

ONCERTS NEXT WEEK

ky's "Petruschka" from the Sym-Orchestra—A Matinee for the n Fund—Cyril Scott in His Own Pieces—Mr. Maier and Mr. Patti-new—The Art Museum Returns to he Symphony Concerts of next eek, the suite arranged by Straviny from the music to his ballet, chka" will be played for the first America. The first part is music fair with which on the stage the begins. The second part follows lous and tortured puppet into his he third returns to the fair and the nces. To disclose anew the notable of the string choir, it will be heard ody in Mendelssohn's Octet, a novel nowadays in the concert-hall. The number of the programme is likely Respighi's tone-poem, "Fountains of generally liked a week ago and agerly demanded on all sides in on.

rrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, onteux and the orchestra will be n the first of the two annual conor the Pension Fund. The pro-e traverses pieces that will reveal w quality of the band and please general ear: Rimsky-Korsakov's suite, "Scheherazade"; Saint-tone-poem, "The Youth of Her-Wagner's resounding overture to " and Liszt's glittering concerto no in E flat with Guy Maier to play o part. Here in Boston he has not o played with the orchestra.

RAN. NOV. 20

YMPHONY TO PLAY FOR PENSION FUND

cheherazade" to Be Per-med in All Oriental Beauty onsiderable interest centres in the formance of "Scheherazade" by the ton Symphony Orchestra this after-n in Symphony Hall at 3:30 at its ual pension fund concert, in that will be the first performance of this ular suite by the orchestra under guidance of Pierre Monteux who so famous for his magnificent read-of this score in its ballet version n he conducted the Ballet Russ hestra.

he symphonic version of this orienta gorgeously colored music of the bian Nights is of course its finest also its authentic form. Rimsky rsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote solely for orchestral use, and only er his death in 1908 was it hashed a "choreographic drama."
ow protested this desecration a d every legal means to prevent it, b hout success. Indeed, the music descriptive in itself that dancing a nery detract rather than add to ctiveness.

here are important solos upon ea
he principal instruments—the viol a, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, n, horn, trumpet, trombone—even
ms. The violin solo is the m ortant of these, and a sensu enza-like theme with which the c master intersperses the music s Scheherazade, the Sultan's c beginning another of her thous one tales. This will afford ortunity to estimate the talents nard Burgin, who has newly co that post of honor in the Bos nphony Orchestra.

GLOBE NOV. 21

[51]

HUB AUDIENCES LIKE OLDER MUSIC, DECLARES CONDUCTOR MONTEUX

HERALD NOV. 21

A New Piece on the Program of a Symphony Concert Often Fails to Make Its Full Effect

CONDUCTOR MONTEUX IN ACTION

HE amateur listener at the Symphony concerts cannot resist the curiosity o know "what makes the wheels go ound." He sees the hall, the orchestra, the conductor, the soloist; he is ware of his fellow listeners; he hears he music. Somehow he understands hat all together make the whole thing hat is a symphony concert. But how e wonders, do they combine. Does the udience have any effect on the orchestra and the conductor? Does weather ffect the concert? Why should the rst violins sit on the conductor's left? oes the conductor labor more vigorusly in fortissimo passages or is his urden as heavy when the still small oice of the orchestra sings?

The listener knows that there are ooks to aid him, but life is so short nd art is so long that he fears the ength of dissertation. Yet curiosity ill not down; how does a concert happen? Mr. Monteux is glad to take time rom his busy life to explain in terms the amateur brain.

Tempo Is a Matter of Feeling

The amateur has noticed that different conductors set different paces for he same piece of music. He has read he words of critics that a movement as taken too fast or too slow. He has ven been astonished, sometimes, that he tempo is different from what he ad expected; in such cases he has ways found that what he received as better than what he expected ow. who, he wonders, knows what he right time is? "Can a conductor now," he asks Mr. Monteux, "that e has set the right tempo for a piece music?"

"That," comes the quick answer, "is l a matter of feeling. I study a score. hum. I think about it, and finally I nd just how I feel that it should be ayed. Of course, there is the metronome—I can consult it. But sometimes is very wrong—to my mind! I never ke the Eighth Symphony of Beetoven so rapidly as the metronome arks call for. I feel that such speed ould make a wrong effect.

"That is why conductors differ—they not feel alike. Members of the orestra do not feel alike. Each has his wn idea of what the time should be."

Then here, cries the amateur to himlf, is the answer to the aged queson, "Why is a conductor?" The lady st behind him whispered at the last ncert, "I wish they didn't have a nductor! Don't you think a man looks ly waving his arms?" She had never tened, probably, to 16 first violins ch going at its own sweet will through e sweeps and melodies of a symphony. he ancient question of the one or the any is quickly answered for the orestra: it must be the one, and he is e conductor.

d and Modern Require Same Pains

The same is true of the volume of und. "That, too, is a matter of feelg," Mr. Monteux asserts. "How soft, w loud? I decide by how I feel to fferent degrees, whether one or anher gives just the feeling that the usic ought to have. I never can tell course, whether we shall have in the ncert exactly the shade of tone that e had in rehearsal. We have rearsed thoroughly until we know what to be done, but the conductor must alert at every moment to see that e orchestra does not forget. If we ke too much volume, I make signs reduce, and if tones are too thin, must ask for more."

The amateur has been wondering out the demands of old and modern sic. Which requires more rehearsing d why? Is there not a temptation to ange older music to suit a changed chestra, to remake Beethoven in the y that he would probably have sen to write in 1920?

"Old and new must have about the same amount of rehearsing," Mr. Monteux explains. "The older music often is more difficult for the individual instrument to play, but the modern music needs more rehearsing to show the balance and the meaning of each part. I must often, in rehearsing modern music, ask one section of the orchestra to remain silent and listen to what another section plays, so that we shall all understand the meaning of the whole composition. Older music is very clear in its intention, and is so beautiful that we must take the greatest pains to make it sing exactly as it should be sung. But we must never change older music to suit modern possibilities. There it is, as the composer meant to have it when he wrote. We are a museum to keep it in just as he left it."

Boston Audience Clings to Old

The question arises, does a Boston audience always show sympathy to the newer music? Can the conductor always depend on the audience, always know how it will react? Do modern audiences feel as antagonistic toward unheard forms as the audiences of 100 years ago?

"I never know," Mr. Monteux replies, "whether the audience will like or not like the program. Sometimes I have made a program which seemed to me very fine, and I have thought, 'They will like that.' Then when the concert was played every one has sat still and unmoved! I have sometimes gone to a concert with the thought, 'Oh, what is there in this program that should move an audience? I fear they will be disappointed.' But they have applauded with the greatest enthusiasm. I made the program because I thought the music should be heard, but I feared the result. No, I never know what to expect.'

"Boston audiences like the older works better. They are willing to hear the newer, but they prefer to stay with the old. Of course, I must offer every kind of music. We must have the old masters, the moderns, the overture, the symphony, the tone poem—everything. But one thing we must never have—cheap music! I will never put a bit of cheap music on a program. It is often most effective, and a conductor can rouse an audience, but it is cheap just the same, and I will not do it.

"When we put a new piece on a program to be played for the first time in Boston, often it fails to make its full effect. Modern music must be heard many times before it is understood. So we must repeat it at another time. People are not opposed to it, but they don't quite understand it.

Playing Best in Concerts

"But modern audiences are not so violent in their opposition as the audiences were 100 years ago, or even 20 years ago. When I first played Debussy's 'L'Apres-midi d'un Faune,' people laughed outright at it! They thought it monstrous! Today an audience would not quite do that. The people are more accustomed to new things, and after they have heard them a few times they accept them if they are good."

Does the orchestra play as well in rehearsal as in concert? Is it better to conduct with or without score?

"No, we never do so well in rehearsal. Something must always be left for the concert to make it perfect. It is impossible to tell just why this is so, but it is. We try to do everything at the rehearsal, we go over everything, and leave no point without its refinement. But it is never quite right. Then we go to the concert—and we do much more than we had done before. I am often astonished at the difference. I hear members of the orchestra remark on the change and declare that they did not know we could do so well.

"I used to conduct without score. It is no more difficult than when one uses the score. But I noticed that people paid too much attention to me and too little to the music. I discussed the question with M. Rabaud, and decided that I would always use the score, so that people should pay all attention to the main thing, the music. So I have placed the harps at the rear of the orchestra, because people used to watch the harpist's foot too closely and forget that they had come to listen to music. Whatever interferes with that must step aside."

Each Instrument May Be a Soloist

Then why does a conductor arrange his orchestra as he does, why proportion it as he does? Are there any instruments on which he cannot depend? Does he lack instruments to express his desires?

"There are both tradition and reason in the arrangement," is Mr. Monteux's reply. "With the violins there is reason. The first violins carry the melody, the important part, most often. The melody must be dominant. So we have the players sit on the conductor's left hand, where their instruments will have the opening of the body toward the audience. That throws the sound out in fuller volume. With other instruments the position is chiefly a matter of tradition and varies with different orchestras. Some have the basses at one side; we have them at the rear.

"The number of stringed instruments is far greater than that of wind or percussion, as any one can see. The strings make the body of the orchestra. But some composers wish not to write one voice to be sung by 16 first violins. Stavinsky, when I saw him last, declared that he is now going to write an individual part for each violin: if he has 16, each will play its own melody. Why, he asks, should 16 do the same thing? Each flute plays its own part, each oboe, each clarinet. So with the strings. If he wants fewer than 16 parts, he will have fewer violins. Each instrument will have its solo, then. No, it will be no more difficult to conduct such an orchestra. The score will be larger and harder to read, perhaps, but that is all.

Future Orchestra Will Be Larger

"Instruments are now so well made that they can be depended upon to do what is required. There are also plenty of instruments to express whatever the music calls for. It is the composer, not the conductor, who sometimes needs new instruments. I remember once at the opera in Paris a composer needed an instrument to express the feelings of a weak, ill woman. The violin was too sharp, too loud. Finally someone hollowed out a walking stick, stretched a single string over it, and the result was a thin tune that was exactly what was required.

"I fear that modern music will continue to demand new instruments, more and more. I see no limit to what we may expect. More and more music becomes complex—and to meet this complexity more instruments are necessary. That means a larger orchestra, unless composers definitely restrict themselves to writing music for a small body of players."

Is conducting more or less difficult when the full orchestra plays? Does weather affect the playing? How can the conductor indicate his desires to the men.

"When the full orchestra plays," says Mr. Monteux, "it is the easy time for the conductor. He must then beat time, and that is all. The full orchestra runs itself, almost. It is the pianissimo passages, where great delicacy is required and where the shading is at once evident and of great importance, that the conductor is most called upon for his ability.

"Does weather affect the music? I wish it did not! Violins in rainy times grow wet, strings are like wrapping twine! A soloist like Mr. Kreisler wishes above everything for a pleasant day for his concert.

"I cannot tell exactly how I indicate my wishes to the members of the orchestra. It is like driving an automobile: you cannot tell just what you will do in a crowd when you need to go to the right, swerve to the left, stop short. You do what is necessary when the time comes. I have no certain number of signs. I just do by instinct what seems best at the moment, and we understand each other."

And the present orchestra—what of it? All the listeners have gloried in the rising above the troubles of last year. All see new faces, many of them young. Are young or old players more desired by a conductor? "I assure you," says Mr. Monteaux, "that both young and old are satisfactory, essential. The young men now sit in the last seats of their section—they want to sit in the front seats. So they work! Older players have more experience to make them sure, even if they have not so much 'pep.' Experience and enthusiacm—the combination makes a perfect orchestra.

"Is the orchestra as good as it used to be? That is for some one else to say. All that I would say is, I think we have a very fine orchestra."

HERALD NOV. 21

[52]

Re-Birth of Italian Music

Monteux to Repeat Masterpiece of the Youthful Respighi at Symphony Concerts — Representative Figures of New School of Modern Music

A sculptor was talking to a group of friends about his student days in Paris, the wonderful fellows, the wonderful times he remembered. Another man expressed everybody's thought when he asked why such fellows and such days were no more? The sculptor, even as he had had a longer experience than any of his companions, had also a farther vision. He said: "Those particular fellows have gone, and it makes me sad, too, to think of them. But other fellows and other wonderful days are coming which you will see, and I won't. The only permanent thing in the world, you know, is change. There come certain periods when a charmed circle assembles. Then it breaks up; there are some lean years, disorderly years, when nothing seems to happen. Then there is another assembling of creative talents, elements. That process, that breaking up and reforming, is going on all the time in nature, and is shown in every society and every art."

We thought of this again, and thought of it hard, when Mr. Monteux played Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome" at the Boston Symphony concerts of eight and nine days ago. This work he will soon repeat in response to many requests. At that time we related this work in our mind with that of another young Italian composer of today, Malipiero, whose "Pauses of Silence" was played last year by Mr. Monteux and the year before by Mr. Rabaud. Both works have fresh, noble artistic qualities in common. What illustrates the parable of the sculptor's story is that they breathe a higher and finer artistic spirit than has manifested itself in Italian music since Verdi's "Otello" and "Falstaff" made their appearance in the world. Respighi and Malipiero are evidently proponents of the new Italian symphonic school of today, a "new" movement judged from a contemporaneous standpoint; as evidently a renaissance, a blossoming again into flower of an artistic consiousness as old as the Italian people, and it would appear, destined to embody in new forms of beauty the ancestral genius of the race.

Mr. Jean Aubry, in an exceedingly interesting and informing article on "The New Italy" in the Musical Quarterly of January last, traces briefly, but very clearly and well, a perspective of Italian musical developments of the last three centuries, and the causes and sources and personnel of the new movement. This new movement, for the first time in the modern history of Italy, tends toward instrumental and symphonic music rather than toward the inevitable opera, the field in which every Italian composer since Monteverde, the true precursor of all modern opera composers, has found his path to fame.

There was given a concert in Paris, on the 14th of February, 1914, when the first significant manifestation of the works of the young Italian school took place. In the programme was a short manifesto describing the aims of the movement. The signatories were Ildebrando Pizzetti, Vincenzo Tommasini, Francesco Malipiero, Alfredo Casella, Giannotto Bastianelli, Vincenzo Davico and Giuseppe Ferranti. This manifesto read as follows:

"A vast musical movement, rooted in the most diverse directions, is today taking place in the whole of Europe. Following the footsteps of Russia and France, who were the first to dare open up a road beyond apparently insurmountable barriers, old and new nations, some (like Hungary) barren of tradition, others (like Spain) with a more or less glorious past, began one and all to contribute to that enhancement and that perfection of tonal language which appear to constitute the chief aim of present day musical researches. And Italy, in spite of the lethargy which has blighted the natural development of the 17th century melodrama, smothered the germs of 18th century chamber music and dried up (or almost) the sources of folk-song—Italy, too, strives to vanquish its apathy and to participate in the European movement. This concert, devoted to works of a few young Italian composers, the oldest of whom is 33 years of age, is being given in order to prove the birth of a new musicality in our country, a musicality which, while desiring to remain united to the other young European schools, intends, nevertheless, to retain as intact as possible its national character."

Mr. Aubry, who was present at this concert, says that the works performed were of uneven worth, but that "from the whole concert, and from some of the works in particular, there was left the impression of a peculiar accent which foreshadowed a national personality ready to emerge. The few years which followed, troubled as they were by the war, have shown that this first impression was right and that Italy was really destined to contribute to the musical life of Europe, not only curiosities, but delicate or powerful, attractive and personal works."

Outstanding Personalities

The three outstanding personalities at that concert who have advanced and justified Mr. Aubry's prediction made at the time, he names as Pizzetti, Casella and Malipiero. New music by Casella and Malipiero will be played by Mr. Monteux this season, as also music by their colleague, Victor de Sabata, and the work of Respighi, which, as already stated, will be played again at the Symphony concerts.

Of these personalities, the most brilliant and in some ways the most commanding appears to be Casella. He is only 38 years old. Born at Turin, he is, says Mr. Aubry, "a personality in Europe and one of the most curious and striking figures in the musical life of today." Casella, as a young man, entered Diemer's class at the Paris Conservatoire, "but this venerable and prudent professor must today be wellnigh terrified at the sight of the bird that emerged from the egg that he hatched years ago."

Casella has a prodigious equipment, which is not belied by his remarkable orchestration of Balakireff's piano piece, "Islamey," which Mr. Monteux showed the writer a few days ago. He is a brilliant pianist, and conductor, a learned professor. "He has stored in his memory the music of all ages from its origin; it is impossible to catch him by mentioning a work he knows nothing about. He knows every treatise and rule; he could astonish any scientific society by his erudition; but, as it happens, this man of cold appearance, of precise dialectic, this experimentalist with all the tonal combinations, is the most revolutionary spirit possible, if the word is employed in its most legitimate meaning. There is in the world of music no innovation that could escape the infallible eyes and ears of Casella. No sooner a young composer has shown, if one may say so, the tips of his ears in one of the corners of Europe, Alfredo Casella has already discovered him; he has already examined, weighed, sifted and valued what such a young composer has brought with him, and understood whether the result is in the nature of an asset to the musical expression of tomorrow."

There is not so much "grace as force of expression that must be sought in his (Casella's) work. His art is inflexible, tense, sober, of a sobriety that is ofte disconcerting." The performance Casella's "Heroic Elegy" at a concer at the Augusteo, Rome, unchained suc a riot as had not been witnessed fo centuries at a concert in Italy. "Th result was that attention was instantl drawn to this young composer, who di not trouble about pleasing the public but pursued his way, careless of the reception given his music in various quarters, where it either astonished, revolted or annoyed the hearers."

Personality of Malipiero

Of Casella more when his music is played. Mr. Aubry discusses him at great length and with much enthusiasm. "But," he continues, "Italian music of today boasts of a third personality, who reflects perhaps more strongly and more originally still its characteristics. It is G. Francesco Malipiero."

Further on: "There are artistic natures who reveal themselves suddenly, like Claude Debussy, Moussorgsky or Maurice Ravel, and there are others who hesitate for some time. Malipiero was one of the latter, but today his personality is past the shadow of a doubt.

"Malipiero is also a young man as modern composers go—very young it seems to the writer, to have produced such a wonderful work as "The Pauses of Silence," a work well described by Mr. Aubry's felicitious remark, of another of Malipiero's compositions: 'One can only describe it outwardly; the essential content which is enfolded in the musical matter is so directly musical that it escapes the bonds of the literary vocabulary,' which is very true. For most music you can find an analogy in something else, at any rate a literary comparison or description. Listen to 'The Pauses of Silence.' Explain it if you can! It has a strange, clear, ordered but quite indescribable beauty. If it has emotion the emotion has no name. It is sheely musical. The title was bestowed after the piece was composed and probably the composer would agree that this title was as good, as descriptive, as indicative of the music as any other—and no more. Malipiero's 'Impressioni dal vero" will be played this winter by Mr. Monteux. Malipiero was born in 1882 at Venice. He was a pupil of Enrico Bossi. He diligently studied not only ancient Italian music, but modern French, Russian and Hungarian compositions. Nothing in music remained unknown to him. His works, says Aubry, 'take hold of us like an obsession. Sometimes their impression is that of an anguish caused by a dream, confused at first and then revealing qualities which are more than real. An ardent nature like that of Malipiero might find the means of expressing his feelings violently by the mere use of orchestral resources, tone color, or harmonic cunning; but he belongs to a race with traditions, to a country which, in its finest expressions possesses a perfect sense of style. Thus his classicism struggles against his impulses, and out of this struggle comes the fundamental personality of Malipiero.'

Of Respighi, Mr. Aubry has com-

---

of a somber vein. Especially noteworthy was his rendition of Chausson's 'Le Temps des Lilacs,' where his well-sustained legato, tasteful phrasing and fine interpretive powers were well displayed.

"Mr. De Voto's accompaniments gave real support to the singer and were a feature of the evening.

"An audience of fair size was very responsive, demanding several encores."

---

paratively little to say. He does not expatiate on the rich fantasy, the perfection of form, the wondrous orchestral mastery of "The Fountains of Rome," which has been often given abroad and remained too long unknown in this country and city. Respighi, now principal of the Royal Academy of Santa Cecilia in Rome, after being taught by Torchi and Martucci at Bologna, became a pupil, at Petrograd, of Rimsky-Korsakoff. He was born July 29th, at Bologna. As for Victor de Sabata, 'he has been the only musician of our time to give the world a symphonic work of real value at the age of 17. It is difficult to say at present, whether these youthful promises will be fulfilled." According to reports from other cities, the work of Sabata, which Mr. Monteux will produce in Boston, has proven one of the most successful novelties heard thus far this season.

Mr. Aubry makes short shrift of the enormously successful operatic verists of today. "Although 'La Boheme,' 'Cavalleria, Rusticana' and 'Tosca' are still favorites, it is already the singers that appear in them rather than the works which are the main interest. In ten years nothing will remain of these works but gramaphone records and the exhalations of barrel-organs. None of the works of Mascagni, of Leoncavallo, of Puccini even, retain a shred of the musicality of a Donizetti or a Verdi, slender as this often is; their works will suffer the fate of all sham creations, where sincerity of soul and humanity are sacrificed to shallow effects. And while these hastily built structures begin to crumble, one can once more see real artists reappear and grow, artists like, each in his own way, Monteverdi, Demenico, Scarlatti, Bellini, or Rossini.

"Italy today possesses a considerable force which is fit to reconstruct her musical greatness; she has young composers full of erudition and warmth, pugnacious and discerning critics; she possesses admirable orchestras like the one of the Augusteo, many chamber music societies and even a public which, though still somewhat limited, grows from day to day. . . . Those who are not content with discovering works only when they have become public property, and who enjoy the supreme satisfaction of new discoveries, will do well to turn to Italy, where the germs of beauty are becoming visible, and where many of them will blossom forth into splendor and swell the esthetic treasures of the world."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The annual concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the receipts to be devoted to its pension fund for retired musicians, will be given this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30. On this occasion Pierre Monteux, who as conductor of the Russian Ballet Orchestra introduced Scheherazade to this country as a "choreographic" drama, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the pages of this gorgeously colored Oriental music for the first time. This will also afford Richard Burgin, the new concert master, an opportunity to reveal to our public his powers as a virtuoso, for the violin solo parts in the symphonic suite are among some of its most beautiful measures. As the soloist proper of the afternoon, however, Guy Maier, pianist, will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. For the remaining symphonic part of the programme Pierre Monteux will conduct Saint-Saens' tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Symphony Programme

Music for "Petrouchka," Stravinsky's fantastic and humorous ballet of a country fair in Russia, will be heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux collaborated with the daring Russian composer to arrange this score in the form of a symphonic suite for performance at the Concerts Monteux in the Casino at Paris some years ago. The piano solo in this score will be taken by Raymond Havens. In place of a symphony on this programme, Mendelssohn's string octette will be played by the string choirs of the orchestra. The remaining number will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's oratorio, "The Redemption."

GLOBE NOV. 21

Symphony Offers Pension Fund Concert

THE annual concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund will be given this afternoon in Symphony Hall. On this occasion Pierre Monteux, who, as conductor of the Russian Ballet Orchestra, introduced "Scheherazade" to this country as a "choreographic" drama, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the pages of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously colored Oriental music for the first time. This will also afford Richard Burgin, the new concert-master, an opportunity to reveal his powers as a virtuoso, for the violin solo parts in the symphonic suite are among some of its most beautiful measures.

Guy Maier, pianist, will play Liszt' concerto in E flat with the orchestra. Saint-Saens' tone-poem, "The Yout of Hercules," and Wagner's overtur to "Rienzi" will be played by th orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

"Petrouchka," Stravinsky's fantast and humorous ballet of a country fa in Russia, will be heard for the first tim at the Symphony concerts next Frida and Saturday. The piano solo will b taken by Raymond Havens. Mendels sohn's String Octet will be played by th string choirs. The remaining numbe will be the symphonic interlude fro Cesar Franck's oratorio, "The Re demption."

ADVERTISER NOV. 2

"PETROUCHKA"

"Petrouchka," a suite from Stravinsky's fantastic and humorous ballet of a fair in Russia, will be heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux collaborated with the daring Russian composer to arrange this score in the form of a symphonic suite for performance at the Concerts Monteux in the Casino at Paris some years ago. The piano solo in this score, which revolutionizes the piano as an orchestral instrument, will be played by Raymond Havens. In place of a symphony, Mendelssohn's Octet, op. 20, will be played by the string choirs of the orchestra. The remaining number will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's "The Redemption."

HERALD NOV. 21

'SCHEHEREZADE' MOST POPULAR NUMBER

Symphony Pension Fund's Annual Concert

Rimsky Korsakoff's familiar "Scheherezade" was the only number on the program of yesterday's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was either of unusual musical merit or unusually well liked by audiences.

Mr Monteux selected two bombastic and rather dull routine pieces, Saint-Saens' "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" for the other orchestral numbers, instead of the Beethoven symphony or the excerpts from "Tristan," "Meistersinger" and the "Ring," which have drawn crowded houses to pension fund concerts in other seasons.

Guy Maier, the soloist, also chose an empty and pretentious show piece, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat, and went through it with his usual digital dexterity, but without the beauty of tone familiar to the many who have admired his playing in recitals. He was much applauded.

The orchestra played with the qualities it has shown at this year's regular concerts.

The performance was brilliant rather than polished, more vociferous than suave. "Scheherezade" drew the most applause from an audience which did not quite fill the hall.

GLOBE NOV. 22

[illegible]hen the Symphony Orchestra next [illegible] in New York on Dec. 2 and 4, it will [illegible]e heard in Brahms's symphony in E minor; Mendelssohn's octet, played by the full string choir; the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka"; Ravel's suite "Couperin's Tomb"; Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Respighi's "Fountains of Rome." At the second concert, Mr. Be dettl will play Lalo's concerto for violoncello.

TRANS. NOV. 22

37TH PENSION FUND CONCERT

Vivid Performance of the "Scheherazade" Suite Is Orchestral Triumph

GUY MAIER SHOWS POWER AT PIANO

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony orchestra gave its 37th Pension Fund concert, the first of this season.

The program was: "Scheherazade," symphonic suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff; "The Youth of Hercules," symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; concerto in E-flat No. 1, for piano and orchestra, Liszt; "Rienzi" overture, Wagner. Guy Maier, pianist, was soloist.

The hall was filled. The orchestra was on its mettle. The conductor was in his best mood to take advantage of the skill and the special aplomb of his men. The audience was keenly curious to see how Mr. Monteux and the musicians would play the "Scheherazade" suite, as they were to give it for the first time together. Spontaneous enthusiasm greeted the suite at every break in its course. The concert was a splendid success.

A dominant note ran through the whole program—spectacular and glorious employment of conquering might. It was as if the selections had been made for the celebration of some great triumph. Perhaps Mr. Monteux and his men are mainly Republicans and took the chance to glorify the sweep of Nov. 2. At any rate, the whole program and the playing of it sounded like that from the surging victory of the sea over Sinbad's ship, shattered against the rock on which the bronze warrior stood, through the suggested power of young Hercules, in the triumphal strains of the concerto and down to the blaring pomp of "Rienzi."

The interspersed lyric beauties that served by contrast to make the impression of glory more vivid were exquisitely portrayed by Mr. Burgin in Scheherazade's tale-telling, by the orchestra and by Mr. Maier in the concerto.

HERALD NOV. 22

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

RAVEL, RIMSKY-KORSAKOV, SUNDR OTHERS

"Couperin's Tomb" at Second Hearing—Difficult Composer for the Average Heare—"Scheherazade" in Glowing Performance—Liszt Under Disadvantages, Early Wagner and Dull Saint-Saens—The Harvard Glee Club to Sing in New York—Chamber-Music from Stravinsky

RAVEL'S new suite, "Couperin's Tomb," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, won no heartier applause than it had on Friday. Yet "this public" (as an old phrase of reviewing used to go) is by no means cool toward his music. In Dr. Muck's day, it covered with applause the two suites from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe"; twice and thrice it has heard gladly the miniatures of "Mother Goose"; while at every repetition it has warmed to the Spanish Rhapsody. Perhaps many hearers could find in "Couperin's Tomb" no more than an instance of Ravel's skill—skill in the following of a chosen manner and skill with harmonic and instrumental device. None the less the new suite contains music both to kindle the fancy and to touch the heart. There is charm, for example, in the gentle vivacity of the Forlane, as though Ravel had distilled into his measures the finer spirit of a popular Venetian dance, as though he were hearing it through the softening veils of the two centuries between Couperin and him. Again, out of the Minuet he makes a veritable tone-poem—an elegy, as it were, to those fallen comrades in the late war to whom he dedicated the original piano-pieces. Little remains of the minuet, as Couperin and his day knew it, except the formal progress. Within its course and rhythms Ravel has written with grave beauty, sensitive hand and feeling as reticent as it is deep. The listener thinks not at all of the chosen manner, barely heeds the sophisticated simplicity of procedure, yields himself wholly to the elegiac mood. The piece is only a few minutes long; yet, if it be memorial music of the war, none other, except Mr. Loeffler's string quartet, is comparable with it as tonal poetry of mourning spirit and sorrowing voice.

The truth may be that it is hard for the ordinary hearer to believe in Ravel. His modern Germans in music have accustomed him to great gushes of feeling and Ravel, in subjective mood and with a personal emotion, is always reticent. His modern Americans have accustomed him to sentiment, not to say sentimentality, and Ravel is wary of that pitfall. His modern Russians have accustomed him to glowing scores, and Ravel prefers a relatively thin tonal fabric, glinting with half-tints. Even Parisian contemporaries do not prepare the ear for his music. Debussy is more glamorous, Schmitt more exuberant, d'Indy larger-voiced. The Ravel of "Mother Gooose," busy with playful, polished fancies, the susceptible hearer enjoys. The Ravel of the chiselled pastoral grace or the rhythmical whirl and tumult of "Daphnis and Chloe" s[illegible]. But the Ravel who releases a personal emotion in this Minuet or here and there in the trio for violin, violoncello and piano, baffles him. To be reticent therewith, to be chary of sentiment, to speak low but poignantly and by the most exact means, is not our way in such utterance. And the easy-going hearer settles back into the subconscious notion that Ravel plays only games of tonal skill.

"Scheherazade" and Supplements

The first purpose of a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund is to increase the income benevolently and deservingly disbursed. The second is to display the quality of the orchestra that sustains the fund and is the gainer by it. The third is to give to the assembled audience the pleasure of music and performance. By experience of the past a concert of Wagner's music best serves these three ends. Chaikovsky is useful to them, especially with his "Pathetic Symphony." An eminent "assisting artist," is also worth the while. Departures from routine waken discoverable interest as when Dr. Muck set Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz on such a programme, or when the Harvard Glee Club twice added choral pieces to the orchestral numbers. The dependable choice, however, is a "Wagner Concert." It fills Symphony Hall, puts conductor and band on their mettle, yields music that next to never in these days do we Bostonians hear in the opera house. Why not, then, return to such programmes for the Pension Fund? A miscellaney like that of yesterday and of similar concerts within easy recollection takes a long chance. The orchestra was fortunate in the numbers of the audience on Sunday, though perceptible seats stood empty. Not yet, seemingly, does the town, by and large, know the renewal virtue of the band, while some have still to discover that usually Mr. Monteux is an interesting director.

Much more than such was the conductor in the principal piece of yesterday afternoon, Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite of the Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade." Through and through he knows the music, since time and again he has led in it in the version that suited the needs of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet. In itself, moreover, it quickens his best powers. The tonal texture is sumptuous and splendid, glowing with harmonic and instrumental color in mass, in contrasts, in strands finely spun. Throughout rhythm beats high and modulation tingles upon the ear. Climacteric surge of progress alternates with pungent sensuous loveliness. As in a theatre of the imagination the ear may hear and the eye see the imagery of the music. Here Scheherazade herself speaks seductively to her listening lord. There drones the Kalendar at his wondrous tale. In the solitary garden the young prince and the young princess—"moons of their age"—whisper and dream and fondle. The revels of Baghdad swirl through the night. The great sea tosses Sinbad's ship from wave to wave. When Mr. Monteux can so visualize a music, so set it, as it were, within a theatre, he is invariably eloquent. Moreover, there is magic in "Scheherazade"—the magic of Rimsky-Korsakov's imagination when he would evoke the storied East; the magic of music when melody and modulation, rhythm and color, the matter within, the manner without, unite in deep and illusory sensation upon any and all hearers. Mr. Monteux would not be the conductor that he is did he not stir to such conjuring.

Yesterday, besides, the orchestra caught sparks from director and composer. Familiarly "Scheherazade" has been displayful music for the virtuosi that strew the band. It was so again when Mr. Laus at the first bassoon began the tale of the Kalendar-Prince; when Mr. Sand sang upon his clarinet; when Mr. Holy added the color of his harp; when Mr. Burgin made the voice of Scheherazade upon his violin cajoling enough to win twenty Sultans. (In the orchestra he gains a beauty of penetrating tone, a warmth of expression that evaded him, the other day, as "solo-violinist" in a miscellaneous concert.) As signal were the virtues of the several choirs. The strings shimmered in the episode of the garden, or elsewhere set edge to Rimsky-Korsakov's modulations or, again, sang deep and full in his sea-measures. The wood-winds and the horns were voice to the opulence, the glow of the whole music. The brass lent power and richness to its sonorities. The whole orches[illegible] pulsed with rhythm. Hardly fore [illegible] its new estate, has it seemed once [illegible] puissant and sensitive an instrument. [illegible]With the suite so played, both t[illegible] tonal [illegible]d the imaginative splendor [illegible] "Sche[illegible]azade" drenched those that hear. When [illegible] music was done, the listener could sa[illegible] to themselves as they do afte "Carme[illegible] or "Tristan": "Our sons sha hear an[illegible]now and delight in this as wel as we."

As the [illegible]rtunes of the afternoon went, the secon[illegible]art of the concert was far less interestin[illegible]nd impressive in the quality of both m[illegible] and performance. No doubt Saint-Saën[illegible] tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," [illegible]s merits—appropriate motivs, smooth join[illegible]re, felicitous workmanship, a painstak[illegible] imagination. When Mr. Rabaud rev[illegible]d the piece, after years of neglect, the [illegible]stener half-believed in it. Yesterday, h[illegible]ever, the sensuous dalliance and the man[illegible] readiness, between which the young He[illegible]ules must choose, sounded equally dull. [illegible]irtue and vice at Saint-Saëns's varn[illegible]ing hands wizened into tonal platitude[illegible] The music smelt equally of the compo[illegible]r's study-table and of a large and fas[illegible]nable Parisian audience. Nor did it rece[illegible]e exactly a polished and subtly accen[illegible]performance. Since even working hours [illegible]ve their limits, Mr. Monteux could not [illegible]repare everything as he had "Scheheraz[illegible]e."

Liszt and Wa[illegible]er filled the remainder of the programme—[illegible]iszt of the concerto for piano in E flat; Wagner of the overture to "Rienzi." M[illegible] Guy Maier played the solo part in the [illegible]ncerto, with a tone that seemed dry and [illegible]ard, a stiff progress, an impassive mood [illegible]until he reached the scherzo-like mea[illegible]res. Then he lightened his touch, warm[illegible] his voice, relaxed his fingers and thr[illegible]h the finale caught in measure the ver[illegible] and glint of the music.

Throughout, however, he remained [illegible] gaining neither the sweeping ardor nor the jewelled workmanship that are the two ways with Liszt of the concertos. As for the accompaniment—even the Symphony Orchestra may now and then fall away to "scratch performance." Far better went the overture to "Rienzi." Mr. Mager, indeed, made the trumpet passages at the beginning sound as though the Wagner of the golden prime had written them; while Mr. Monteux, as the music warrants, [illegible] on and spared not, whether it was triumphing sound and fury or songful [illegible] and fustian. Mr. Gilman, writing of the overture to "Rienzi" in a recent programme-book of the National Orchestra remarked that it was "near-Meyerbeer." At the least, Mr. Monteux raised the alcoholic contents to something more than [illegible] and seventy-five hundredths per [illegible]

TRANS. NOV. 22

The Symphony Orchestra announces two of its promised concerts for young people for Tuesday and Thursday afternoons Dec. 7 and 9. The same pieces will be played at both concerts, viz., fragments from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and Dvorak's symphony, "The New World"; an overture of Rossini; a suite for flute and strings by Bach, and the Farandole from Bizet's music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlesrienne." As heretofore the tickets will be distributed through schools and social settlements in the city and the suburban ring. None will be sold at the box-office.

TRANS. NOV. 22

A SPLENDID CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Arrives Late but Makes Up for It—Miss Seydel, Violinist, Pleases Again

Maintaining the precedent set two years ago and now hopefully established as an annual event, the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Strand Theatre last evening, with Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, as soloist and Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the following program:

Dvorak: Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, "From the New World," opus 95.
- I.—Adagio allegro molto
- II.—Larghetto
- III.—Scherzo: molto vivace. Trio.
- IV.—Allegro cor fuoco.

Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem, La Jeunesse d'Hercule (The Youth of Hercules).
Vieuxtemps: Concerto in D-minor No. 4, for violin and orchestra.
Wagner: Overture to Rienzi.

Misfortune has certainly followed the laudable efforts of the Eastern Concert Bureau to present a series of musical events here this season. First there was the sudden illness of Madame Schumann-Heink, which caused the postponement of the concert originally set for her and the subsequent cancellation of her appearance and the substitution of other artists in her place on the second date. Last night the audience waited patiently until after 9 o'clock before the orchestra made its appearance on the stage. Word had been sent on, and was duly announced, that the train from Boston was half an hour late, due doubtless to the inclement weather, but the audience was assured that the orchestra was on the way and that the complete program would be played after its arrival. The delay was taken good-naturedly and the audience was finally rewarded by the appearance of the musicians, who hurried at once to their desks and tuned up on the platform. Most of them were on hand at the belated opening of the concert, but a few stragglers entered from time to time at inconvenient moments, giving the impression of one of Bandmaster Sousa's characteristic humoresques. It was the first appearance of the orchestra here since the troubles of last year which caused the cancellation of the second concert which had been planned for Lowell and resulted in the reorganization of the orchestra. It may be said in this connection that as far as can be judged the organization has not been impaired by the changes in personnel. New, and in some instances younger, members have brought life and vim to it, while the virtuosi of the various choirs are still the skilled artists that have made the orchestra famous. Mr. Burgin, recently heard in recital here, has supplanted the recalcitrant Fradkin as concert-master, and Pierre Monteux, now in his second season as conductor, has moulded the band to his methods and his musical will.

It is needless to enter into a discussion of the origin of the "From the New World" symphony, which the Bohemian composer Dvorak wrote here in America. Whether it is distinctively national music matters not at this day. Dvorak first came into prominence by the popularity of his Slavonic dances, of which there are no less than 40 rhythms in Bohemia. He took the rhythm of these and composed his own melodies in the folk-song spirit. Caught by the folk-song element in Negro slave music, the suggestion furnished the impulse that culminated in the symphony.

Last night the first movement of the work showed traces of the hurried arrival of the band, especially in the adagio, but by the time that the beautiful larghetto was due the [illegible] had themselves well in hand and a remarkably beautiful reading of the movement was given. The [illegible] melody at the opening for the [illegible] horn was admirably done, and the various [illegible]tations through the [illegible] with the soft pizzicato of the basses to accent it at times [illegible] the quality of the orchestra [illegible]

1882 at Venice. He was a pupil of Enrico Bossi. He diligently studied not only ancient Italian music, but modern French, Russian and Hungarian compositions. Nothing in music remained unknown to him. His works, says Aubry, 'take hold of us like an obsession. Sometimes their impression is that of an anguish caused by a dream, confused at first and then revealing qualities which are more than real. An ardent nature like that of Malipiero might find the means of expressing his feelings violently by the mere use of orchestral resources, tone color, or harmonic cunning; but he belongs to a race with traditions, to a country which, in its finest expressions possesses a perfect sense of style. Thus his classicism struggles against his impulses, and out of this struggle comes the fundamental personality of Malipiero.'

Of Respighi, Mr. Aubry has com-

of a somber vein. Especially noteworthy was his rendition of Chausson's 'Le Temps des Lilacs,' where his well-sustained legato, tasteful phrasing and fine interpretive powers were well displayed.

"Mr. De Voto's accompaniments gave real support to the singer and were a feature of the evening.

"An audience of fair size was very responsive, demanding several encores."

paratively little to say. He does not expatiate on the rich fantasy, the perfection of form, the wondrous orchestral mastery of "The Fountains of Rome," which has been often given abroad and remained too long unknown in this country and city. Respighi, now principal of the Royal Academy of Santa Cecilia in Rome, after being taught by Torchi and Martucci at Bologna, became a pupil, at Petrograd, of Rimsky-Korsakoff. He was born July 29th, at Bologna. As for Victor de Sabata, "he has been the only musician of our time to give the world a symphonic work of real value at the age of 17. It is difficult to say at present, whether these youthful promises will be fulfilled." According to reports from other cities, the work of Sabata, which Mr. Monteux will produce in Boston, has proven one of the most successful novelties heard thus far this season.

Mr. Aubry makes short shrift of the enormously successful operatic verists of today. "Although 'La Boheme,' 'Cavalleria, Rusticana' and 'Tosca' are still favorites, it is already the singers that appear in them rather than the works which are the main interest. In ten years nothing will remain of these works but gramaphone records and the exhalations of barrel-organs. None of the works of Mascagni, of Leoncavallo, of Puccini even, retain a shred of the musicality of a Donizetti or a Verdi, slender as this often is; their works will suffer the fate of all sham creations, where sincerity of soul and humanity are sacrificed to shallow effects. And while these hastily built structures begin to crumble, one can once more see real artists reappear and grow, artists like, each in his own way, Monteverdi, Demenico, Scarlatti, Bellini, or Rossini.

"Italy today possesses a considerable force which is fit to reconstruct her musical greatness; she has young composers full of erudition and warmth, pugnacious and discerning critics; she possesses admirable orchestras like the one of the Augusteo, many chamber music societies and even a public which, though still somewhat limited, grows from day to day. . . . Those who are not content with discovering works only when they have become public property, and who enjoy the supreme satisfaction of new discoveries, will do well to turn to Italy, where the germs of beauty are becoming visible, and where many of them will blossom forth into splendor and swell the esthetic treasures of the world."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The annual concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the receipts to be devoted to its pension fund for retired musicians, will be given this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30. On this occasion Pierre Monteux, who as conductor of the Russian Ballet Orchestra introduced Scheherazade to this country as a "choreographic" drama, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the pages of this gorgeously colored Oriental music for the first time. This will also afford Richard Burgin, the new concert master, an opportunity to reveal to our public his powers as a virtuoso, for the violin solo parts in the symphonic suite are among some of its most beautiful measures. As the soloist proper of the afternoon, however, Guy Maier, pianist, will play Liszt's First Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. For the remaining symphonic part of the programme Pierre Monteux will conduct Saint-Saens' tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Symphony Programme

Music for "Petrouchka," Stravinsky's fantastic and humorous ballet of a country fair in Russia, will be heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux collaborated with the daring Russian composer to arrange this score in the form of a symphonic suite for performance at the Concerts Monteux in the Casino at Paris some years ago. The piano solo in this score will be taken by Raymond Havens. In place of a symphony on this programme, Mendelssohn's string octette will be played by the string choirs of the orchestra. The remaining number will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's oratorio, "The Redemption."

GLOBE NOV. 21

Symphony Offers Pension Fund Concert

THE annual concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Func will be given this afternoon ir Symphony Hall. On this occasior Pierre Monteux, who, as conductor o the Russian Ballet Orchestra, introduced "Scheherazade" to this country as a "choreographic" drama, wil lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the pages of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously colored Orienta music for the first time. This wil also afford Richard Burgin, the new concert-master, an opportunity to reveal his powers as a virtuoso, fo the violin solo parts in the symphoni suite are among some of its mos beautiful measures

Guy Maier, pianist, will play Liszt' concerto in E flat with the orchestra Saint-Saens' tone-poem, "The Yout of Hercules," and Wagner's overtur to "Rienzi" will be played by th orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

"Petrouchka," Stravinsky's fantast and humorous ballet of a country fa in Russia, will be heard for the first tir at the Symphony concerts next Frida and Saturday. The piano solo will b taken by Raymond Havens. Mendelssohn's String Octet will be played by th string choirs. The remaining numbe will be the symphonic interlude fro Cesar Franck's oratorio, "The Redemption."

ADVERTISER NOV. 21

"PETROUCHKA"

"Petrouchka," a suite from Stravinsky's fantastic and humorous ballet of a fair in Russia, will be heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux collaborated with the daring Russian composer to arrange this score in the form of a symphonic suite for performance at the Concerts Monteux in the Casino at Paris some years ago. The piano solo in this score, which revolutionizes the piano as an orchestral instrument, will be played by Raymond Havens. In place of a symphony, Mendelssohn's Octet, op. 20, will be played by the string choirs of the orchestra. The remaining number will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's "The Redemption."

HERALD NOV. 21

'SCHEHEREZADE' MOST POPULAR NUMBER

Symphony Pension Fund's Annual Concert

Rimsky Korsakoff's familiar "Scheherezade" was the only number on the program of yesterday's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was either of unusual musical merit or unusually well liked by audiences.

Mr Monteux selected two bombastic and rather dull routine pieces, Saint-Saens' "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" for the other orchestral numbers, instead of the Beethoven symphony or the excerpts from "Tristan," "Meistersinger" and the "Ring," which have drawn crowded houses to pension fund concerts in other seasons.

Guy Maier, the soloist, also chose an empty and pretentious show piece, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat, and went through it with his usual digital dexterity, but without the beauty of tone familiar to the many who have admired his playing in recitals. He was much applauded.

The orchestra played with the qualities it has shown at this year's regular concerts.

The performance was brilliant rather than polished, more vociferous than suave. "Scheherezade" drew the most applause from an audience which did not quite fill the hall.

GLOBE NOV. 22

When the Symphony Orchestra next plays in New York on Dec. 2 and 4, it will be heard in Brahms's symphony in E minor; Mendelssohn's octet, played by the full string choir; the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka"; Ravel's suite "Couperin's Tomb"; Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Respighi's "Fountains o Rome." At the second concert, Mr. Be detti will play Lalo's concerto for violor cello.

TRANS. NOV. 22

[53]

37TH PENSION FUND CONCERT

Vivid Performance of the "Scheherazade" Suite Is Orchestral Triumph

GUY MAIER SHOWS POWER AT PIANO

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony orchestra gave its 37th Pension Fund concert, the first of this season.

The program was: "Scheherazade," symphonic suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff; "The Youth of Hercules," symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; concerto in E-flat No. 1, for piano and orchestra, Liszt; "Rienzi" overture, Wagner. Guy Maier, pianist, was soloist.

The hall was filled. The orchestra was on its mettle. The conductor was in his best mood to take advantage of the skill and the special aplomb of his men. The audience was keenly curious to see how Mr. Monteux and the musicians would play the "Scheherazade" suite, as they were to give it for the first time together. Spontaneous enthusiasm greeted the suite at every break in its course. The concert was a splendid success.

A dominant note ran through the whole program—spectacular and glorious employment of conquering might. It was as if the selections had been made for the celebration of some great triumph. Perhaps Mr. Monteux and his men are mainly Republicans and took the chance to glorify the sweep of Nov. 2. At any rate, the whole program and the playing of it sounded like that from the surging victory of the sea over Sinbad's ship, shattered against the rock on which the bronze warrior stood, through the suggested power of young Hercules, in the triumphal strains of the concerto and down to the blaring pomp of "Rienzi."

The interspersed lyric beauties that served by contrast to make the impression of glory more vivid were exquisitely portrayed by Mr. Burgin in Scheherazade's tale-telling, by the orchestra and by Mr. Maier in the concerto.

HERALD NOV. 22

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

RAVEL, RIMSKY-KORSAKOV, SUNDR OTHERS

"Couperin's Tomb" at Second Hearing—A Difficult Composer for the Average Heare—"Scheherazade" in Glowing Performance—Liszt Under Disadvantages, Early Wagner and Dull Saint-Saens—The Harvard Glee Club to Sing in New York—Chamber-Music from Stravinsky

RAVEL'S new suite, "Couperin's Tomb," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, won no heartier applause than it had on Friday. Yet "this public" (as an old phrase of reviewing used to go) is by no means cool toward his music. In Dr. Muck's day, it covered with applause the two suites from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe"; twice and thrice it has heard gladly the miniatures of "Mother Goose"; while at every repetition it has warmed to the Spanish Rhapsody. Perhaps many hearers could find in "Couperin's Tomb" no more than an instance of Ravel's skill—skill in the following of a chosen manner and skill with harmonic and instrumental device. None the less the new suite contains music both to kindle the fancy and to touch the heart. There is charm, for example, in the gentle vivacity of the Forlane, as though Ravel had distilled into his measures the finer spirit of a popular Venetian dance, as though he were hearing it through the softening veils of the two centuries between Couperin and him. Again, out of the Minuet he makes a veritable tone-poem—an elegy, as it were, to those fallen comrades in the late war to whom he dedicated the original piano-pieces. Little remains of the minuet, as Couperin and his day knew it, except the formal progress. Within its course and rhythms Ravel has written with grave beauty, sensitive hand and feeling as reticent as it is deep. The listener thinks not at all of the chosen manner, barely heeds the sophisticated simplicity of procedure, yields himself wholly to the elegiac mood. The piece is only a few minutes long; yet, if it be memorial music of the war, none other, except Mr. Loeffler's string quartet, is comparable with it as tonal poetry of mourning spirit and sorrowing voice.

The truth may be that it is hard for the ordinary hearer to believe in Ravel. His modern Germans in music have accustomed him to great gushes of feeling and Ravel, in subjective mood and with a personal emotion, is always reticent. His modern Americans have accustomed him to sentiment, not to say sentimentality, and Ravel is wary of that pitfall. His modern Russians have accustomed him to glowing scores, and Ravel prefers a relatively thin tonal fabric, glinting with half-tints. Even Parisian contemporaries do not prepare the ear for his music. Debussy is more glamoreus, Schmitt more exuberant, d'Indy larger-voiced. The Ravel of "Mother Gooose," busy with playful, polished fancies, the susceptible hearer enjoys. The Ravel of the chiselled pastoral grace or the rhythmical whirl and tumult of "Daphnis and Chloe" stirs him. But the Ravel who releases a personal emotion in this Minuet or here and there in the trio for violin, violoncello and piano, baffles him. To be reticent therewith, to be chary of sentiment, to speak low but poignantly and by the most exact means, is not our way in such utterance. And the easy-going hearer settles back into the subconscious notion that Ravel plays only games of tonal skill.

"Scheherazade" and Supplements

The first purpose of a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund is to increase the income benevolently and deservingly disbursed. The second is to display the quality of the orchestra that sustains the fund and is the gainer by it. The third is to give to the assembled audience the pleasure of music and performance. By experience of the past a concert of Wagner's music best serves these three ends. Chaikovsky is useful to them, especially with his "Pathetic Symphony." An eminent "assisting artist," is also worth the while. Departures from routine waken discoverable interest as when Dr. Muck set Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz on such a programme, or when the Harvard Glee Club twice added choral pieces to the orchestral numbers. The dependable choice, however, is a "Wagner Concert." It fills Symphony Hall, puts conductor and band on their mettle, yields music that next to never in these days do we Bostonians hear in the opera house. Why not, then, return to such programmes for the Pension Fund? A miscellaney like that of yesterday and of similar concerts within easy recollection takes a long chance. The orchestra was fortunate in the numbers of the audience on Sunday, though perceptible seats stood empty. Not yet, seemingly, does the town, by and large, know the renewal virtue of the band, while some have still to discover that usually Mr. Monteux is an interesting director.

Much more than such was the conductor in the principal piece of yesterday afternoon, Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite of the Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade." Through and through he knows the music, since time and again he has led in it in the version that suited the needs of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet. In itself, moreover, it quickens his best powers. The tonal texture is sumptuous and splendid, glowing with harmonic and instrumental color in mass, in contrasts, in strands finely spun. Throughout rhythm beats high and modulation tingles upon the ear. Climacteric surge of progress alternates with pungent sensuous loveliness. As in a theatre of the imagination the ear may hear and the eye see the imagery of the music. Here Scheherazade herself speaks seductively to her listening lord. There drones the Kalendar at his wondrous tale. In the solitary garden the young prince and the young princess—"moons of their age"—whisper and dream and fondle. The revels of Baghdad swirl through the night. The great sea tosses Sinbad's ship from wave to wave. When Mr. Monteux can so visualize a music, so set it, as it were, within a theatre, he is invariably eloquent. Moreover, there is magic in "Scheherazade"—the magic of Rimsky-Korsakov's imagination when he would evoke the storied East; the magic of music when melody and modulation, rhythm and color, the matter within, the manner without, unite in deep and illusory sensation upon any and all hearers. Mr. Monteux would not be the conductor that he is did he not stir to such conjuring.

Yesterday, besides, the orchestra caught sparks from director and composer. Familiarly "Scheherazade" has been displayful music for the virtuosi that strew the band. It was so again when Mr. Laus at the first bassoon began the tale of the Kalendar-Prince; when Mr. Sand sang upon his clarinet; when Mr. Holy added the color of his harp; when Mr. Burgin made the voice of Scheherazade upon his violin cajoling enough to win twenty Sultans. (In the orchestra he gains a beauty of penetrating tone, a warmth of expression that evaded him, the other day, as "solo-violinist" in a miscellaneous concert.) As signal were the virtues of the several choirs. The strings shimmered in the episode of the garden, or elsewhere set edge to Rimsky-Korsakov's modulations or, again, sang deep and full in his sea-measures. The wood-winds and the horns were voice to the opulence, the glow of the whole music. The brass lent power and richness to its sonorities. The whole orchestra pulsed with rhythm. Hardly before in its new estate, has it seemed once so puissant and sensitive an instrument. With the suite so played, both t tonal and the imaginative splendor o "Scheherazade" drenched those that hear When the music was done, the listene could say to themselves as they do afte "Carmen" or "Tristan": "Our sons sha hear and know and delight in this as wel as we."

As the fortunes of the afternoon went, the second part of the concert was far less interesting and impressive in the quality of both music and performance. No doubt Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," has its merits—appropriate motivs smooth jointure, felicitous workmanship, a painstaking imagination. When Mr. Rabaud revived the piece, after years of neglect, the listener half-believed in it. Yesterday, however, the sensuous dalliance and the manly readiness, between which the young Hercules must choose, sounded equally dull. Virtue and vice at Saint-Saëns's varnishing hands wizened into tonal platitudes. The music smelt equally of the composer's study-table and of a large and fashionable Parisian audience. Nor did it receive exactly a polished and subtly accented performance. Since even working hours have their limits, Mr. Monteux could not prepare everything as he had "Scheherazade."

Liszt and Wagner filled the remainder of the programme—Liszt of the concerto for piano in E flat; Wagner of the overture to "Rienzi." Mr. Guy Maier played the solo part in the concerto, with a tone that seemed dry and hard, a stiff progress, an impassive mood until he reached the scherzo-like measures. Then he lightened his touch, warmed his voice, relaxed his fingers and through the finale caught in measure the verve and glint of the music. Throughout, however, he remained gaining neither the sweeping ardor nor jewelled workmanship that are the ways with Liszt of the concertos. As for the accompaniment—even the Symphony Orchestra may now and then fall away to "scratch performance." Far better went the overture to "Rienzi." Mr. Maier, indeed, made the trumpet passages at the beginning sound as though the Wagner of the golden prime had written them; while Mr. Monteux, as the music warrants, piled on and spared not, whether it was triumphing sound and fury or songful pomp and fustian. Mr. Gilman, writing of the overture to "Rienzi" in a recent programme-book of the National Orchestra, remarked that it was "near-Meyerbeer." At the least, Mr. Monteux raised the alcoholic contents to something more than and seventy-five hundredths per

TRANS. NOV. 22

The Symphony Orchestra announces two of its promised concerts for young people for Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Dec. 7 and 9. The same pieces will be played at both concerts, viz., fragments from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and Dvořák's symphony, "The New World"; an overture of Rossini; a suite for flute and strings by Bach, and the Farandole from Bizet's music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlésienne." As heretofore the tickets will be distributed through schools and social settlements in the city and the suburban ring. None will be sold at the box-office.

NOV. 28

A SPLENDID CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Arrives Late but Makes Up for It—Miss Seydel, Violinist, Pleases Again.

Maintaining the precedent set two years ago and now hopefully established as an annual event, the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Strand Theatre last evening, with Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, as soloist and Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the following program:

Dvorak: Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, "From the New World," opus 95.
- I.—Adagio allegro molto
- II.—Larghetto
- III.—Scherzo: molto vivace. Trio.
- IV.—Allegro cor fuoco.

Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem, La Jeunesse d'Hercule (The Youth of Hercules).
Vieuxtemps: Concerto in D-minor No. 4, for violin and orchestra.
Wagner: Overture to Rienzi.

Misfortune has certainly followed the laudable efforts of the Eastern Concert Bureau to present a series of musical events here this season. First there was the sudden illness of Madame Schumann-Heink, which caused the postponement of the concert originally set for her and the subsequent cancellation of her appearance and the substitution of other artists in her place on the second date. Last night the audience waited patiently until after 9 o'clock before the orchestra made its appearance on the stage. Word had been sent on, and was duly announced, that the train from Boston was half an hour late, due doubtless to the inclement weather, but the audience was assured that the orchestra was on the way and that the complete program would be played after its arrival. The delay was taken good-naturedly and the audience was finally rewarded by the appearance of the musicians, who hurried at once to their desks and tuned up on the platform. Most of them were on hand at the belated opening of the concert, but a few stragglers entered from time to time at more convenient moments, giving the impression of one of Bandmaster Sousa's characteristic humoresques. It was the first appearance of the orchestra here since the troubles of last year which caused the cancellation of the concert which had been planned for Lowell and resulted in the reorganization of the orchestra. In this connection that as far as can be judged the organization has sonnel. New, and in some instances younger, members have been and vim to it, while the virtues of the various choirs are still artists that have made the orchestra famous. Mr. Burgin, recently heard in recital here, has supplanted the citrant Fradkin as concert-master, and Pierre Monteux, now in his second season as conductor, has to his methods and his

It is needless to enter into a sion of the origin of the "From the New World" symphony, which the Bohemian composer Dvorak wrote in America. Whether it is tively national music this day. Dvorak first came inence by the popularity of his Slavonic dances, of which less than 40 rhythms in took the rhythm and posed his own melodies in the spirit. Caught by the folk-songs ment in Negro slave music gestion furnished the impulse minated in the symphony.

Last night the first movement work showed traces of the rival of the band, but by the time tiful larghetto was had themselves well in hand markably beautiful reading was given. The melody at the opening for the horn was admirably done with the soft pizzicato of tations through the various basses to accent it the quality of the in passages of the kind was both Monteux developed it Allegro of the symphony themes of the in various

NCERTS YOUNG P

mphony to School Child

TIGHT BINDING

sweeping ardor nor the nship that are the two t of the concertos. As for ment—even the Symphony now and then fall away to mance." Far better went
"Rienzi." Mr. Mager, in-trumpet passages at the be as though the Wagner of
e had written them; while s the music warrants, not, whether it was
and fury or songful pas
Mr. Gilman, writing of th
"Rienzi" in a recent pr of the National Orchestra
it was "near-Meyerbeer.
r. Monteux raised the alco
o something more than e hundredths per

y Orchestra announces two d concerts for young peoy and Thursday afternoons
The same pieces will be concerts, viz., fragments
Korsakov's "Scheherazade"
symphony, "The New verture of Rossini; a suite strings by Bach, and the m Bizet's music to Dau L'Arlesienne." As hereto
s will be distributed through ocial settlements in the city ban ring. None will be sold ce.

S. MON. 2.

DID CONCERT
TON SYMPHONY

Arrives Late but Makes
—Miss Seydel, Vio-
Pleases Again.

g the precedent set two nd now hopefully estab-
annual event, the Boston orchestra at the Strand evening, with Miss Irma nist, as soloist and Pierre ducting, gave the follow-
:
mphony No. 5 in E-minor,
the New World," opus 95.
o allegro molto
etto
zo: molto vivace. Trio.
ro cor fuoco.
Symphonic Poem, La Jeund'Hercule (The Youth of les).
Concerto in D-minor No.
violin and orchestra.
verture to Rienzi.
e has certainly followed the orts of the Eastern Concert present a series of musical this season. First there udden illness of Madame Heink, which caused the nt of the concert originally and the subsequent canf her appearance and the
of other artists in her e second date. Last night
e waited patiently until afk before the orchestra made nce on the stage. Word had
n, and was duly announced,
ain from Boston was half an due doubtless to the in-eather, but the audience was at the orchestra was on the that the complete program played after its arrival. The taken good-naturedly and ce was finally rewarded by rance of the musicians, who t once to their desks and on the platform. Most of on hand at the belated open-concert, but a few stragglers
rom time to time at con-
oments, giving the impres-
e of Bandmaster Sousa's charhumoresques. It was the arance of the orchestra here troubles of last year which e cancellation of the second which had been planned fo
d resulted in the reorganiza e orchestra. It may be sa onnection that as far as c d the organization has n paired by the changes in p
New, and in some instanc members have brought to it, while the virtuosi of choirs are still the skil hat have made the orchest
Mr. Burgin, recently heard
ere, has supplanted the rec
Fradkin as concert-master, onteux, now in his second onductor, has moulded the b ethods and his musical will eedless to enter into a disc
the origin of the "From
orld" symphony, which the composer Dvorak wrote
rica. Whether it is dist national music matters no
. Dvorak first came into pr
by the popularity of his ances, of which there are n 40 rhythms in Bohemia.
e rhythm of these and is own melodies in the n Caught by the folk-song
n Negro slave music, the furnished the impulse that in the symphony.
night the first movement o howed traces of the hurrie
f the band, especially in but by the time that the rghetto was due the mus mselves well in hand and bly beautiful reading of ent was given. The ha at the opening for the En as admirably done, and it through the various he soft pizzicato of the o accent it at times,
ality of the orchestra at it of the kind. The S elastic and brilliant developed it, and the
the finale, in wh
symphony are

ce but nevertheless abounded in sudn contrasts to which the musicians sponded alertly and effectively. It as well worth waiting an hour or ore to hear it so played.
Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The outh of Hercules," is in the compos-
's familiar vein, a medium which Mr.
onteux well knows how to display at best. The strings and wood-wind ere especially notable for their eth-real quality in the opening of the ndante and again in the closing hrases played to soft chords by the
arp. The allegro, the music of leasure, is less distinguished musical-
y and more boisterous in treatment.
r. Monteux, however, with skilled iscernment, managed to bring out its est qualities.

There is little need now to speak of Miss Seydel's unquestioned attainments as a violinist. Hitherto we have heard her in solo numbers of fragmentary character to pianoforte accompaniment, but in the Vieuxtemps concerto, which she played last night, she was manifestly inspired by the band that was ready to do her bidding as indicated by a sympathetic and watchful conductor, and as a consequence she has never played better here. The concerto is more musical than some of the composer's long list. It contains more melody and less pyrotechnics, but nevertheless makes many demands on the technical skill of the performer. These, on the whole, were met by the player most admirably. The melodic passages were pure, yet sufficiently penetrating in quality, and the declamatory strains delivered with confident assurance and broad tone. Miss Seydel was congratulated by conductor and band at the close of the number and was brought back several times by the audience to curtsey her acknowledgment.

It has been the fashion to call Wagner's "Rienzi" overture bombastic and blatant. Compared with "Tristan and Isolde" it undoubtedly is so. The gentlemen who puff the great tuba, the trumpets and the trombones certainly get their innings, and the versatile kettle-drummer has an agile time of it. Nevertheless the number sets the musical nerves tingling, and the harmonies are Wagner's alone, even if they are voiced in strenuous fashion. Mr. Monteux made the opening strains, which are quieter in treatment, wonderfully impressive, and whipped the band to a fine frenzy of tone and timbre in the finale, powerful indeed, but nevertheless musical. A little "pep" of the sort does not come amiss at the end of such a program. All of us are amused by a little bombast now and then, so why be such a high-brow as to cavil at it.

It was to be regretted that the theatre was not completely filled for the concert. The bad weather doubtless discouraged those who had delayed making reservations, but if we are to be sure of an annual appearance of the orchestra here, the response of the public must be more general.

S. R. F.

Cou. Citizen

CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Symphony to Play for School Children

Instead of a regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall during the week of Dec. 5, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote that time to two concerts to be given on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons at 4 o'clock, Dec. 7 and 9, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation. When this experiment was tried last season, its success was so apparenet that the scheme and programmes will be arranged in much the same way.

Their design is to acquaint the young people of Boston with symphonic music as played by the full symphony orchestra under its regular conductor. Each programme will be one hour in length, as last year, and seats will be obtainable at the same nominal prices of 25, 35, and 50 cents. They will be apportioned through the schools of Boston and through the various settlements.

The programme which Pierre Monteux is arranging for these two concerts (the audience at each will be entirely different) will represent the finest music in the orchestral repertory but will be simple and of direct appeal. He also plans to so arrange his programme that solos in the music will exhibit the various instruments in the orchestra. There will be an overture of Rossini, a suite for flute by Bach, a movement from Devorak's "New World" Symphony, a movement from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," and a dance from Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne."

POST NOV. 23

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CHILDREN'S CONCERTS

Conductor Monteux Arranging Program for Dec. 7 and 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will evote the week of Dec. 5 to two conerts, given on the evenings of Dec. 7 nd Dec. 9, for the pleasure of the ounger generation, instead of giving he regular two concerts in Symphony all that week. The experiment was ried last year, and its success was so pparent that the programs will be rranged in much the same way as hey were at that time. Their design to acquaint young persons of Boston d vicinity with symphonic music as ayed by the full orchestra under its gular conductor.
Pierre Monteux is arranging a program which will represent the finest music in the orchestral repertory, but which will be simple and of direct appeal.

Old and New Pieces from Stravinsky

"Petruschka" for the Concert Hall, "The Nightingale" as Mimodrama and a Strange Quartet for "The Flonzaleys"

AGAIN the music of Stravinsky, rarely heard nowadays in America, will have place in the Symphony Concerts when, on Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the suite that he has drawn from his ballet, "Petruschka," danced and mimed four years ago in Boston by Mr. Diaghilev's company. Almost simultaneously, the Flonzaley Quartet played last evening in New York the Concertino that Stravinsky has lately written for them. At the same time The Chesterian—magazine of the newer music published in London—brings accounts of his transformation of his opera, "The Nightingale's Song," into a mimodrama for the Russian Ballet and of his singular piece, read, played and danced, "The Story of the Soldier." Herewith follow an article recalling "Petruschka" as ballet of the theatre; a word about the new Concertino, and a review by Henry Prunières of the transformed opera. The article by Monsieur Ansermet about "The Story of the Soldier" will be printed in this place on Saturday next.

"PETRUSCHKA" WITHOUT STAGE

THE suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka," to be played at the Symphony Concerts this week, probably for the first times in America, was put together by the composer at the suggestion of Mr. Monteux. After the four "burlesque scenes"—as the formal title stands—had been danced and mimed in the theatre, the conductor wished to transfer to his concerts at the Casino de Paris as much of the music as would bear such shifting. The outcome was the present "symphonic suite," well received in Paris but none too heartily applauded when it was heard elsewhere in Europe. It runs in three divisions: music from the first scene—the carnival fair on the outskirts of Petrograd; music from the second scene—the puppet, Petruschka, in his box tortured by love for the puppet ballerina and jealousy of the preferred blackamoor; music from the final scene—again at the carnival fair and including the dances of the nurses and the grooms. Through the suite as through the ballet, runs an incisive piano-part. It is to be played here and in New York and Philadelphia by Raymond Havens.

The peril besetting the music of "Petruschka" in the concert-hall is Stravinsky's close assimilation of it to the action on the stage. For many a measure the one is the intimate complement of the other. Since this action will be invisible at Symphony Hall, next Friday and Saturday, it may reasonably be recalled in detail. The "burlesque scenes," as the formal title tries vainly to classify a piece altogether of its own species, are pictured, mimed and danced upon a stage within a stage. The "scenes" happen to be scenes in the life, death and amorous adventures of the puppet, Petruschka, and accordingly the inner framing suggests in pattern, ornament, and vivid color—blue and gold—the glorified booth of such a show. Behind is the booth proper, in which, as the spectators are soon to see Petruschka, the Ballerina, and the Blackamoor have their life and being; while beyond the low roof is a domed, gray and wintry prospect of distant Petrograd. For "Petruschka" bids the spectators to a fair of the folk in a cold and clouded carnival time, say fifty years ago. It is not in the least a pretentious fair; the booths are weather-worn; the grotesque old men who gesticulate above them in ardent invitation are as unkempt and faded as their drooping beards; and the crowd itself consists of such humble but merry folk as grooms, cabmen, maid-servants, street musicians, street-dancers and the like.

The assembling folk amuse themselves with dancing and clowning; listen to rival hand-organs; and stroll from booth to booth. Most of all they are interested in that in which an old necromancer, bearded like a Methuselah but covered with a worn top-hat at a rakish angle, exhibits three puppets which by magic arts he can actually call into semblance of life. On their perches they sit whirling legs and arms to the music—in the centre the lovely Ballerina with the pinkest of painted cheeks; on one side the green and gold Blackamoor brandishing his scimitar; on the other little Petruschka is only the merest of puppets with black-mittened hands, red and gold plaided trousers, tasselled hat, expressionless face and arms and legs that droop when they are not in automatic and angular motion. At the touch of the necromancer's wand all three spring off their perches, dance among the crowd and mime a little episode of jealous rivalry. For, as it seems, both Petruschka and the Blackamoor are enamored of the Ballerina, the one humbly and tremulously; the other complacently and even arrogantly. The scene gives the victory to Petruschka who feeble though he is, beats off the Blackamoor with the limp blows of his slap-stick.

But life is not the theatre and these three puppets have their own life to live in the little chambers of the box behind the booth. Thither, however, they carry the rivalries in which the outer world of the fair knows them. For, on and off the stage, Petruschka loves the Ballerina, clumsily, futilely, foolishly, but with no other thought in his feeble little brain and no other impulse in his fond and trembling little heart. There he is in his box, shabby and bare as a stalk, impatient to go to her and even pushing through the wall only to discover that the hole he has broken leads nowhere. At least he can dance the dance by which he will fascinate her. In the midst of it the Ballerina enters—for she has the approved habit of the theatre to wander about the rooms of the other sex—sees his grotesque and pitiful steps, runs away and leaves him, all unwitting of her departure, to dance the harder, until he sees that she is gone and collapses piteously.

Not so, the Blackamoor. In his box, which is gorgeous of fantastically painted wall, he sprawls at his ease, playing with a cocoanut like the stupid savage he really is. He tosses it; he rolls it to and fro; he pretends to worship it; he resents its indifference and cuts at it with his precious scimitar. In the midst of his sport and when he is a little weary of it, enters the amorous Ballerina. The Blackmoor has no need to make love to her; he has only to receive in grinning self-satisfaction the love that she makes to him. Tooting her little trumpet, she works a dance of allurement upon the complacent black—only to discover poor Petruscha caught in the door of the box as he follows in tremulously imploring and feebly clamorous pursuit. The Ballerina mocks him; the Blackamoor, alive to intuition, if not to affection, beats him away with the scimitar. . . .

If Petruscha will woo behind the scenes in his foolish fashion, then will the Blackamoor have revenge upon him before them. Once more the crowd at the fair swelled now by the newcomers of the evening—maskers in guise like animals, soldiers, higher-placed folk "on the loose" and even a policeman or two—is dancing its fill, but with one eye and one ear on the booth of the strange puppets. Behind the curtain is the faint tumult of squeaking quarrel; out of the curtains bursts the frightened and hunted Petruschka all flying arms and legs with the Blackamoor in full pursuit. The scimitar cuts him down, the "murderer" flees; the police move about; the crowd is half-frightened and half-curious; the old necromancer starts to drag away the cloth, the stuffing, the bent and broken wires, the limp body that was once Petruschka. The crowd drifts away to more amusing things; wearily the old magician goes toward the booth; glances upward and there on the roof, grimacing and squeaking, drooping—all futility in death as in life—is the ghost of Petruschka. The top-hat flies from the old man's head. Is he to be haunted all his days by the phantoms of his own necromancy?

As some say, there is symbolism in these puppets, their fortunes and their fate, for the spectator to discover as he may. If he has a mind to on a large scale he may discover in puppet Petruschka and his futilities half the temperamental shortcomings of the Russians in much more important matter than the amorous conflicts of the old necromancer's booth. Or if he has a liking for philosophizing on a yet wider human scale he may discover in the adventures and the fates of the Ballerina, the Blackamoor and the tertium quid that was Petruschka ironic semblance of the disposition and the ways of mankind and womankind, of life and fate. Or he may be content, as it is easy to suspect that Stranvinsky and Benois were content when they made the piece, with the fantastical invention and the fantastical continuance and consummation of the whole. To dress three puppets in mimic and contrasting human traits; to set them in a little drama that should mimic the human tragedy of their relations; and to work out that drama rather more logically than it might run were it subject to human impulse, was an idea with a flash of genius for the fantastic. To carry it to the end with all the wealth of grotesquely and comically characterizing detail that fills the scenes in the boxes was a like feat of imagination. To give it the setting of a Russian folk-fair was to find for the Western World an environment nearly as fantastic. What a scheme to accomplish for the sheer pleasure and thrill of the accomplishment to all concerned. Buckets of ironic meanings outpoured by too many and too willing hands will not quench the joys of the imagination and the joys of fantastic creation for its own sake.

In the autumn of 1916, at the Boston Opera House, Mr. Monteux led the orchestra of the Russian Ballet in "Petruschka." It was then written in this place of him and it:

> Mr. Monteux gave the music a somewhat coarser texture (as of the theatre rather than the concert-hall) than did his predecessor, a sharper accent (as though it would be as graphic as the action on the stage), a fuller clangor, a more intense rhythmic life. He slapped Stravinsky's tingling dissonances and scarifying chords upon the listening ear. He multiplied the din of the fair, quickening by beat and blow the rushing current of the music yet keeping it in steady foam of incisive detail. As sharply, he plied the characterizing phrases, timbres and modulations for the puppets and their doings. Every twitch, every squeak of Petruschka snapped clear and clean out of the orchestra; the ballerina's legs and the accompanying phrases of flute and piccolo danced simultaneously in air; the trumpet tune for her was as unsparingly vulgar as Stravinsky intended; the rival hand-organs were so perfectly simulated that, as of old, many believed them played upon the stage. Best of all, Mr. Monteux kept high and bright the rhythmic force, the endless rhythmic play which are half the power and more than half the cohesion of Stravinsky's music. Never before here has it sounded with such verve of rhythm, such impinging harmonies and timbres, such vivid force of delineation and (almost) impersonation—a masterpiece beyond peradventure in its purpose and kind.

TRANS NOV 24

7TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Mendelssohn's Octet Displays Remarkable Skill of String Choir

MONTEUX PLEASES IN CHOICE OF PIECES

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Octet, E flat major, op. 20 for the string choir; Respighi, "Fountains of Rome," Symphonic poem; Stravinsky, Orchestral suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka," (first time at these concerts).

Mendelssohn wrote this Octet when he was 16 years old. It was at the time an astonishing feat for so young a man; the Octet still commands respect by the workmanship displayed; the fantastical Scherzo is still heard with great pleasure; the other movements have aged. Would that Mendelssohn had always written in the vein of this Scherzo and of another early work, the overture to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream!" What might he not have accomplished if he had been poor; if he had not been flattered by adoring family and friends; if he had been knocked about the world and had not been wrapped in cotton-wool? There is the Mendelssohn of the works already mentioned, also the "Hebrides" overture, "The Walpurgis Night," the Scherzo in F sharp minor for the piano; then, unfortunately, there is the mass of music by Mendelssohn, the ineffable prig. His music too often brings to mind the portrait in which he is shown with a billowing ruffled shirt and a huge shirt-pin, already to step into an English parlor or to play for the Prince Consort; or as in the caricature by Aubrey Beardsley with pen in hand, probably about to write to some one about the shocking ballet of nuns in "Robert the Devil," or to express his horror at the sight of poor little Zerlina undressing and singing before the looking glass in "Fra Diavolo."

The Octet had not been heard at a Symphony concert for many years. It tests the strings and is good practice for them. The performance yesterday was excellent. The city may well be proud of this string choir.

It was a pleasure to hear Resphigi's beautiful music again, and Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for answering so graciously the request of many. As a rule, an unfamiliar piece is played once, then put on the shelf and not taken down again for many months, or even some years. This is not fair to the audience or the composer, especially when the idiom of the latter is novel. Mr. Monteux is bringing forward many new works by the younger composers of various countries and various schools, while he does not neglect the old masters. This is wise; this is necessary, unless knowledge with appreciation of music becomes stagnant. Undue familiarity with the great works of the old masters is injurious to them. We hear the symphonies of Beethoven so often that it is not easy to recognize the beauty and the grandeur of the better ones. Haydn, a man of many symphonies, is represented from year to year, only by a few that we knew as children by playing them in four-handed arrangements with a teacher or a maiden-aunt. Weber wrote other overtures than the everlasting three. For many years the younger men have not had opportunity to be heard. How woefully scanty, for example, is our acquaintance with the young orchestral composers of Great Britain! But hearing of an important new work at long intervals is not enough to form a judgment; to confirm a sane opinion, favorable or unfavorable.

Great is Stravinsky, writer of ballet music, and Mr. Monteux is his prophet. No wonder that he wished to perform the music of "Petrouchka," for, intimately associated with the composer, he has conducted the first performance of many of his works and many performances thereafter, and with the composer he chose the pages for concert use.

But the music of "Petrouchka," remarkable as it is with the ballet on the stage, is not so well suited for concert performance as is the music of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird." It is as closely connected with the action, as inseparable, as the music of "Pelleas and Melisande is with the situations, the dialogue and the emotions. Many pages that amuse or thrill when Petrouchka, the Moor and the Ballerine are playing out the tragedy have no significance in the concert hall; they merely excite surprise, or possibly the indignation of the hopelessly conservative who roll their eyes in ectasy at the mention of Brahms, and would loudly applaud a smug interpretation of Hummel's piano concerto in A minor. Nevertheless Igor Stravinsky is a man to be reckoned with and his music should be heard—heard more than once. The performance yesterday was brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week; the orchestra will be away.

On Tuesday Dec. 7, Thursday Dec. 9, and Friday Dec. 10 at 4 P. M., the Young People's Concert will take place.

The program of the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon Dec. 17 and Saturday evening Dec. 18 will be as follows: Weber, overture to "Preciosa"; Brahms, violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Bax "In the Faery Hills," Symphonic poem (first time in America); Balakireff, "Islamey," Oriental Fantasy for piano, orchestrated by Alfred Casella (first time in Boston).

HERALD NOV. 27

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on November 26 was as follows: Mendelssohn, octette for strings in E flat op. 20; Respighi, "Fontane di Roma"; Stravinsky, orchestral suite from the ballet "Pétrouchka."

Does not Mendelssohn's octette suffer in being transferred to a large hall, with each of its eight parts many times doubled? It would seem so on hearing it yesterday. The details of its delicate workmanship were somewhat obscured and the magnified version lost the intimate character of chamber music which is properly associated with the work. Nevertheless, it served as a virtuoso piece for the string section of the orchestra and as such was effective, if in quite a different manner from that intended by the composer. Respighi's "Fontane di Roma," given for the first time in Boston two weeks ago, was substituted for Franck's symphonic piece from the Redemption as originally announced. Would that all important new compositions might thus be repeated. Few worthy compositions can be fully understood at a first hearing. Respighi's symphonic poem is a case in point. Yesterday's hearing revealed unexpected beauties of melody and color and it may confidently be said that the composition is a welcome addition to our orchestral repertory.

Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" is distinctly music for the theater. No doubt the many harmonic barbarities serve to heighten the dramatic action. In the concert room they are often tiresome. There is little thematic interest, little to stir the emotions when the music is played apart from the dramatic action. There are clever orchestral effects, it is almost needless to say. The prodigious command of orchestral technic excites astonishment. It must be admitted that there are occasional poetic moments, as in the final measures of the suite. The program served well to show the virtuosity of the orchestra. Yet it included two works which properly speaking are out of place on a symphony program. Raymond Havens was the pianist in the Stravinsky work, although, as the piano is treated as a purely orchestral instrument, it is to be wondered why his name should be featured when all the musicians of the orchestra distinguished themselves so signally in the interpretation of a difficult and taxing composition.

MONITOR NOV. 27.

SYMPHONY IN VARIED PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

An almost forgotten Octette for strings by Mendelssohn, a repetition of Respighi's "Fountain of Rome" played only a fortnight ago, and the Stravinsky suite for orchestra from the ballet "Petrouchka" made up Mr. Monteux's bill for fare at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

The Mendelssohn music is suave and a bit old fashioned. Why is it that Mendelssohn so often sounds old fashioned while his contemporaries, some of whom were considered far less talented in those days, hold their own much better? The Scherzo is the best music in it.

The Respighi tone poem improves with a rehearing. It has undoubted beauty and moments of fineness.

"Petrouchka" is queer music for a Symphony concert. The ballet is the most fantastic affair imaginable. I saw it in Monte Carlo once, and had no program, and found it delightful but utterly bewildering. Stravinsky's music needs the weird ballet to make it intelligible, and even then it is not too much so. Imagine it with the ears of people who never saw the ballet, though it was done in Boston by the Diaghileff troupe, and who were simply astounded by the strange noises the orchestra often gave fourth.

Nevertheless this is remarkable music and it received a very effective performance. Monteux may not be the most celebratd of symphonic conductors, but when it comes to interpreting the Russian ballet all other conductors must go to school to him.

AMERICAN NOV. 27.

Items and Incidents

The first of the two annual concerts by the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund will take place in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21. As Mr. Monteux now sketches the programme, it will include Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," olorful and displayful music in which the onductor has not yet been heard; Saint-Saëns's agreeable tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's jigging and resonant overture to his early opera, "Rienzi." A notable "assisting artist," as yet unannounced, will join the orchestra and contribute one or two numbers to the full programme.

[54]

... sweeping ardor nor the
...aship that are the two ...of the concertos. As for
...nent—even the Symphony
...now and then fall away to
...mance." Far better went
..."Rienzi." Mr. Mager, in
...trumpet passages at the be
...as though the Wagner of
...e had written them; while
...s the music warrants, and
...not, whether it was
...and fury or songful pas
...r. Gilman, writing of th
...Rienzi" in a recent pro
...f the National Orchestra
...it was "near-Meyerbeer."
...r. Monteux raised the alco
...o something more than
...e hundredths per ...m.

...S. NOV. 2...

...y Orchestra announces two
...concerts for young peo-
...and Thursday afternoons
...The same pieces will be
...concerts, viz., fragments
...Korsakov's "Scheherazade"
...symphony, "The New
...verture of Rossini; a suite
...strings by Bach, and the
...Bizet's music to Dau-
...L'Arlesienne." As hereto-
...will be distributed through
...cial settlements in the city
...an ring. None will be sold
...e.

...S. NOV. ...

...DID CONCERT ...TON SYMPHONY

...rrives Late but Makes ...—Miss Seydel, Vio- ...Pleases Again.

...the precedent set two
...nd now hopefully estab-
...annual event, the Boston
...rchestra at the Strand
...evening, with Miss Irma
...ist, as soloist and Pierre
...ducting, gave the follow-

...phony No. 5 in E-minor,
...the New World," opus 95.
...o allegro molto
...etto
...o: molto vivace. Trio.
...o cor fuoco.
...Symphonic Poem, La Jeun-
...l'Hercule (The Youth of ...es).
...Concerto in D-minor No.
...violin and orchestra.
...erture to Rienzi.

...e has certainly followed the
...rts of the Eastern Concert
...resent a series of musical
...this season. First there
...udden illness of Madame
...Heink, which caused the
...t of the concert originally
...and the subsequent can-
...her appearance and the
...of other artists in her
...e second date. Last night
...e waited patiently until af-
...k before the orchestra made
...nce on the stage. Word had
...n, and was duly announced,
...ain from Boston was half an
...due doubtless to the in-
...ather, but the audience was
...t the orchestra was on the ...hat the complete program
...layed after its arrival. The
...taken good-naturedly and
...ce was finally rewarded by
...ance of the musicians, who ...once to their desks and
...on the platform. Most of
...on hand at the belated open-
...concert, but a few stragglers
...rom time to time at con-
...oments, giving the impres-
...e of Bandmaster Sousa's char-
...humoresques. It was the
...rance of the orchestra here
...troubles of last year which
...e cancellation of the second
...hich had been planned for
...d resulted in the reorganiza
...e orchestra. It may be said
...nnection that as far as can
...d the organization has not
...aired by the changes in per
...New, and in some instances
...members have brought
...to it, while the virtuosi of
...choirs are still the skill
...hat have made the orchest
...Mr. Burgin, recently heard
...ere, has supplanted the rec
...Fradkin as concert-master,
...onteux, now in his second se
...nductor, has moulded the ba
...ethods and his musical will
...eedless to enter into a disc
...the origin of the "From
...rld" symphony, which the
...composer Dvorak wrote
...rica. Whether it is dist
...ational music matters not
...Dvorak first came into pr
...by the popularity of his
...nces, of which there are
...40 rhythms in Bohemia.
...e rhythm of these and
...s own melodies in the na
...Caught by the folk-song
...Negro slave music, the
...furnished the impulse that
...in the symphony.
...ight the first movement of ...owed traces of the hurried
...f the band, especially in
...but by the time that the
...rghetto was due the mu
...mselves well in hand an
...ly beautiful reading
...ent was given. The ha
...at the opening for the
...as admirably done, and
...through the various
...e soft pizzicato of the
...to accent it at times,
...ality of the orchestra at ...ages of the kind. The
...th elastic and brilliant
...x developed it, and the
...the finale, in wh
...symphony are

...nce but nevertheless abounded in sud-
...en contrasts to which the musicians
...esponded alertly and effectively. It
...as well worth waiting an hour or
...ore to hear it so played.
...Saint-Saën's symphonic poem, "The
...outh of Hercules," is in the compos-
...'s familiar vein, a medium which Mr.
...onteux well knows how to display at
...s best. The strings and wood-wind
...ere especially notable for their eth-
...real quality in the opening of the
...ndante and again in the closing
...hrases played to soft chords by the
...arp. The allegro, the music of
...leasure, is less distinguished musical-
...y and more boisterous in treatment.
...r. Monteux, however, with skilled
...iscernment, managed to bring out its
...est qualities.

There is little need now to speak of Miss Seydel's unquestioned attainments as a violinist. Hitherto we have heard her in solo numbers of fragmentary character to pianoforte accompaniment, but in the Vieuxtemps concerto, which she played last night, she was manifestly inspired by the band that was ready to do her bidding as indicated by a sympathetic and watchful conductor, and as a consequence she has never played better here. The concerto is more musical than some of the composer's long list. It contains more melody and less pyrotechnics, but nevertheless makes many demands on the technical skill of the performer. These, on the whole, were met by the player most admirably. The melodic passages were pure, yet sufficiently penetrating in quality, and the declamatory strains delivered with confident assurance and broad tone. Miss Seydel was congratulated by conductor and band at the close of the number and was brought back several times by the audience to curtsey her acknowledgment.

It has been the fashion to call Wagner's "Rienzi" overture bombastic and blatant. Compared with "Tristan and Isolde" it undoubtedly is so. The gentlemen who puff the great tuba, the trumpets and the trombones certainly get their innings, and the versatile kettle-drummer has an agile time of it. Nevertheless the number sets the musical nerves tingling, and the harmonies are Wagner's alone, even if they are voiced in strenuous fashion. Mr. Monteux made the opening strains, which are quieter in treatment, wonderfully impressive, and whipped the band to a fine frenzy of tone and timbre in the finale, powerful indeed, but nevertheless musical. A little "pep" of the sort does not come amiss at the end of such a program. All of us are amused by a little bombast now and then, so why be such a high-brow as to cavil at it.

It was to be regretted that the theatre was not completely filled for the concert. The bad weather doubtless discouraged those who had delayed making reservations, but if we are to be sure of an annual appearance of the orchestra here, the response of the public must be more general.

S. R. F.

[illegible] Cou. Citizen No.

CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Symphony to Play for School Children

Instead of a regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall during the week of Dec. 5, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote that time to two concerts to be given on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons at 4 o'clock, Dec. 7 and 9, for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation. When this experiment was tried last season, its success was so apparenet that the scheme and programmes will be arranged in much the same way.

Their design is to acquaint the young people of Boston with symphonic music as played by the full symphony orchestra under its regular conductor. Each programme will be one hour in length, as last year, and seats will be obtainable at the same nominal prices of 25, 35, and 50 cents. They will be apportioned through the schools of Boston and through the various settlements.

The programme which Pierre Monteux is arranging for these two concerts (the audience at each will be entirely different) will represent the finest music in the orchestral repertory but will be simple and of direct appeal. He also plans to so arrange his programme that solos in the music will exhibit the various instruments in the orchestra. There will be an overture of Rossini, a suite for flute by Bach, a movement from Devorak's "New World" Symphony, a movement from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," and a dance from Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne."

POST NOV. 23

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CHILDREN'S CONCERTS

Conductor Monteux Arranging Pro-

Sauce... Several styles full kitchen utensils ... sizes First ... to $1.59 Regularly During this sale ... Kettles $2.19 ...round

HERALD NOV. 23.

Old and New Pieces from Stravinsky

"Petruschka" for the Concert Hall, "The Nightingale" as Mimodrama and a Strange Quartet for "The Flonzaleys"

AGAIN the music of Stravinsky, rarely heard nowadays in America, will have place in the Symphony Concerts when, on Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the suite that he has drawn from his ballet, "Petruschka," danced and mimed four years ago in Boston by Mr. Diaghilev's company. Almost simultaneously, the Flonzaley Quartet played last evening in New York the Concertino that Stravinsky has lately written for them. At the same time The Chesterian—magazine of the newer music published in London—brings accounts of his transformation of his opera, "The Nightingale's Song," into a mimodrama for the Russian Ballet and of his singular piece, read, played and danced, "The Story of the Soldier." Herewith follow an article recalling "Petruschka" as ballet of the theatre; a word about the new Concertino, and a review by Henry Prunières of the transformed opera. The article by Monsieur Ansermet about "The Story of the Soldier" will be printed in this place on Saturday next.

"PETRUSCHKA" WITHOUT STAGE

THE suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petruschka," to be played at the Symphony Concerts this week, probably for the first times in America, was put together by the composer at the suggestion of Mr. Monteux. After the four "burlesque scenes"—as the formal title stands—had been danced and mimed in the theatre, the conductor wished to transfer to his concerts at the Casino de Paris as much of the music as would bear such shifting. The outcome was the present "symphonic suite," well received in Paris but none too heartily applauded when it was heard elsewhere in Europe. It runs in three divisions: music from the first scene—the carnival fair on the outskirts of Petrograd; music from the second scene—the puppet, Petruschka, in his box tortured by love for the puppet ballerina and jealousy of the preferred blackamoor; music from the final scene—again at the carnival fair and including the dances of the nurses and the grooms. Through the suite as through the ballet, runs an incisive piano-part. It is to be played here and in New York and Philadelphia by Raymond Havens.

The peril besetting the music of "Petruschka" in the concert-hall is Stravinsky's close assimilation of it to the action on the stage. For many a measure the one is the intimate complement of the other. Since this action will be invisible at Symphony Hall, next Friday and Saturday, it may reasonably be recalled in detail. The "burlesque scenes," as the formal title tries vainly to classify a piece altogether of its own species, are pictured, mimed and danced upon a stage within a stage. The "scenes" happen to be scenes in the life, death and amorous adventures of the puppet, Petruschka, and accordingly the inner framing suggests in pattern, ornament, and vivid color—blue and gold—the glorified booth of such a show. Behind is the booth proper, in which, as the spectators are soon to see Petruschka, the Ballerina, and the Blackamoor have their life and being; while beyond the low roof is a domed, gray and wintry prospect of distant Petrograd. For "Petruschka" bids the spectators to a fair of the folk in a cold and clouded carnival time, say fifty years ago. It is not in the least a pretentious fair; the booths are weather-worn; the grotesque old men, who gesticulate above them in ardent invitation are as unkempt and faded as their drooping beards; and the crowd itself consists of such humble but merry folk as grooms, cabmen, maid-servants, street musicians, street-dancers and the like.

The assembling folk amuse themselves with dancing and clowning; listen to rival hand-organs; and stroll from booth to booth. Most of all they are interested in that in which an old necromancer, bearded like a Methuselah but covered with a worn top-hat at a rakish angle, exhibits three puppets which by magic arts he can actually call into semblance of life. On their perches they sit whirling legs and arms to the music—in the centre the lovely Ballerina with the pinkest of painted cheeks; on one side the green and gold Blackamoor brandishing his scimitar; on the other little Petruschka is only the merest of puppets with black-mittened hands, red and gold plaided trousers, tasselled hat, expressionless face and arms and legs that droop when they are not in automatic and angular motion. At the touch of the necromancer's wand all three spring off their perches, dance among the crowd and mime a little episode of jealous rivalry. For, as it seems, both Petruschka and the Blackamoor are enamored of the Ballerina, the one humbly and tremulously; the other complacently and even arrogantly. The scene gives the victory to Petruschka who feeble though he is, beats off the Blackamoor with the limp blows of his slap-stick.

But life is not the theatre and these three puppets have their own life to live in the little chambers of the box behind the booth. Thither, however, they carry the rivalries in which the outer world of the fair knows them. For, on and off the stage, Petruschka loves the Ballerina, clumsily, futilely, foolishly, but with no other thought in his feeble little brain and no other impulse in his fond and trembling little heart. There he is in his box, shabby and bare as a stalk, impatient to go to her and even pushing through the wall only to discover that the hole he has broken leads nowhere. At least he can dance the dance by which he will fascinate her. In the midst of it the Ballerina enters—for she has the approved habit of the theatre to wander about the rooms of the other sex—sees his grotesque and pitiful steps, runs away and leaves him, all unwitting of her departure, to dance the harder, until he sees that she is gone and collapses piteously.

Not so, the Blackamoor. In his box, which is gorgeous of fantastically painted wall, he sprawls at his ease, playing with a cocoanut like the stupid savage he really is. He tosses it; he rolls it to and fro; he pretends to worship it; he resents its indifference and cuts at it with his precious scimitar. In the midst of his sport and when he is a little weary of it, enters the amorous Ballerina. The Blackmoor has no need to make love to her; he has only to receive in grinning self-satisfaction the love that she makes to him. Tooting her little trumpet, she works a dance of allurement upon the complacent black—only to discover poor Petruscha caught in the door of the box as he follows in tremulously imploring and feebly clamorous pursuit. The Ballerina mocks him; the Blackamoor, alive to intuition, if not to affection, beats him away with the scimitar. . . .

If Petruscha will woo behind the scenes in his foolish fashion, then will the Blackamoor have revenge upon him before them. Once more the crowd at the fair swelled now by the newcomers of the evening—maskers in guise like animals, soldiers, higher-placed folk "on the loose" and even a policeman or two—is dancing its fill, but with one eye and one ear on the booth of the strange puppets. Behind the curtain is the faint tumult of squeaking quarrel; out of the curtains bursts the frightened and hunted Petruschka all flying arms and legs with the Blackamoor in full pursuit. The scimitar cuts him down, the "murderer" flees; the police move about; the crowd is half-frightened and half-curious; the old necromancer starts to drag away the cloth, the stuffing, the bent and broken wires, the limp body that was once Petruschka. The crowd drifts away to more amusing things; wearily the old magician goes toward the booth; glances upward and there on the roof, grimacing and squeaking, drooping—all futility in death as in life—is the ghost of Petruschka. The top-hat flies from the old man's head. Is he to be haunted all his days by the phantoms of his own necromancy?

As some say, there is symbolism in these puppets, their fortunes and their fate, for the spectator to discover as he may. If he has a mind to on a large scale he may discover in puppet Petruschka and his futilities half the temperamental shortcomings of the Russians in much more important matter than the amorous conflicts of the old necromancer's booth. Or if he has a liking for philosophizing on a yet wider human scale he may discover in the adventures and the fates of the Ballerina, the Blackamoor and the tertium quid that was Petruschka ironic semblance of the disposition and the ways of mankind and womankind, of life and fate. Or he may be content, as it is easy to suspect that Stranvinsky and Benois were content when they made the piece, with the fantastical invention and the fantastical continuance and consummation of the whole. To dress three puppets in mimic and contrasting human traits; to set them in a little drama that should mimic the human tragedy of their relations: and to work out that drama rather more logically than it might run were it subject to human impulse, was an idea with a flash of genius for the fantastic. To carry it to the end with all the wealth of grotesquely and comically characterizing detail that fills the scenes in the boxes was a like feat of imagination. To give it the setting of a Russian folk-fair was to find for the Western World an environment nearly as fantastic. What a scheme to accomplish for the sheer pleasure and thrill of the accomplishment to all concerned. Buckets of ironic meanings outpoured by too many and too willing hands will not quench the joys of the imagination and the joys of fantastic creation for its own sake.

In the autumn of 1916, at the Boston Opera House, Mr. Monteux led the orchestra of the Russian Ballet in "Petruschka." It was then written in this place of him and it:

> Mr. Monteux gave the music a somewhat coarser texture (as of the theatre rather than the concert-hall) than did his predecessor, a sharper accent (as though it would be as graphic as the action on the stage), a fuller clangor, a more intense rhythmic life. He slapped Stravinsky's tingling dissonances and scarifying chords upon the listening ear. He multiplied the din of the fair, quickening by beat and blow the rushing current of the music yet keeping it in steady foam of incisive detail. As sharply, he plied the characterizing phrases, timbres and modulations for the puppets and their doings. Every twitch, every squeak of Petruschka snapped clear and clean out of the orchestra; the ballerina's legs and the accompanying phrases of flute and piccolo danced simultaneously in air; the trumpet tune for her was as unsparingly vulgar as Stravinsky intended; the rival hand-organs were so perfectly simulated that, as of old, many believed them played upon the stage. Best of all, Mr. Monteux kept high and bright the rhythmic force, the endless rhythmic play which are half the power and more than half the cohesion of Stravinsky's music. Never before here has it sounded with such verve of rhythm, such impinging harmonies and timbres, such vivid force of delineation and (almost) impersonation—a masterpiece beyond peradventure in its purpose and kind.

TRANS NOV 24

7TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Mendelssohn's Octet Displays Remarkable Skill of String Choir

MONTEUX PLEASES IN CHOICE OF PIECES

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Octet, E flat major, op. 20 for the string choir; Respighi, "Fountains of Rome," Symphonic poem; Stravinsky, Orchestral suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka," (first time at these concerts).

Mendelssohn wrote this Octet when he was 16 years old. It was at the time an astonishing feat for so young a man; the Octet still commands respect by the workmanship displayed; the fantastical Scherzo is still heard with great pleasure; the other movements have aged. Would that Mendelssohn had always written in the vein of this Scherzo and of another early work, the overture to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream!" What might he not have accomplished if he had been poor; if he had not been flattered by adoring family and friends; if he had been knocked about the world and had not been wrapped in cotton-wool? There is the Mendelssohn of the works already mentioned, also the "Hebrides" overture, "The Walpurgis Night," the Scherzo in F sharp minor for the piano; then, unfortunately, there is the mass of music by Mendelssohn, the ineffable prig. His music too often brings to mind the portrait in which he is shown with a billowing ruffled shirt and a huge shirt-pin, already to step into an English parlor or to play for the Prince Consort; or as in the caricature by Aubrey Beardsley with pen in hand, probably about to write to some one about the shocking ballet of nuns in "Robert the Devil," or to express his horror at the sight of poor little Zerlina undressing and singing before the looking glass in "Fra Diavolo."

The Octet had not been heard at a Symphony concert for many years. It tests the strings and is good practice for them. The performance yesterday was excellent. The city may well be proud of this string choir.

It was a pleasure to hear Respighi's beautiful music again, and Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for answering so graciously the request of many. As a rule, an unfamiliar piece is played once, then put on the shelf and not taken down again for many months, or even some years. This is not fair to the audience or the composer, especially when the idiom of the latter is novel. Mr. Monteux is bringing forward many new works by the younger composers of various countries and various schools, while he does not neglect the old masters. This is wise; this is necessary, unless knowledge with appreciation of music becomes stagnant. Undue familiarity with the great works of the old masters is injurious to them. We hear the symphonies of Beethoven so often that it is not easy to recognize the beauty and the grandeur of the better ones. Haydn, a man of many symphonies, is represented from year to year, only by a few that we knew as children by playing them in four-handed arrangements with a teacher or a maiden-aunt. Weber wrote other overtures than the everlasting three. For many years the younger men have not had opportunity to be heard. How wofully scanty, for example, is our acquaintance with the young orchestral composers of Great Britain! But hearing of an important new work at long intervals is not enough to form a judgment; to confirm a sane opinion, favorable or unfavorable.

Great is Stravinsky, writer of ballet music, and Mr. Monteux is his prophet. No wonder that he wished to perform the music of "Petrouchka," for, intimately associated with the composer, he has conducted the first performance of many of his works and many performances thereafter, and with the composer he chose the pages for concert use.

But the music of "Petrouchka," remarkable as it is with the ballet on the stage, is not so well suited for concert performance as is the music of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird." It is as closely connected with the action, as inseparable, as the music of "Pelleas and Melisande is with the situations, the dialogue and the emotions. Many pages that amuse or thrill when Petrouchka, the Moor and the Ballerine are playing out the tragedy have no significance in the concert hall; they merely excite surprise, or possibly the indignation of the hopelessly conservative who roll their eyes in ectasy at the mention of Brahms, and would loudly applaud a smug interpretation of Hummel's piano concerto in A minor. Nevertheless Igor Stravinsky is a man to be reckoned with and his music should be heard—heard more than once. The performance yesterday was brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week; the orchestra will be away.

On Tuesday Dec. 7, Thursday Dec. 9, and Friday Dec. 10 at 4 P. M., the Young People's Concert will take place.

The program of the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon Dec. 17 and Saturday evening Dec. 18 will be as follows: Weber, overture to "Preciosa" Brahms, violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Bax "In the Faery Hills," Symphonic poem (first time in America); Balakireff, "Islamey," Oriental Fantasy for piano, orchestrated by Alfred Casella (first time in Boston).

HERALD NOV. 27.

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on November 26 was as follows: Mendelssohn, octette for strings in E flat op. 20; Respighi, "Fontane di Roma"; Stravinsky, orchestral suite from the ballet "Pétrouchka."

Does not Mendelssohn's octette suffer in being transferred to a large hall, with each of its eight parts many times doubled? It would seem so on hearing it yesterday. The details of its delicate workmanship were somewhat obscured and the magnified version lost the intimate character of chamber music which is properly associated with the work. Nevertheless, it served as a virtuoso piece for the string section of the orchestra and as such was effective, if in quite a different manner from that intended by the composer. Respighi's "Fontane di Roma," given for the first time in Boston two weeks ago, was substituted for Franck's symphonic piece from the Redemption as originally announced. Would that all important new compositions might thus be repeated. Few worthy compositions can be fully understood at a first hearing. Respighi's symphonic poem is a case in point. Yesterday's hearing revealed unexpected beauties of melody and color and it may confidently be said that the composition is a welcome addition to our orchestral repertory.

Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" is distinctly music for the theater. No doubt the many harmonic barbarities serve to heighten the dramatic action. In the concert room they are often tiresome. There is little thematic interest, little to stir the emotions when the music is played apart from the dramatic action. There are clever orchestral effects, it is almost needless to say. The prodigious command of orchestral technic excites astonishment. It must be admitted that there are occasional poetic moments, as in the final measures of the suite. The program served well to show the virtuosity of the orchestra. Yet it included two works which properly speaking are out of place on a symphony program. Raymond Havens was the pianist in the Stravinsky work, although, as the piano is treated as a purely orchestral instrument, it is to be wondered why his name should be featured when all the musicians of the orchestra distinguished themselves so signally in the interpretation of a difficult and taxing composition.

MONITOR NOV. 27.

SYMPHONY IN VARIED PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

An almost forgotten Octette for strings by Mendelssohn, a repetition of Respighi's "Fountain of Rome" played only a fortnight ago, and the Stravinsky suite for orchestra from the ballet "Petrouchka" made up Mr. Monteux's bill for fare at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

The Mendelssohn music is suave and a bit old fashioned. Why is it that Mendelssohn so often sounds old fashioned while his contemporaries, some of whom were considered far less talented in those days, hold their own much better? The Scherzo is the best music in it.

The Respighi tone poem improves with a rehearing. It has undoubted beauty and moments of fineness.

"Petrouchka" is queer music for a Symphony concert. The ballet is the most fantastic affair imaginable. I saw it in Monte Carlo once, and had no program, and found it delightful but utterly bewildering. Stravinsky's music needs the weird ballet to make it intelligible, and even then it is not too much so. Imagine it with the ears of people who never saw the ballet, though it was done in Boston by the Diaghileff troupe, and who were simply astounded by the strange noises the orchestra often gave fourth.

Nevertheless this is remarkable music and it received a very effective performance. Monteux may not be the most celebratd of symphonic conductors, but when it comes to interpreting the Russian ballet all other conductors must go to school to him.

AMERICAN NOV. 27.

Items and Incidents

The first of the two annual concerts by the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund will take place in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21. As Mr. Monteux now sketches the programme, it will include Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," colorful and displayful music in which the conductor has not yet been heard; Saint-Saëns's agreeable tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules" and Wagner's jigging and resonant overture to his early opera, "Rienzi." A notable "assisting artist," as yet unannounced, will join the orchestra and contribute one or two numbers to the full programme.

[54]

SYMPHONIC POEM IS HEARD AGAIN

Two of the numbers played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, were in manner born to arouse the imagination and fancy.

Ane of these was the repetition of the performance of the Symphonic Poem by Respighi, "Fontaine de Roma ("Fountains of Rome"). This work was performed by the orchestra two weeks ago and was received with such enthusiasm that Mr. Monteux felt its second performance would not be amiss. This composition is a delight to the mind and heart. How easily one visualizes the pastoral scene; the fountain in which the naiads and tritons joyously dance; the fountain over which Neptune and his sea chargers ride in glorious procession; and the sweet last part, in which distant bells and evening zephyrs die away in calm quiet. Delight at this second interpretation by the orchestra was shown by the large audience in its appreciative applause.

The other number which filled its hearers' thoughts with vivid pictures was Stravinsky's Orchestral Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka." The story is one of a festival, a puppet show and all the rest which makes a Russian "fete." One easily sensed the excitement and noises of such a day as this expressed. the wheeze of the hurdy-gurdy, the cries of the vendors and the tales of the fortune-tellers. Stravinsky has sensed it all and one almost sees the faded bunting and tinsel of the crowd. Much as the delight would be at seeing the actual ballet, there is a still keener happiness in letting the music of Stravinsky weave one's own pictures as they follow one on another in quick succession.

The other number on the program was an octette for strings by Mendelssohn This was well played by the orchestra but there are other of Mendelssohn's works more worthy of presentation than this.

Raymond Havens assisted at the piano during the Stravinsky number.

TRAV. NOV. 27.

[illegible] evening, Dec. 16, in Sanders [illegible] in Cambridge, a concert by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, playing the solo-part in Brahms's concerto.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Burgin to play the solo-part in Brahms's concerto for violin. The other items of the programme are Weber's resuscitated overture to his forgotten opera, "Preciosa"; a new tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills" by the British composer, Arnold Bax; and Casella's orchestral version of Balakirev's oriental fantasia, "Islamey," originally a piano-piece.

Saturday evening, Dec. 18, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and the programme above specified.

TRANS. NOV. 27

"PETROUCHKA" A GROTESQUE TRIUMPH

Stravinsky's Piece Given By Symphony Orchestra

Mendelssohn's Amazing Early Skill Shown in an Octet for Strings

Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," performed for the first time here in the arrangement for orchestra alone at yesterday's Symphony concert, deserves to be called the apotheosis of the grotesque. It represents the extreme verge of the sort of romanticism which has "added strangeness to beauty." There is originality of the conception and amazing skill in its working out.

Stravinsky's harmonies, rhythms, themes and orchestration are pre-eminently his own, as much so as Wagner's in "Tristan" or Debussy's in "Pelleas." They are often strange, as "Tristan" and "Pelleas" were when we had not learned to know them. They are sometimes wilfully freakish, but no more so than the subject of the ballet demands.

Back of even the most perverse skips and dissonances, the listener who really listens, feels a powerful creative imagination at work with its ends always clearly in view attaining the desired results with an almost uparalleled mastery of technique. This music makes Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" sound like the work of an amateurish bungler, so great is its craftsmanship.

As for Respighi's "Fountains of Rome", repeated yesterday by request from Nov 12 and 13, the audience preferred it to "Petrouchka" just as audiences long preferred Wagner's "Rienzi" to "Tristan", because it is for the most part a reworking of familiar stuff which cleverly disguises the obvious, making commonplaces both old and relatively new sound original by the use of unhackneyed harmonic and orchestral tricks.

Mendelssohn's Octet for strings is a surprising production for a boy of 16, skilfully written for the chosen medium. There are pages in the three latter movements which are still quietly beautiful. It is curious that Mendelssohn never matured much beyond the point he reached in this early work. A comparison of his work in his 'teens and twenties with Beethoven's or Wagner's at the same age would make him appear greatly their superior. They went on growing; he stopped at 18.

The orchestra had not rehearsed this number long enough to be able to attain an absolutely precise ensemble. They presumably had taken more pains over the difficulties of "Petrouchka," but it would be rash for a listener not [illegible] familiar with the score to judge whether they kept absolutely together in that. At all events they gave a thrilling performance of it, as well as a much applauded one of Respighi's "Fountains."

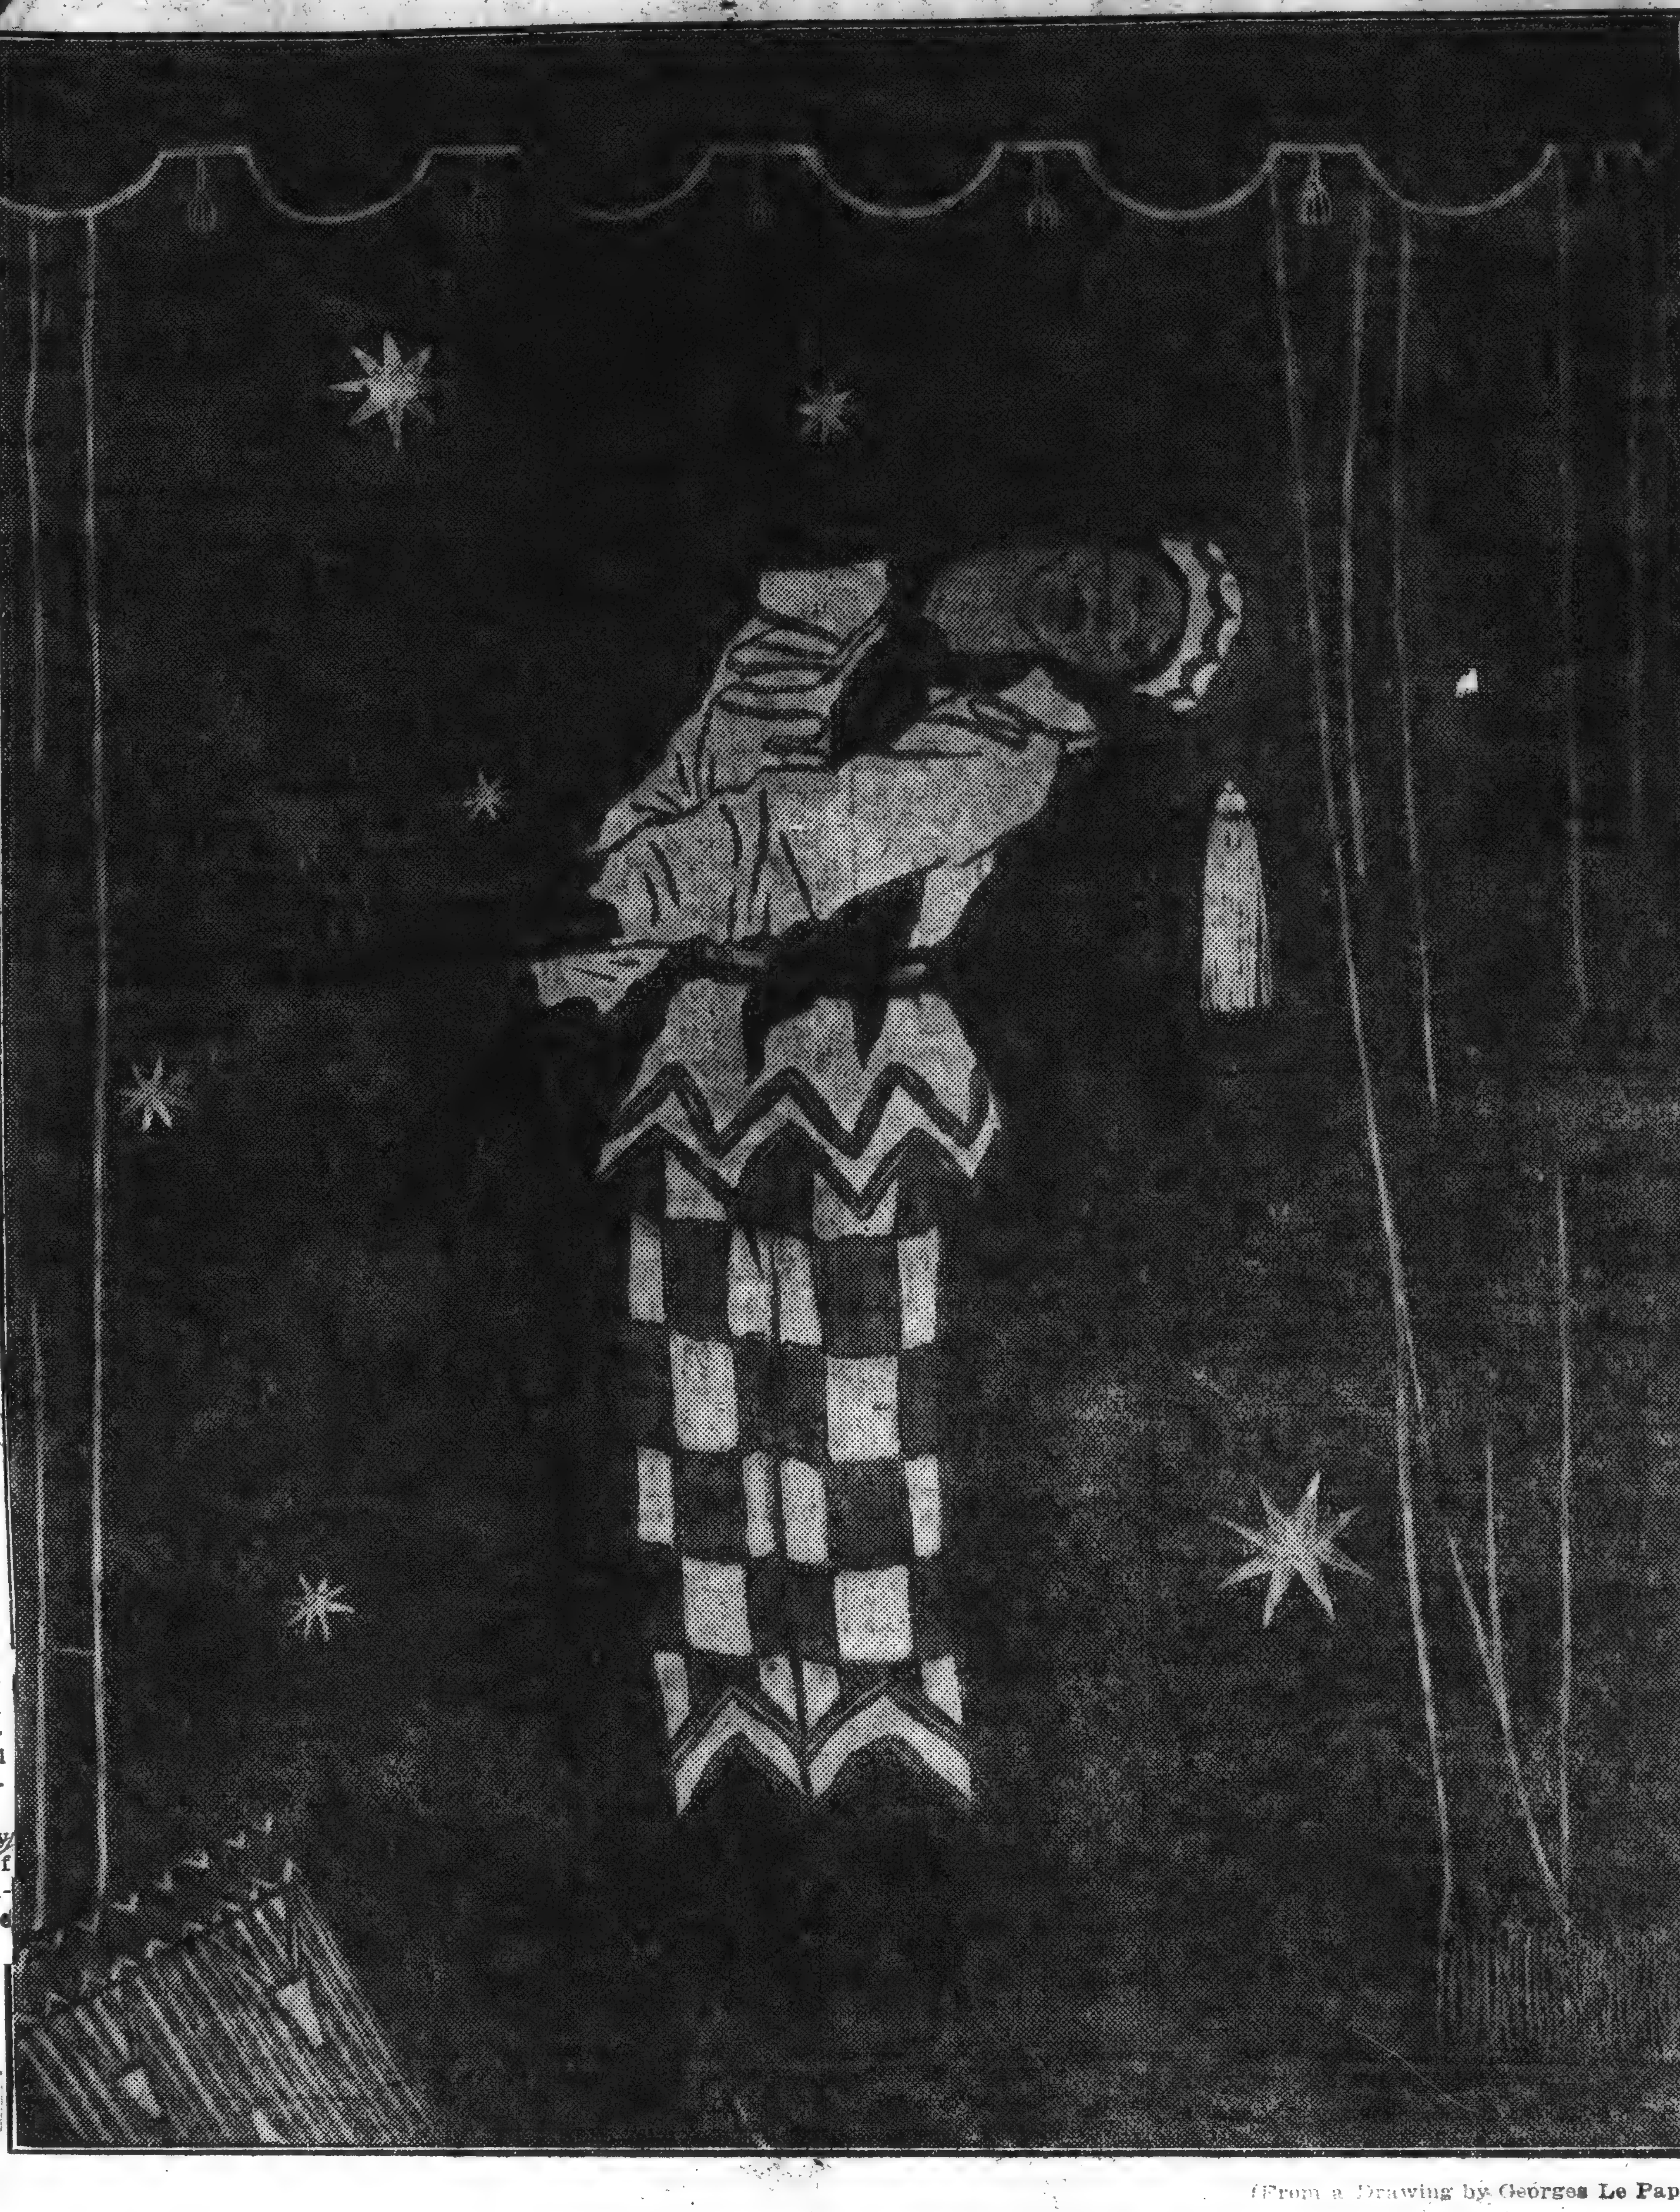
There are no more regular concerts until Dec 17 and 18, when Mr Burgin, the new concertmaster, will play the Brahms violin concerto, and the orchestra alone will be heard in Weber's overture to "Preciosa," Balakirev's "Islamey," orchestrated by Casella, and a new piece by Arnold Bax with a Gaelic title which means "In the Fairy Hills."

GLOBE NOV. 27.

---

[55]

Little Peter of the Puppets



(From a Drawing by Georges Le Pape)

The Figure, Out of Stravinsky's Mimodrama, "Petrushka," That Mr. Monteux and His Orchestra Would Conjure Into Symphony Hall

TRANS. NOV. 27.

THE GLORIOUS DAY OF "LITTLE PETER"

Stravinsky's "Petrushka" for the First Time in Boston Outside a Theatre—Strange to Say It Gains by the Transfer—Rare Pleasure and Stimulus—Mendelssohn's Octet Alive and Well After Ninety-Five Years—Another Notable Performance—Respighi and the Middle Way

(A noted drawing of Petrushka appears on Page 4 of Part 5)

WHEN Mr. Gericke took leave of the Symphony Orchestra in the spring of 1906, there was a ceremonial concert in his honor with making of speeches bestowal of wreaths and, in general, what the pious call a laying-on of hands. One speaker congratulated the conductor, his forces, composers and the practitioners of music yesterday, today and forever upon the solace they yielded the tired business-man when he settled into his seat in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening assured, through an hour and three-quarters, of rest and recreation. The compliment was well-intended; but, for obvious reasons, it did not altogether please the retiring Gericke or accord altogether with his deserts. Like Mr. Paur before him, in his final years in Boston, he had opened the door of the Symphony Concerts to the moderns and the ultra-moderns in whose music there is no peace In succession Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler swung the gate wider, and now Mr. Monteux has timely and wisely thrust it back upon its very hinges. The brief interregnum of Mr. Rabaud, with his easy entertainments for the elderly, brought, possibly, the last respite. For, were the business-man ten times as tired as he likes to profess himself, his repose of old time in Symphony Hall would not be proof against the Roumanian Rhapsody of Enesco, the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushka," Casella's version for orchestra of Balakirev's "Islamey." Out upon their brazen tongues; for, whether they please or displease the hearer, they do keep him awake and alert. And in three successive pairs of concerts Mr. Monteux has included these disturbers. The rest of the righteous has vanished from Symphony Hall. Yet somehow the present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has never been so able, eloquent and generally praised as he is in these days.

It was a courageous act—the deed of a man who loves his profession, respects its obligations, cherishes an artist's honor—to bring into the concert-hall this suite from "Petrushka." Of course Stravinsky deserves to be heard. No one, unless he is purblind and sodden with dislike, denies the Russian his place among the individualities of music in our time or his influence upon composers of his own generation and probably through a generation to come. And if Stravinsky is to be heard at all in Boston or New York; he must find room in symphony concerts. No Russian Ballet ministers periodically to us as does Mr. Diaghilev's to London and Paris Yet for dancers and mimes upon the stage of a theatre Stravinsky has written his major orchestral pieces. What, then, is a conductor to do? Accept gladly the suite, heard in Boston last autumn, that the composer himself drew from "The Fire-Bird"; join with him, as Mr. Monteux has done, in the extraction of a suite from "Petrushka"; play from first measure to last, as Mr. Monteux did in Paris, as upon some fortunate day he may do in Boston, the whole of "The Rite of the Spring." Behind as well waits "The Song of the Nightingale."

Yet for this very suite from "Petrushka" many a hearer—perhaps composer and conductor too—waited with foreboding. For, if ever music for danced and mimed "burlesque scenes" was close knit to the action and the aspect of the stage, it is this music of Stravinsky. At beginning and end it is charged with the sights, the sounds—the very smells as some say—of a steaming Russian fair. No fête d'élite in the French of Petrograd; no more a peasant merry-making—only a cheap, common, sordid "side-show" on a Shrove Tuesday, frequented by servants, hawkers, "barkers," "shysters" and a few of their betters with a taste or a passing inclination for "low company." The music is redolent of this crew—moves, halts, dances, whirls, murmurs, shouts with them. It is as graphic of every passing incident. Note, even yesterday in Symphony Hall, the soft, clumsy clump-clump-clump of the dancing bear led across the scene. Listen—and the whole audience Friday smiled as it heard—to the rival hand-organs. Open wide the ear to dance piled, as it were, upon dance.

Akin is the music of the puppets—of the little-Peter-doll who is Petrushka, of the pink-cheeked Ballerina, of the Blackamoor who—shame upon her!—is her accepted lover. Does Petrushka, tortured by jealousy and longing, grope and tear and push at the walls of his box? The music twitches with both his physical and his spiritual agonies—twitches and also records the futility of them. Does the fatuous Blackamoor play with a cocoanut? The music shares his silly pastime. In prances the Ballerina to her smudgy lord and the orchestra plays her penny-trumpet tune. At one moment, it is grieving wistfully—and with a ghostly twitch—for Petrushka foully murdered; the next and there he is—no less in the orchestra than on the parapet of the booth—grimacing and teetering at the old showman—and all humanity. For what are we but like puppets of our fate?

An impossible music—it is easy to say—in the concert-hall. Yet there it was yesterday and there it will be this evening—in nearly every measure self-contained, closely knit, graphic, richly amusing, once and again piteous, always penetrating and exciting, a more individual music in fibre, texture, color, process than ever it seemed in the theatre. And all this with no more aid from tabulated divisions, a programme-note and memories recalled than Mendelssohn exacts for numbers to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Of course, Mr. Monteux was wise in what to include and what to exclude for the concert-hall, and Stravinsky may well countersign him. He began with the music that sets the scene of the fair, whipping and bubbling with bustle, din and stew. He did not overlook the celebrated incident of the hurdy-gurdy. The snare-drum rattled to call the folk to the show-man's booth and forthwith the three puppets spun through their folk-dance.

Next and briefly music to the scene in Petrushka's box—his twitching tortures, gropings, clawings, the wistful little dances he sketches wherewith to win the Ballerina to sympathy and love—this and the futility, the irony of it all. Then, with the whole scene in the Blackamoor's box omitted, back to the fair as darkness descends, snow falls, the crowd thickens and the dances become more boisterous. There is way for the bear, and a tinkle at last of the drunken merchant's concertina. Then the nurses', the coachmen's, the grooms' dances and the wild orchestral whirl of all three. Here, obviously, was the lunging, plunging close. Mr. Monteux has too much artistic scruple, is too loyal to Stravinsky, to halt there. On he goes to the piteous measures of "little Peter's" death for love's sake, and a page further to the ironic grimace with which, as is usual among both human and puppet-kind, such tragedies end.

What a music heard thus self-contained and stripped of every distraction of the theatre—a music of power, beauty, imagery, illusion, irony, fantasy as the composer for the instant wills—a music of the utmost individuality and economy of means! Power welds the three dances of the fair by night until the air leaps and blazes with them, and a breathless orchestra shouts, gasps and shouts again. Only in "The Rite of Spring" does Stravinsky make rhythm pound harder or colors blare more sharply. Beauty touches the little dance of Petrushka's wistful imagining, the piteousness of his cruel end. He is more, not less, plausible and poignant when his wired arms and legs twitch, his blunt fingers fumble, his sawdust aches in the music rather than in Mr. Nijinsky's or Mr. Massine's miming. In tones rather than in the flesh his final grimace is the more ironic, fantastic, haunting. There is more humor in the contending hurdy-gurdies heard and not seen. A man awkward in a bear-skin lends no aid to the clump-clump-clump of the music. The rattle of the snare-drum is enough to open the showman's booth. So forth and so onward. By every token of yesterday the music of "Petrushka" is self-contained, self-sufficient. Not an illusion, an impression, a quality, that it yields in the theatre disappears or deteriorates in the concert-hall. Instead all are quickened.

What a music again in the mere facture! At every turn the means are as economical as the effect is sure and complete. A chord provokes an emotion; a sequence of chords, an illusion. From a motiv of three or four notes upsprings a whole dance. In our day there is no such master of the power of rhythm as is Stravinsky; and none to excel him in the bite and flame of the primary harmonic and instrumental colors. The sharp edge, the pungent phrase are his familiars. He seems to hear the orchestra as so many individual voices with which he may work his will severally, not in traditional choirs or in coördinated groups; while none but him—and the commentators are endless—has ever fathomed his marvellous manipulation of them. Even in him it may be half divination.

And the performance? Enough that there would have been no such impressions, no such illusion, had not Mr. Monteux in a familiar field and the orchestra in an unfamiliar, outdone themselves separately and collectively after days and nights of unsparing work. Again the band can pulse with rhythm, glow with color, run the gamut from finesse to force. In turn, Mr. Havens, as he should, cut sharp and struck hard with the piano-part. Since the day of Liszt's "Faust," the Symphony Concerts have not known so glorious an hour as this afternoon of "Petrushka."

Yet Mendelssohn gave pleasure—the Mendelssohn of the octet for strings, A. D. first place. in 1920 this Mendelssohn of Symphony Concerts in thirty-five years, with parts distributed as though it were piece for two string-orchestras. In the first place in 1920 this Mendelssohn of octet is preferable to the Mendelssohn of the symphonies and most of the overtures; to any and all Mendelssohn except him of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." In the second place, Mr. Monteux and most of the string choir were no less on their mettle with the octet than they were soon to be with "Petrushka." So played in relatively few spots has the music worn bare, thin, antiquated. The slow movement suffers most such impairing. Yesterday it seemed pale, slender, sentimental, prettyfied, like to a "Song without Words," beside the warm vigor or the fleet fancy of the other divisions. Not even the songful violoncellos at the beginning, the full-voiced middle measures, the wistful coloring of the violas could reanimate it.

On the other hand, the flash and flicker, the dart and ripple of the scherzo defy the years. Not even in the fairy-music to Shakspeare's comedy has Mendelssohn been more light and sure of finger, fleet and fecund of fancy. Hand in hand go animation and delicacy. In the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" a wind choir was at the composer's command. Here in the octet, and not in the scherzo alone, he can ingeniously suggest, and with only strings, the contrasting coloring of wind instruments. (After all the imaginative and suggestive manipulation of harmonies and timbres did begin before our blessed musical time.) The strings yesterday played this [illegible] lightly, fleetly, as fine-spun, [illegible] they seemed ready even [illegible] Mab and sylphs. Neither [illegible] they lacked rhythmic animation [illegible] spring of the [illegible] of one part upon another, [illegible] listening fancy; the whole came [illegible] in plastic, polished progress. [illegible]

Nor is Mendelssohn merely [illegible] counterpoint and spinning [illegible] first movement. There is a [illegible]

his first motiv; before he has [illegible] the working; he has struck [illegible] for the incisive violins of [illegible]

SYMPHONIC POEM IS HEARD AGAIN

Two of the numbers played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, were in manner born to arouse the imagination and fancy.

Ane of these was the repetition of the performance of the Symphonic Poem by Respighi, "Fontaine de Roma ("Fountains of Rome"). This work was performed by the orchestra two weeks ago and was received with such enthusiasm that Mr. Monteux felt its second performance would not be amiss. This composition is a delight to the mind and heart. How easily one visualizes the pastoral scene; the fountain in which the naiads and tritons joyously dance; the fountain over which Neptune and his sea chargers ride in glorious procession; and the sweet last part in which distant bells and evening zephyrs die away in calm quiet. Delight at this second interpretation by the orchestra was shown by the large audience in its appreciative applause.

The other number which filled its hearers' thoughts with vivid pictures was Stravinsky's Orchestral Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka." The story is one of a festival, a puppet show and all the rest which makes a Russian "fete." One easily sensed the excitement and noises of such a day as this expressed, the wheeze of the hurdy-gurdy, the cries of the vendors and the tales of the fortune-tellers. Stravinsky has sensed it all and one almost sees the faded bunting and tinsel of the crowd. Much as the delight would be at seeing the actual ballet, there is a still keener happiness in letting the music of Stravinsky weave one's own pictures as they follow one on another in quick succession.

The other number on the program was an octette for strings by Mendelssohn. This was well played by the orchestra but there are other of Mendelssohn's works more worthy of presentation than this.

Raymond Havens assisted at the piano during the Stravinsky number.

[illegible] evening, Dec. 16, in Sanders [illegible] in Cambridge, a concert by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. [illegible]onteux conducting and Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, playing the solo-part in Brahms's concerto.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Burgin to play the solo-part in Brahms's concerto for violin. The other items of the programme are Weber's resuscitated overture to his forgotten opera, "Preciosa"; a new tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills" by the British composer, Arnold Bax; and Casella's orchestral version of Balakirev's oriental fantasia, "Islamey," originally a piano-piece.

Saturday evening, Dec. 18, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and the programme above specified.

"PETROUCHKA" A GROTESQUE TRIUMPH

Stravinsky's Piece Given By Symphony Orchestra

Mendelssohn's Amazing Early Skill Shown in an Octet for Strings

Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," performed for the first time here in the arrangement for orchestra alone at yesterday's Symphony concert, deserves to be called the apotheosis of the grotesque. It represents the extreme verge of the sort of romanticism which has "added strangeness to beauty." There is originality of the conception and amazing skill in its working out.

Stravinsky's harmonies, rhythms, themes and orchestration are preeminently his own, as much so as Wagner's in "Tristan" or Debussy's in "Pelleas." They are often strange, as "Tristan" and "Pelleas" were when we had not learned to know them. They are sometimes wilfully freakish, but no more so than the subject of the ballet demands.

Back of even the most perverse skips and dissonances, the listener who really listens, feels a powerful creative imagination at work with its ends always clearly in view attaining the desired results with an almost uparalleled mastery of technique. This music makes Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" sound like the work of an amateurish bungler, so great is its craftsmanship.

As for Respighi's "Fountains of Rome", repeated yesterday by request from Nov 12 and 13, the audience preferred it to "Petrouchka" just as audiences long preferred Wagner's "Rienzi" to "Tristan", because it is for the most part a reworking of familiar stuff which cleverly disguises the obvious, making commonplaces both old and relatively new sound original by the use of unhackneyed harmonic and orchestral tricks.

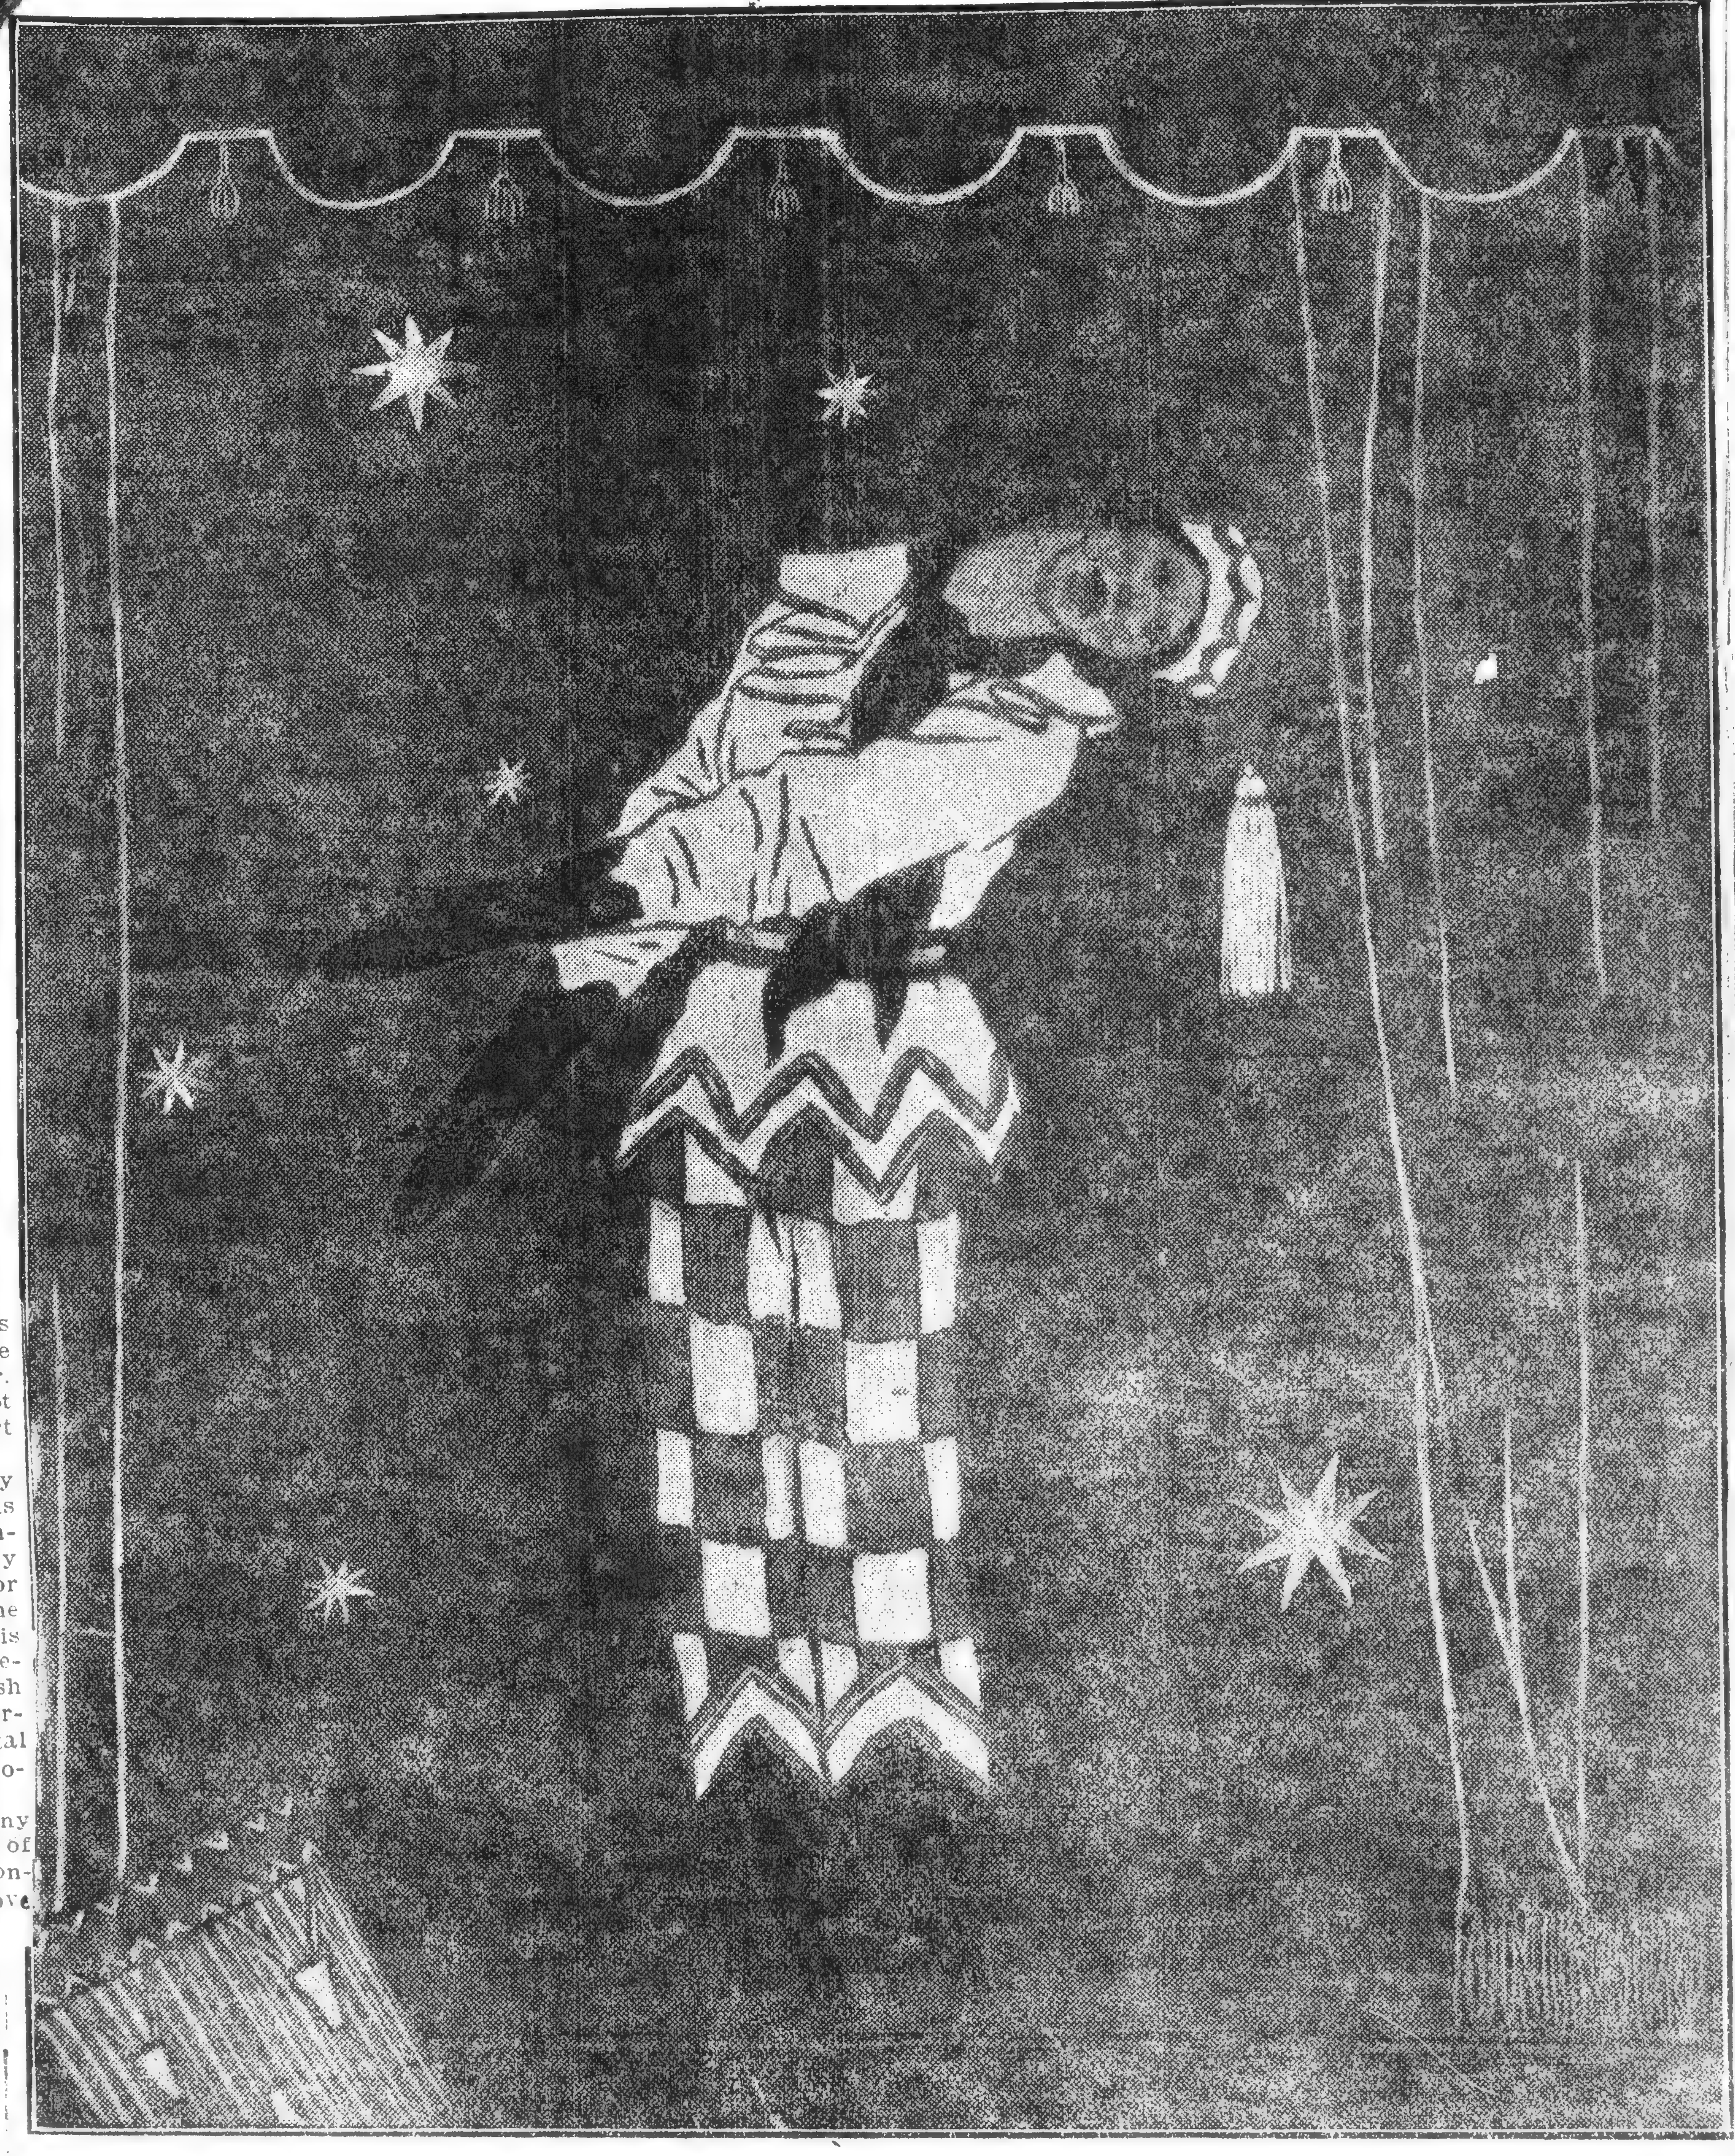
Mendelssohn's Octet for strings is a surprising production for a boy of 16, skilfully written for the chosen medium. There are pages in the three latter movements which are still quietly beautiful. It is curious that Mendelssohn never matured much beyond the point he reached in this early work. A comparison of his work in his 'teens and twenties with Beethoven's or Wagner's at the same age would make him appear greatly their superior. They went on growing; he stopped at 18.

The orchestra had not rehearsed this number long enough to be able to attain an absolutely precise ensemble. They presumably had taken more pains over the difficulties of "Petrouchka," but it would be rash for a listener not thoroughly familiar with the score to

---

[55]

Little Peter of the Puppets



The Figure, Out of Stravinsky's Mimodrama, "Petrushka," That Mr. Monteux and His Orchestra Would Conjure Into Symphony Hall

[illegible] when [illegible] they kept absolutely together in that. At all events they gave a thrilling performance of it, as well as a much applauded one of Respighi's "Fountains."

There are no more regular concerts until Dec 17 and 18, when Mr Burgin, the new concertmaster, will play the Brahms violin concerto, and the orchestra alone will be heard in Weber's overture to "Preciosa," Balakirev's "Islamey," orchestrated by Casella, and a new piece by Arnold Bax with a Gaelic title which means "In the Fairy Hills."

THE GLORIOUS DAY OF "LITTLE PETER"

Stravinsky's "Petrushka" for the First Time in Boston Outside a Theatre—Strange to Say It Gains by the Transfer—Rare Pleasure and Stimulus—Mendelssohn's Octet Alive and Well After Ninety-Five Years — Another Notable Performance—Respighi and the Middle Way

(A noted drawing of Petrushka appears on Page 4 of Part 5)

WHEN Mr. Gericke took leave of the Symphony Orchestra in the spring of 1906, there was a ceremonial concert in his honor with making of speeches bestowal of wreaths and, in general, what the pious call a laying-on of hands. One speaker congratulated the conductor, his forces, composers and the practitioners of music yesterday, today and forever upon the solace they yielded the tired business-man when he settled into his seat in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening assured, through an hour and three-quarters, of rest and recreation. The compliment was well-intended; but, for obvious reasons, it did not altogether please the retiring Gericke or accord altogether with his deserts. Like Mr. Paur before him, in his final years in Boston, he had opened the door of the Symphony Concerts to the moderns and the ultra-moderns in whose music there is no peace In succession Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler swung the gate wider, and now Mr. Monteux has timely and wisely thrust it back upon its very hinges. The brief interregnum of Mr. Rabaud, with his easy entertainments for the elderly, brought, possibly, the last respite. For, were the business-man ten times as tired as he likes to profess himself, his repose of old time in Symphony Hall would not be proof against the Roumanian Rhapsody of Enesco, the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushka," Casella's version for orchestra of Balakirev's "Islamey." Out upon their brazen tongues; for, whether they please or displease the hearer, they do keep him awake and alert. And in three successive pairs of concerts Mr. Monteux has included these disturbers. The rest of the righteous has vanished from Symphony Hall. Yet somehow the present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has never been so able, eloquent and generally praised as he is in these days.

It was a courageous act—the deed of a man who loves his profession, respects its obligations, cherishes an artist's honor—to bring into the concert-hall this suite from "Petrushka." Of course Stravinsky deserves to be heard. No one, unless he is purblind and sodden with dislike, denies the Russian his place among the individualities of music in our time or his influence upon composers of his own generation and probably through a generation to come. And if Stravinsky is to be heard at all in Boston or New York, he must find room in symphony concerts. No Russian Ballet ministers periodically to us as does Mr. Diaghilev's to London and Paris Yet for dancers and mimes upon the stage of a theatre Stravinsky has written his major orchestral pieces. What, then, is a conductor to do? Accept gladly the suite, heard in Boston last autumn, that the composer himself drew from "The Fire-Bird"; join with him, as Mr. Monteux has done, in the extraction of a suite from "Petrushka"; play from first measure to last, as Mr. Monteux did in Paris, as upon some fortunate day he may do in Boston, the whole of "The Rite of the Spring." Behind as well waits "The Song of the Nightingale."

Yet for this very suite from "Petrushka" many a hearer—perhaps composer and conductor too—waited with foreboding. For, if ever music for danced and mimed "burlesque scenes" was close knit to the action and the aspect of the stage, it is this music of Stravinsky. At beginning and end it is charged with the sights, the sounds—the very smells as some say—of a steaming Russian fair. No fête d'élite in the French of Petrograd; no more a peasant merry-making—only a cheap, common, sordid "side-show" on a Shrove Tuesday, frequented by servants, hawkers, "barkers," "shysters" and a few of their betters with a taste or a passing inclination for "low company." The music is redolent of this crew—moves, halts dances, whirls, murmurs, shouts with them. It is as graphic of every passing incident. Note, even yesterday in Symphony Hall the soft, clumsy clump-clump-clump of the dancing bear led across the scene. Listen—and the whole audience Friday smiled as it heard—to the rival hand-organs. Open wide the ear to dance piled, as it were, upon dance.

Akin is the music of the puppets—of the little-Peter-doll who is Petrushka, of the pink-cheeked Ballerina, of the Blackamoor who—shame upon her!—is her accepted lover. Does Petrushka, tortured by jealousy and longing, grope and tear and push at the walls of his box? The music twitches with both his physical and his spiritual agonies—twitches and also records the futility of them. Does the fatuous Blackamoor play with a cocoanut? The music shares his silly pastime. In prances the Ballerina to her smudgy lord and the orchestra plays her penny-trumpet tune. At one moment, it is grieving wistfully—and with a ghostly twitch—for Petrushka foully murdered; the next and there he is—no less in the orchestra than on the parapet of the booth—grimacing and teetering at the old showman—and all humanity. For what are we but like puppets of our fate?

An impossible music—it is easy to say—in the concert-hall. Yet there it was yesterday and there it will be this evening—in nearly every measure self-contained, closely knit, graphic, richly amusing, once and again piteous, always penetrating and exciting, a more individual music in fibre, texture, color, process than ever it seemed in the theatre. And all this with no more aid from tabulated divisions, a programme-note and memories recalled than Mendelssohn exacts for numbers to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Of course, Mr. Monteux was wise in what to include and what to exclude for the concert-hall, and Stravinsky may well countersign him. He began with the music that sets the scene of the fair, whipping and bubbling with bustle, din and stew. He did not overlook the celebrated incident of the hurdy-gurdies. The snare-drum rattled to call the folk to the show-man's booth and forthwith the three puppets spun through their folk-dance.

Next and briefly music to the scene in Petrushka's box his twitching tortures, gropings, clawings, the wistful little dance he sketches wherewith to win the Ballerina to sympathy and love—this and the futility, the irony of it all. Then, with the whole scene in the Blackamoor's box omitted, back to the fair as darkness descends, snow falls, the crowd thickens and the dances become more boisterous. There is way for the bear, and a tinkle at least of the drunken merchant's concertina. Then the nurses', the coachmen's the grooms' dances and the wild orchestral whirl of all three. Here, obviously, was the hanging [illegible] close. Mr. Monteux has too much artistic scruple, is too loyal to Stravinsky, to halt there. On he goes to the [illegible] of "little Peter's" death for [illegible] sake, and a page further to the [illegible] grimace with which, as [illegible] among both human and puppet-kind, [illegible] tragedies end.

What a music heard thus self-contained and stripped of every distraction of the theatre, a music of power, beauty, imagery, illusion, irony, fantasy as the com[illegible]

[illegible] wistful imagin[illegible] [illegible] and poignant [illegible]

[illegible] in Mr. Nijinsky's [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] the piano-part [illegible] the Sym[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] the scherzo [illegible] in the fairy-music [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] finger [illegible] fancy. [illegible] Night's Dream" a [illegible] composer's [illegible]

[illegible] played this [illegible] fine-spun [illegible] sylphs. Neither the finale [illegible] rhythmic animation [illegible] the beginning, the little [illegible] part upon another, pleased [illegible] listening fancy: the whole came and [illegible] in plastic, polished progress.

Nor is Mendelssohn merely [illegible] counterpoint and spinning figures [illegible] first movement. There is a fine [illegible] his first motiv; before he has done the working, he has struck fire, the [illegible] for the incisive violins of yesterday gentler theme renews this warmth. Never in the whole course of the movement does Mendelssohn merely fill staves becomingly. Youth and zest spur him; a fine instinct, an eager hand write. Again a revival worth the making, and an end to doubt of the precision, pliancy, sensibility, range in tonal warmth and tonal color of the renewed string choir. It can glint and it can glow. Nor has Mr. Monteux himself in this elder music often been so sensitive to inflection and undulation. The limpid Mendelssohn has his Gallic kinships.

As good fortune would have it between Mendelssohn and Stravinsky stood Respighi and his music of the Roman fountains, happily repeated within a fortnight in lieu of the banalities of Franck's "symphonic piece" about a redeemed Hardingesque world. Between a classic octet and ultra-modern "burlesque scenes," this modern tone-poem with nearly all the virtues of the golden mean. Respighi pleases the scholars, the connoisseurs, by well proportioned, contrasted and flowing design, apt workmanship, play of meditative mood and pictorial fancy, the richness, the lustrousness, the sensuous quality that should dwell in a music of the South. By these latter virtues, by clear tone-picturing, melodic warmth, grace or sonority of utterance —and all not too unfamiliar—he pleasures the general ear. There is charm in this music of Roman waters and gardens and vigor also when it becomes sea-piece and pageant. Safely walk composers in the middle way and, with Respighi's quality, successfully as well.

H. T. PARKER

NS. NOV. 27.

A RUSSIAN BALLET BY SYMPHONY

Strawinsky "Petrouchka" Creates Very Deep Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ultra-modern music, prefaced by one of the earliest compositions of Felix Mendelssohn, made the programme interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The Mendelssohn composition was the Octet for String's op. 20. It was completed in the composer's 16th year. It served to display the splendid tone of the string choir of the orchestra, and possibly, also, Mr. Monteux played it to take the curse off the peppery discords of the music of Strawinsky's music to the ballet "Petrouchka" which came at the end of the programme.

Between these two compositions stood the supreme offering of the afternoon, the symphonic poem, "Fountains of Rome," by the young modern Italian, Respighi, wisely repeated after its success when performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concerts of two weeks preceding.

NOT HEARD SINCE 1885

Mendelssohn's music has not been heard at these concerts since 1885. It is in four very long and platitudinous movements, of which the scherzo is undoubtedly the best. The orchestra was called to its feet after this performance. The applause must have been for the brilliant playing. It is hard to conceive of any who in this day and age would be stirred by the babbling commonplace of this work.

Strawinsky's music was heard for the first time at these concerts, and the performance was masterly from every standpoint. This is music intended first of all, of course, to go with a stage spectacle.

Extraordinary Originality

Having seen the ballet, which was given a number of times by the Ballet Russe in this city, the music again made a deep impression on the writer, because of its vitality, its dramatic, characterizing power, its rough popular humor, the scraps of Russian folk music so vigorously employed, and the extraordinary originality of both harmony and instrumentation.

How much this music meant to many unacquainted with the stage spectacle, it is not so easy to say. They probably often wondered what it was all about, while other hearers, who had also been beholders, saw before them the riotous throng at the fair in the admiralty market place, the dances of peasants, players, traders and the like; the two organ grinders; the old magician at whose bidding Petrouchka—symbolising, it is said, the Russian people—dances and mimes; the pains and smarts of Petrouchka, beaten, writhing and groaning, while wind instruments sound discordant; Petrouchka's struggles against the vile Moor, and all his evil; and the fair again, the merriment growing wilder, and finally, in the pale light of the dawn, the ghost of the murdered Petrouchka, frantically waving its arms over the top of the magician's booth.

Score a Marvel of Genius

The score is a marvel of genius, genius which creates with the certainty and the recklessness and prodigality of inspiration which can do anything with the tonal materials employed. The work hangs together even in the concert-room, without explanatory evolutions and gestures on the stage. The conclusion, the eerie, ghastly music of Petrouchka's end, puts the hearer under a spell, even when he is far from the theatre. Above all, there is felt continually the background of life, the commotion, the bustle, the clattering tongues of the crowd, the wildness and extravagance of drunken dances, of legendary songs shouted out by revellers.

All this is in Strawinski's music. It was felt, if not wholly apprehended, by many unfamiliar with the scenes of the ballet. Yet it must be admitted that this music loses greatly when transplanted from the theatre to the concert hall.

Respighi's Masterpiece

The imperishable memory of the concert remains that of the masterpiece of Respighi. Here is a beauty unutterably pure, Italian, patrician, a beauty which is the product of centuries of culture and art, and a land where beauty itself finds its valued home.

The work is as original nad racial as it is unforced and unerring in the achievement of impressionistic effects by Respighi's wondrous orchestra.

POST. NOV 27

NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

An intervening week of traveling by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be followed by a week of young people's concerts, makes the next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall fall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18. At these concerts Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will appear for the first time as soloist with the orchestra, playing Brahms' violin concerto in D major. The remainder of the program comprises Weber's overture to "Preciosa," a Gaelic symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, entitled "An Siuagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), and Balakireff's "Islamey," for piano, orchestrated by Casella.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Instead of a regular pair of concerts, the week of Dec. 5 will be devoted to young people's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pursuing, in general, the experiment so successfully instituted last season. The aim is to acquaint the younger generation with representative symphonic music as played by the full symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux, its regular conductor. Concerts will be given on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 7, and Thursday afternoon, Dec. 9. All seats will be allotted to Boston schools and settlements. Since the demand for seats cannot be met by these two concerts, a third will be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 10, for which tickets are sold at the Symphony Hall box office. Each concert will take place at 4 o'clock, and the tickets will be hold at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents. The rule will hold that no adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

Mr. Monteux has compiled a program that will represent the best music in the orchestral repertory and yet be of direct appeal. He has further planned the program to reveal in turn the different instruments in the orchestra by the incidental solos which occur in the scores.

Overture to the opera "The Italian in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B Minor .... Bach
a. Bourree.
b. Polonaise.
c. Badinerie.
Movements from the Symphony "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Largo (with English horn solo).
Scherzo.
Second Movement from the Symphonic suite, "Scheharazare" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night")
Rimsky-Korsakoff
'The story of the Kalander-Prince.
Farandole from the suit, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 .... Bizet

---

HERALD - NOV. 28

hree Symphony Concerts for Children

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from its second Southern trip, it will devote the lowing week to concerts for the unger generation. For the two ncerts, on Tuesday afternoon, Dember 7, and Thursday afternoon, ecember 9, all seats will be apporoned through the public schools and ttlements. In order to meet the rge demands a third concert will given on Friday afternoon, Dember 10, for which the seats are w one sale. The same program ll be given at each of these three ncerts, which will begin at four lock. The nominal prices for ats will be 25, 35 and 50 cents. No ult will be admitted unless accomied by a child. The program folws:

rture to the Opera "The Italians in Algiers" .... Rossini ces from the Suite in B minor .... Bach ements from the Symphony, "From the New World" .... Dvorak
d Movement from "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff ndole from Suite, "L'Arlesianne," No. 2 .... Bizet

ADVERTISER
NOV. 28

Young People's Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra will give three young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, and the full membership playing as at the regular concerts, at 4 on Dec 7, Dec 9 and Dec 10. Tickets for Dec 7 and 9, as previously announced, will be on sale only through schools and settlement houses at nominal prices, 25, 35 and 50 cents. Tickets for the concert Dec 10 will be on public sale at Symphony Hall at the same prices, but with the proviso that admission will be refused to adults unaccompanied by children.

This extra concert is given to satisfy those disappointed in the allotment for the other two. The program for all three concerts is the same. It is designed to show off the instruments of the orchestra in incidental solos, as well as to familiarize young people with specimens of standard symphonic music.

The complete list of numbers follows: Rossini, overture to the opera "The Italian in Algiers"; Bach, three dances from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, two movements from the symphony "From the New World"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, second movement from "Scheherazade"; Bizet, farandole from the suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 2.

GLOBE NOV. 28.

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

NOW NEW ITALIANS; SOON NEW BRITONS

At Last Symphony Concerts in America Emerge from the Franco-German Rut—Mr. Maier, Mr. Pattison and Various Music for Two Pianos—Mme. Tetrazzini, 1920—Harvard Opens Mr. Whiting's "Expositions" to the Public — Forthcoming Programmes—Mr. Toscanini's Plans

RESPIGHI'S tone-poem, "Fountains of Rome," was applauded no less heartily after a fourth hearing—and within a fortnight—at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening than it was after the first. Possibly report of its reappearance there helped to carry the audience above the usual numbers. In Chicago another piece by another of the "new Italians" has been as fortunate, and for like qualities—Sabata's tone-poem, "Youth," to be heard also from Mr. Monteux before the season is ended. Not long ago, Mr. Stock and his orchestra played it for the first times in America; two audiences rose to it; and it will be repeated almost as soon as was Respighi's piece in Boston. By all accounts it is a similar music—modern, but not ultra-modern in idiom, warm, rich, flowing, quick with feeling, lucid and illusory in expression. In Boston a year and a half ago, in New York more recently, Malipiero's pieces, baffling as they are in speech and impression, quickened no small curiosity, stirred not a little stimulating debate. There are other "new Italians," still unheard in America—Tommasini, for example, Pizzetti of the remarkable sonata for violin, Lualdi, Pick-Mangiagalli, one of whose ballets the Metropolitan will venture next Thursday. Mr. Toscanini will soon bring more specimens of their music to America. Others may be expected from such open-minded conductors as Mr. Monteux, Mr. Stock and Mr. Stokowski or from valiant discoverers like Mr. Longy or Mrs. Coolidge.

Promising are these prospects. Yet still the wonder lingers that these "new Italians" went so long unknown in America. Through some years before the late war, their music was played and applauded in Italy. Its interest, its merit must have stood clear. Yet scarcely a word of report came overseas, even crossed the Alps into Paris, Munich and Vienna, or the Channel into London. Enough, seemingly, for Italy and for the rest of the world that Puccini was still writing operas and Zandonai making his way on the "lyric stage." Only the ferment of war could awaken the Italians to the fact that a new generation was developing a symphonic music of its own; that it deserved hearing abroad no less than the newer music of France or Germany; that it was high time to spread knowledge of it. Once roused, the Italians acted energetically, shrewdly, and the outcome is written large on programmes from Sir Henry Wood's and Mr. Weingartner's in Europe to Mr. Monteux's and Mr. Stock's in America. In similar case, and for as long, have stood the younger Britons. Few of their fellow countrymen perceived that Bax, Vaughan-Williams and Holst, for convenient examples, were writing a notable and highly individual music and that report of it ought to spread abroad. Indeed, Mr. Monteux, Mr. Stock and Mr. Stokowski had, almost, to go in pursuit of it. Yet now the inning of the young Britons promises to equal and, may be, excel the inning of the young Italians. The war, like all such scourges, did no little harm to the art of music, but, at least here in America, it lifted symphony concerts from both the French and the German rut. The one was as narrowing as the other.

H. T. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV30
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux leading, gave its second concert at the Academy last night. First on the program was Mendelssohn's Octet for strings, a pure, clear formulation of the classical tradition and spirit heartily played and heartily enjoyed. The Scherzo is distinctly in the mood and manner of the fairy revel of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" score, and the light-fingered execution was a reminder of the feats of the old days whose established prestige the orchestra is now striving to recapture.

Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, was the soloist. He played the Lalo concerto and played it well. The tone was always robust and plentiful, and as he warmed to his work it improved in refinement and smoothness. The support of the orchestra was not in all places so congenially sustaining as it might have been. This music is a very severe test of the artist who essays it, for the composer uses the cello violin-wise. Mr. Bedetti showed that he has the right to be counted among the small number of the most distinguished exponents of his instrument.

Finally came the dissonances and vagaries of Stravinsky's Orchestra Suite from the "Petrouchka" Ballet. It would have helped the hearing could the dancers have appeared. Without them some passages appeared mere stridency and freakish blaring and braying. But the audience was amused as much as mystified, even though the second movement ended so abruptly that the applause was not ready for it. There is a very realistic picture of carnival in the opening sounds, and the interpolation of the hurdy-gurdy sounds is quaintly charming. A piano is used merely as an associate instrument and rarely given an assertive voice. It is very difficult to keep the instruments in time and place amid the charivari of the crying piccolo, stopped brasses and grunting bassoon or booming trombone, and once Mr. Monteux forgot his usual urbanity and stamped loudly on his dais. The piano part was played cleverly by Raymond Havens.

From
TIMES NOV30
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Fortieth Anniversary of Orchestra—To Play Here January 10.

The primary event of the musical season in Hartford will be the concert to be given at Parsons's theater on January 10 by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This institution, so long eminent in the musical world, is now in the full tide of the season which commemorates its fortieth anniversary. Never have the concerts been more popular than this year and in no former season has so large a number been undertaken. The brilliant opening of the season in Boston was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks) was as highly praised as the quality of the performances.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this success. Returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer, he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections of the orchestra is Richard Burgin, the new concert master, who arrived from the eastern part of Europe, where he is considered by long count the best concertmaster, to participate at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

At the coming Hartford concert, Piastro, the miraculous Russian violinist, will play as soloist with the great orchestra. This genius of his instrument came to America for the first time this season and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia.

The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipt of checks, and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

Mrs. Wilson Is Hostess At Symphony Concert In Washington Theatre

Mrs. Bainbridge Colby To Hold Her First "At Home" Of The Season Today.

[From The Sun Bureau.]

Washington, Nov. 30.—Mrs. Woodrow Wilson attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the National Theatre this afternoon and had as guests Mme. Mathieu, wife of the Ambassador of Chile; Mrs. Albert Sidney Burleson, Mrs. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Mrs. Rufus Day and Miss Blanche Bates, who is playing in Washington this week and who in private life is Mrs. George Creel.

BALTIMORE SUN. DEC. 1.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Hall—For Young People

ACCORDING to the schedule made las summer for the Symphony Orchestra through the current season, it should spend next week in a journey to cities of the Middle West. When, however, the wages of the "railroad men" were raised last summer, and corresponding exactio laid upon travellers, the trip became u profitable. Accordingly it was abandone and the orchestra will tarry next week home. Since the original schedule cou not be altered, there will be no regula Symphony Concerts. Instead the band w ndertake three of the concerts for youn eople that succeeded so well last winter e of these concerts—on Friday after n at four o'clock—will be open to the ic at prices no higher than fifty cents. it, and for the other two on Tuesday hursday afternoons, for which tickets been privately distributed, Mr. Mon- prprogramme stands:

re to the Opera, "L'Italiana in Algeri" .... Rossini e, Polonaise and Badinerie from the ite in B minor .... Bach and Scherzo from "The New World," mphony .... Dvořák ory of the Kalendar-Prince, from the ite, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakov dole from the Incidental Music to L'Arlésienne" .... Bizet

Friday afternoon, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Burgin to pla the solo-part in Brahms's concerto f violin. The other items of the programm are Weber's resuscitated overture to h forgotten opera, "Preciosa"; a new ton poem, "In the Fairy Hills" by the Britis composer, Arnold Bax; and Casella's or chestral version of Balakirev's orienta antasia, "Isiamey," originally a piano piece.

TRANS. Dec. 4

From TIMES, DEC 1 -
Washington, D. C.

MONTEUX RESTORES MOZART'S FINESSE

Boston Symphony Conductor Gives Eighteenth Century Score in Proper Setting.

Yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, in the second concert of the local season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under leadership of Pierre Monteux, evoked for a memorable half hour the unclouded brightness and serenity of an eighteenth century symphony. It was Mozart's in C major, written in 1783 during his late twenties. According to the practice of the time it was scored for two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettle drum and strings. By precedent, M. Monteux should have employed nearly his full string choir and doubled the other parts to cope with this body of tone. Instead, he kept the paired wind instruments of Mozart's design and reduced violins, violas, violoncellos, and double basses until the whole orchestra approximated in numbers and balance an orchestra of the composer's day.

Throughout, as a result, the music pleased the more, for the orchestra gained a lightness of tone that sixty strings and a doubled wind choir could not wholly achieve. Mozart's fine and vibrant line was neither thickened nor stiffened; the transparent, pliant, orchestra voice spun playful or musing figures of unforgettable charm; his modulations were like little light glints upon the surface of the music; there was a sheen upon the harmonic and instrumental texture of the whole.

The other numbers for the orchestra were Lekeu's "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou" and Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3. Lekeu's composition displays a surprising modernity of orchestra for a work of nearly thirty years ago, and one feels after hearing it that in the death of this young Belgian music lost a figure of promise.

Frances Alda was the soloist. She sang Marguerite's prison song, "L'Altra Notte," from Arrigo Boito's "Mephistopheles," and the well-beloved air from Puccini's "Tosca," "Vissi d'Arte." Alda played Marguerite in the recent revival of "Mephistophele" at the Metropolitan Opera House, and to this circumstance, no doubt, we owe her selection of this song as one of her numbers. She gave it with a sincerely sympathetic understanding of the tragic and pathetic figure of Marguerite. But her triumph came in Florio Tosca's prayer, "Love and Art," for on this occasion Washingtonians were privileged to hear this incomparable song in its proper orchestral setting

[56]

t not overlook t
of the hurdy-gurdie ttled to call the folk to booth and forthwith the spun through their folk-briefly music to the scene is box—his twitching tortures, lawings, the wistful little dance wherewith to win the Balympathy and love—this and the irony of it all. Then, with the ne in the Blackamoor's box ack to the fair as darkness dew falls, the crowd thickens, and become more boisterous. There the bear, and a tinkle at least runken merchant's concertina.

nurses', the coachmen's theances and the wild orchestral il three. Here, obviously, was , plunging close. Mr. Monteux ch artistic scruple, is too loyal sky to halt there. On he goes ous measures of "little Peter's" love's sake, and a page further nic grimace with which, as is ng both human and puppet-kind, dles end.

music heard thus self-contained ed of every distraction of the music of power, beauty, im-sion, irony, fantasy as the com-the instant wills—a music of t individuality and economy of ower welds the three dances of y night until the air leaps and h them, and a breathless or-outs, gasps and shouts again.
The Rite of Spring" does Stravin-rhythm pound harder or colors sharply. Beauty touches the e of Petrushka's wistful imagin-teousness of his cruel end. He ot less, plausible and poignant wired arms and legs twitch, his ers fumble, his sawdust aches ic rather than in Mr. Nijinsky's ssine's miming. In tones rather e flesh his final grimace is the c, fantastic, haunting. There is nor in the contending hurdy-ard and not seen. A man awkbear-skin lends no aid to the p-clump of the music. The ratsnare-drum is enough to open an's booth. So forth and so By every token of yesterday the "Petrushka" is self-contained, nt. Not an illusion, an im-quality, that it yields in the sappears or deteriorates in the il. Instead all are quickened.
rnuais again in the mere facture!
urn the means are as economical ect is sure and complete. A vokes an emotion; a sequence an illusion. From a motiv of four notes upsprings a whole our day there is no such master ver of rhythm as is Stravinsky;
o excel him in the bite and flare mary harmonic and instrumental sharp edge, the pungent phrase miliars. He seems to hear the as so many individual voices
h he may work his will severally, ditional choirs or in coördinated hile none but him—and the com-are endless—has ever fathomed ellous manipulation of them.
im it may be half divination.
e performance? Enough that ld have been no such impressuch illusion, had not Mr. Mon-familiar field and the orchestra miliar, outdone themselves sepa-l collectively after days and unsparing work. Again the band with rhythm, glow with color, amut from finesse to force. In Havens, as he should, cut sharp ck hard with the piano-part day of Liszt's "Faust," the Symncerts have not known so gloriour as this afternoon of "Peendelssohn gave pleasure—the nn of the octet for strings, A. D. e, in 1920 this Mendelssohn of Concerts in thirty-five years, s distributed as though it were two string-orchestras. In the e in 1920 this Mendelssohn of the preferable to the Mendelssohn of nonies and most of the overtures;

d all Mendelssohn except him of c to "A Midsummer Night's In the second place, Mr. Mon most of the string choir were their mettle with the octet than e soon to be with "Petrushka." in relatively few spots has the rn bare, thin, antiquated. The ement suffers most such impair-sterday it seemed pale, slender, tal, prettyfied, like to a "Song Words," beside the warm vigor est fancy of the other divisions the songful violoncellos at the
, the full-voiced middle measures ul coloring of the violas could re
t.
other hand, the flash and flicker and ripple of the scherzo def
s. Not even in the fairy-music t are's comedy has Mendelssoh re light and sure of finger, fle nd of fancy. Hand in hand tr n and delicacy. In the music ummer Night's Dream" a wi s at the composer's comman the octet, and not in the scher can ingeniously suggest, and wi ings, the contrasting colorings truments. (After all the imagin suggestive manipulation of hi and timbres did begin somewh ur blessed musical time). As t yesterday played this scher leetly, as fine-spun, iridescent w emed ready even for Berlio
d sylphs. Neither the finale cked rhythmic animation;
the beginning, the little ru part upon another, pleased fancy; the whole came and w ic polished progress.
is Mendelssohn merely wea oint and spinning figures in ement. There is a fine ed motiv; before he has done nk he has struck fire, the violins of yesterday

gentler theme renews this warmth. Never in the whole course of the movement does Mendelssohn merely fill staves becomingly. Youth and zest spur him; a fine instinct, an eager hand write. Again a revival worth the making, and an end to doubt of the precision, pliancy, sensibility, range in tonal warmth and tonal color of the renewed string choir. It can glint and it can glow. Nor has Mr. Monteux himself in this elder music often been so sensitive to inflection and undulation. The limpid Mendelssohn has his Gallic kinships.

As good fortune would have it between Mendelssohn and Stravinsky stood Respighi and his music of the Roman fountains, happily repeated within a fortnight in lieu of the banalities of Franck's "symphonic piece" about a redeemed Hardingesque world. Between a classic octet and ultra-modern "burlesque scenes," this modern tone-poem with nearly all the virtues of the golden mean. Respighi pleases the scholars, the connoisseurs, by well proportioned, contrasted and flowing design, apt workmanship, play of meditative mood and pictorial fancy, the richness, the lustrousness, the sensuous quality that should dwell in a music of the South. By these latter virtues, by clear tone-picturing, melodic warmth, grace or sonority of utterance—and all not too unfamiliar—he pleasures the general ear. There is charm in this music of Roman waters and gardens and vigor also when it becomes sea-piece and pageant. Safely walk composers in the middle way and, with Respighi's quality, successfully as well.

H. T. PARKER

A RUSSIAN BALLET BY SYMPHONY

Strawinsky "Petrouchka" Creates Very Deep Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ultra-modern music, prefaced by one of the earliest compositions of Felix Mendelssohn, made the programme interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The Mendelssohn composition was the Octet for String's op. 20. It was completed in the composer's 16th year. It served to display the splendid tone of the string choir of the orchestra, and possibly, also, Mr. Monteux played it to take the curse off the peppery discords of the music of Strawinsky's music to the ballet "Petrouchka" which came at the end of the programme.

Between these two compositions stood the supreme offering of the afternoon, the symphonic poem, "Fountains of Rome," by the young modern Italian, Respighi, wisely repeated after its success when performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concerts of two weeks preceding.

NOT HEARD SINCE 1885

Mendelssohn's music has not been heard at these concerts since 1885. It is in four very long and platitudinous movements, of which the scherzo is undoubtedly the best. The orchestra was called to its feet after this performance. The applause must have been for the brilliant playing. It is hard to conceive of any who in this day and age would be stirred by the babbling commonplace of this work.

Strawinsky's music was heard for the first time at these concerts, and the performance was masterly from every standpoint. This is music intended first of all, of course, to go with a stage spectacle.

Extraordinary Originality

Having seen the ballet, which was given a number of times by the Ballet Russe in this city, the music again made a deep impression on the writer, because of its vitality, its dramatic, characterizing power, its rough popular humor, the scraps of Russian folk music so vigorously employed, and the extraordinary originality of both harmony and instrumentation.

How much this music meant to many unacquainted with the stage spectacle, it is not so easy to say. They probably often wondered what it was all about, while other hearers, who had also been beholders, saw before them the riotous throng at the fair in the admiralty market place, the dances of peasants, players, traders and the like; the two organ grinders; the old magician at whose bidding Petrouchka—symbolizing, it is said, the Russian people—dances and mimes; the pains and smarts of Petrouchka, beaten, writhing and groaning, while wind instruments sound discordant; Petrouchka's struggles against the vile Moor, and all his evil; and the fair again, the merriment growing wilder, and finally, in the pale light of the dawn, the ghost of the murdered Petrouchka, frantically waving its arms over the top of the magician's booth.

Score a Marvel of Genius

The score is a marvel of genius, genius which creates with the certainty and the recklessness and prodigality of inspiration which can do anything with the tonal materials employed. The work hangs together even in the concert-room, without explanatory evolutions and gestures on the stage. The conclusion, the eerie, ghastly music of Petrouchka's end, puts the hearer under a spell, even when he is far from the theatre. Above all, there is felt continually the background of life, the commotion, the bustle, the clattering tongues of the crowd, the wildness and extravagance of drunken dances, of legendary songs shouted out by revellers.

All this is in Strawinski's music. It was felt, if not wholly apprehended, by many unfamiliar with the scenes of the ballet. Yet it must be admitted that this music loses greatly when transplanted from the theatre to the concert hall.

Respighi's Masterpiece

The imperishable memory of the concert remains that of the masterpiece of Respighi. Here is a beauty unutterably pure, Italian, patrician, a beauty which is the product of centuries of culture and art, and a land where beauty itself finds its valued home.

The work is as original nad racial as it is unforced and unerring in the achievement of impressionistic effects by Respighi's wondrous orchestra.

POST. NOV. 27

NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

An intervening week of traveling by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be followed by a week of young people's concerts, makes the next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall fall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18. At these concerts Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will appear for the first time as soloist with the orchestra, playing Brahms' violin concerto in D major. The remainder of the program comprises Weber's overture to "Preciosa," a Gaelic symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, entitled "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), and Balakireff's "Islamey," for piano, orchestrated by Casella.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Instead of a regular pair of concerts, the week of Dec. 5 will be devoted to young people's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pursuing, in general, the experiment so successfully instituted last season. The aim is to acquaint the younger generation with representative symphonic music as played by the full symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux, its regular conductor. Concerts will be given on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 7, and Thursday afternoon, Dec. 9. All seats will be allotted to Boston schools and settlements. Since the demand for seats cannot be met by these two concerts, a third will be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 10, for which tickets are sold at the Symphony Hall box office. Each concert will take place at 4 o'clock, and the tickets will be hold at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents. The rule will hold that no adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

Mr. Monteux has compiled a program that will represent the best music in the orchestral repertory and yet be of direct appeal. He has further planned the program to reveal in turn the different instruments in the orchestra by the incidental solos which occur in the scores.

Overture to the opera "The Italian in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B Minor .... Bach
a. Bourree.
b. Polonaise.
c. Badinerie.
Movements from the Symphony "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Largo (with English horn solo).
Scherzo.
Second Movement from the Symphonic suite, "Scheharazare" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night")
Rimsky-Korsakoff
The story of the Kalander-Prince.
Farandole from the suit, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 .... Bizet

---

HERALD - NOV. 28

Three Symphony Concerts for Children

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from its second Southern trip, it will devote the following week to concerts for the younger generation. For the two concerts, on Tuesday afternoon, December 7, and Thursday afternoon, December 9, all seats will be apportioned through the public schools and settlements. In order to meet the large demands a third concert will be given on Friday afternoon, December 10, for which the seats are now one sale. The same program will be given at each of these three concerts, which will begin at four o'clock. The nominal prices for seats will be 25, 35 and 50 cents. No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by a child. The program follows:

Overture to the Opera "The Italians in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B minor .... Bach
Movements from the Symphony, "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Second Movement from "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff Farandole from Suite, "L'Arlesianne," No. 2 .... Bizet

ADVERTISER
NOV. 28.

Young People's Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra will give three young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, and the full membership playing as at the regular concerts, at 4 on Dec 7, Dec 9 and Dec 10. Tickets for Dec 7 and 9, as previously announced, will be on sale only through schools and settlement houses at nominal prices, 25, 35 and 50 cents. Tickets for the concert Dec 10 will be on public sale at Symphony Hall at the same prices, but with the proviso that admission will be refused to adults unaccompanied by children.

This extra concert is given to satisfy those disappointed in the allotment for the other two. The program for all three concerts is the same. It is designed to show off the instruments of the orchestra in incidental solos, as well as to familiarize young people with specimens of standard symphonic music. The complete list of numbers follows: Rossini, overture to the opera "The Italian in Algiers"; Bach, three dances from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, two movements from the symphony "From the New World"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, second movement from "Scheherazade"; Bizet, farandole from the suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 2.

GLOBE NOV. 28.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

NOW NEW ITALIANS; SOON NEW BRITONS

At Last Symphony Concerts in America Emerge from the Franco-German Rut—Mr. Maier, Mr. Pattison and Various Music for Two Pianos—Mme. Tetrazzini, 1920—Harvard Opens Mr. Whiting's "Expositions" to the Public — Forthcoming Programmes—Mr. Toscanini's Plans

RESPIGHI'S tone-poem, "Fountains of Rome," was applauded no less heartily after a fourth hearing—and within a fortnight—at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening than it was after the first. Possibly report of its reappearance there helped to carry the audience above the usual numbers. In Chicago another piece by another of the "new Italians" has been as fortunate, and for like qualities—Sabata's tone-poem, "Youth," to be heard also from Mr. Monteux before the season is ended. Not long ago, Mr. Stock and his orchestra played it for the first times in America; two audiences rose to it; and it will be repeated almost as soon as was Respighi's piece in Boston. By all accounts it is a similar music—modern, but not ultra-modern in idiom, warm, rich, flowing, quick with feeling, lucid and illusory in expression. In Boston a year and a half ago, in New York more recently, Malipiero's pieces, baffling as they are in speech and impression, quickened no small curiosity, stirred not a little stimulating debate. There are other "new Italians," still unheard in America—Tommasini, for example, Pizzetti of the remarkable sonata for violin, Lualdi, Pick-Mangiagalli, one of whose ballets the Metropolitan will venture next Thursday. Mr. Toscanini will soon bring more specimens of their music to America. Others may be expected from such open-minded conductors as Mr. Monteux, Mr. Stock and Mr. Stokowski or from valiant discoverers like Mr. Longy or Mrs. Coolidge.

Promising are these prospects. Yet still the wonder lingers that these "new Italians" went so long unknown in America. Through some years before the late war, their music was played and applauded in Italy. Its interest, its merit must have stood clear. Yet scarcely a word of report came overseas, even crossed the Alps into Paris, Munich and Vienna, or the Channel into London. Enough, seemingly, for Italy and for the rest of the world that Puccini was still writing operas and Zandonai making his way on the "lyric stage." Only the ferment of war could awaken the Italians to the fact that a new generation was developing a symphonic music of its own; that it deserved hearing abroad no less than the newer music of France or Germany; that it was high time to spread knowledge of it. Once roused, the Italians acted energetically, shrewdly, and the outcome is written large on programmes from Sir Henry Wood's and Mr. Weingartner's in Europe to Mr. Monteux's and Mr. Stock's in America. In similar case, and for as long, have stood the younger Britons. Few of their fellow countrymen perceived that Bax, Vaughan-Williams and Holst, for convenient examples, were writing a notable and highly individual music and that report of it ought to spread abroad. Indeed, Mr. Monteux, Mr. Stock and Mr. Stokowski had, almost, to go in pursuit of it. Yet now the inning of the young Britons promises to equal and, may be, excel the inning of the young Italians. The war, like all such scourges, did no little harm to the art of music, but, at least here in America, it lifted symphony concerts from both the French and the German rut. The one was as narrowing as the other.

H. T. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 30
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux leading, gave its second concert at the Academy last night. First on the program was Mendelssohn's Octet for strings, a pure, clear formulation of the classical tradition and spirit heartily played and heartily enjoyed. The Scherzo is distinctly in the mood and manner of the fairy revel of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" score, and the light-fingered execution was a reminder of the feats of the old days whose established prestige the orchestra is now striving to recapture.

Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, was the soloist. He played the Lalo concerto and played it well. The tone was always robust and plentiful, and as he warmed to his work it improved in refinement and smoothness. The support of the orchestra was not in all places so congenially sustaining as it might have been. This music is a very severe test of the artist who essays it, for the composer uses the cello violin-wise. Mr. Bedetti showed that he has the right to be counted among the small number of the most distinguished exponents of his instrument.

Finally came the dissonances and vagaries of Stravinsky's Orchestra Suite from the "Petrouchka" Ballet. It would have helped the hearing could the dancers have appeared. Without them some passages appeared mere stridency and freakish blaring and braying. But the audience was amused as much as mystified, even though the second movement ended so abruptly that the applause was not ready for it. There is a very realistic picture of carnival in the opening sounds, and the interpolation of the hurdy-gurdy sounds is quaintly charming. A piano is used merely as an associate instrument and rarely given an assertive voice. It is very difficult to keep the instruments in time and place amid the charivari of the crying piccolo, stopped brasses and grunting bassoon or booming trombone, and once Mr. Monteux forgot his usual urbanity and stamped loudly on his dais. The piano part was played cleverly by Raymond Havens.

From TIMES NOV 30
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Fortieth Anniversary of Orchestra—To Play Here January 10.

The primary event of the musical season in Hartford will be the concert to be given at Parsons's theater on January 10 by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This institution, so long eminent in the musical world, is now in the full tide of the season which commemorates its fortieth anniversary. Never have the concerts been more popular than this year and in no former season has so large a number been undertaken. The brilliant opening of the season in Boston was followed by highly successful performances in the various cities of its travels. In New York particularly, where the critics elect to consider themselves the arbiters of musical opinion in America, the quality of the personnel (which is in full ranks) was as highly praised as the quality of the performances.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the post of leadership to which he came last season, is largely to be thanked for this success. Returning from a sojourn in Europe last summer, he brought with him not only a number of notable new scores from France, England, Italy, Spain and Russia, but several musicians of fine attainment to fill vacant chairs. The changed personnel, however, is not considerable, and the only newcomer among the leaders of the different sections of the orchestra is Richard Burgin, the new concert master, who arrived from the eastern part of Europe, where he is considered by long count the best concertmaster, to participate at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

At the coming Hartford concert, Piastro, the miraculous Russian violinist, will play as soloist with the great orchestra. This genius of his instrument came to America for the first time this season and his playing has been a cause of wonder to all connoisseurs of the violin. It is an interesting coincidence that Piastro and Concertmaster Burgin were fellow pupils of the famous Leopold Auer in Petrograd, Russia.

The ticket sale will be at Sedgwick & Casey's Inc., and seats will be reserved in order of receipt of checks, and as near to location designated as possible. Prices $1 to $3.

Mrs. Wilson Is Hostess At Symphony Concert In Washington Theatre

Mrs. Bainbridge Colby To Hold Her First "At Home" Of The Season Today.

[From The Sun Bureau.]

Washington, Nov. 30.—Mrs. Woodrow Wilson attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the National Theatre this afternoon and had as guests Mme. Mathieu, wife of the Ambassador of Chile; Mrs. Albert Sidney Burleson, Mrs. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Mrs. Rufus Day and Miss Blanche Bates, who is playing in Washington this week and who in private life is Mrs. George Creel.

BALTIMORE SUN. DEC. 1.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Hall—For Young People

ACCORDING to the schedule made last summer for the Symphony Orchestra through the current season, it should spend next week in a journey to cities of the Middle West. When, however, the wages of the "railroad men" were raised last summer, and corresponding exactions laid upon travellers, the trip became unprofitable. Accordingly it was abandoned and the orchestra will tarry next week at home. Since the original schedule could not be altered, there will be no regular Symphony Concerts. Instead the band will undertake three of the concerts for young people that succeeded so well last winter. One of these concerts—on Friday afternoon at four o'clock—will be open to the public at prices no higher than fifty cents. For it, and for the other two on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, for which tickets have been privately distributed, Mr. Monteux's programme stands:

Overture to the Opera, "L'Italiana in Algeri" .... Rossini Bourrée, Polonaise and Badinerie from the Suite in B minor .... Bach
Largo and Scherzo from "The New World," Symphony .... Dvořák
Story of the Kalendar-Prince, from the Suite, "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakov Farandole from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlésienne" .... Bizet

Friday afternoon, Dec. 17, in Symphony Hall, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Burgin to play the solo-part in Brahms's concerto for violin. The other items of the programme are Weber's resuscitated overture to his forgotten opera, "Preciosa"; a new tone poem, "In the Fairy Hills" by the British composer, Arnold Bax; and Casella's orchestral version of Balakirev's oriental fantasia, "Islamey," originally a piano piece.

TRANS. Dec. 4

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

MONTEUX RESTORES MOZART'S FINESSE

Boston Symphony Conductor Gives Eighteenth Century Score in Proper Setting.

Yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, in the second concert of the local season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under leadership of Pierre Monteux, evoked for a memorable half hour the unclouded brightness and serenity of an eighteenth century symphony. It was Mozart's in C major, written in 1783 during his late twenties. According to the practice of the time it was scored for two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettle drum and strings. By precedent, M. Monteux should have employed nearly his full string choir and doubled the other parts to cope with this body of tone. Instead, he kept the paired wind instruments of Mozart's design and reduced violins, violas, violoncellos, and double basses until the whole orchestra approximated in numbers and balance an orchestra of the composer's day.

Throughout, as a result, the music pleased the more, for the orchestra gained a lightness of tone that sixty strings and a doubled wind choir could not wholly achieve. Mozart's fine and vibrant line was neither thickened nor stiffened; the transparent, pliant, orchestra voice spun playful or musing figures of unforgettable charm; his modulations were like little light glints upon the surface of the music; there was a sheen upon the harmonic and instrumental texture of the whole.

The other numbers for the orchestra were Lekeu's "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou" and Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3. Lekeu's composition displays a surprising modernity of orchestra for a work of nearly thirty years ago, and one feels after hearing it that in the death of this young Belgian music lost a figure of promise.

Frances Alda was the soloist. She sang Marguerite's prison song, "L'Altra Notte," from Arrigo Boito's "Mephistopheles," and the well-beloved air from Puccini's "Tosca," "Vissi d'Arte." Alda played Marguerite in the recent revival of "Mephistophele" at the Metropolitan Opera House, and to this circumstance, no doubt, we owe her selection of this song as one of her numbers. She gave it with a sincerely sympathetic understanding of the tragic and pathetic figure of Marguerite. But her triumph came in Floria Tosca's prayer, "Love and Art," for on this occasion Washingtonians were privileged to hear this incomparable song in its proper orchestral setting, and not with piano accompaniment alone.

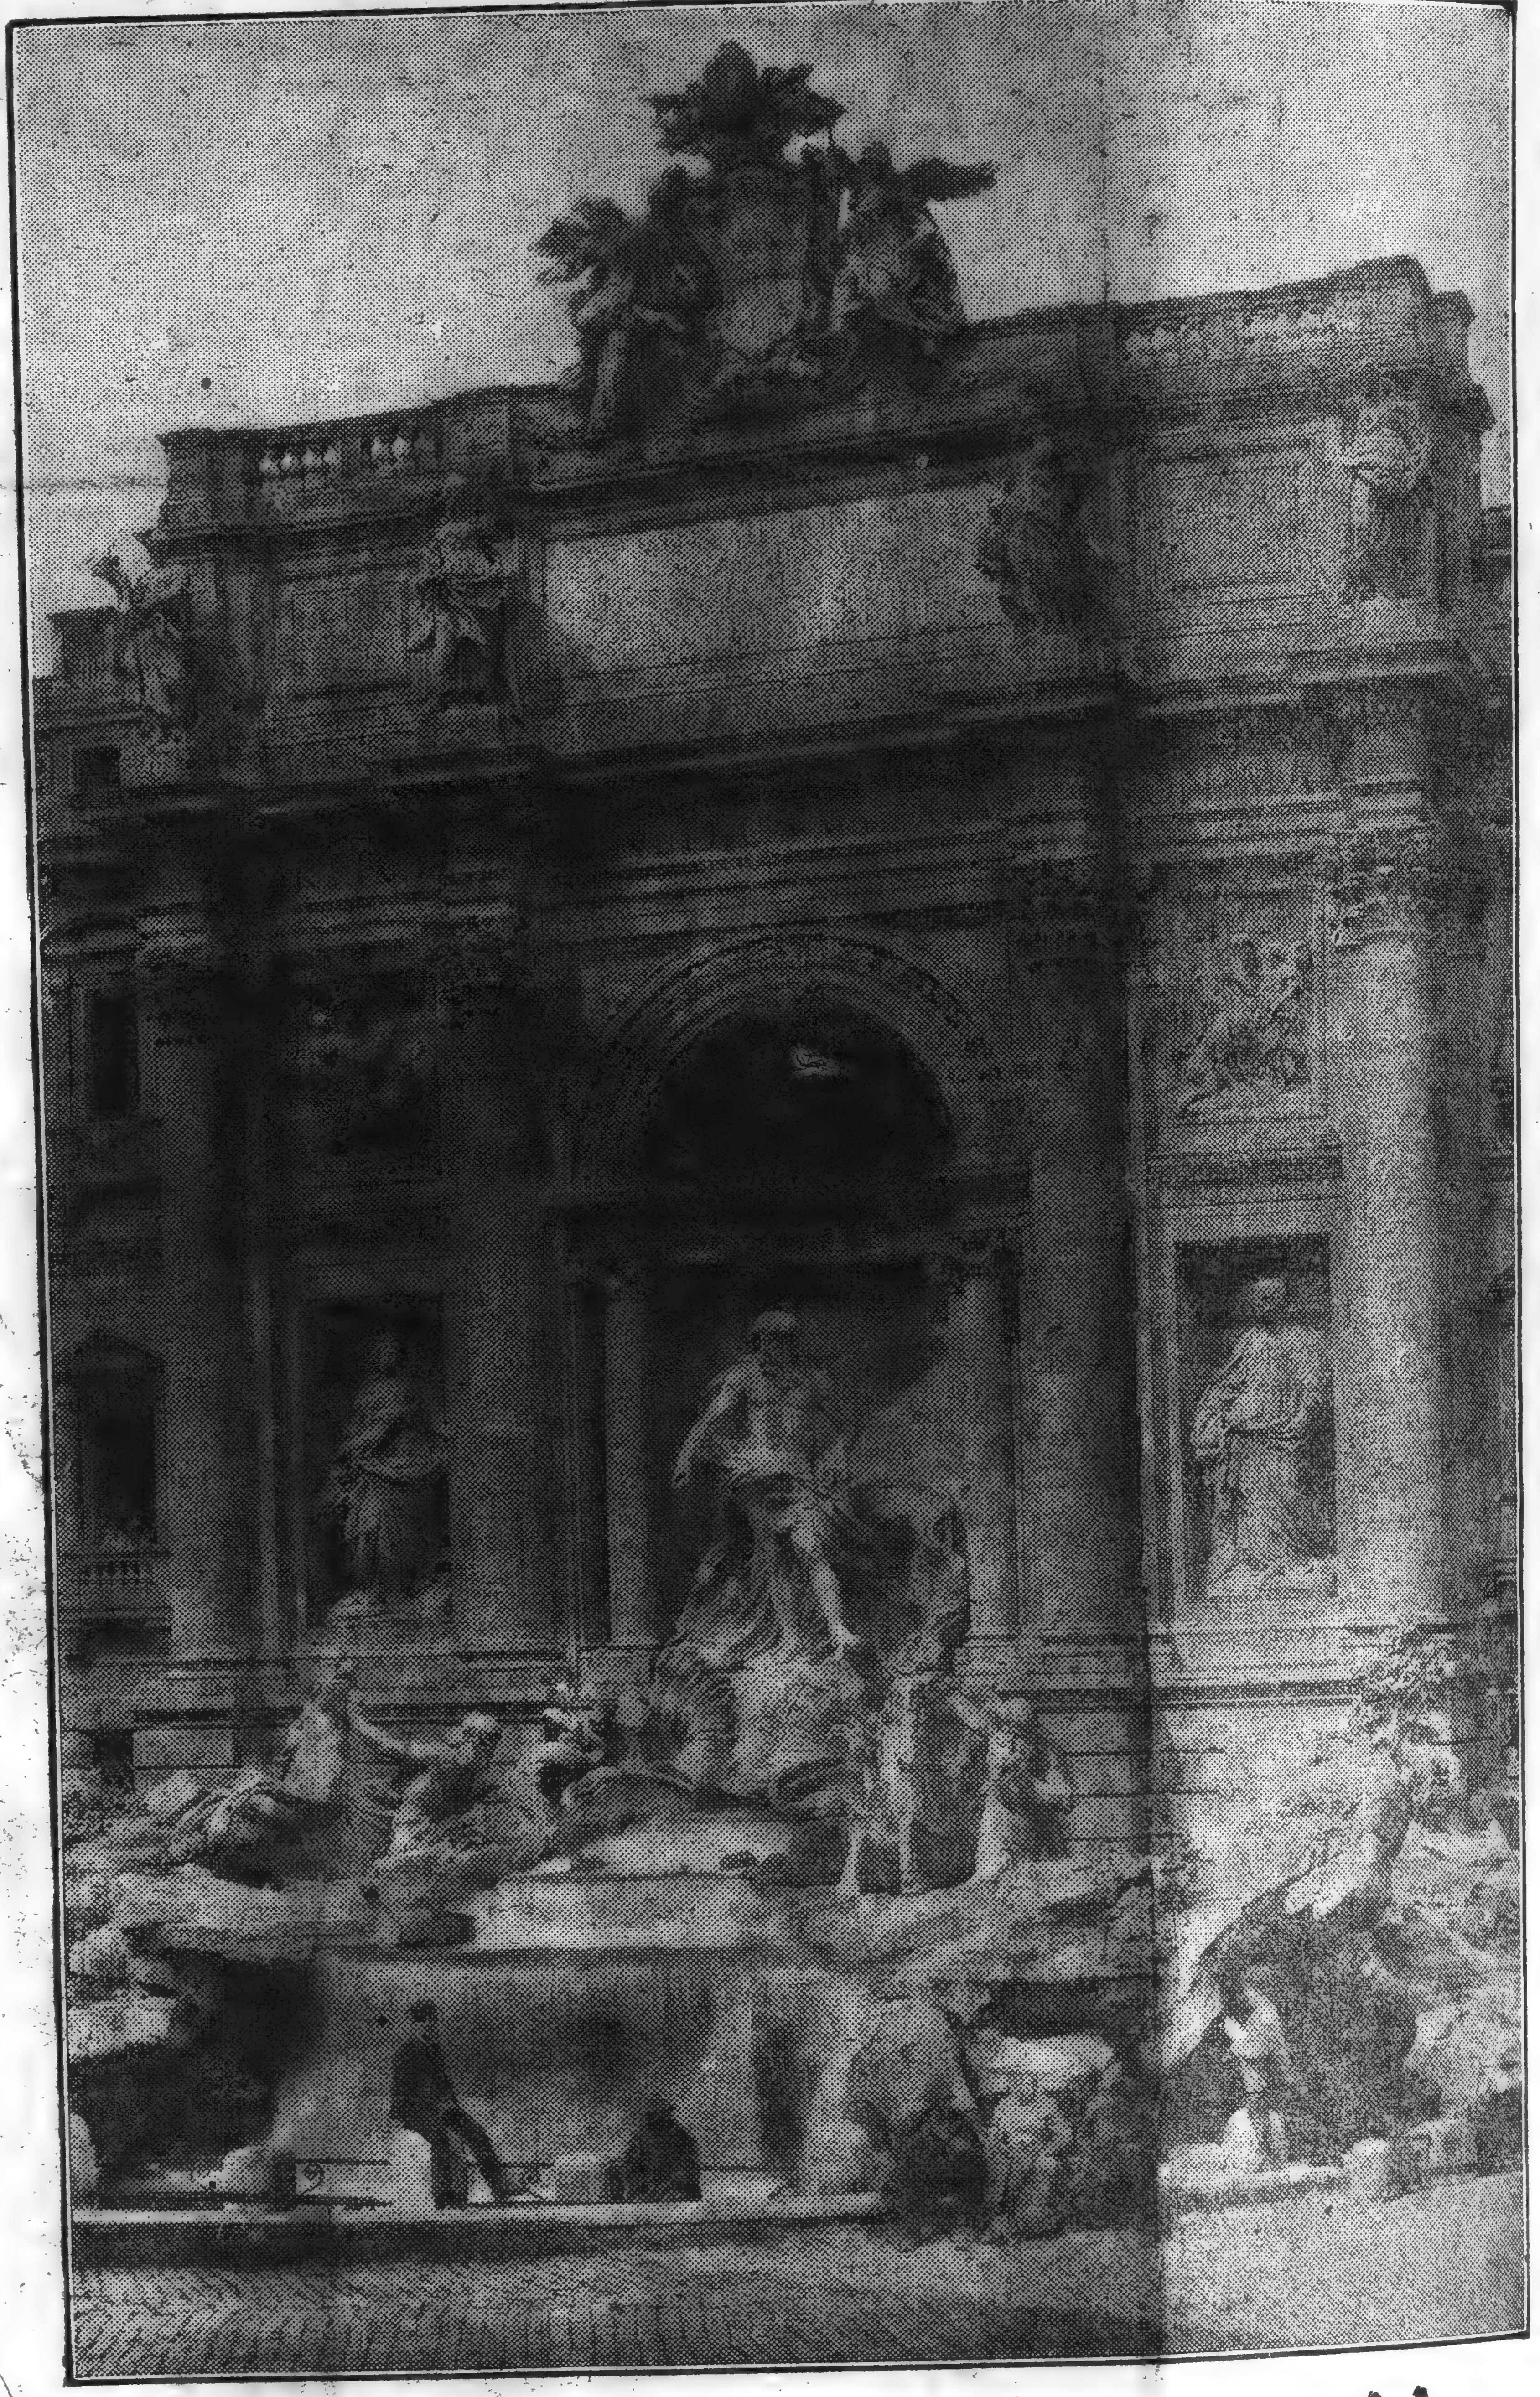
Roman Fountains That Suggested Respighi's Much-Like

Three of the Backgrounds to His Tone-Poem, "Fontane di Roma," Played Four Times Within a Month at the Symphony Concerts

(The Photographs (by Anderson) Lent from the Public Library)

Triton Fountain

For the Dance of the Sea-Folk



Fountain of Trevi

For the Sea-Pageant of Neptune's Train

Fou

TRIBUNE,
New York City
DEC 3

Concert Given As Memorial To Beethoven

Symphony Society Contributes to Musical Exercises Marking 150th Anniversary of Composer's Birth

Boston Orchestra Heard

Programs of Wide Variance Mark Afternoon and Evening Fetes at Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

At two concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday performances were given to four symphonies, two symphonic poems and a suite. The audiences were quite distinct in composition and character, however; though that of the afternoon, which heard three symphonies by Beethoven, may have felt that the program was somewhat ponderous, it was upheld by the feeling that it was participating in an act of commemorative celebration, for the concert was the Symphony Society's contribution to the musical exercises which have been planned in honor of the 150th anniversary of the birth of the master who brought the symphonic form to perfection, and also, as some think, to its final culmination.

Boston Orchestra Heard

The program of the Boston Orchestra, which gave the evening concert, knew nothing of Beethoven, but paid its tribute to Brahms (his spiritual brother), Maurice Ravel, Richard Strauss and Ottorio Respighi, the last a gifted member of the coterie of latter-day Italian musical impressionists.

He was placed in the same dilemma again last night, for Mr. Stokowski chose the Brahms symphony as the war-horse of his second invasion of New York. The temptation to compare the two performances is strong, but must be resisted. It will suffice to say that there was meticulous nicety in the performance of the Philadelphians, virility in that of the Bostonians.

Charm in Ravel's Music

The Ravel suite, a novelty, was a transcription of four pieces from a set of six dedicated by the composers to companions in arms who were killed in the war. The forms were archaic, the spirit of the pieces, by which we mean the melodic, harmonic and instrumental expression, modern. Couperin is an archaic composer, but his ballet suites are delightfully fresh and lovely.

There is much charm in Ravel's music also when not married, as in the Forlane, by strenuous effort to avoid the obvious.

It is a pitiful cry this: "Save me from being as other music is—natural, unqualifiedly ingratiating and lovely!" But the immortelles which hang on Couperin's tomb are of that kind. The hothouse blooms of Ravel will not live so long.

Respighi's symphonic poem "Fontane di Roma" was played at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in February, 1919. A pretty poetical conceit lies at its base—the composer gives musical expression to the sentiments and visions evoked by his contemplation of four famous fountains in the ancient city of Italy "at the hours," he says, "when their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer."

So we have the fountain of Valle Giulia, a pastoral picture, cattle passing and disappearing in the mists of the Roman dawn; the Triton fountain: Naiads and tritons called together by summons from the conch-shell horns, disporting themselves in the jets of water glittering in the morning sun; the Fountain of Trevi, a triumphant procession of Neptune over the water's surface in his chariot drawn by sea-horses, followed by a cohort of sirens and tritons; the Fountain of the Villa Medici, a vision of sunset and evening twilight, passing into night, tolling bells, twittering birds, rustling leaves, sounds steeped in sweet melancholy, vanishing into silence.

The music differentiates itself from that of some of Respighi's fellows heard recently in being something more than color. There is beauty of line and phrase as well.

Old devices are used, of coure. A sustained high tone, which pictures the Star of the East in Liszt's "Christus," silence and twilight in D'Indy's "Day on the Mountain," the bleak stretches of the Russian steppes in Borodin's symphonic poem, here tells us of dawn and fading eve. There is much of those vague tangled sounds and vagrant dissonant chords, covered by a haze of instrumental color, for which Schumann found the word in "Traumeswirren," but there are also thematic invention and poetical thought.

From
World
New York City
DEC 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES ITS USUAL NEW YORK HIT.

Orchestra Renders Brilliant Programme in Way That Delights Carnegie Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last evening for its second Thursday concert of the season. The programme at Carnegie Hall called for a regal display of the band's virtuosity and the various choirs were equal to the encounter. Conductor Monteux successfully threaded his way through the Brahms Fourth Symphony and the audience liked it better than the programme said Brahms's friends did when the symphony made its appearance. It was played for the first time in America thirty-four years ago this month.

A Suite for Orchestra, "Couperin's Tomb," comprising four movements of Ravel's pianoforte suite, and done with Ravel's light touch, provided no great difficulties for the Boston men, who were on their mettle. They are agreeable bits and cleverly scored.

Respigli's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem, picturing peaceful landscapes, legions of playful naiads and tritons, processions of sirens with Neptune's chariot leading the way, and, finally, sunset and night, was skilfully done as to details. Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," the final number, was played as only the Boston men can do it.

F. H. W.

TELEGRAM
New York City
DEC 3

Brahms from Boston.

While Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not noted as a Brahms conductor, he offered last night, at the second evening concert of the season of the men from Boston at Carnegie Hall, Brahms' last and most difficult symphony. His reading was not as forceful or as thrilling as that of Leopold Stokowski, who led the Philadelphia Orchestra through it a few weeks ago, but it offered much that was commendable. The orchestra is much improved over last year. There were a few slips in the horn section, but the tone of the strings, particularly the 'cellos, was lovely in the slow movement of the symphony. The wood winds, too, were very effective. Aside from the Brahms work, a new composition of Ravel, "La Tombeau de Couperin," and a modern Italian symphonic poem, "Fontane di Rome," were played. Judged by the concerts of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well on the road back to its former glory, which was dimmed by the war. Mr. Monteux is doing excellent things with the revived orchestra

---

ESTABL
From Even
New

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, came near to reaching its former standards of perfection at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Brahms's fourth symphony was played with dignity and understanding. Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," heard for the first time in New York, was written for the piano in six movements. Later the composer arranged it for a small orchestra in four. The title is somewhat misleading. The suite, as to form, is in the style of the masters of Couperin's time, but there the similitude ends. The prelude is charmingly quaint and suggestive of long ago. The forlane and menuet and rigaudon show the piquant alliance between Ravel's modernism and the antique form in which he has chosen to express it. Respighi's "Fontane di Rome" is a work of poetic imagination with ultra-modern tendency. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" sounded conservative by comparison. The programme was too long.

[57]

From
EAGLE,
DEC 3
Brooklyn, N.Y

In the evening,
Hall the Boston Sym
second of its Thursd
single notable perfor
of the Strauss tone-p spiegel," in which touched the heights
ability. This evenin comes to Brooklyn.
there will be more t
dwell on its accomp

ESTABLISHED
From EVENING MAI
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

MUSICAL communist
edly refer to the night's Boston Sympho
"yellow centrists" and the second appearance
teaux and his organiza
Hall was just about n suit the tastes of Ne
goers. Brahms' Fourt
Ravel suite, a Resp
poem and Richad Strau
spiegel" furnished two music. It was an even of orchestration rule
and during which u gems flowed forth at vals.

Brahms, out of su thematic material, wr symphony, which from
of the first movement
and appeal. The disco
wood instruments in th
ment was particularly f
Ravel's suite, "Le Couperin," orchestrated
inal composition for pia
ing modern work, not
from Dame Musica. T
New York performance
written avowedly progr
"Fontane di Rome," su
ing four of the famou
But except for occa
there was nothing to dis fountains from those i orchestration, which inc masterful and br atmospheric affec

Monteux in th

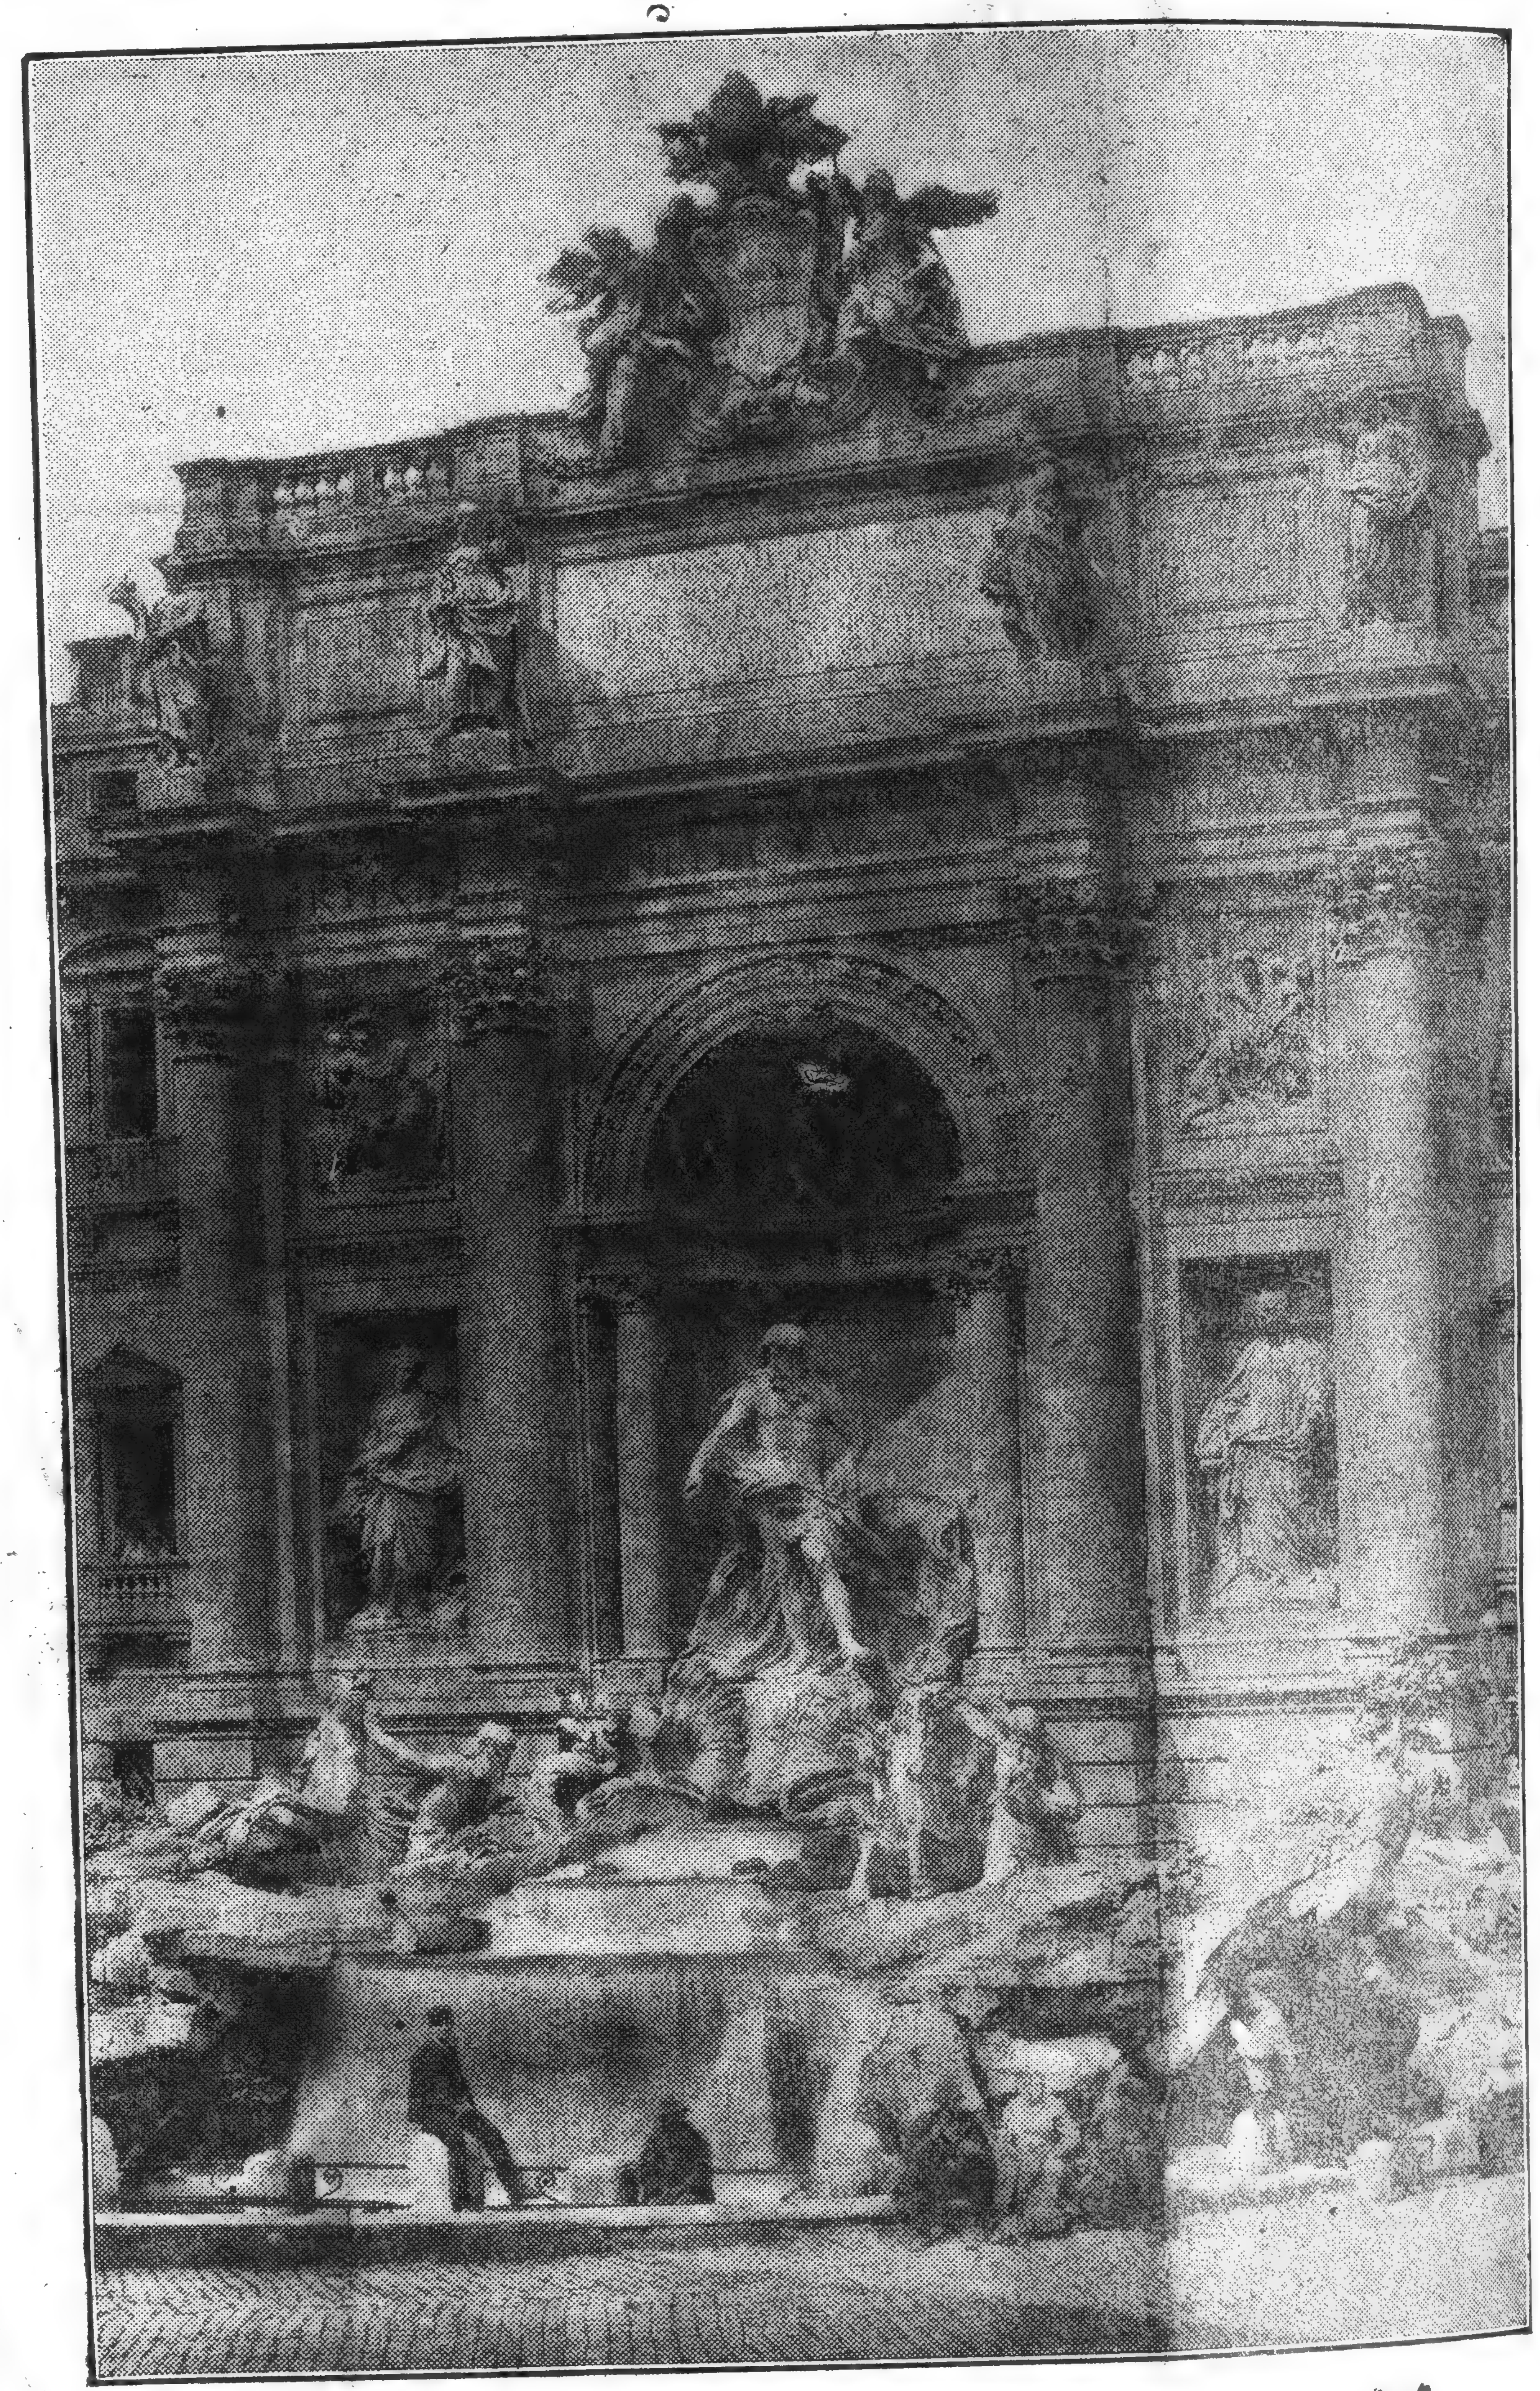
Roman Fountains That Suggested Respighi's Much-Like

Three of the Backgrounds to His Tone-Poem, "Fontane di Roma," Played Four Times Within a Month at the Symphony Concerts

(The Photographs (by Anderson) Lent from the Public Library)

Triton Fountain

For the Dance of the Sea-Folk



Fountain of Trevi

For the Sea-Pageant of Neptune's Train

Fou

TRIBUNE,
New York City DEC 3 1920

Concert Given As Memorial To Beethoven

Symphony Society Contributes to Musical Exercises Marking 150th Anniversary of Composer's Birth

Boston Orchestra Heard

Programs of Wide Variance Mark Afternoon and Evening Fetes at Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

At two concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday performances were given to four symphonies, two symphonic poems and a suite. The audiences were quite distinct in composition and character, however; though that of the afternoon, which heard three symphonies by Beethoven, may have felt that the program was somewhat ponderous, it was upheld by the feeling that it was participating in an act of commemorative celebration, for the concert was the Symphony Society's contribution to the musical exercises which have been planned in honor of the 150th anniversary of the birth of the master who brought the symphonic form to perfection, and also, as some think, to its final culmination.

Boston Orchestra Heard.

The program of the Boston Orchestra, which gave the evening concert, knew nothing of Beethoven, but paid its tribute to Brahms (his spiritual brother), Maurice Ravel, Richard Strauss and Ottorio Respighi, the last a gifted member of the coterie of latter-day Italian musical impressionists.

He was placed in the same dilemma again last night, for Mr. Stokowski chose the Brahms symphony as the war-horse of his second invasion of New York. The temptation to compare the two performances is strong, but must be resisted. It will suffice to say that there was meticulous nicety in the performance of the Philadelphians, virility in that of the Bostonians.

Charm in Ravel's Music

The Ravel suite, a novelty, was a transcription of four pieces from a set of six dedicated by the composers to companions in arms who were killed in the war. The forms were archaic, the spirit of the pieces, by which we mean the melodic, harmonic and instrumental expression, modern. Couperin is an archaic composer, but his ballet suites are delightfully fresh and lovely.

There is much charm in Ravel's music also when not married, as in the Forlane, by strenuous effort to avoid the obvious.

It is a pitiful cry this: "Save me from being as other music is—natural, unqualifiedly ingratiating and lovely!" But the immortelles which hang on Couperin's tomb are of that kind. The hothouse blooms of Ravel will not live so long.

Respighi's symphonic poem "Fontane di Roma" was played at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in February, 1919. A pretty poetical conceit lies at its base—the composer gives musical expression to the sentiments and visions evoked by his contemplation of four famous fountains in the ancient city of Italy "at the hours," he says, "when their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer."

So we have the fountain of Valle Giulia, a pastoral picture, cattle passing and disappearing in the mists of the Roman dawn; the Triton fountain: Naiads and tritons called together by summons from the conch-shell horns, disporting themselves in the jets of water glittering in the morning sun; the Fountain of Trevi, a triumphant procession of Neptune over the water's surface in his chariot drawn by sea-horses, followed by a cohort of sirens and tritons; the Fountain of the Villa Medici, a vision of sunset and evening twilight, passing into night, tolling bells, twittering birds, rustling leaves, sounds steeped in sweet melancholy, vanishing into silence.

The music differentiates itself from that of some of Respighi's fellows heard recently in being something more than color. There is beauty of line and phrase as well.

Old devices are used, of coure. A sustained high tone, which pictures the Star of the East in Liszt's "Christus," silence and twilight in D'Indy's "Day on the Mountain," the bleak stretches of the Russian steppes in Borodin's symphonic poem, here tells us of dawn and fading eve. There is much of those vague tangled sounds and vagrant dissonant chords, covered by a haze of instrumental color, for which Schumann found the word in "Traumeswirren," but there are also thematic invention and poetical thought.

From DEC 3
World
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES ITS USUAL NEW YORK HIT.

Orchestra Renders Brilliant Programme in Way That Delights Carnegie Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last evening for its second Thursday concert of the season. The programme at Carnegie Hall called for a regal display of the band's virtuosity and the various choirs were equal to the encounter. Conductor Monteux successfully threaded his way through the Brahms Fourth Symphony and the audience liked it better than the programme said Brahms's friends did when the symphony made its appearance. It was played for the first time in America thirty-four years ago this month.

A Suite for Orchestra, "Couperin's Tomb," comprising four movements of Ravel's pianoforte suite, and done with Ravel's light touch, provided no great difficulties for the Boston men, who were on their mettle. They are agreeable bits and cleverly scored.

Respigli's "Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem, picturing peaceful landscapes, legions of playful naiads and tritons, processions of sirens with Neptune's chariot leading the way, and, finally, sunset and night, was skilfully done as to details. Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," the final number, was played as only the Boston men can do it.

F. H. W.

---

m TELEGRAM
dress
New York City
DEC 3
te

Brahms from Boston.

While Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not noted as a Brahms conductor, he offered last night, at the second evening concert of the season of the men from Boston at Carnegie Hall, Brahms' last and most difficult symphony. His reading was not as forceful or as thrilling as that of Leopold Stokowski, who led the Philadelphia Orchestra through it a few weeks ago, but it offered much that was commendable. The orchestra is much improved over last year. There were a few slips in the horn section, but the tone of the strings, particularly the 'cellos, was lovely in the slow movement of the symphony. The wood winds, too, were very effective. Aside from the Brahms work, a new composition of Ravel, "La Tombeau de Couperin," and a modern Italian symphonic poem, "Fontane di Rome," were played. Judged by the concerts of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well on the road back to its former glory, which was dimmed by the war. Mr. Monteux is doing excellent things with the revived orchestra

---

ESTAB
From Ev
Ne

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, came near to reaching its former standards of perfection at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Brahms's fourth symphony was played [illegible] Respighi's "Fontane di Rome" is a work of poetic imagination with ultra-modern tendency. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" sounded conservative by comparison. The programme was too long.

From DEC 3
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N. Y

In the evening,
Hall, the Boston Sym
second of its Thursd
single notable perfor
of the Strauss tone-p
spiegel," in which touched the heights
ability. This evenin
comes to Brooklyn.
there will be more t
dwell on its accomp

ESTABLISHED
From EVENING MAI
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

MUSICAL communist
edly refer to the night's Boston Sympho
"yellow centrists" and
the second appearance
teaux and his organiza
Hall was just about m
suit the tastes of Ne
goers. Brahms' Fourt
Ravel suite, a Resp
poem, and Richad Strau
spiegel" furnished two music. It was an even
of orchestration rule
and during which u
gems flowed forth at vals.

Brahms, out of su
thematic material, wro
symphony, which from
of the first movement
and appeal. The disco
wood instruments in th
ment was particularly f

Ravel's suite, "Le Couperin," orchestrated
inal composition for pia
ing modern work, not
from Dame Musica. T
New York performance
written avowedly prog
"Fontane di Rome," su
ing four of the famou
But, except for occa
there was nothing to dis fountains from those in Orchestration, which incl masterful and bri atmospheric effec Monteaux in th lapsed back into ggishness which c ny.

...hi's Much-Liked Music

...a Month at the Symphony Concerts

Fountain of the Villa Medici

For the Nocturne of Sunset

From
EAGLE, DEC 3
Brooklyn, N.Y.

In the evening, also in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony gave the second of its Thursday concerts. The single notable performance was that of the Strauss tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel," in which Mr. Monteux touched the heights of his conducting ability. This evening the orchestra comes to Brooklyn, and tomorrow there will be more time and space to dwell on its accomplishments.

1881
...C 3 H
World
...k City

...n Symphony Orchestra ...adership of Pierre Mon- ... near to reaching its ...ards of perfection at its ...arnegie Hall last night. ...rth symphony was played ...and understanding. Ra- ... "Le Tombeau de Cou- ...l for the first time in ...was written for the piano ...ments. Later the com- ...ged it for a small orches- ...The title is somewhat ... The suite, as to form, is ... of the masters of Cou- ..., but there the similitude ... prelude is charmingly ... suggestive of long ago. ... and menuet and rigaudon ...piquant alliance between ...dernism and the antique ...ich he has chosen to ex- ... Respighi's "Fontane di ... work of poetic imagina- ... ultra-modern tendency. ... "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry ...ounded conservative by ... The programme was too

---

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 3
From
EVENING MAIL,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MUSICAL communists would undoubtedly refer to the composers on last night's Boston Symphony programme as "yellow centrists" and "reformers," but the second appearance of Pierre Monteaux and his organization at Carnegie Hall was just about modern enough to suit the tastes of New York concert-goers. Brahms' Fourth Symphony, a Ravel suite, a Respighi symphonic poem, and Richad Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" furnished two hours of exacting music. It was an evening when masters of orchestration ruled unchallenged, and during wh'ch unrivaled melodic gems flowed forth at unexpected intervals.

Brahms, out of surprisingly little thematic material, wrote the E-minor symphony, which from the final pages of the first movement grew in interest and appeal. The discourse among the wood instruments in the second movement was particularly fine.

Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," orchestrated from the original composition for piano, is an appealing modern work, not entirely divorced from Dame Musica. This was its first New York performance. Respighi has written avowedly programme music in "Fontane di Rome," supposedly depicting four of the famous Latin founts. But, except for occasional glimpses, there was nothing to distinguish Rome's fountains from those in Central Park. Orchestration, which included the organ, was masterful and brilliant, producing subtle atmospheric effect.

M. Monteaux in the Strauss tone poem lapsed back into a suggestion of the sluggishness which characterized the symphony.

Morning Telegraph
New York

DEC 3 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS GREAT CROWDS

Hundreds of Enthusiasts Attend Orchestra's Second Concert at Carnegie Hall.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Carnegie Hall last night before hundreds of music enthusiasts. This was the second concert of the orchestra's second season.

Brahm's Symphony in E minor, Ravel's "La Tombeau de Couperin" ("Couperin's Tomb"), Respighi's "Fontane di Roma" ("Fountains of Rome"), and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," were heard. This was the first performance in this country of Ravel's "Couperin's Tomb."

The orchestra's second matinee will be held on Saturday afternoon, when Mendelssohn, Lalo and Stravinsky compositions will be heard.

From DEC 3
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

CARNEGIE HALL CONCERTS.

"Beethoven" was the featured member of Walter Damrosch's historical program-cycle at the concert of the Symphony Society of New York in Carnegie Hall last night. The program will be repeated December 15, the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. The selections were the First, Seventh and Fifth Symphonies. All three numbers were well played and the audience listened in a mood of enjoyment rather than criticism.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the same hall in the evening played Brahms Symphony in E Minor, Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," "The Fountains of Rome" by Respighi, and Strauss' "Till Eugenspie..

From DEC 3
AMERICAN,
New York City

Boston Symphony Is Heard at Carnegi...

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, gave its second concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall, playing a programme that embraced Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Ravel suite in four movements; "Le Tombeau de Couperin," transcribed for orchestra by the composer himself from his work for pianoforte, and heard here for the first time in that form; Respighi's symphonic poem "Fontane di Roma," produced in New York only once before, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which had not been placed before the local public since the war.

A pity that this peculiarly interesting programme binding German, French and Italian music in an artistic league, should have been set apart for an evening on which operatic activities absorbed so much attention; for under the circumstances it cannot receive the critical consideration which it deserves.

The Prelude, Forlane, Menuel and Rigaudon by Ravel, exclusively scored fancies of a clever man's mind, were admirably given, compensating in a measure for a heavy and uninspiring performance of the Brahms symphony.

Monsieur Monteux also caught ...he atmosphere of the Respighi ...one-pictures, his musicians respond...ng with animation to his baton. ...nd he achieved far better results ...han one had anticipated in his ...trauss music, although his read...ng lacked something in elasticity ...nd grace.

...SUN

...ess New York City

DEC 3 1920 D

The Boston Symphony.

Last night the Boston Symphony O... chestra gave their third New York co... cert of the season before an audien... which did not crowd although it r... spectably filled Carnegie Hall. Inves... ing the Brahms Fourth Symphony wi... a robust tone, Mr. Monteux lost som... what in delicacy what he gained ... muscularity. The precision of the pla... ers, however, particularly in the sync... pated passages, seemed rather impos... from the desk than spontaneous... evoked from the instruments. But ... sense of the larger values of the co... position made up for the poverty of d... tailed shading.

The novelty of the evening was a Ravel suite, new to this city, which the composer had chosen and arranged from six piano pieces dedicated to the memory of various friends who died in the war and united under the title "Couperin's Tomb." This epithet serves to indicate the ancient manner in which the four orchestral numbers are conceived, each to a dance rhythm probably familiar to the men and women of Couperin's time. The orchestration is remarkably simple, the modern web of iridescent color being replaced by solo effects from the various choirs. A plaintive harmonic scheme endowed these simple dance steps with a wistfulness that at times rose to real elegiac feeling, as in the Minuet, while again it fell to a grave whimsicality.

"The Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem of Ottorino Respighi, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" completed the concert, the former as sensuously descriptive as the latter is merrily narrative, both displaying the skill of the orchestra and its conductor, and both warmly received by the audience.

THE LISTENER.

From TIMES, DEC 4 1920 Y
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Virile Concert Given by Boston Symphony

"As demonstrated by their second con... cert at the Academy of Music las... night, the Boston Symphony Orchestr... still remains a progressive grou... under the guidance of an excellent dis... ciplinarian. Supplemented by the ef... forts of Mary Jordan, the perform... ance fell short of being "one long de... light" only because the program wa... somewhat unrelated.

The opening number was heartil... applauded. It was Rimsky-Korsakoff... "Scheherzade." The tonality of th... musical tale of Sinbad and the Kalen... dar Prince and the ship that wa... wrecked on the rock surmounted by ... bronze warrior, makes an exceller... "hearing."

Conductor Monteux's manipulation o... his brasses wos most virile. It wa... no wonder that not only the conducto... was recalled several times but that th... ensemble warmly applauded. Richar... Bergen, first violin, was treated to ... near ovation. To be sure, Mr. Berger... who appears to be quite young, de... served the plaudits. His tone is swee... his technique commendable and hi... manner unassuming. The other or... chestral numbers were: Strauss' "Ti... Eulenspiegel," and Lekeu's variation... on folk songs of Anjon. The forme... brilliant work received exceller... handling and was effective as eve... The Lekeu Fantasia is a charmin... work and was charmingly played.

Miss Jordan's performance was en... joyable. Her voice is pleasant, and sh... does not force. She sang "Ah, Mo... fils," from the Meyerbeer "Le Pro... phets" and "Mon Coeur s'ouvre a ... voix," by Saint Saens.

[58]

From DEC 3 1920 K
Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday played a program of which the overshadowing number was Brahms's fourth symphony, and which contained also two new compositions by contemporary composers and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Quite new to New York was Maurice Ravel's orchestral suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin." It is a transcription or a resetting for orchestra of four movements of a suite originally in six movements for the piano. This was composed during the war, and each movement is inscribed to the memory of a friend who was killed in it. There is nothing, however, that is funereal or that could even be called elegiac in the four movements heard last evening. The title is fanciful. Mr. Hale, in his program note, conjectures that it was meant to give the idea that the suite is in the ancient manner, of which Couperin was a distinguished exponent. Nobody, however, who has ever heard the music of Couperin would mistake Ravel's manner for his.

These movements are quite characteristic of Ravel. The prelude is built up of a series of arabesques, light and fanciful, first for the oboe, then transferred to other instruments. But the oboe is allowed much rest in none of these movements. Its tone is heard again a good deal in the "Fortane," a delightfully prim specimen of the Italian dance that usually whirls more giddily than it does here, though this has a fascinating rhythm in six-eight time. The "Minuet" and the "Rigaudon" that follow have each a curious charm of their own, the "Rigaudon" a decorous gayety. The harmonization is characteristic of Ravel's acid sweetness in tis less pronounced manner, stimulating and refreshing. The orchestra is used with much delicacy and grace of sound; the oboe gives it its characteristic color.

The other new composition was Ottorino Respighi's symphonic poem "The Fountains of Rome," which had been heard in New York three seasons ago. It is intended to represent four fountains in Rome, specified, and, more than the fountains, the sentiments and visions suggested by them; a pastoral landscape; a dance of naiads and tritons; the passing of Neptune's chariot and a train of sirens and tritons; finally, a sunset mood, birds twittering, leaves rustling.

The music is vivid and picturesque, rich in suggestiveness, the qualities that the composer sought. He has been much more considerate of his listeners' ears than some others of the modern Italians. He needs a very large instrumental force to express himself—a piano which is entirely unheard, the organ, but little more heard; a bell and other modern necessities.

The playing of Brahms's symphony had many excellent qualities, but there were some technical slips and some readings that seemed strange. But it gained much applause, as did the other numbers of the program.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EAGLE, DEC 4 1920 U
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Brilliant Modern Program With Mary Jordan as Soloist.

The restored quality and richness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was revealed at its concert here last month. Last evening at the Academy of Music Mr. Monteux came into his own as a conductor. He had a wholly modern program, the music with which he is in closest sympathy, and its chief feature was the brilliant and tricksy "Scheherezade" suite of Rimsky Korsakoff, with which Mr. Monteux made an intimate acquaintance when, as conductor of Ballet Russe, he led it for the ballet of the same name. Last night under his baton the work proved to be a mine of fluent fancy and a wonder of orchestral technique in doing unexpected things delicately and beautifully. There are other things to be said about the suite of course. Its lack of sustained melody—except in the third movement—with its brief spurts of song from almost everything in the orchestra except the tuba, gave it an effect of patchiness. But the fertility of its fancy and the amazing skill of its orchestration—and last night of its performance as well—triumphed and made it fascinating even to ears trained on Beethoven. When you reach the festival of Bagdad, to be sure, you may be reminded of Browning's

> Ere you open your eyes in the city the blessed church bells begin;
> No sooner the bells leave off than the diligence rattles in.
> By and by there's the traveling doctor gives pills, lets blood, draws teeth,
> Or the Pulcinello-trumpet breaks up the market beneath.

But you forget the clatter when you come to the wreck of Sindbad's ship and the very beautiful close. Orchestra and conductor were acclaimed and Mr. Monteux did well to insist upon sharing the honors with Mr. Burgin, his concertmaster, whose playing of the brief violin solos had everything to be desired of delicacy and grace.

An orchestral novelty was a "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou," by Lekeu. It proved to be very tender and lovely music whose beauty raised regret that the composer's death at 24 silenced a voice which gave promise of rich additions to the modern French school.

The soloist was that always reliable singer, Mary Jordan, who combined "Oh, My Son" from "The Prophet" and "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" from "Samson." Perhaps it was the modern character of all the rest of the program which made Meyerbeer's once famous song sound out-dated. That pompous genius of the thea... needs the theatrical touch to ... him over," and Miss Jordan was content to sing. Saint Saens's ever popular song, however, requires singing rather than declamation and forced tone, and its treatment by Miss Jordan was delightful.

The concert closed with Strauss's' "Till Eulenspiegel." A great deal of music has rolled over the Brooklyn Bridge since this tour de force was new and audiences used to think that the orchestra as well as Till was tipsy. The procession has overtaken Strauss and his music now sounds spirited but by no means crazy. Perhaps Mr. Monteux gave it a little more sanity than the composer intended. The Franch mind is logical.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From DEC 4 1920 A CITIZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Mary Jordon Appears as Assisting Artist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave its second concert in the Academy of Music. A large audience gave Mr. Monteux a cordial greeting. There were many new faces among the players, as there are in all the orchestras this season. Under Mr. Monteux's direction the men from Boston gave a fine account of themselves. The string band, with its new leader, Mr. Burgin, is a splendid body, its tone full and elastic.

Mary Jordan, contralto, was the assisting artist, and her full, rich tones were a delightful feature of the concert.

The programme as played was as fololws: "Symphonic Suite" (Rimfollows: "Symphonic Suite" (Rimsky-Korsakoff), "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou" (Leken), arioso, "Ah! Mon Fils!", from "Le Prophete" (Meyerbeer); air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" (Saint-Saens), by Miss Jordan; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, in rondo form for full orchestra (Strauss).

...rom DEC 5 1920 L
World
...ew York City

FIVE CONCERTS DRAW CITY'S MUSIC LOVERS

Boston Symphony and Philharmonic Bands and Bauer Play —Recital and Opera.

The Boston Symphony's programme for yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall comprised the Mendelssohn octet for strings in E flat, Lalo's concerto for violoncello with orchestra, and Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka."

The concerto served to introduce Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the Boston organization. He is a fine musician and plays with much charm and grace. As Pierre Monteux conducted the first performance of "Petrouchka" in Paris, and has been associated with its performances in this country, he had no trouble in getting out of the suite yesterday all that Stravinsky intended.

TELEGRAM

...ess: New York City.

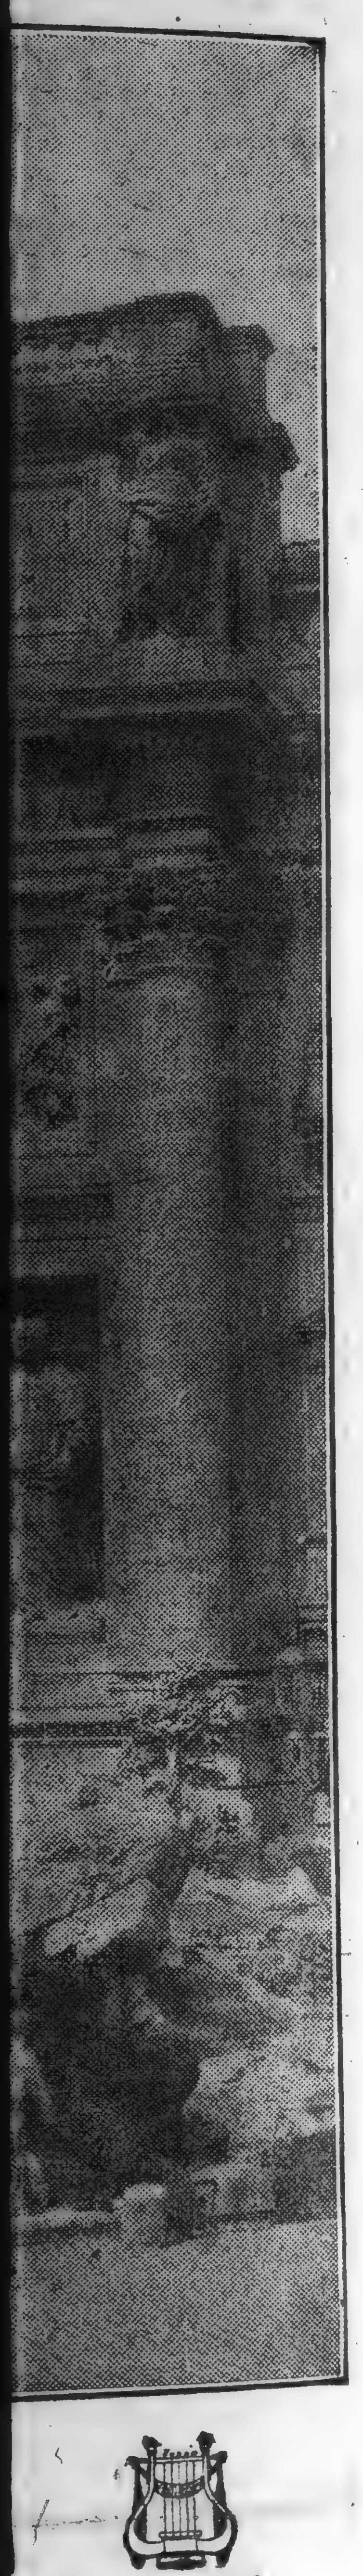
DEC 5 1920 L

A Brilliant 'Cellist.

One of the best 'cellists that New York has heard in a long time is Jean Bedetti, who was the soloist at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is a member. Such beauty of tone, such refinement of style, and such technical skill as he displayed in the Lalo concerto are extremely rare. With the lightness and grace of a violin virtuoso he played his rapid passages. Yet there was a fine resonance in his deep bass notes. Mr. Bedetti is a real 'cello virtuoso and a musician of unusually fine sensibilities. He was loudly applauded for his beautiful rendition of the Lalo work. In place of a symphony the orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteux, played a youthful work of Mendelssohn, an octette for strings. A final number was a symphonic suite based upon Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka," in which Raymond Havens, pianist, appeared as soloist. There were more vacant seats at yesterday's concert than have been noted at any concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here in the last ten years.

hi's Much-Liked Music

a Month at the Symphony Concerts



Fountain of the Villa Medici

For the Nocturne of Sunset

1931

World

k City

n Symphony Orchestra, dership of Pierre Mon-near to reaching its ards of perfection at its arnegie Hall last night.
rth symphony was played and understanding. Ra-"Le Tombeau de Coul for the first time in as written for the piano ments. Later the comed it for a small orches-
The title is somewhat
The suite, as to form, is of the masters of Cou-but there the similitude prelude is charmingly suggestive of long ago.
and menuet and rigaudon piquant alliance between dernism and the antique ich he has chosen to ex-Respighi's "Fontane di work of poetic imaginaultra-modern tendency.
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry ounded conservative by
The programme was too

From DEC 3
EAGLE,
Brooklyn, N.Y.

In the evening, also in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony gave the second of its Thursday concerts. The single notable performance was that of the Strauss tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel," in which Mr. Monteux touched the heights of his conducting ability. This evening the orchestra comes to Brooklyn, and tomorrow there will be more time and space to dwell on its accomplishments.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING MAIL,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Musical communists would undoubtedly refer to the composers on last night's Boston Symphony programme as "yellow centrists" and "reformers," but the second appearance of Pierre Monteaux and his organization at Carnegie Hall was just about modern enough to suit the tastes of New York concert-goers. Brahms' Fourth Symphony, a Ravel suite, a Respighi symphonic poem, and Richad Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" furnished two hours of exacting music. It was an evening when masters of orchestration ruled unchallenged, and during which unrivaled melodic gems flowed forth at unexpected intervals.

Brahms, out of surprisingly little thematic material, wrote the E-minor symphony, which from the final pages of the first movement grew in interest and appeal. The discourse among the wood instruments in the second movement was particularly fine.

Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," orchestrated from the original composition for piano, is an appealing modern work, not entirely divorced from Dame Musica. This was its first New York performance. Respighi has written avowedly programme music in "Fontane di Rome," supposedly depicting four of the famous Latin founts. But, except for occasional glimpses, there was nothing to distinguish Rome's fountains from those in Central Park. Orchestration, which included the organ, was masterful and brilliant, producing subtle atmospheric effect.

M. Monteaux in the Strauss tone poem lapsed back into a suggestion of the sluggishness which characterized the symphony.

Morning Telegraph
New York

DEC 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS GREAT CROWDS

Hundreds of Enthusiasts Attend Orchestra's Second Concert at Carnegie Hall.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Carnegie Hall last night before hundreds of music enthusiasts. This was the second concert of the orchestra's second season.

Brahm's Symphony in E minor, Ravel's "La Tombeau de Couperin" ("Couperin's Tomb"), Respighi's "Fontane di Roma" ("Fountains of Rome"), and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," were heard. This was the first performance in this country of Ravel's "Couperin's Tomb."

The orchestra's second matinee will be held on Saturday afternoon, when Mendelssohn, Lalo and Stravinsky compositions will be heard.

From DEC
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

CARNEGIE HALL CONCERTS.

"Beethoven" was the featured member of Walter Damrosch's historical program-cycle at the concert of the Symphony Society of New York in Carnegie Hall last night. The program will be repeated December 15, the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. The selections were the First, Seventh and Fifth Symphonies. All three numbers were well played and the audience listened in a mood of enjoyment rather than criticism.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the same hall in the evening played Brahms Symphony in E Minor, Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," "The Fountains of Rome," by Respighi, and Strauss' "Till Eugenspie..

From DEC 3
AMERICAN,
New York City

Boston Symphony Is Heard at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, gave its second concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall, playing a programme that embraced Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Ravel suite in four movements; "Le Tombeau de Couperin," transcribed for orchestra by the composer himself from his work for pianoforte, and heard here for the first time in that form; Respighi's symphonic poem, "Fontane di Roma," produced in New York only once before, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which had not been placed before the local public since the war.

A pity that this peculiarly interesting programme binding German, French and Italian music in an artistic league, should have been set apart for an evening on which operatic activities absorbed so much attention; for under the circumstances it cannot receive the critical consideration which it deserves.

The Prelude, Forlane, Menuel and Rigaudon by Ravel, exclusively scored fancies of a clever man's mind, were admirably given, compensating in a measure for a heavy and uninspiring performance of the Brahms symphony.

Monsieur Monteux also caught the atmosphere of the Respighi tone-pictures, his musicians responding with animation to his baton, and he achieved far better results than one had anticipated in his Strauss music, although his reading lacked something in elasticity and grace.

SUN

ess New York City

The Boston Symphony.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their third New York concert of the season before an audience which did not crowd although it respectably filled Carnegie Hall. Investing the Brahms Fourth Symphony with a robust tone, Mr. Monteux lost somewhat in delicacy what he gained in muscularity. The precision of the players, however, particularly in the syncopated passages, seemed rather imposed from the desk than spontaneously evoked from the instruments. But a sense of the larger values of the composition made up for the poverty of detailed shading.

The novelty of the evening was a Ravel suite, new to this city, which the composer had chosen and arranged from six piano pieces dedicated to the memory of various friends who died in the war and united under the title "Couperin's Tomb." This epithet serves to indicate the ancient manner in which the four orchestral numbers are conceived, each to a dance rhythm probably familiar to the men and women of Couperin's time. The orchestration is remarkably simple, the modern web of iridescent color being replaced by solo effects from the various choirs. A plaintive harmonic scheme endowed these simple dance steps with a wistfulness that at times rose to real elegiac feeling, as in the Minuet, while again it fell to a grave whimsicality.

"The Fountains of Rome," a symphonic poem of Ottorino Respighi, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" completed the concert, the former as sensuously descriptive as the latter is merrily narrative, both displaying the skill of the orchestra and its conductor, and both warmly received by the audience.

THE LISTENER.

From TIMES, DEC 4
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Virile Concert Given by Boston Symphony

As demonstrated by their second concert at the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra still remains a progressive group under the guidance of an excellent disciplinarian. Supplemented by the efforts of Mary Jordan, the performance fell short of being "one long delight" only because the program was somewhat unrelated.

The opening number was heartily applauded. It was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherzade." The tonality of the musical tale of Sinbad and the Kalendar Prince and the ship that was wrecked on the rock surmounted by a bronze warrior, makes an excellent "hearing."

Conductor Monteux's manipulation of his brasses wos most virile. It was no wonder that not only the conductor was recalled several times but that the ensemble warmly applauded. Richard Bergen, first violin, was treated to a near ovation. To be sure, Mr. Bergen who appears to be quite young, deserved the plaudits. His tone is sweet, his technique commendable and his manner unassuming. The other orchestral numbers were: Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Lekeu's variations on folk songs of Anjon. The former brilliant work received excellent handling and was effective as ever. The Lekeu Fantasia is a charming work and was charmingly played.

Miss Jordan's performance was enjoyable. Her voice is pleasant, and she does not force. She sang "Ah, Mon fils," from the Meyerbeer "Le Prophets" and "Mon Coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," by Saint Saens.

[58]

From DEC 3
Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday played a program of which the overshadowing number was Brahms's fourth symphony, and which contained also two new compositions by contemporary composers and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Quite new to New York was Maurice Ravel's orchestral suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin." It is a transcription or a resetting for orchestra of four movements of a suite originally in six movements for the piano. This was composed during the war, and each movement is inscribed to the memory of a friend who was killed in it. There is nothing, however, that is funereal or that could even be called elegiac in the four movements heard last evening. The title is fanciful. Mr. Hale, in his program note, conjectures that it was meant to give the idea that the suite is in the ancient manner, of which Couperin was a distinguished exponent. Nobody, however, who has ever heard the music of Couperin would mistake Ravel's manner for his.

These movements are quite characteristic of Ravel. The prelude is built up of a series of arabesques, light and fanciful, first for the oboe, then transferred to other instruments. But the oboe is allowed much rest in none of these movements. Its tone is heard again a good deal in the "Fortane," a delightfully prim specimen of the Italian dance that usually whirls more giddily than it does here, though this has a fascinating rhythm in six-eight time. The "Minuet" and the "Rigaudon" that follow have each a curious charm of their own, the "Rigaudon" a decorous gayety. The harmonization is characteristic of Ravel's acid sweetness in its less pronounced manner, stimulating and refreshing. The orchestra is used with much delicacy and grace of sound; the oboe gives it its characteristic color.

The other new composition was Ottorino Respighi's symphonic poem "The Fountains of Rome," which had been heard in New York three seasons ago. It is intended to represent four fountains in Rome, specified, and, more than the fountains, the sentiments and visions suggested by them; a pastoral landscape; a dance of naiads and tritons; the passing of Neptune's chariot and a train of sirens and tritons; finally, a sunset mood, birds twittering, leaves rustling.

The music is vivid and picturesque, rich in suggestiveness, the qualities that the composer sought. He has been much more considerate of his listeners' ears than some others of the modern Italians. He needs a very large instrumental force to express himself—a piano which is entirely unheard, the organ, but little more heard; a bell and other modern necessities.

The playing of Brahms's symphony had many excellent qualities, but there were some technical slips and some readings that seemed strange. But it gained much applause, as did the other numbers of the program.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EAGLE, DEC 4
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Brilliant Modern Program With Mary Jordan as Soloist.

The restored quality and richness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was revealed at its concert here last month. Last evening at the Academy of Music Mr. Monteux came into his own as a conductor. He had a wholly modern program, the music with which he is in closest sympathy, and its chief feature was the brilliant and tricksy "Scheherezade" suite of Rimsky Korsakoff, with which Mr. Monteux made an intimate acquaintance when, as conductor of Ballet Russe, he led it for the ballet of the same name. Last night under his baton the work proved to be a mine of fluent fancy and a wonder of orchestral technique in doing unexpected things delicately and beautifully. There are other things to be said about the suite of course. Its lack of sustained melody—except in the third movement—with its brief spurts of song from almost everything in the orchestra except the tuba, gave it an effect of patchiness. But the fertility of its fancy and the amazing skill of its orchestration—and last night of its performance as well—triumphed and made it fascinating even to ears trained on Beethoven. When you reach the festival of Bagdad, to be sure, you may be reminded of Browning's

Ere you open your eyes in the city the blessed church bells begin;
No sooner the bells leave off than the diligence rattles in.
By and by there's the traveling doctor gives pills, lets blood, draws teeth.
Or the Pulcinello-trumpet breaks up the market beneath.

But you forget the clatter when you come to the wreck of Sindbad's ship and the very beautiful close. Orchestra and conductor were acclaimed and Mr. Monteux did well to insist upon sharing the honors with Mr. Burgin, his concertmaster, whose playing of the brief violin solos had everything to be desired of delicacy and grace.

An orchestral novelty was a "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou," by Lekeu. It proved to be very tender and lovely music whose beauty raised regret that the composer's death at 24 silenced a voice which gave promise of rich additions to the modern French school.

The soloist was that always reliable singer, Mary Jordan, who combined "Oh, My Son" from "The Prophet" and "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" from "Samson." Perhaps it was the modern character of all the rest of the program which made Meyerbeer's once famous song sound out-dated. That pompous genius of the theaneeds the theatrical touch to put him over," and Miss Jordan was content to sing. Saint Saens's ever popular song, however, requires singing rather than declamation and forced tone, and its treatment by Miss Jordan was delightful.

The concert closed with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." A great deal of music has rolled over the Brooklyn Bridge since this tour de force was new and audiences used to think that the orchestra as well as Till was tipsy. The procession has overtaken Strauss and his music now sounds spirited but by no means crazy. Perhaps Mr. Monteux gave it a little more sanity than the composer intended. The Franch mind is logical.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From DEC 4
CITIZEN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Mary Jordon Appears as Assisting Artist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave its second concert in the Academy of Music. A large audience gave Mr. Monteux a cordial greeting. There were many new faces among the players, as there are in all the orchestras this season. Under Mr. Monteux's direction the men from Boston gave a fine account of themselves. The string band, with its new leader, Mr. Burgin, is a splendid body, its tone full and elastic.

Mary Jordan, contralto, was the assisting artist, and her full, rich tones were a delightful feature of the concert.

The programme as played was as fololws: "Symphonic Suite" (Rimfollows: "Symphonic Suite" (Rimsky-Korsakoff), "Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou" (Leken), arioso, "Ah! Mon Fils!", from "Le Prophete" (Meyerbeer); air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" (Saint-Saens), by Miss Jordan; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, in rondo form for full orchestra (Strauss).

---

rom DEC 5
World
New York City

FIVE CONCERTS DRAW CITY'S MUSIC LOVERS

Boston Symphony and Philharmonic Bands and Bauer Play —Recital and Opera.

The Boston Symphony's programme for yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall comprised the Mendelssohn octet for strings in E flat, Lalo's concerto for violoncello with orchestra, and Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka."

The concerto served to introduce Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the Boston organization. He is a fine musician and plays with much charm and grace. As Pierre Monteux conducted the first performance of "Petrouchka" in Paris, and has been associated with its performances in this country, he had no trouble in getting out of the suite yesterday all that Stravinsky intended.

TELEGRAM

ess: New York City.

DEC 5

A Brilliant 'Cellist.

One of the best 'cellists that New York has heard in a long time is Jean Bedetti, who was the soloist at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is a member. Such beauty of tone, such refinement of style and such technical skill as he displayed in the Lalo concerto are extremely rare. With the lightness and grace of a violin virtuoso he played his rapid passages. Yet there was a fine resonance in his deep bass notes. Mr. Bedetti is a real 'cello virtuoso and a musician of unusually fine sensibilities. He was loudly applauded for his beautiful rendition of the Lalo work. In place of a symphony the orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteux, played a youthful work of Mendelssohn, an octette for strings. A final number was a symphonic suite based upon Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka," in which Raymond Havens, pianist, appeared as soloist. There were more vacant seats at yesterday's concert than have been noted at any concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here in the last ten years.

From Tribune DEC 5 - 1920
New York City

Varied Music By Orchestra From Boston

Program of Contrasts at Carnegie Hall Serves to Bring Out Skill of Symphony in Eminent Degree

Familiar Ballet Given

Jean Bedetti, in Solo Part of Violoncello Concerto, Shows Suave Mastery

By H. E. Krehbiel

Yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program of contrasts: Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat for strings; Lalo's Concerto for violoncello and what was called a "symphonic suite" (why, we cannot even guess) made out of some of the music composed by Stravinsky for the ballet "Petrouchka." The ballet music was the most familiar of these compositions to the people who go to the opera, as well as to symphonic concerts, and what remarks upon it the occasion invited may as well as not be made at once. In its place—which means in the theater and as an accompaniment to pictures and action—this music is quite the most extraordinary composition with which we are familiar. Not in the region in which high imagination dwells, but in the abode of careless fancy, Stravinsky's music, illustrative to a story of poor Punchinello, is an amazing agency in coördinating sight and hearing or confounding them, making the eyes hear and the ears see. But as music pure and simple there is little of it which has the qualifications which fit it for the concert room. That little is summed up in his treatment of Russian folksong tunes or melodies based on those tunes. The rest is mere grotesquerie which may amuse; in fact, it does that, but must also bewilder all those who listen to it without having gone through the experience of witnessing the comically pathetic or pathetically comic pantomime in the theater. Again we suggest, with perfect seriousness, that when played in the concert room it ought always to be accompanied by moving pictures. Here is a matter for Mr. Eastman's consideration.

It served yesterday to display Mr. Monteux's appreciation of Stravinsky's score and the skill of the orchestra; both in an eminent degree. The performance was admirable, thrilling indeed. The vertiginous movement of the music written to delineate the confused bustle of a Russian multitude in enjoyment of a fair was almost dizzying. The device is one of Stravinsky's early inventions; we knew of nothing like it previous to the advent of his piece called "Fireworks." In a different manner the fine muscularity of the body of string instrument players which Mr. Monteux has enlisted was brought into notice by the performance of Mendelssohn's Octet. When a composition designed for intimate performance by a group of solo instruments is transferred to a large band the question whether or not it has gained or lost in effectiveness always comes to the fore in the minds of experienced listeners. Yesterday the transformation seemed justified in the first movement with its large lines of joy and jubilation of splendid color effects in the middle voices; but in the andante we missed the individual utterances which are native and essential to chamber compositions. After the many attacks
serried brass and strident disso
however, the music fell like
ing balm into the ear.

The solo part of the v certo was played by who joined the ran ians at the begin
He is an excelle suave and s dowed with brought, o contents

From STANDARD UNION DEC 5 A
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its second New York Saturday afternoon concert yesterday at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan. A feature of the programme was three movements comprising a concert suite of Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka," music than which none is better qualified to conduct than Mr. Monteux. Another interesting, though more "old-fashioned" work was the Mendelssohn Octette for strings in E flat, op. 20.

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part of Lalo's concerto.

Morning Telegraph
New York DEC 5

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS UNCONVENTIONAL

But Most Satisfying, Audience Agrees at Second Matinee of Series.

The second matinee in the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, with Pierre Monteux conducting. The program was composed of Mendelssohn's "Octette for Strings" in E flat, Op. 20; "Concerto for violin with orchestra," by Lalo, and the Symphonic Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky.

As on former occasions, evidence was shown in all directions of the splendid training of this organization of musicians under the baton of Mr. Monteux, who is serving in his second year as its leader. There is a style and direct manner of presentation in the programs given by the Boston Symphony that tend to fascinate and hold the lover of good music.

The Stravinsky number, the last on yesterday's program, drew the greatest applause, perhaps because of its individuality and uniqueness. Dealing, as the suite does, with four movements, it presents "Fair in Festival Week," a Russian dance, "Petrouchka at Home," "Dance of Coachmen and Grooms" and the "Death of Petrouchka." The varying moods and tempos were impressively shown with Raymond Havens.

The Lalo concerto for violincello and orchestra was well received. It is tuneful, full of rhythm and quite as well known as the beautiful compositions of Mendelssohn. Jean Bedetti appeared as soloist with the orchestra.

The program was far from the old conventional design once followed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it was most satisfying, judging from the modern musical viewpoint.

DEC -5 1920
rom American
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT FORM

Marvellous Tone-Painting in Strawinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite Admirably Rendered.

FARRAR ADMIRED IN "ZAZA"

Leoncavallo's Opera, as Well as Puccini's "La Boheme," Given at Metropolitan.

By MAX SMITH.

At their second matinee of the season, yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux and his band from the Hub produced what was described as an orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," but what proved to be virtually the complete score of Strawinsky's extraordinary work, shortened perhaps by a few undecernible elisions.

The choreographic selection, heard here for the first time without its pictorial context, came at the end of a programme embracing Mendelssohn's charmingly innocent octette in E-flat for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos, played on this occasion by the full string choir, including the bass violas, and Lalo's 'cello concerto with Jean Bedetti, a member of the orchestra, as soloist, and while the Russian composer's grating dissonances presumably disturbed the equanimity of some oldsters in the audience, it was peculiarly inoffensive to ears inured to cacophonies of more recent date.

Truth to tell the Petrouchka music, admirably interpreted under the authoritative direction of Monsieur Monteux, who conducted the Paris premiere, by the way, on June 13, 1911, exerted an irresistible fascination, especially on those who had witnessed the performances in the Century Theatre and Metropolitan Opera House a few years ago.

MARVELLOUS TONE PAINTING.

It seemed to the initiated listener as if every movement of the stage throngs, every gesture, action and step of the principal characters—yes, even their facial expression were palpably presented to the eye, so vividly did this marvellous tone painting react on the memory.

A more striking demonstration of the power of association inherent in music has not been given in this city. But genius alone can achieve such results as Strawinsky has attained in this canvass of resonant color and rhythm.

The Mendelssohn "Octette"—particularly the exquisitely delicate Scherzo—also gave pleasure, though it is preferable in its original form, as last produced here by the Kneisels in 1917. And Monsieur Benedetti gave a brilliant, if somewhat frigid exhibition of his virtuoso skill in the Lalo work. His finger technique is excellent, his intonation impeccable. But the tone he draws from his instrument

---

From Times DEC -5 192
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux presented a curious and unusual program yesterday at the afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It began with Mendelssohn's octet for strings, played by all the strings of the orchestra, including four double basses, which do not appear in the score originally, and ended with the music of Igor Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." Between them Mr. Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, played Lalo's concerto for 'cello.

Mendelssohn's octet is hardly strong enough to bear transplanting in this fashion. And, furthermore, when such transplantation is attempted, it is more or less in the nature of a tour de force, and it must succeed as such. Now, it scarcely did so succeed. The performance had not all the delicacy, the finished precision of ensemble that it should have had. Mr. Monteux's strings have been greatly improved since the reorganization of the orchestra, both in quality of tone and in finish. It was natural that he should want to show what they could do; but he would have waited a while to advantage. The finer quality of tone was most in evidence; there is still something to do in the polishing of the ensemble.

And the octet itself seemed to have aged. The first movement now sounds the most vital; the andante seems singularly weak. The scherzo, which Mendelssohn thought enough of to introduce into one of his earlier symphonies in place of a minuet, is not so engrossing as some of his other elf-like pieces. The octet is still a remarkable product for a boy of 16; but he did better as a boy of 17. with the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture.

The "Petrouchka" ballet was a not wholly fortunate selection for an orchestral concert. The ballet itself upon the stage is a fascinating production, endless in its stores of wit and sarcasm, its musical characterization of the vast and whirling phantasmagoria, the fantastic and symbolical burlesque. It attracted much attention and much admiration at its performances here. But in such a thing as this the music is inseparably bound up with the action on the stage, with the characters, their appearances and the least details of their doings. Without them it is in large degree meaningless and pointless.

Stravinsky, to be sure, wrote "Petrouchka" with something more to say musically than he has had in his latest pieces. But even so, the music is quite unable to stand alone and must have been a mystery to those who had not seen the ballet. They could perhaps hear and enjoy the delicious imitation of the wheezy hand-organ, a mystery in clever instrumentation, in the first section; and the characteristic Russian dance tune in the last. The rest, to be appreciated, must be seen as well as heard.

Mr. Bedetti's playing of the concerto by Lalo was excellent in tone, in finished technique, in musicianly feeling. The concerto is not quite so exorbitant as some others in its demands on the player for merely technical display in awkward positions and ungainly passage work. What it did demand he met with full competence. But it is not deeply interesting as music.

HERALD
ess New York City
DEC 5 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Pierre Monteux exhibited the qualities of his strings at the second matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The composition selected for this ambitious purpose was Mendelssohn's octet in E flat, opus 20. The work is one of those pleasant productions which flowed so suavely from the pen of the writer and which are not often heard either in their original form or in the guise of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux directed the music with conviction, but not with wholly satisfying results. The performance was commendable, but by no means flawless. The tonal quality of the string choir left something to the imagination. The lucid character of the older Bostonians' tone was wanting and there was no great degree of finish.

The soloist was Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the organization, and he played Lalo's concerto. Most cello concertos are labored creations and this one is no exception to the rule. Mr. Bedetti played it with boldness of style and accuracy of finger technic, but with little warmth of color. The final number was the orchestral suite arranged from Stravinsky's familiar ballet "Petrouchka." Mr. Monteux cherishes a natural affection for this music with which he has so long been associated, but it is more effective in the theatre than in the concert hall.

Young People's Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is devoting this week to giving three concerts at nominal prices for young people, which defer the next regular concerts until Dec 17 and 18. Tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents for Tuesday and Thursday afternoons at 4 are on sale only through schools and settlement houses. Tickets for Friday at 4 may be had at the box office in Symphony Hall, with the understanding that adults unaccompanied by young people not over high school age will not be admitted.

The program is the same for all three concerts. It is arranged so as to illustrate the instruments of the orchestra in solo passages. The complete list of numbers is as follows:

Rossini, overture to the opera, "The Italian in Algiers," (with oboe solo); Bach, dances from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, two movements from the symphony, "From the New World"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, second movement from the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"; Bizet, Farandole from the suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.

GLOBE DEC. 5

[59]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Symphony Hall next week on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 17 and 18, the coming week being devoted to Young People's concerts.

The program for this, the eighth pair, comprises Weber's Overture to "Preciosa," the Gaelic symphonic poem, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in America, and Balakireff's oriental fantasy, "Islamey," which brilliant work has been set for orchestra by Alfred Casella, who figures prominently among the younger composers of Italy. Richard Burgin, concert master, will play as soloist for the first time at these concerts the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D-minor.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

This week instead of the regular subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be Young People's concerts. The aim is to acquaint the younger generation with representative symphonic music as played by the full Symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux, its regular conductor. Concerts will be given on Tuesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. All seats will be allotted to Boston schools and settlements. Since the demand for seats cannot be met by these two concerts, a third will be given on Friday afternoon, for which tickets are sold at the Symphony Hall box office. Each concert will take place at 4 o'clock and the tickets will be sold at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents. No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

Overture to the opera "The Italian in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B minor .... Bach
Movements from the Symphony "From the New World" .... Dvorak Largo.
Scherzo.
Second Movement from the Symphonic suite "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne," Suite No. 2 .... Bizet

HERALD. DEC. 5.

YOUNG FOLKS' SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote the coming week to a series of young people's concerts on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday afternoons at 4 o'clock. All seats for Tuesday and Thursday are being distributed in schools and settlements. Seats for the Friday concert are on sale at nominal prices. Pierre Monteux has arranged the following program:

Overture to the Opera, "The Italian in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B minor .... Bach
Two Movements from the Symphony, "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Second Movement from the Symphony Suite, "Scheherazade" .. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Farandole from the Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 .... Bizet

ADVERTISER. DEC. 5.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR YOUNG FOLK

Returning from their second southern trip, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote the coming week to a series of Young People's Concerts, instead of the regular pair. These will take place on the afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Dec. 7, 9 and 10, at 4 o'clock. Their purpose is to acquaint the younger folk of Boston with the pleasures and beauties of symphonic music as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRAV. DEC. 4-?

THE BOSTON SYMPH

Boston Symphony

Since the coming week will be occupied by the second Southern trip of the orchestra, and the following week by Young People's concerts, the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18. At these concerts Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will for the first time play as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His number will be the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Weber's overture to the opera "Preciosa." Two new works to be played on this occasion are the Gaelic symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), and Balakireff's pictorial "Islamey," arranged into an "Oriental Fantasy" by the noted Italian composer of the younger generation, Alfred Casella.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from its second Southern trip, which will occupy the coming week, it will devote the following week to concerts for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation. For the two concerts, which will befall on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 7, and Thursday afternoon, Dec. 9, all seats will be apportioned through the medium of the public schools and settlements of Boston. In order to meet the inevitable large demands from those disappointed in this allotment, a third concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 10, for which the seats are now on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall.

The same programme will be given at each of these three concerts, since each will have an entirely different public. Each will begin at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and the nominal prices for seats will be 25, 35 and 50 cents. The rule will hold that no adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The object of these concerts, which were so successfully instituted last season, is to acquaint our young people with the finest symphonic music as played by the full Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor. Pierre Monteux has compiled a programme which will represent the best music in the orchestral repertory and yet be of direct appeal. He has further planned his programme to reveal in turn the different instruments in the orchestra by the incidental solos which occur in the scores.

DEC. 5

New York and Mr. Monteux's Music

At their concert in New York on Saturday afternoon last, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra played the "symphonic suite" from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka," heard at home a week ago. In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel writes of piece and performance as hereunder and most of the reviewers in New York were substantially of his mind:

In its place—which means in the theatre and as an accompaniment to pictures and action—this music is quite the most extraordinary composition with which we are familiar. But as music pure and simple there is little of it which has qualifications for the concert-room. That little is summed up in Stravinsky's treatment of Russian folk-tunes, or melodies based on those tunes. The rest is mere grotesquerie which may amuse; in fact, it does that, but must also bewilder all those who listen to it without having gone through the experience of witnessing the comically pathetic or pathetically comic pantomime in the theatre. It served yesterday to display Mr. Monteux's appreciation of the score and the skill of the orchestra; both in an eminent degree. The performance was admirable, thrilling indeed. The vertiginous movement of the music written to delineate the confused bustle of a Russian multitude in enjoyment of a fair was almost dizzying. The device is one of Stravinsky's early inventions; we knew of nothing like it previous to the advent of his piece called "Fireworks."

In a different manner the fine muscularity of the body of string instrument players which Mr. Monteux has enlisted was brought into notice by the performance of Mendelssohn's Octette. When a composition designed for intimate performance by a group of instruments is transferred to a large band, the question whether or not it

All but five members of the
made on the stage of Symph

Pierre Monteux, conducto
Violins—Burgin, R., conc
stein, S., Hoffmann, J., Mahn,
Lewen, P., Murray, J., Knud
Deslce, C., Messina, S., Tapl
Violas—Denayer, F., Arti
Kluge, M., Zahn, F.
Violoncellos—Bedetti, J., S
Stockbridge, C., Marjollet, L.
Basses—Kunze, M., Gerha
Girard, H.
Flutes—Laurent, G., Brook
Clarinets—Sand, A., Vanni
Piccolo—Battles, A. Eng
Bass Clarinet—Mimart, H
Horns—Wendler, G., Lorbe
Trumpets—Mager, G., Man
Trombones—Hampe, C., A
Harps—Holy, A., Van Den
Percussion—Rettberg, A.,
Tuba—Lemcke, C. Organ

gained or lost in effectiveness comes to the fore in the mind
perienced listeners. Yester transformation seemed justifie
first movement, with its large
joy and jubilation of splend effects in the middle voices; b andante we missed the indiv terances which are native an tial to chamber compositions.

Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tom
at the preceding concert of Thur
ing likewise excited the curios
reviewers in New York. Mr. A
The Times thought well of it:
he writes, "who has ever heard of Couperin would mistake Ra ne for his, and the title is pr
cial. . . . The four movem ever, are quite characteristic
The Minuet and the Rigaudon
a curious charm of their own,
don a decorous gayety. The tion is of Ravel's acid sweet less pronounced manner, stim refreshing. The orchestra is much delicacy and grace of oboe gives it characteristic c
Krehbiel also yielded to the c suite, but he resented what he val's strenuous effort to avoid t

New York
GLOBE EV. DEC 6 X

Music.

The Boston Symphony O tra and Other Music.

By PITTS SANBORN.

A decidedly unconventional gramme marked the season's s Boston Symphony matinée in gie Hall Saturday afternoo
the first place, Mr. Monteux ch present as the opening number symphony but Mendelssohn's strings in E flat, played b string choirs of the orchestra.
he made this selection to e without interference from wi
percussion instruments the strings in all their beauty unad is not the first conductor the octet. And the served its purpose very well.
truth to tell, much of this co remarkable for a boy still has already gone the w flesh and most music.
After the octet Jean Bedett
'cellist of the orchestra,
in the Lalo 'cello concerto Bedetti revealed a sonorous ton proved himself a good technicia especially as to his left hand. Hi with the audience was con
For the final number on th gramme Mr. Monteux offered a from Stravinsky's ballet
"Petrouchka," which, for some m reason, has dropped from th repertory of the Metropolitan House, though the production a capital one. It was acco particular pleasure to hear th Saturday, in spite of the fa of it loses much of its eff in the concert room who was the

From
Tribune
New York City
DEC 5 - 1920

Varied Music By Orchestra From Boston

Program of Contrasts at Carnegie Hall Serves to Bring Out Skill of Symphony in Eminent Degree

Familiar Ballet Given

Jean Bedetti, in Solo Part of Violoncello Concerto, Shows Suave Mastery

By H. E. Krehbiel

Yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program of contrasts: Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat for strings; Lalo's Concerto for violoncello and what was called a "symphonic suite" (why, we cannot even guess) made out of some of the music composed by Stravinsky for the ballet "Petrouchka." The ballet music was the most familiar of these compositions to the people who go to the opera, as well as to symphonic concerts, and what remarks upon it the occasion invited may as well as not be made at once. In its place—which means in the theater and as an accompaniment to pictures and action—this music is quite the most extraordinary composition with which we are familiar. Not in the region in which high imagination dwells, but in the abode of careless fancy, Stravinsky's music, illustrative to a story of poor Punchinello, is an amazing agency in coördinating sight and hearing or confounding them, making the eyes hear and the ears see. But as music pure and simple there is little of it which has the qualifications which fit it for the concert room. That little is summed up in his treatment of Russian folksong tunes or melodies based on those tunes. The rest is mere grotesquerie which may amuse; in fact, it does that, but must also bewilder all those who listen to it without having gone through the experience of witnessing the comically pathetic or pathetically comic pantomime in the theater. Again we suggest, with perfect seriousness, that when played in the concert room it ought always to be accompanied by moving pictures. Here is a matter for Mr. Eastman's consideration.

It served yesterday to display Mr. Monteux's appreciation of Stravinsky's score and the skill of the orchestra; both in an eminent degree. The performance was admirable, thrilling indeed. The vertiginous movement of the music written to delineate the confused bustle of a Russian multitude in enjoyment of a fair was almost dizzying. The device is one of Stravinsky's early inventions; we knew of nothing like it previous to the advent of his piece called "Fireworks." In a different manner the fine muscularity of the body of string instrument players which Mr. Monteux has enlisted was brought into notice by the performance of Mendelssohn's Octet. When a composition designed for intimate performance by a group of solo instruments is transferred to a large band the question whether or not it has gained or lost in effectiveness always comes to the fore in the minds of experienced listeners. Yesterday the transformation seemed justified in the first movement with its large lines of joy and jubilation of splendid color effects in the middle voices; but in the andante we missed the individual utterances which are native and essential to chamber compositions. After the many attacks
serried brass and strident disso
however, the music fell like
ing balm into the ear.

The solo part of the vi
certo was played by
who joined the ran
ians at the begin
He is an excell suave and s dowed with brought ov contents

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 5 A

At Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its second New York Saturday afternoon concert yesterday at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan. A feature of the programme was three movements comprising a concert suite of Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka," music than which none is better qualified to conduct than Mr. Monteux. Another interesting, though more "old-fashioned" work was the Mendelssohn Octette for strings in E flat, op. 20.

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part of Lalo's concerto.

Morning Telegraph
New York
DEC 5

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS UNCONVENTIONAL

But Most Satisfying, Audience Agrees at Second Matinee of Series.

The second matinee in the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, with Pierre Monteux conducting. The program was composed of Mendelssohn's "Octette for Strings" in E flat, Op. 20; "Concerto for violin with orchestra," by Lalo, and the Symphonic Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky.

As on former occasions, evidence was shown in all directions of the splendid training of this organization of musicians under the baton of Mr. Monteux, who is serving in his second year as its leader. There is a style and direct manner of presentation in the programs given by the Boston Symphony that tend to fascinate and hold the lover of good music.

The Stravinsky number, the last on yesterday's program, drew the greatest applause, perhaps because of its individuality and uniqueness. Dealing, as the suite does, with four movements, it presents "Fair in Festival Week," a Russian dance, "Petrouchka at Home," "Dance of Coachmen and Grooms" and the "Death of Petrouchka." The varying moods and tempos were impressively shown with Raymond Havens.

The Lalo concerto for violincello and orchestra was well received. It is tuneful, full of rhythm and quite as well known as the beautiful compositions of Mendelssohn. Jean Bedetti appeared as soloist with the orchestra.

The program was far from the old conventional design once followed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it was most satisfying, judging from the modern musical viewpoint.

---

rom American
New York City
DEC 5 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT FORM

Marvellous Tone-Painting in Strawinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite Admirably Rendered.

FARRAR ADMIRED IN "ZAZA"

Leoncavallo's Opera, as Well as Puccini's "La Boheme," Given at Metropolitan.

By MAX SMITH.

At their second matinee of the season, yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux and his band from the Hub produced what was described as an orchestral suite from the ballet 'Petrouchka," but what proved to be virtually the complete score of Strawinsky's extraordinary work, shortened perhaps by a few undecernible elisions.

The choreographic selection, heard here for the first time without its pictorial context, came at the end of a programme embracing Mendelssohn's charmingly innocent octette in E-flat for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos, played on this occasion by the full string choir, including the bass violas, and Lalo's 'cello concerto with Jean Bedetti, a member of the orchestra, as soloist, and while the Russian composer's grating dissonances presumably disturbed the equanimity of some oldsters in the audience, it was peculiarly inoffensive to ears inured to cacophonies of more recent date.

Truth to tell the Petrouchka music, admirably interpreted under the authoritative direction of Monsieur Monteux, who conducted the Paris premiere, by the way, on June 13, 1911, exerted an irresistible fascination, especially on those who had witnessed the performances in the Century Theatre and Metropolitan Opera House a few years ago.

MARVELLOUS TONE PAINTING.

It seemed to the initiated listener as if every movement of the stage throngs, every gesture, action and step of the principal characters—yes, even their facial expression were palpably presented to the eye, so vividly did this marvellous tone-painting react on the memory.

A more striking demonstration of the power of association inherent in music has not been given in this city. But genius alone can achieve such results as Strawinsky has attained in this canvass of resonant color and rhythm.

The Mendelssohn "Octette"—particularly the exquisitely delicate Scherzo—also gave pleasure, though it is preferable in its original form, as last produced here by the Kneisels in 1917. And Monsieur Benedetti gave a brilliant, if somewhat frigid exhibition of his virtuoso skill in the Lalo work. His finger technique is excellent, his intonation impeccable. But the tone he draws from his instrument

---

From
Times
New York City
DEC -5 192

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux presented a curious and unusual program yesterday at the afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It began with Mendelssohn's octet for strings, played by all the strings of the orchestra, including four double basses, which do not appear in the score originally, and ended with the music of Igor Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" Between them Mr. Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, played Lalo's concerto for 'cello.

Mendelssohn's octet is hardly strong enough to bear transplanting in this fashion. And, furthermore, when such transplantation is attempted, it is more or less in the nature of a tour de force, and it must succeed as such. Now, it scarcely did so succeed. The performance had not all the delicacy, the finished precision of ensemble that it should have had. Mr. Monteux's strings have been greatly improved since the reorganization of the orchestra, both in quality of tone and in finish. It was natural that he should want to show what they could do; but he would have waited a while to advantage. The finer quality of tone was most in evidence; there is still something to do in the polishing of the ensemble.

And the octet itself seemed to have aged. The first movement now sounds the most vital; the andante seems singularly weak. The scherzo, which Mendelssohn thought enough of to introduce into one of his earlier symphonies in place of a minuet, is not so engrossing as some of his other elf-like pieces. The octet is still a remarkable product for a boy of 16; but he did better as a boy of 17 with the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture.

The "Petrouchka" ballet was a not wholly fortunate selection for an orchestral concert. The ballet itself upon the stage is a fascinating production, endless in its stores of wit and sarcasm, its musical characterization of the vast and whirling phantasmagoria, the fantastic and symbolical burlesque. It attracted much attention and much admiration at its performances here. But in such a thing as this the music is inseparably bound up with the action on the stage, with the characters, their appearances and the least details of their doings. Without them it is in large degree meaningless and pointless.

Stravinsky, to be sure, wrote "Petrouchka" with something more to say musically than he has had in his latest pieces. But even so, the music is quite unable to stand alone and must have been a mystery to those who had not seen the ballet. They could perhaps hear and enjoy the delicious imitation of the wheezy hand-organ, a mystery in clever instrumentation, in the first section; and the characteristic Russian dance tune in the last. The rest, to be appreciated, must be seen as well as heard.

Mr. Bedetti's playing of the concerto by Lalo was excellent in tone, in finished technique, in musicianly feeling. The concerto is not quite so exorbitant as some others in its demands on the player for merely technical display in awkward positions and ungainly passage work. What it did demand he met with full competence. But it is not deeply interesting as music.

HERALD
ess New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Pierre Monteux exhibited the qualities of his strings at the second matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The composition selected for this ambitious purpose was Mendelssohn's octet in E flat, opus 20. The work is one of those pleasant productions which flowed so suavely from the pen of the writer and which are not often heard either in their original form or in the guise of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux directed the music with conviction, but not with wholly satisfying results. The performance was commendable, but by no means flawless. The tonal quality of the string choir left something to the imagination. The lucid character of the older Bostonians' tone was wanting and there was no great degree of finish.

The soloist was Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the organization, and he played Lalo's concerto. Most cello concertos are labored creations and this one is no exception to the rule. Mr. Bedetti played it with boldness of style and accuracy of finger technic, but with little warmth of color. The final number was the orchestral suite arranged from Stravinsky's familiar ballet "Petrouchka." Mr. Monteux cherishes a natural affection for this music with which he has so long been associated, but it is more effective in the theatre than in the concert hall.

Young People's Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is devoting this week to giving three concerts at nominal prices for young people, which defer the next regular concerts until Dec 17 and 18. Tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents for Tuesday and Thursday afternoons at 4 are on sale only through schools and settlement houses. Tickets for Friday at 4 may be had at the box office in Symphony Hall, with the understanding that adults unaccompanied by young people not over high school age will not be admitted.

The program is the same for all three concerts. It is arranged so as to illustrate the instruments of the orchestra in solo passages. The complete list of numbers is as follows:

Rossini, overture to the opera, "The Italian in Algiers," (with oboe solo); Bach, dances from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, two movements from the symphony, "From the New World"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, second movement from the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"; Bizet, Farandole from the suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.

GLOBE DEC. 5

THE SUNDAY J

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Symphony Hall next week on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 17 and 18, the coming week being devoted to Young People's concerts.

The program for this, the eighth pair, comprises Weber's Overture to "Preciosa," the Gaelic symphonic poem, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in America, and Balakireff's oriental fantasy, "Islamey," which brilliant work has been set for orchestra by Alfred Casella, who figures prominently among the younger composers of Italy. Richard Burgin, concert master, will play as soloist for the first time at these concerts the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D-minor.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

This week instead of the regular subscription concerto of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be Young People's concerts. The aim is to acquaint the younger generation with representative symphonic music as played by the full Symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux, its regular conductor. Concerts will be given on Tuesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. All seats will be allotted to Boston schools and settlements. Since the demand for seats cannot be met by these two concerts, a third will be given on Friday afternoon, for which tickets are sold at the Symphony Hall box office. Each concert will take place at 4 o'clock and the tickets will be sold at the nominal rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents. No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

Overture to the opera "The Italian in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B minor........ Bach
Movements from the Symphony "From the New World" .... Dvorak Largo.
Scherzo.
Second Movement from the Symphonic suite "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne," Suite No. 2 .... Bizet

HERALD DEC. 5

YOUNG FOLKS' SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote the coming week to a series of young people's concerts on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday afternoons at 4 o'clock. All seats for Tuesday and Thursday are being distributed in schools and settlements. Seats for the Friday concert are on sale at nominal prices. Pierre Monteux has arranged the following program:

Overture to the Opera, "The Italian in Algiers" .... Rossini
Dances from the Suite in B minor ...... Bach
Two Movements from the Symphony, "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Second Movement from the Symphony Suite, "Scheherazade" .. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Farandole from the Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 .... Bizet

ADVERTISER. DEC. 5

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR YOUNG FOLK

Returning from their second southern trip, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote the coming week to a series of Young People's Concerts, instead of the regular pair. These will take place on the afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Dec. 7, 9 and 10, at 4 o'clock. Their purpose is to acquaint the younger folk of Boston with the pleasures and beauties of symphonic music as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRAV. DEC. 4-?

Boston Symphony

Since the coming week will be occupied by the second Southern trip of the orchestra, and the following week by Young People's concerts, the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18. At these concerts Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will for the first time play as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His number will be the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Weber's overture to the opera "Preciosa." Two new works to be played on this occasion are the Gaelic symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy Hills"), and Balakireff's pictorial "Islamey," arranged into an "Oriental Fantasy" by the noted Italian composer of the younger generation, Alfred Casella.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns from its second Southern trip, which will occupy the coming week, it will devote the following week to concerts for the pleasure and edification of the younger generation. For the two concerts, which will befall on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 7, and Thursday afternoon, Dec. 9, all seats will be apportioned through the medium of the public schools and settlements of Boston. In order to meet the inevitable large demands from those disappointed in this allotment, a third concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Dec 10, for which the seats are now on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall.

The same programme will be given at each of these three concerts, since each will have an entirely different public. Each will begin at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and the nominal prices for seats will be 25, 35 and 50 cents. The rule will hold that no adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The object of these concerts, which were so successfully instituted last season, is to acquaint our young people with the finest symphonic music as played by the full Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor. Pierre Monteux has compiled a programme which will represent the best music in the orchestral repertory and yet be of direct appeal. He has further planned his programme to reveal in turn the different instruments in the orchestra by the incidental solos which occur in the scores.

New York and Mr. Monteux's Music

At their concert in New York on Saturday afternoon last, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra played the "symphonic suite" from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka," heard at home a week ago. In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel writes of piece and performance as hereunder and most of the reviewers in New York were substantially of his mind:

In its place—which means in the theatre and as an accompaniment to pictures and action—this music is quite the most extraordinary composition with which we are familiar. But as music pure and simple there is little of it which has qualifications for the concert-room. That little is summed up in Stravinsky's treatment of Russian folk-tunes, or melodies based on those tunes. The rest is mere grotesquerie which may amuse; in fact, it does that, but must also bewilder all those who listen to it without having gone through the experience of witnessing the comically pathetic or pathetically comic pantomime in the theatre. It served yesterday to display Mr. Monteux's appreciation of the score and the skill of the orchestra; both in an eminent degree. The performance was admirable, thrilling indeed. The vertiginous movement of the music written to delineate the confused bustle of a Russian multitude in enjoyment of a fair was almost dizzying. The device is one of Stravinsky's early inventions; we knew of nothing like it previous to the advent of his piece called "Fireworks."

In a different manner the fine muscularity of the body of string instrument players which Mr. Monteux has enlisted was brought into notice by the performance of Mendelssohn's Octette. When a composition designed for intimate performance by a group of solo instruments is transferred to a large band the question whether or not it

---

THE BOSTON SYMPH

All but five members of the
made on the stage of Symph

Pierre Monteux, conducto
Violins—Burgin, R., conc
stein, S., Hoffmann, J., Mahn,
Leveen, P., Murray, J., Knud
Deance, C., Messina, S., Tapl
Violas—Denayer, F., Arti
Kluge, M., Zahn, F.
Violoncellos—Bedetti, J., S
Stockbridge, C., Marjollet, L.
Basses—Kunze, M., Gerha
Girard, H.
Flutes—Laurent, G., Brook
Clarinets—Sand, A., Vanni
Piccolo—Battles, A. Eng
Bass Clarinet—Mimart, I
Horns—Wendler, G., Lorbe
Trumpets—Mager, G., Man
Trombones—Hampe, C., A
Harps—Holy, A., Van Den
Percussion—Rettberg, A.,
Tuba—Lemcke, C. Organ

gained or lost in effectiveness
comes to the fore in the mind
perienced listeners. Yester
transformation seemed justifie
first movement, with its large
joy and jubilation of splend
effects in the middle voices; b andante we missed the indivi terances which are native an
tial to chamber compositions.
Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tom
at the preceding concert of Thur
ing likewise excited the curios
reviewers in New York. Mr. A
The Times thought well of it:
he writes, "who has ever heard
of Couperin would mistake Ra
ne for his, and the title is pr cipal. . . . The four movem ever, are quite characteristic
The Minuet and the Rigaudon
a curious charm of their own,
don a decorous gayety. The
tion is of Ravel's acid sweet
less pronounced manner, stim
refreshing. The orchestra is much delicacy and grace of
oboe gives it characteristic c
Krehbiel also yielded to the c
suite, but he resented what he
val's strenuous effort to avoid t

New York
GLOBE EV.
DEC 6

Music.

The Boston Symphony O tra and Other Music.

By PITTS SANBORN.

decidedly unconventional gramme marked the season's Boston Symphony matinée in negie Hall Saturday afternoo
the first place, Mr. Monteux ch
present as the opening number symphony but Mendelssohn's for strings in E flat, played string choirs of the orchestra.
less he made this selection to e
without interference from wi
percussion instruments the
strings in all their beauty unad
He is not the first conductor treat the octet. And the served its purpose very well.
truth to tell, much of this co
, remarkable for a boy still teens, has already gone the w all flesh and most music.
After the octet Jean Bedett
'cellist of the orchestra,
d in the Lalo 'cello concerto etti revealed a sonorous ton ved himself a good technicia ally as to his left hand. Hi
with the audience was con
For the final number on th mme Mr. Monteux offered a n from Stravinsky's ballet chka," which, for some my reason, has dropped from th
ry of the Metropolitan se, though the production a capital one. It was accor rticular pleasure to hear the aturday, in spite of the fac of it loses much of its effe in the concert room. Mr.
, who was the original con is difficult work, led it Sat the authority of complete x and the Boston men

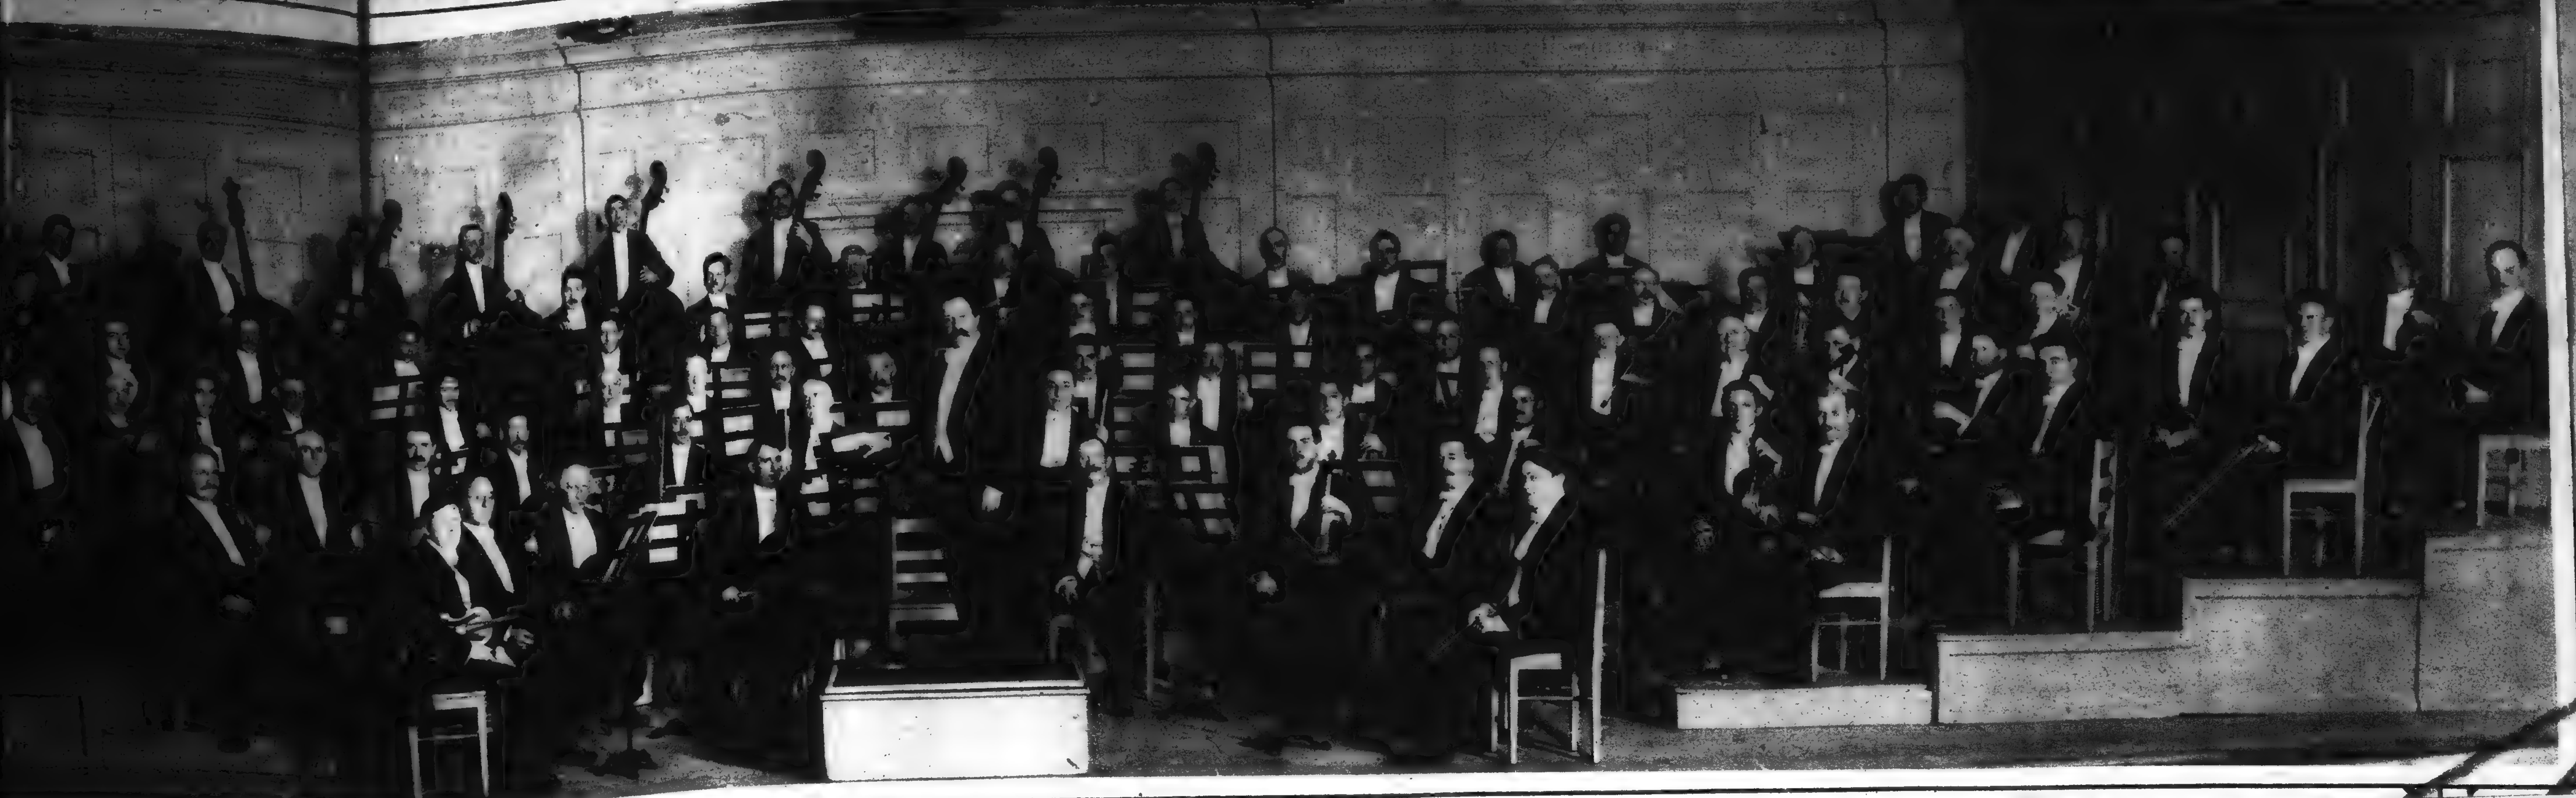
[59]



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN ITS FORTIETH YE

All but five members of the famous New England institution were present when this photograph was made on the stage of Symphony hall in Boston. The personnel of the orchestra, as photographed, is:

Pierre Monteux, conductor.
Violins—Burgin, R., concert-master; Theodorowicz, J., Gundersen, R., Pinfield, C., Thillois, F., Goldstein, S., Hoffmann, J., Mahn, F., Berger, H., Hoffmann E., Kurth, R., Gerardi, A., Hamilton, V., Fiedler, B., Leveen, P., Murray, J., Knudsen, C., Sauvlet, H., Barozzi, S., Riedlinger, H., Gorodetzky, L., Stonestreet, L., Deance, C., Messina, S., Tapley, R., Reed, L., Seiniger, S., Del Sordo, R.
Violas—Denayer, F., Artieres, L., Van Wynbergen, C., Shirley, P., Grover, H., Mullaly, J., Gerhardt, S., Kluge, M., Zahn, F.
Violoncellos—Bedetti, J., Schroeder, A., Keller, J., Barth, C., Belinski, M., Fabrizio, E., Warnke, J., Stockbridge, C., Marjollet, L.
Basses—Kunze, M., Gerhardt, G., Seydel, T., Frankel, I., Ludwig, O., Demetrides, L., Kelley, A., Girard, H.
Flutes—Laurent, G., Brooke, A., Amerena, P. Oboes—Longy, G., Lenom, C., Stanislaus, H.
Clarinets—Sand, A., Vannini, A., Forlani, N. Bassoons—Laus, A., Mueller, E., Bettoney, F.
Piccolo—Battles, A. English Horns—Mueller, F., Speyer, L.
Bass Clarinet—Mimart, P. Contra-Bassoon—Piller, B.
Horns—Wendler, G., Lorbeer, H., Hain, F., Gebhardt, W., Van Den Berg, C., Hess, M.
Trumpets—Mager, G., Mann, J., Kloepfel, L.
Trombones—Hampe, C., Adam, E., Mausebach, A., Kenfield, L.
Harps—Holy, A., Van Den Berg, W. Tympani—Neumann, S., Kandler, F.
Percussion—Rettberg, A., Ludwig, C., Burkhardt, H.
Tuba—Lemcke, C. Organ—Snow, A. Librarian—Rogers, L. J.

---

oston Symphony

coming week will be occupied ond Southern trip of the or- nd the following week by ple's concerts, the next regu- Boston Symphony concerts en in Symphony Hall on Fri- oon and Saturday evening, nd 18. At these concerts urgin, the new concertmaster hestra, will for the first time oloist with the Boston Sym- hestra. His number will be Concerto of Brahms in D ierre Monteux will open the ith Weber's overture to the eciosa." Two new works to on this occasion are the mphonic poem by Arnold Bax, gh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy nd Balakireff's pictorial "Is- rranged into an "Oriental Fan- the noted Italian composer of er generation, Alfred Casella.

PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

e Boston Symphony Orchestra om its second Southern trip, l occupy the coming week, it te the following week to con- the pleasure and edification unger generation. For the two which will befall on Tuesday , Dec. 7, and Thursday after- . 9, all seats will be appor- rough the medium of the pub- ols and settlements of Boston to meet the inevitable large from those disappointed in this t, a third concert will be given y afternoon, Dec. 10, for which s are now on sale at the box Symphony Hall.

ame programme will be given at these three concerts, since each ve an entirely different public. vill begin at 4 o'clock in the af- , and the nominal prices for will be 25, 35 and 50 cents. The ll hold that no adult will be ad- unless accompanied by one or hildren. The object of these con- which were so successfully insti- last season, is to acquaint our people with the finest symphonic as played by the full Symphony stra under its regular conductor. Monteux has compiled a pro- e which will represent the best in the orchestral repertory and of direct appeal. He has further ed his programme to reveal in the different instruments in the stra by the incidental solos which in the scores.

RALD. DEC. 6.

k and Mr. Monteux's Music

ir concert in New York on Satur- ernoon last, Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra played the "symphonic rom Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrush- ard at home a week ago. In The . Mr. Krehbiel writes of piece and ance as hereunder and most of the rs in New York were substantially nind:

its place—which means in the re and as an accompaniment to res and action—this music is quite most extraordinary composition which we are familiar. But as c pure and simple there is little which has qualifications for the ert-room. That little is summed n Stravinsky's treatment of Rus- folk-tunes, or melodies based hose tunes. The rest is mere gro- uerie which may amuse; in fact, oes that, but must also bewilder hose who listen to it without hav- gone through the experience of nessing the comically pathetic or netically comic pantomime in the tre. It served yesterday to display Monteux's appreciation of the s and the skill of the orchestra; in an eminent degree. The per- mance was admirable, thrilling in- d. The vertiginous movement of music written to delineate the com- ed bustle of a Russian multitude enjoyment of a fair was almost zying. The device is one of Stra- sky's early inventions; we knew of hing like it previous to the advent his piece called "Fireworks." n a different manner the fine mus- arity of the body of string instru- nt players which Mr. Monteux has isted was brought into notice by the rformance of Mendelssohn's Octette [illegible]

---

gained or lost in effectiveness always comes to the fore in the minds of experienced listeners. Yesterday the transformation seemed justified in the first movement, with its large lines of joy and jubilation of splendid color effects in the middle voices; but in the andante we missed the individual utterances which are native and essential to chamber compositions.

Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tomb," played at the preceding concert of Thursday evening likewise excited the curiosity of the reviewers in New York. Mr. Aldrich for The Times thought well of it: "Nobody," he writes, "who has ever heard the music of Couperin would mistake Ravel's manner for his, and the title is probably fanciful. . . . The four movements, however, are quite characteristic of Ravel. The Minuet and the Rigaudon have each a curious charm of their own, the Rigaudon a decorous gayety. The harmonization is of Ravel's acid sweetness in his less pronounced manner, stimulating and refreshing. The orchestra is used with much delicacy and grace of sound; the oboe gives it characteristic color." Mr. Krehbiel also yielded to the charm of the suite, but he resented what he calls "Ravel's strenuous effort to avoid the obvious."

TRANS. DEC. 6

New York
GLOBE EV.
DEC 6 X V

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Other Music.

By PITTS SANBORN.

A decidedly unconventional programme marked the season's second Boston Symphony matinée in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. In the first place, Mr. Monteux chose to present as the opening number not a symphony but Mendelssohn's octet for strings in E flat, played by the string choirs of the orchestra. Doubtless he made this selection to exhibit without interference from wind or percussion instruments the Boston strings in all their beauty unadorned. He is not the first conductor so to treat the octet. And the device served its purpose very well. But, truth to tell, much of this composition, remarkable for a boy still in his teens, has already gone the way of all flesh and most music.

After the octet Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was heard in the Lalo 'cello concerto. Mr. Bedetti revealed a sonorous tone and proved himself a good technician, especially as to his left hand. His success with the audience was conspicuous. For the final number on the programme Mr. Monteux offered a suite taken from Stravinsky's ballet "Pétrouchka," which, for some mysterious reason, has dropped from the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House, though the production there was a capital one. It was accordingly a particular pleasure to hear the suite on Saturday, in spite of the fact that some of it loses much of its effectiveness in the concert room. Mr. Monteux, who was the original conductor of this difficult work, led it Saturday with the authority of complete under- [illegible] and the Boston men played

---

EVENING POST
New York City

DEC 6 K

Orchestral Concerts

Pierre Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first became known as the leader of the Russian ballet, which specialized in the works of Stravinsky. He was therefore in his element when he conducted in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon a suite made up of selections from the delightful "Petrouchka." Needless to say, one missed the action and the scenic background, as one does when Wagnerian excerpts are played in the concert halls; but this music is so novel, so individual, so spicy that it enchants wherever it may be heard.

The Philharmonic or

3000 CHILDREN HEAR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

They Vigorously Applaud at Every Opportunity

Musical Appreciation Shown at First of Three Concerts

Symphony Hall was filled to capacity yesterday afternoon for the first of the three young people's concerts to be given this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nearly 3000 children who had obtained tickets at nominal prices through schools and settlement houses applauded Pierre Monteux and the orchestra at every break in a program of short numbers which lasted only an hour.

Preference had been given in allotting tickets for yesterday's concert to children who are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs, and to those who are receiving school credits for outside music study, so that the audience may have been more musical than a crowd of children picked at random would have proved.

All the boys and girls of high school and junior high school age certainly seemed to be listening quietly and thoughtfully. A few little boys were restless and some little girls whispered, but then their elders sometimes annoy other people in the same ways at concerts and theatres. Possibly a rule excluding children under 12 would produce a more thoroughly attentive audience.

Everyone seemed especially interested in the solo qualities of the oboe, bassoon, clarinet, harp, trumpet and other orchestra instruments, which the program was partly designed to illustrate. Numbers by Mozart and Beethoven might well have been put in place of the old-fashioned Rossini overture and the not immediately appealing dances by Bach with which the concert began. Good tunes and vigorous, not too intricate rythms, are what children like best in music as a rule.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony was a better choice, and "Scheherezade" and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" were still better works from which to choose excerpts. The performance averaged about as the regular symphony concerts do nowadays in such repertory pieces as those played yesterday.

Tickets for the second concert on Thursday at 4 are obtainable only through selected schools and settlement houses. In order to satisfy those unable to get tickets in this way, a third concert will be given on Friday at 4, for which there are still seats remaining on sale at the box office in Symphony Hall, at the same scale of prices, 25, 35 and 50 cents. Adults unaccompanied by children cannot be admitted, however.

GLOBE-DEC. 8.

PUPILS ENJOY FIRST CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Gives Numbers Emphasizing Solo Instruments

YOUNG LISTENERS SHOW APPRECIATION

By PHILIP HALE

The first of the young people's concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, overture to "The Italian (woman) in Algiers," Bach, Bourree Polonaise and Badinerie from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, Largo and Scherzo from the symphony "From the New World;" Romsky-Korsakoff, "The Story of the Kalander Prince" from "Scheherazade;" Bizet-Guiraud, Farandole from the suite "L'Arlessienne" No. 2.

For the concert of yesterday and the one tomorrow afternoon all the tickets were distributed through 90 schools and 10 settlements of Greater Boston.

The audience yesterday was especially musical, for the first preference was given to the pupils that are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs; also to pupils that are studying music outside of the schools but are being credited for it in the schools.

The program was arranged so as to acquaint in a measure the young listeners with the quality of several solo instruments. Thus in the odd and once popular overture of the light-hearted Rossini the florid passages for oboe were played delightfully by Mr. Longy. Mr. Laurent's skill and taste were displayed in the movements from Bach's suite, while the English horn solo in Dvorak's largo was played by Mr. Mueller. The movement from "Scheherazade" brought into prominence solos by violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone played by the admirable virtuosos of the orchestra.

The young listeners were greatly interested and pleased. They were warmly appreciative. They watched the players attentively and heard them intelligently. When they talked, the subject was the music of the orchestral instruments.

These concerts will do much to arouse and maintain genuine interest in good music, music that is melodious and strongly rhythmed, whether it be by an Italian, Frenchman, Russian, German or even an American. Mr. Monteux arranged, as he did last season, an excellent program for the purpose; he conducted and the full orchestra played as if the concert were in the regular subscription series.

In order that students of the schools that did not come in the allotment may have an opportunity to hear the orchestra, a third concert will be given the afternoon of Dec. 10, for which tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are now being sold at the Symphony Hall box office. This concert will also accommodate pupils of the various private schools.

Adults will be admitted only as escorts.

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week has been slightly altered. As Beethoven's birth is supposed to have been on Dec. 16, 1770, his overture "The Dedication of the House" has been substituted for Weber's overture to "Preciosa." The other orchestral pieces will be the fantasie, "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold Bax (first time in America) and Balakireff's "Islamey" orchestra by Alfredo Casella (first time in Boston). Richard Burgin, the concert master, will play Brahms's concerto for violin.

HERALD. DEC. 8.

CONCERT FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Symphony Devotes Week to School Children

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first of the Young People's Symphony concerts of the current season, a continuation of the policy which Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated so successfully last year, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. An audience of children from every district of the city, the rich and the poor, the socially "select" and the socially free of such misfortunes, sat side by side and listened to the wonder-tales of the orchestra.

Where, indeed, is the equal of the modern orchestra as a story-teller? And these were the tales: Overture to "The Italians in Algiers," Rossini; "Dances," as they happily called, from Bach's suite, with flute solo, in B minor—the Bourree, the Polonaise, and the Badinerie; the Largo and the Scherzo from Dvorak's "New World" symphony; the second movement, "The Tale of the Two Kalendars," from Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "The Thousand and One Nights," and the "Farandole" from Bizet's suite from "L'Arlesienne."

This was music which every grown-up, musically informed or otherwise, might well expect to enjoy, and it was also music so melodious and brilliant and so depictive of the powers of the various orchestral instruments, that every child must long remember yesterday's experience, and identify in years to come many a musical sensation tasted then for the first time.

The two remaining concerts of this series for children by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this week on Thursday afternoon and Friday afternoon, the 9th and 10th, the entire week being given up to these children's concerts, instead of the orchestral tour usually undertaken at this time of the season. The tickets for the Thursday afternoon concerts have all been distributed, but there are still tickets which can be applied for for the concerts of the next Friday afternoon. The programme for these concerts is just an hour in length, and the time of the beginning—4 o'clock—and the closing 5—make them reasonably convenient even for the children who come into town from more or less distant suburbs.

POST. DEC. 8.

[60]

The Symphony Orchestra Plays to Young People Happily Chosen Pieces — Three Dances or Casella Tamed—Mr. Kreisler Surprises an Audience—Amended Programmes

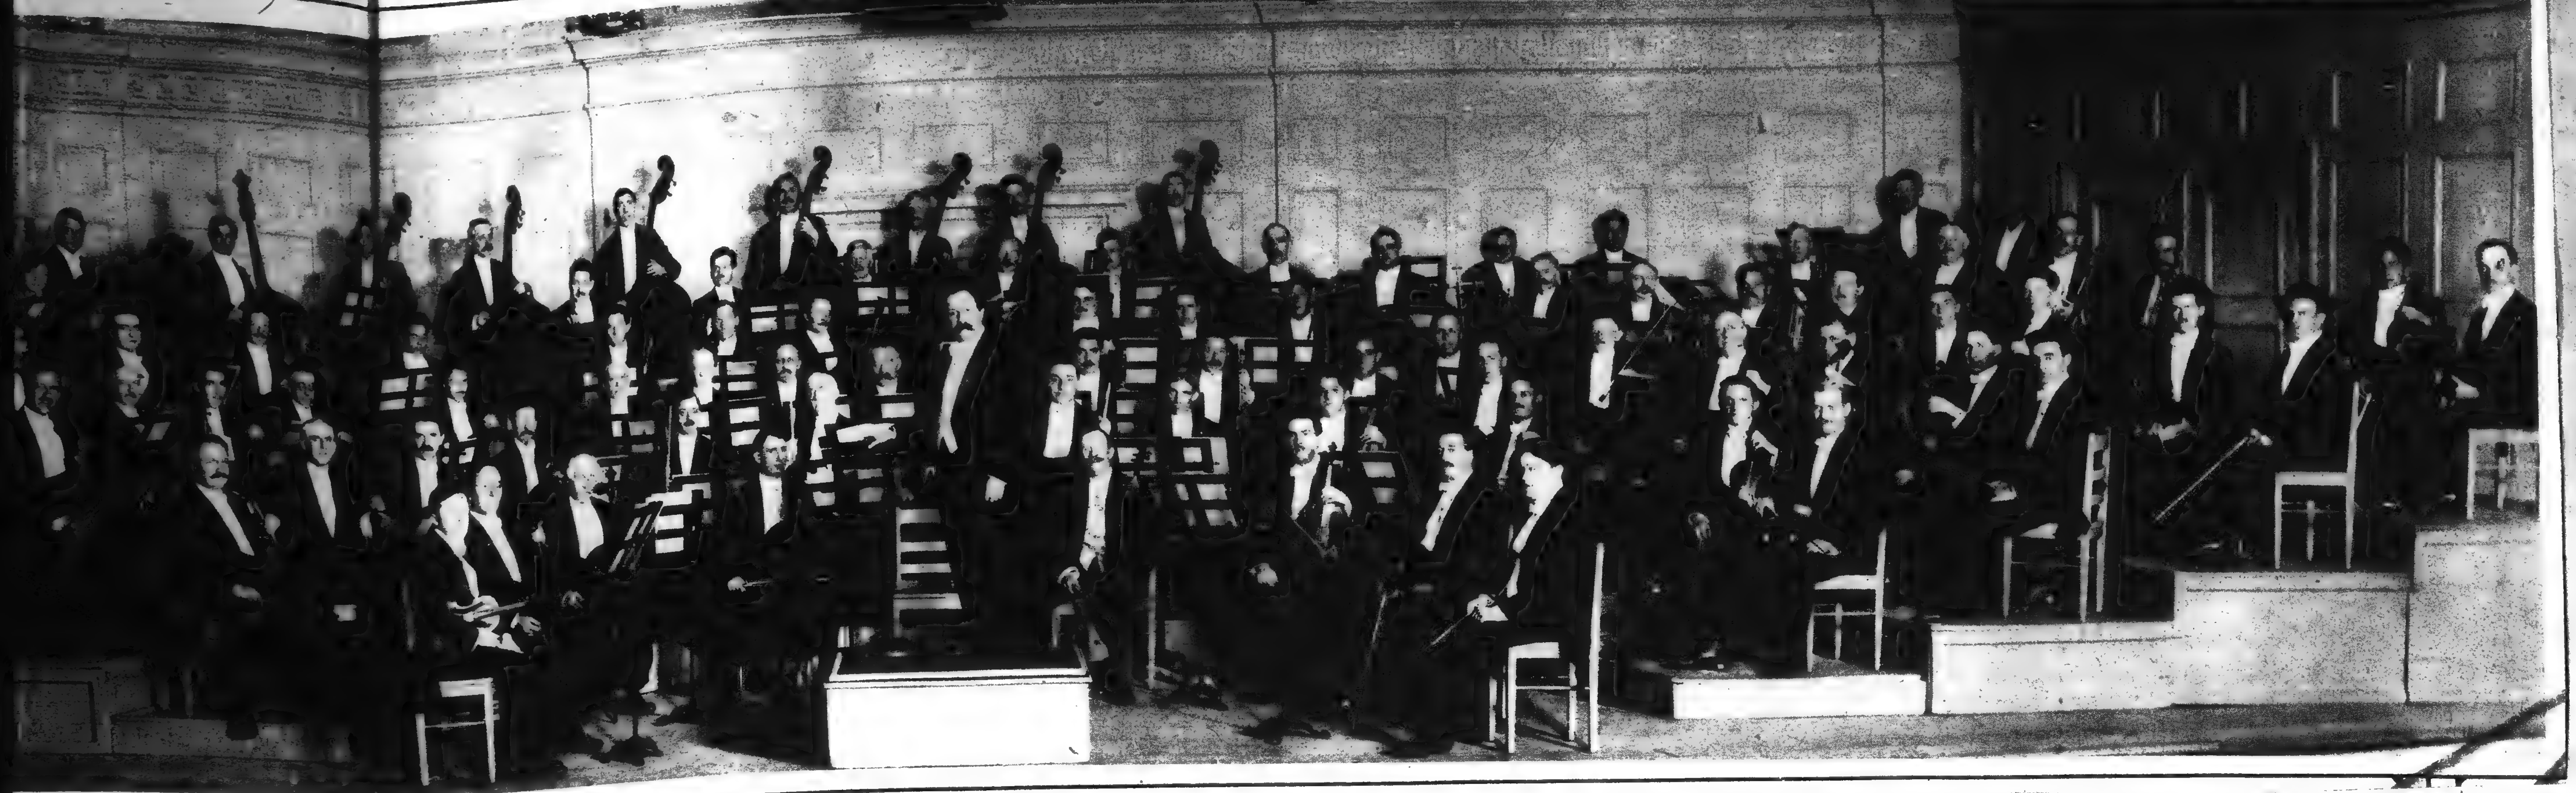
TRANS. DEC. 8

An adroit maker of programmes is Mr. Monteux, but in the matter of finding suitable music for the Young People's Concerts he has had to learn his trade afresh. For the first, which took place a year ago, he followed the most obvious course. The concert was primarily educational, hence he would play an overture by Beethoven and a symphony by Schubert; these pieces must have less serious music for foil and contrast, and for that purpose he selected ballet music by Delibes. His second list, which included pieces by Weber, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Grieg and Berlioz, was at once less taxing and more stimulating to youthful minds and ears. Yesterday afternoon there befell the first of the Young People's Concerts of the present season, and it will be repeated without change of programme on tomorrow and Friday afternoons. As it is to be presumed that the audiences, although there are three and not one, will include many of those who heard the concerts of last year, Mr. Monteux has had once more to seek new music. And this time he has chosen wisely. He has wholly avoided the classical symphonies; for an overture he has turned to the spirited, tuneful and tingling music with which Rossini prefaced his early opera, "The Italian in Algiers"; from the "great masters," he has chosen not from Beethoven or Schubert, but three dances by Bach, who is often fresher and more modern than either; and from the composers nearer our own time he has picked three who excelled in the writing of highly colored, strongly rhythmed music—Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakov and Bizet. Moreover, in order that the youngsters might learn with their eyes as well as with their ears, he selected each piece with a view to displaying some solo instrument, the nature of which is duly explained in the programme. In Rossini's overture it is the oboe; in the dances by Bach, the flute; in the Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, the English horn; in the second movement of "Scheherazada," a whole array—violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, trombone, trumpet, clarinet and French horn. If there was no reference to any specific instrument in the Scherzo from Dvorak's symphony; or in Bizet's Farandole, in both the drummers had much to do, and the youngsters were quick to observe it.

It is indeed a pity that more of those to whom the future of music, and of the Symphony Orchestra, is a real and vital thing, cannot be privileged to attend one of these concerts. The first sight of Symphony Hall, filled with school-children, is like a visit to the George Junior Republic. It seems curiously as though they belonged there, they are so obviously masters of the situation. And what a pleasure it is to witness their alertness to what is going on, their delight in the things that their experienced elders take so much for granted. Does Rossini interrupt a pronounced pianissimo with a crashing chord, and from the audience there is a ripple of laughter which spreads even to the orchestra. Does Rimsky-Korsakov employ that most jaded and hackneyed device, a muted trumpet, and there is laughter again. Does Dvorak begin his Largo with solemn, organ-like harmonies for the brass, and there is much pricking up of ears and craning of necks—and so on throughout the concert. After all, these young people came and are coming to hear, not only music, but an orchestra, and it is right that they should hear the composers who used the orchestra "for all it was worth," and even Rossini, subject to the technical limitations of his day, did that. And thrice happy was Mr. Monteux in his choice of Rimsky-Korsakov, the master magician and master story-teller of them all.

The management of the Orchestra has requested that the following information about the concerts be here set forth. The tickets for those of yesterday and tomorrow were distributed through ninety schools and ten settlements of Greater Boston. Yesterday's audience was chiefly made up of pupils who are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs, and of pupils who are receiving credit in the schools for their outside musical study. The concert of Friday is designed to accommodate pupils from schools not in the original allotment and also pupils of the various private schools, and to this end tickets for it, priced from twenty-five to fifty cents, are on sale at the box office of Symphony Hall.

W. S. S.



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN ITS FORTIETH YE

All but five members of the famous New England institution were present when this photograph was made on the stage of Symphony hall in Boston. The personnel of the orchestra, as photographed, is:

Pierre Monteux, conductor.
Violins—Burgin, R., concert-master; Theodorowicz, J., Gundersen, R., Pinfield, C., Thillois, F., Goldstein, S., Hoffmann, J., Mahn, F., Berger, H., Hoffmann E., Kurth, R., Gerardi, A., Hamilton, V., Fiedler, B., Leveen, P., Murray, J., Knudsen, C., Sauvlet, H., Barozzi, S., Riedlinger, H., Gorodetzky, L., Stonestreet, L., Deance, C., Messina, S., Tapley, R., Reed, L., Seiniger, S., Del Sordo, R.
Violas—Denayer, F., Artieres, L., Van Wynbergen, C., Shirley, P., Grover, H., Mullaly, J., Gerhardt, S., Kluge, M., Zahn, F.
Violoncellos—Bedetti, J., Schroeder, A., Keller, J., Barth, C., Belinski, M., Fabrizio, E., Warnke, J., Stockbridge, C., Marjollet, L.
Basses—Kunze, M., Gerhardt, G., Seydel, T., Frankel, I., Ludwig, O., Demetrides, L., Kelley, A., Girard, H.
Flutes—Laurent, G., Brooke, A., Amerena, P. Oboes—Longy, G., Lenom, C., Stanislaus, H.
Clarinets—Sand, A., Vannini, A., Forlani, N. Bassoons—Laus, A., Mueller, E., Bettoney, F.
Piccolo—Battles, A. English Horns—Mueller, F., Speyer, L.
Bass Clarinet—Mimart, P. Contra-Bassoon—Piller, B.
Horns—Wendler, G., Lorbeer, H., Hain, F., Gebhardt, W., Van Den Berg, C., Hess, M.
Trumpets—Mager, G., Mann, J., Kloepfel, L.
Trombones—Hampe, C., Adam, E., Mausebach, A., Kenfield, L.
Harps—Holy, A., Van Den Berg, W. Tympani—Neumann, S., Kandler, F.
Percussion—Rettberg, A., Ludwig, C., Burkhardt, H.
Tuba—Lemcke, C. Organ—Snow, A. Librarian—Rogers, L. J.

oston Symphony

coming week will be occupied ond Southern trip of the or- nd the following week by ple's concerts, the next regu- Boston Symphony concerts en in Symphony Hall on Fri- oon and Saturday evening, nd 18. At these concerts urgin, the new concertmaster hestra, will for the first time oloist with the Boston Sym- hestra. His number will be Concerto of Brahms in D ierre Monteux will open the ith Weber's overture to the eciosa." Two new works to on this occasion are the mphonic poem by Arnold Bax, gh Sidhe" ("In the Fairy nd Balakireff's pictorial "Is- rranged into an "Oriental Fan- the noted Italian composer of er generation, Alfred Casella.

PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

e Boston Symphony Orchestra om its second Southern trip. l occupy the coming week, it e the following week to con- the pleasure and edification nger generation. For the two which will befall on Tuesday , Dec. 7, and Thursday after- . 9, all seats will be appor- rough the medium of the pub- ls and settlements of Boston. to meet the inevitable large from those disappointed in this , a third concert will be given y afternoon, Dec. 10, for which s are now on sale at the box Symphony Hall.

me programme will be given at these three concerts, since each ve an entirely different public. ill begin at 4 o'clock in the af- and the nominal prices for ill be 25, 35 and 50 cents. The ll hold that no adult will be ad- unless accompanied by one or hildren. The object of these con- which were so successfully insti- last season, is to acquaint our people with the finest symphonic as played by the full Symphony tra under its regular conductor. Monteux has compiled a pro- e which will represent the best in the orchestral repertory and of direct appeal. He has further ed his programme to reveal in the different instruments in the stra by the incidental solos which in the scores.

k and Mr. Monteux's Music

ir concert in New York on Satur- ernoon last, Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra played the "symphonic rom Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrush- ard at home a week ago. In The , Mr. Krehbiel writes of piece and ance as hereunder and most of the rs in New York were substantially nind:

its place—which means in the re and as an accompaniment to es and action—this music is quite most extraordinary composition which we are familiar. But as pure and simple there is little which has qualifications for the ert-room. That little is summed n Stravinsky's treatment of Rus- folk-tunes, or melodies based hose tunes. The rest is mere gro- erie which may amuse; in fact, es that, but must also bewilder hose who listen to it without hav- gone through the experience of essing the comically pathetic or etically comic pantomime in the tre. It served yesterday to display Monteux's appreciation of the e and the skill of the orchestra; in an eminent degree. The per- ance was admirable, thrilling in- d. The vertiginous movement of music written to delineate the con- ed bustle of a Russian multitude enjoyment of a fair was almost zying. The device is one of Stra- sky's early inventions; we knew of hing like it previous to the advent his piece called "Fireworks." n a different manner the fine mus- arity of the body of string instru- nt players which Mr. Monteux has listed was brought into notice by the formance of Mendelssohn's Octette. en a composition designed for inti- ate performance by a group of solo truments is transferred to a large gained or lost in effectiveness always comes to the fore in the minds of experienced listeners. Yesterday the transformation seemed justified in the first movement, with its large lines of joy and jubilation of splendid color effects in the middle voices; but in the andante we missed the individual utterances which are native and essential to chamber compositions.

Ravel's suite, "Couperin's Tomb," played t the preceding concert of Thursday evenng likewise excited the curiosity of the eviewers in New York. Mr. Aldrich for The Times thought well of it: "Nobody," he writes, "who has ever heard the music of Couperin would mistake Ravel's manner for his, and the title is probably fanciful. . . . The four movements, however, are quite characteristic of Ravel. The Minuet and the Rigaudon have each a curious charm of their own, the Rigaudon a decorous gayety. The harmonization is of Ravel's acid sweetness in his less pronounced manner, stimulating and refreshing. The orchestra is used with much delicacy and grace of sound; the oboe gives it characteristic color." Mr. Krehbiel also yielded to the charm of the suite, but he resented what he calls "Ravel's strenuous effort to avoid the obvious."

New York
GLOBE EV.
DEC 6

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Other Music.

By PITTS SANBORN,

A decidedly unconventional programme marked the season's second Boston Symphony matinée in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. In the first place, Mr. Monteux chose to present as the opening number not a symphony but Mendelssohn's octet for strings in E flat, played by the string choirs of the orchestra. Doubtless he made this selection to exhibit without interference from wind or percussion instruments the Boston strings in all their beauty unadorned. He is not the first conductor so to treat the octet. And the device served its purpose very well. But, truth to tell, much of this composition, remarkable for a boy still in his teens, has already gone the way of all flesh and most music.

After the octet Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was heard in the Lalo 'cello concerto. Mr. Bedetti revealed a sonorous tone and proved himself a good technician, especially as to his left hand. His success with the audience was conspicuous. For the final number on the programme Mr. Monteux offered a suite taken from Stravinsky's ballet "Pétrouchka," which, for some mysterious reason, has dropped from the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House, though the production there was a capital one. It was accordingly a particular pleasure to hear the suite on Saturday, in spite of the fact that some of it loses much of its effectiveness in the concert room. Mr. Monteux, who was the original conductor of this difficult work, led it Saturday with the authority of complete understanding, and the Boston men played with superb spirit.

EVENING POST
New York City

DEC 6 K

Orchestral Concerts

Pierre Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first became known as the leader of the Russian ballet, which specialized in the works of Stravinsky. He was therefore in his element when he conducted in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon a suite made up of selections from the delightful "Petrouchka." Needless to say, one missed the action and the scenic background, as one does when Wagnerian excerpts are played in the concert halls; but this music is so novel, so individual, so spicy that it enchants wherever it may be heard.

The Philharmonic on

3000 CHILDREN HEAR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

They Vigorously Applaud at Every Opportunity

Musical Appreciation Shown at First of Three Concerts

Symphony Hall was filled to capacity yesterday afternoon for the first of the three young people's concerts to be given this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nearly 3000 children who had obtained tickets at nominal prices through schools and settlement houses applauded Pierre Monteux and the orchestra at every break in a program of short numbers which lasted only an hour.

Preference had been given in allotting tickets for yesterday's concert to children who are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs, and to those who are receiving school credits for outside music study, so that the audience may have been more musical than a crowd of children picked at random would have proved.

All the boys and girls of high school and junior high school age certainly seemed to be listening quietly and thoughtfully. A few little boys were restless and some little girls whispered, but then their elders sometimes annoy other people in the same ways at concerts and theatres. Possibly a rule excluding children under 12 would produce a more thoroughly attentive audience.

Everyone seemed especially interested in the solo qualities of the oboe, bassoon, clarinet, harp, trumpet and other orchestra instruments, which the program was partly designed to illustrate. Numbers by Mozart and Beethoven might well have been put in place of the old-fashioned Rossini overture and the not immediately appealing dances by Bach with which the concert began. Good tunes and viogorous, not too intricate rythms, are what children like best in music as a rule.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony was a better choice, and "Scheherezade" and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" were still better works from which to choose excerpts. The performance averaged about as the regular symphony concerts do nowadays in such repertory pieces as those played yesterday.

Tickets for the second concert on Thursday at 4 are obtainable only through selected schools and settlement houses. In order to satisfy those unable to get tickets in this way, a third concert will be given on Friday at 4, for which there are still seats remaining on sale at the box office in Symphony Hall, at the same scale of prices, 25, 35 and 50 cents. Adults unaccompanied by children cannot be admitted, however.

GLOBE-DEC. 8.

PUPILS ENJOY FIRST CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Gives Numbers Emphasizing Solo Instruments

YOUNG LISTENERS SHOW APPRECIATION

By PHILIP HALE

The first of the young people's concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, overture to "The Italian (woman) in Algiers," Bach, Bourree Polonaise and Badinerie from the suite in B minor; Dvorak, Largo and Scherzo from the symphony "From the New World;" Romsky-Korsakoff, "The Story of the Kalander Prince" from "Scheherazade;" Bizet-Guiraud, Farandole from the suite "L'Arlessienne" No. 2.

For the concert of yesterday and the one tomorrow afternoon all the tickets were distributed through 90 schools and 10 settlements of Greater Boston.

The audience yesterday was especially musical, for the first preference was given to the pupils that are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs; also to pupils that are studying music outside of the schools but are being credited for it in the schools.

The program was arranged so as to acquaint in a measure the young listeners with the quality of several solo instruments. Thus in the odd and once popular overture of the light-hearted Rossini the florid passages for oboe were played delightfully by Mr. Longy. Mr. Laurent's skill and taste were displayed in the movements from Bachs's suite, while the English horn solo in Dvorak's largo was played by Mr. Mueller. The movement from "Scheherazade" brought into prominence solos by violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone played by the admirable virtuosos of the orchestra.

The young listeners were greatly interested and pleased. They were warmly appreciative. They watched the players attentively and heard them intelligently. When they talked, the subject was the music of the orchestral instruments.

These concerts will do much to arouse and maintain genuine interest in good music, music that is melodious and strongly rhythmed, whether it be by an Italian, Frenchman, Russian, German or even an American. Mr. Monteux arranged, as he did last season, an excellent program for the purpose; he conducted and the full orchestra played as if the concert were in the regular subscription series.

In order that students of the schools that did not come in the allotment may have an opportunity to hear the orchestra, a third concert will be given the afternoon of Dec. 10, for which tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are now being sold at the Symphony Hall box office. This concert will also accommodate pupils of the various private schools.

Adults will be admitted only as escorts.

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week has been slightly altered. As Beethoven's birth is supposed to have been on Dec. 16, 1770, his overture "The Dedication of the House" has been substituted for Weber's overture to "Preciosa." The other orchestral pieces will e the fantasie, "In the Faery Hills," y Arnold Bax (first time in America) nd Balakireff's "Islamey" orchestra y Alfredo Casella (first time in Boson). Richard Burgin, the concert aster, will play Brahms's concerto or violin.

HERALD. DEC. 8.

CONCERT FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Symphony Devotes Week to School Children

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first of the Young People's Symphony concerts of the current season, a continuation of the policy which Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated so successfully last year, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. An audience of children from every district of the city, the rich and the poor, the socially "select" and the socially free of such misfortunes, sat side by side and listened to the wonder-tales of the orchestra.

Where, indeed, is the equal of the modern orchestra as a story-teller? And these were the tales: Overture to "The Italians in Algiers," Rossini; "Dances," as they happily called, from Bach's suite, with flute solo, in B mino —the Bourree, the Polonaise, and th Badinerie; the Largo and the Scherz from Dvorak's "New World" sym phony; the second movement, "The Tal of the Two Kalendars," from Rimsky Korsakoff symphonic suite, "The Thou sand and One Nights," and the "Faran dole" from Bizet's suite from "L'A lesienne."

This was music which every grown-u musically informed or otherwise, migh well expect to enjoy, and it was als music so melodious and brilliant and s depictive of the powers of the variou orchestral instruments, that every chil must long remember yesterday's ex perience, and identify in years to com many a musical sensation tasted the for the first time.

The two remaining concerts of this series for children by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this wee on Thursday afternoon and Friday af ternoon, the 9th and 10th, the entir week being given up to these children' concerts, instead of the orchestral tou unusually undertaken at this time the season. The tickets for the Thur day afternoon concerts have all bee distributed, but there are still ticke which can be applied for for the co certs of the next Friday afternoon. T programme for these concerts is ju an hour in length, and the time of t beginning—4 o'clock—and the closing 5—make them reasonably conveni even for the children who come i town from more or less distant subur

POST. DEC. 8.
[60]

The Symphony Orchestra Plays to Young People Happily Chosen Pieces—Three Dances or Casella Tamed—Mr. Kreisler Surprises an Audience—Amended Programmes

AN adroit maker of programmes is Mr. Monteux, but in the matter of finding suitable music for the Young People's Concerts he has had to learn his trade afresh. For the first, which took place a year ago, he followed the most obvious course. The concert was primarily educational, hence he would play an overture by Beethoven and a symphony by Schubert; these pieces must have less serious music for foil and contrast, and for that purpose he selected ballet music by Delibes. His second list, which included pieces by Weber, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Grieg and Berlioz, was at once less taxing and more stimulating to youthful minds and ears. Yesterday afternoon there befell the first of the Young People's Concerts of the present season, and it will be repeated without change of programme on tomorrow and Friday afternoons. As it is to be presumed that the audiences, although there are three and not one, will include many of those who heard the concerts of last year, Mr. Monteux has had once more to seek new music. And this time he has chosen wisely. He has wholly avoided the classical symphonies; for an overture he has turned to the spirited, tuneful and tingling music with which Rossini prefaced his early opera, "The Italian in Algiers"; from the "great masters," he has chosen not from Beethoven or Schubert, but three dances by Bach, who is often fresher and more modern than either; and from the composers nearer our own time he has picked three who excelled in the writing of highly colored, strongly rhythmed music—Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakov and Bizet. Moreover, in order that the youngsters might learn with their eyes as well as with their ears, he selected each piece with a view to displaying some solo instrument, the nature of which is duly explained in the programme. In Rossini's overture it is the oboe; in the dances by Bach, the flute; in the Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, the English horn; in the second movement of "Scheherazada," a whole array—violin, harp, bassoon, oboe, trombone, trumpet, clarinet and French horn. If there was no reference to any specific instrument in the Scherzo from Dvorak's symphony; or in Bizet's Farandole, in both the drummers had much to do, and the youngsters were quick to observe it.

It is indeed a pity that more of those to whom the future of music, and of the Symphony Orchestra, is a real and vital thing, cannot be privileged to attend one of these concerts. The first sight of Symphony Hall, filled with school-children, is like a visit to the George Junior Republic. It seems curiously as though they belonged there, they are so obviously masters of the situation. And what a pleasure it is to witness their alertness to what is going on, their delight in the things that their experienced elders take so much for granted. Does Rossini interrupt a pronounced pianissimo with a crashing chord, and from the audience there is a ripple of laughter which spreads even to the orchestra. Does Rimsky-Korsakov employ that most jaded and hackneyed device, a muted trumpet, and there is laughtr again. Does Dvorák begin his Largo with solemn, organ-like harmonies for the brass, and there is much pricking up of ears and craning of necks—and so on throughout the concert. After all, these young people came and are coming to hear, not only music, but an orchestra, and it is right that they should hear the composers who used the orchestra "for all it was worth," and even Rossini, subject to the technical limitations of his day, did that. And thrice happy was Mr. Monteux in his choice of Rimsky-Korsakov, the master magician and master story-teller of them all.

The management of the Orchestra has requested that the following information about the concerts be here set forth. The tickets for those of yesterday and tomorrow were distributed through ninety schools and ten settlements of Greater Boston. Yesterday's audience was chiefly made up of pupils who are members of school orchestras, bands or glee clubs, and of pupils who are receiving credit in the schools for their outside musical study. The concert of Friday is designed to accommodate pupils from schools not in the original allotment and also pupils of the various private schools, and to this end tickets for it, priced from twenty-five to fifty cents, are on sale at the box office of Symphony Hall.

W. S. S.

TIGHT BINDING

Not Weber's little known overture to his light opera, "Preciosa," but Beethoven's overture, almost as seldom played, "The Dedication of the House," will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next week. Mr. Monteux has so changed his programme to note the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Beethoven. We in Boston are fortunate to escape the "Beethoven programme," sometimes three symphonies long with which conductors elsewhere are satiating hearers.

TRANS. DEC 8.

[6]

In Bostonian Ears Another Young Briton

Arnold Bax, Celt and Composer, Whose Imaginative Music Impends at the Symphony Concerts

In placing on the programme of the Symphony Concerts of next week Arnold Bax's tone poem, "In the Faery Hills," Mr. Monteux has begun to fulfill his promise to acquaint us with the music of contemporary England—as he has already done with that of Italy and purposes to do with that of Spain. A glance through the back files of the Symphony programme reveals but a sprinkling of English names and, with one or two exceptions, a meagre list of performances. If we overlook songs, with and without orchestral accompaniment, of the five composers whom J. A. Fuller Maitland has termed the leaders of the English Renaissance, we find but three, Frederick Hymen Cowen, Charles Villiers Stanford and Alexander Campbell Mackenzie; we do not find Charles Hubert Parry or Arthur Goring Thomas. Of their Mendelssohnian forerunners, Sterndale Bennet is alone represented—but surely there is little cause for grief on that score. Of the later men, who have broken more and more from academic tradition, Elgar—the most generally played of all British composers—leads overwhelmingly; next to him come Frederick Delius and Granville Bantock. From the still younger and bolder spirits we have heard a single piece by William Wallace and one by Joseph Holbrooke, and also one each by the lesser Cecil Forsyth and Arthur Hinton. But there are numerous composers of distinction, particularly of the present generation, whom we do not know at all. It matters not greatly if we have missed Frederick Cliffe, Walford Davies, Arthur Somerville, Colin McAlpin and Hamish MacCunn; their work, admirable as it is, belongs already to the past. Those whom it is important that we should know, and most of whom Mr. Monteux intends to introduce to us, are Frank Bridge, Gustave Holst, Ralph Vaughn-Williams, Lord Berners and Arnold Bax, not to mention the lesser Cyril Scott, although there is reason to believe that his work in the larger forms is of less consequence than that of the others.

Record and Trait

Arnold Bax, with whom we are now concerned, like most of the significant composers of today, is clearly a product of the so-called intellectual class—more than ever before, the writing of music demands a keen intelligence, susceptibility to external impressions and a fineness of temper that tend to make the art increasingly aristocratic. Of Bax's parents, indeed, the dictionaries tell us nothing, but we are informed that he is a nephew of E. Belfort Bax, well known in England as a writer on social and philosophical topics. The composer was born in London, in 1883; he was educated privately, and from 1900 to 1905 he was a pupil at the Royal Academy of Music, where he studied composition with Frederick Corder and pianoforte playing with Tobias Matthay. He marri ta Sobrino, daughter of Carlos Sob pianist, and of late years has mostly on the West Coast of Irel natural consequence of his affiliation he Celtic movement in the arts. His deb as a composer was made in Saint James Hall, London, in November, 1903, and the first of his music to be published was a Celtic Song Cycle, which appeared in 1905.

That Bax was a thorough master of the composer's tools while still a young man is attested by the fact that his trio in one movement, for violin, viola and piano—the most frequently played of his chamberpieces—was written when he was but twenty. Although it foreshadows but faintly his later and characteristic idiom, it is fine-grained, sinewy music which must have indicated unmistakably that the composer was a man to be reckoned with. There is a tendency in his early music towards unnecessary elaboration and complexity—common enough among young composers—that has gradually disappeared from his maturer writing, but it is evident that for him complexity in music was nonexistent; more than once he astonished his friends by playing at sight from the orchestral score, and with apparent ease, such music as the symphonic poems of Strauss and the orchestral pieces of Debussy. While the list of his own orchestral compositions is a long one, they have not come to either frequent or adequate performance—with the exception of an early and [illegible] "Festival Overture." We [illegible] testimony [illegible] works, when they are performed at all, are apt to receive less careful attention than those of foreign composers. And if, as is the case with the music of Bax, they are of an intricate and exacting nature, the result is disastrous. Moreover, Bax, of a retiring and self-effacing disposition, shuns the "wire-pulling" which in England—and often in America as well—is an essential preliminary to an orchestral hearing. The music that has succeeded in bringing him most forcibly to the attention of the British public is his whimsical setting of Barrie's travesty-pantomime, "The Truth About the Russian Ballet."

The Celtic Side

Aside from the "Festival Overture," practically all of Bax's orchestral pieces have a Celtic background. Among the exceptions is a "Spring Fire Symphony," which in its suggestively Pagan character shows the influence of Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon;" another is the tone-poem, "November Woods," written in 1917, the piece by which the composer professes that he would like to be judged. There is no doubt, however, that "In the Faery Hills," which we are soon to hear, and "The Garden of Fand," which is said to penetrate even more deeply into the West of Ireland mood, are more truly representative. Bax has also a special fondness for his pianoforte sonata, the two sonatas for violin and the pianoforte quintet. That he should prefer this music to that which seems more specifically characteristic of him is thus explained by Edwin Evans, who has written extensively on Bax in the English musical periodicals. According to him: "Bax, whilst a master of picturesque and fanciful description, is essentially a musician of subjective inclinations, and to have produced a convincing piece of abstract musical thought will always give him more pleasure than even the most faithful delineation of his beloved Irish scenery and folk-lore."

The scene of the fantasy, "In the Faery Hills," is laid in a remote part of Kerry; in its general mood the music is suggestive of the mystery and somberness of the "dusky mountain side," and it depicts the hosting of the "Sidhe" as the Irish faery are termed. We learn from Mr. Evans that the middle section "is suggested by a passage from W. B. Yeats' 'Wanderings of Oisin,' which tells how the human bard sings in the presence of the faery host a 'Song of Human Joy,' which is found by these immortals to be the saddest thing in the world. One of them, weeping, seizes the harp from Oisin's hands, and flings it into a deep pool, there to rest for all time. When the demon of sadness is laid, the endless revel of the Ever-young begins anew." Here is an opportunity for picturesque musical suggestion that would never have inspired a Frenchman nor a German, a Russian nor a Scandinavian, and we are indeed fortunate that a composer has arisen who by right of race and skill can translate such things into tone. Although "In the Faery Hills" is one of the earliest of Bax's orchestral pieces—it was written in 1909—it reveals him as an expert technician as well as a composer of highly poetic tendencies.

In the Smaller Forms

The modern Englishmen have displayed an especial fondness for chamber music, and they have made notable contributions to that exacting branch of the art. Memory still warms to Frank Bridge's songful quartet which the London String Quartet played here so eloquently; we have heard some striking things from the Anglo-Belgian, Goossens; report speaks well of John Ireland's sonata for violin and piano; Dr. Eaglefield Hull is loud in his praise of Cyril Scott's chamber-pieces; and Mr. Evans is equally enthusiastic over those of Arnold Bax. The pianoforte quintet and the violin sonatas are the last report still unpublished; indeed the great difficulty of the second of the two sonatas has thus far kept it from representative performance. Two of the larger pieces, however, have been printed and have even found their way to Boston—the early trio already described and a recent elegiac trio for flute, viola and harp, which also runs in a single movement. Undoubtedly in the elegiat trio the chromatic limitations of the harp have imposed certain restrictions, but in every way the piece bears out Mr. Evans's statement that Bax has now forsaken his early almost Wagnerian luxuriance of harmony for a colder and more austere style; the same tendency can be seen in comparing the later piano pieces and songs with the earlier ones. Here the composer is clearly following the present trend in music toward economy of means, even a certain astringency, although it is possible that in the case of Bax this severity is but a phase of his development. Brahms at one time subjected himself to a similar disciplining.

In his piano music Bax reminds us not a little of our own MacDowell—both men show a preoccupation with the varying moods and aspects of Nature, and in both there is the same sensitive, subjective treatment. So far as the appeal to our ears and interests is concerned, the advantage is clearly with Bax. Not only does it serve him in good stead to have been born nearly a generation later, it is also quite obvious that he has not been compelled by a stern necessity to produce many volumes of short and often inconsequential pieces, somewhat adapted to the requirements of the amateur pianist; and although it may be heresy to suggest it, he shows himself the possessor of a more discriminating taste and a more expert musicianship.

From all accounts the most frequently played of his piano pieces in a brilliant sketch entitled "In a Vodka Shop," which, together with a nocturne, "May Night in the Ukraine," and a "Gopak," is a souvenir of his visit to Russia in 1910. It is hardly necessary to say that none of these pieces discloses his most individual bent, but they are all singularly effective, and with a strong Muscovite atmosphere. The nocturne in particular is a composition of unusual beauty and it should find a welcome from our concert pianists, were they not so obviously minded to play what every one else plays rather than to seek that which is both rare and worth while. Unless recollection is greatly at fault, the only music of Bax that has received a public hearing in Boston is a charming idyl for the piano, "The Maiden with the Daffodil," which had a place on the programme of Miss Marjorie Church's recital last February. Not all of the piano music is obtainable in the Boston music shops—"The Mountain Mood," "Nereid" and "Whirligig" are not to be found—but many of the most striking await the curious: a somber "Winter Waters," which bears the sub-title of "Tragic Landscape"; two delightful fantasies, "Apple-Blossom-Time" and "The Princess's Rose Garden"; and a lullaby, "Sleepy-Head."

Arnold Bax

From S. I. M. by Courtesy of the Public Library

None of this music is easy to play, nor is the composer's idiom readily grasped on a superficial reading. Bax is not satisfied with a melody and an accompaniment but is prone to introduce counter-melodies and decorative figuration. To "The Princess's Rose Garden" he supplies this suggestive foot-note: "This piece must be played as simply as the elaborateness of its detail will allow. No harmonic points should be made and the accompaniment figures generally should be kept wholly subservient to the melodic line." It should be noted that Bax cultivates the temporarily much neglected art of writing "horizontally," neglected because it is often easier and more immediately effective to write chords in blocks and patches than to make the harmonies appear as the result of the clash and progress of the several parts—the sort of writing that has always been characteristic of highly organized music. Besides these smaller pieces, a piano sonata in one movement has been played in England by Myra Hess, and there is also a piano concerto, at last report unperformed; both pieces are unpublished. There is, however, a highly poetic tone-poem for two pianofortes, "Moy Mell" (The Happy Plain), which may be found in the library of the Harvard Musical Association.

For Voice

As a song-writer Bax has been quite prolific, having written half a hundred or more, of which only about a quarter are published; the others, because of the difficulty of their accompaniments, still remain in manuscript. Mr. Evans's remarks on this situation are worth quoting, as they are quite applicable on this side of the water. "It is curious that, at a time when songs of the most complex texture have become not only common, but even especially favored in our concert-rooms, many of our publishers should still apply the standard of the young person who strums." For the present we in Boston must confine our acquaintance with Bax's songs to the set of seven issued by J. & W. Chester of London. None of these present unusual difficulty, so it is safe to assume that they are not among his most elaborate. In his choice of lyrics Bax shows the fine discrimination that we would expect of so scrupulous and sensitive a composer. The complete list of his vocal compositions shows a strong partiality for the poems of Fiona Macleod; we also find there William Morris, Shakspeare, Chaucer, and those of the modern poets whose tendencies are in sympathy with his own. Three of the songs in the Chester collection are set to poems of Fiona Macleod; the words of one, "The Enchanted Fiddle," are anonymous; the lyric of the most beautiful of all, "To Eire," is the work of J. H. Cousins; another is a setting of a fifteenth century Christmas carol, half Latin and half English; and the last is a Chaucer Roundel.

As these seven songs cover the period from 1906 to 1914, they may be considered fairly representative of Bax's development as a song-writer, even though his musical style is said to have undergone significant changes in the last six years. Singers will appreciate the "vocal" character of his writing, so rarely found in contemporary composers. In the carol there is an appropriate use of the old florid style, and there is a more modern ornamentation in the picturesque "Shieling Song." Eminently vocal, too, is his sparing use of chromatic intervals; in the first twenty-two measures of the voice part of "To Eire," for example, there are but two accidentals, and yet the harmonization is wholly unconventional. And even when, as in the roundel, there is a certain amount of chromatic freedom, the intervals are never difficult to grasp. Each of the seven songs might well be discussed in detail did the limits of this article permit; there is, for instance, a notable use of modal harmony in the Christmas Carol; in the roundel we find a striking example of Bax's tendency—observable in everything he has written—to vary the treatment of a melody on each repetition of it. Here on each recurrence of the couplet:

Your eyen two wol slay me sodenly:
I may the beauty of hem not sustene

we find a gradual and impressive intensification in the accompaniment. In this song and in "To Eire" there is a fineness of feeling, and in the latter an elevation rarely met with in any songs and almost unparalleled in songs with English text.

The Whole Man

Those who would always classify and pigeon-hole a composer will have a hard time in tracing Bax's musical ancestry. Especially in the later music it cannot be said, as with so many, that here is Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel, Strauss, Wagner or Musorgsky. But although he is a law unto himself, he does not brazenly defy convention. For one thing, he is apparently too well poised to be willing to discard entirely the old diatonic system. His music is often extremely chromatic, but with him chromaticism is accessory rather than integral. Not only does he refrain from constant modulation or, like some, ignore tonality altogether; he often displays a tendency rare among contemporary composers, to remain in one key for measures on end. His use of dissonance is plentiful and effective but his dissonances are arrived at logically and contrapuntally, not through arbitrary and jangling chords. The contrasting energy and reflectiveness in his music have been likened to the Florestan and Eusibius of Schumann; but such duality is natural in a well-rounded composer. It is far more significant that although his musica[illegible] is essentially subjective, it is alway controlled; and in contrast to such typ introspective writers as Schumann a MacDowell, he is apparently a thoro master of musical architecture and desig It has been well said of him that, parado cal as it sounds, his music can be wistf and at the same time robust.

WARREN STOREY SMIT

TRANS. DEC. 11

SYMPHONY TO RESUME CONCERTS

Since next week will mark the 150th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, the great master's overture, "Dedication of the House," will open the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 17 and 18. It is interesting to note that this overture was the first piece ever played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for it opened the initial program in Music Hall in 1881. Also at this concert Richard Durgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time here, playing Brahms's violin concerto in D major

DEC. 11

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening has been changed to pay tribute to the memory of Beethoven. It will include his "Dedication of the House" overture, the first piece on the first program the Symphony ever played. Richard Burgin, the new concert master, will be the soloist, playing Brahms' violin concerto in D major. The other numbers will be Arnold Bax's Gaelic piece, "In the Fairy Hills," and Balakireff's fantasy, "Islamey." These are novelties.

RTISER 12

Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," opus 124, which is to be played at this week's Symphony concerts in memory of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth, was the first piece on the first program ever given by the orchestra, on Oct 22, 1881, in the old Music Hall.

Richard Burgin, who will appear for the first time this week as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra, of which he is now concert master, is like Heifetz and Zimbalist, a pupil of Auer.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighth program. Overture "The Dedication of the House," Beethoven (In memoriam Ludwig van Beethoven, born Dec 1 1770), "An Sluagh Sidhe," Bax (fir times in America); Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, Brahms. "Islamey," Balakirev-Casella. Soloist Richard Burgin.

DEC. 12

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

THE discussion of the Mus
Union, of its merits and deme its advantages and disadvanta for the whole body of orche players, for the individual m cian and for the best interests of art of music, is a long and compli
one. Not often do many of the d however, get before the public, as did in the excitement of last year a the Boston Orchestra and the que of keeping it in the path that M
Higginson insisted on for so many y
There is no doubt much to be sai both sides; at any rate, much has b said on both sides. But one recent a of the New York union cannot b considered, in its inevitable r highly detrimental to the best int of the art and to the standards chestral playing, and hence, in the suicidal for the players. This adoption of a rule absolutely li the number of rehearsals permitted great orchestral societies by the to four a week and reducing th hearsal time from two and a hal to two. The weekly limit for the phony orchestras has, till this was taken, been five. The weekly ber of hours for rehearsing is th duced from twelve and a half to The action of the union is a "progressive." It always re greater and greater benefit to the vidual member—higher salaries, rehearsals, shorter hours, if the all benefits. And if the individ benefited and the quality of the formance is not injured the net may be a cause for rejoicing. Th ciency experts will tell us that the point beyond which intensive labor not go to advantage. Musicians also tell us that the New Yo phony players are very clever and skillful in accommodating selves to what their conductors Hence, it is said, the need for reh is the less. But the limit of re rehearsals is far from being by the number that has hither permitted by the union; and th est cleverness cannot make a for careful polishing. The fact point has now been reached w standard of rehearsal and pr hitherto considered indispensabl mitely threatened.
Fortunately, one organizatio
York Symphony Society, wa make a stand, for this seas against this reduction of th rehearsal. It made a contr by which its players boun or a p existing rule of

of two and a half ho
as to the then prevaili weekly salary, out-of-town lowances and number of New York. Mr. Flagler is to have waived his contract the minimum salary, to th concerts in New York and t allowances. But he has ins forcing the agreement as to not only the weekly numb duration of each. It is cons rightly so, by both him and much that the main, if no reason for contributing the l dies that are now paid to over and above the sum co
the public through the box insure sufficient rehearsal;
cient rehearsal is the very e subsidized orchestra's reason ence.
This agreement, however, stood to run for one season season the union will be free of this orchestra what it now the others, and can put the sa tions upon it. Most of the m lic will agree with Mr. Flagle new rule of the union is a g fraught with serious conseque future of endowed orchestra York; and that the rights wh enjoys by contract should be accorded to the other sympho tras of the city.
Heaven knows that the sta in recent years been lowere already by the gradual red rehearsal time. There suspicion, and more than susp pieces have been put on th programs insufficiently rehe even not rehearsed at all.
certain that this has sometim be feared often—been the ca with concertos; the solo p have on occasion been uncere dumped into the concert with allowed opportunity for any rea taking practice with the orche sometimes actually without hearsal at all. The results h obvious. They have sometim deplorable.
With the number of concerts orchestras are giving now and t ber of different programs tha therefore, be prepared, the re permitted by the union are ins for proper performances. It is, o a commonplace to say that fine in performance is attainable sufficient rehearsal under compe painstaking direction. This is necessary and obvious stateme the tendency is always and ever to say that "it is good enough
"it will go," possibly even, "they know the difference." It may g a fashion; and "they" may not date the difference immediately; difference will make itself felt time and "they" will take acti cordingly.
Thus the union, by its decre molishing the rehearsal schedule begun the destruction of the poss of good orchestral playing, or at rate of the finest orchestral pla
It has before this made good orche playing not only difficult to obtai very expensive. Perhaps it shou expensive. But the last phase ma been approaching now. There i reason why further reductions in hearsal may not be enforced. The may come when "faking" and "c and pure "magnetism" on the par the conductor will be considered by union enough to carry through an chestral performance.
The raising of salaries has been of the objects most steadily kept in v by the union; an eminently laud one pursued properly and necessa by all workers for a salary. It has b successful, involving, necessarily, great increase in the annual deficits permanent orchestras. Th have reached figures that wo made the hair of a generation a end; but so would many oth of the present time. There millionaires to be milked a to be, or made to bleed throu and ready for that kind many. Nobody pities the sorro millionaire guarantor. He a sorrows—which he knows how joys—may be taken But what cannot be taken f
the definite downward ste
they cannot stop.
union may be all powerful, but be exercising its power un when it takes this step, or make sary to be taken. The public may be educated downwar endure what will be set be even not to know the differ possibly, also, it will not sure there may be fifty mu righteous within the city wh a cry, and even without a cr inevitably come the time whe ence is appreciably felt.
the point of honor, of commo give the public the best tha me by gentlemen and artists the somewhat more recondite artistic rectitude—that artist best that in them lies becaus artists and because they have ideal and an artistic con
We are sure, of course, th ideal is what the union equally with the ideal of and more leisure. It ha misconceived the results of it on, or it has allowed tempo purely practical notions to a time the fine idealism tha ing principle of artists, an union of artists.

TIGHT BINDING

Not Weber's little known overture to his light opera, "Preciosa," but Beethoven's overture, almost as seldom played, "The Dedication of the House," will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next week. Mr. Monteux has so changed his programme to note the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Beethoven. We in Boston are fortunate to escape the "Beethoven programme," sometimes three symphonies long with which conductors elsewhere are satiating hearers.

TRANS. DEC 8.

[6]

In Bostonian Ears Another Young Briton

Arnold Bax, Celt and Composer, Whose Imaginative Music Impends at the Symphony Concerts

IN placing on the programme of the Symphony Concerts of next week Arnold Bax's tone poem, "In the Faery Hills," Mr. Monteux has begun to fulfill his promise to acquaint us with the music of contemporary England—as he has already done with that of Italy and purposes to do with that of Spain. A glance through the back files of the Symphony programme reveals but a sprinkling of English names and, with one or two exceptions, a meagre list of performances. If we overlook songs, with and without orchestral accompaniment, of the five composers whom J. A. Fuller Maitland has termed the leaders of the English Renaissance, we find but three, Frederick Hymen Cowen, Charles Villiers Stanford and Alexander Campbell Mackenzie; we do not find Charles Hubert Parry or Arthur Goring Thomas. Of their Mendelssohnian forerunners, Sterndale Bennet is alone represented—but surely there is little cause for grief on that score. Of the later men, who have broken more and more from academic tradition, Elgar—the most generally played of all British composers—leads overwhelmingly; next to him come Frederick Delius and Granville Bantock. From the still younger and bolder spirits we have heard a single piece by William Wallace and one by Joseph Holbrooke, and also one each by the lesser Cecil Forsyth and Arthur Hinton. But there are numerous composers of distinction, particularly of the present generation, whom we do not know at all. It matters not greatly if we have missed Frederick Cliffe, Walford Davies, Arthur Somerville, Colin McAlpin and Hamish MacCunn; their work, admirable as it is, belongs already to the past. Those whom it is important that we should know, and most of whom Mr. Monteux intends to introduce to us, are Frank Bridge, Gustave Holst, Ralph Vaughn-Williams, Lord Berners and Arnold Bax, not to mention the leser Cyril Scott, although there is reason to believe that his work in the larger forms is of less consequence than that of the others.

Record and Trait

Arnold Bax, with whom we are now concerned, like most of the significant composers of today, is clearly a product of the so-called intellectual class—more than ever before, the writing of music demands a keen intelligence, susceptibility to external impressions and a fineness of temper that tend to make the art increasingly aristocratic. Of Bax's parents, indeed, the dictionaries tell us nothing, but we are informed that he is a nephew of E. Belfort Bax, well known in England as a writer on social and philosophical topics. The composer was born in London, in 1883; he was educated privately, and from 1900 to 1905 he was a pupil at the Royal Academy of Music, where he studied composition with Frederick Corder and pianoforte playing with Tobias Matthay. He married [illegible] ta Sobrino, daughter of Carlos Sob[illegible] pianist, and of late years has [illegible] mostly on the West Coast of Irel[illegible] natural consequence of his affiliation [illegible] the Celtic movement in the arts. His debut as a composer was made in Saint James Hall, London, in November, 1903, and the first of his music to be published was a Celtic Song Cycle, which appeared in 1905.

That Bax was a thorough master of the composer's tools while still a young man is attested by the fact that his trio in one movement, for violin, viola and piano—the most frequently played of his chamberpieces—was written when he was but twenty. Although it foreshadows but faintly his later and characteristic idiom, it is fine-grained, sinewy music which must have indicated unmistakably that the composer was a man to be reckoned with. There is a tendency in his early music towards unnecessary elaboration and complexity—common enough among young composers—that has gradually disappeared from his maturer writing, but it is evident that for him complexity in music was nonexistent; more than once he astonished his friends by playing at sight from the orchestral score, and with apparent ease, such music as the symphonic poems of Strauss and the orchestral pieces of Debussy. While the list of his own orchestral compositions is a long one, they have not come to either frequent or adequate performance—with the exception of an early and uncharacteristic "Festival Overture." We have a good deal of unprejudiced testimony [illegible] works, when they are performed at all, are apt to receive less careful attenion than those of foreign composers. And if, as is the case with the music of Bax, they are of an intricate and exacting nature, the result is disastrous. Moreover, Bax, of a retiring and self-effacing disposition, shuns the "wire-pulling" which in England—and often in America as well—is an essential preliminary to an orchestral hearing. The music that has succeeded in bringing him most forcibly to the attention of the British public is his whimsical setting of Barrie's travesty-pantomime, "The Truth About the Russian Ballet."

The Celtic Side

Aside from the "Festival Overture," practically all of Bax's orchestral pieces have a Celtic background. Among the exceptions is a "Spring Fire Symphony," which in its suggestively Pagan character shows the influence of Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon;" another is the tone-poem, "November Woods," written in 1917, the piece by which the composer professes that he would like to be judged. There is no doubt, however, that "In the Faery Hills," which we are soon to hear, and "The Garden of Fand," which is said to penetrate even more deeply into the West of Ireland mood, are more truly representative. Bax has also a special fondness for his pianoforte sonata, the two sonatas for violin and the pianoforte quintet. That he should prefer this music to that which seems more specifically characteristic of him is thus explaned by Edwin Evans, who has written extensively on Bax in the English musical periodicals. According to him: "Bax, whilst a master of picturesque and fanciful description, is essentially a musician of subjective inclinations, and to have produced a convincing piece of abstract musical thought will always give him more pleasure than even the most faithful delineation of his beloved Irish scenery and folk-lore."

The scene of the fantasy, "In the Faery Hills," is laid in a remote part of Kerry; in its general mood the music is suggestive of the mystery and somberness of the "dusky mountain side," and it depicts the hosting of the "Sidhe" as the Irish faery are termed. We learn from Mr. Evans that the middle section "is suggested by a passage from W. B. Yeats' 'Wanderings of Oisin,' which tells how the human bard sings in the presence of the faery host a 'Song of Human Joy,' which is found by these immortals to be the saddest thing in the world. One of them, weeping, seizes the harp from Oisin's hands, and flings it into a deep pool, there to rest for all time. When the demon of sadness is laid, the endless revel of the Ever-young begins anew." Here is an opportunity for picturesque musical suggestion that would never have inspired a Frenchman nor a German, a Russian nor a Scandinavian, and we are indeed fortunate that a composer has arisen who by right of race and skill can translate such things into tone. Although "In the Faery Hills" is one of the earliest of Bax's orchestral pieces—it was written in 1909—it reveals him as an expert technician as well as a composer of highly poetic tendencies.

In the Smaller Forms

The modern Englishmen have displayed an especial fondness for chamber music, and they have made notable contributions to that exacting branch of the art. Memory still warms to Frank Bridge's songful quartet which the London String Quartet played here so eloquently; we have heard some striking things from the Anglo-Belgian, Goossens; report speaks well of John Ireland's sonata for violin and piano; Dr. Eaglefield Hull is loud in his praise of Cyril Scott's chamber-pieces; and Mr. Evans is equally enthusnastic over those of Arnold Bax. The pianoforte quintet and the violin sonatas are the last report still unpublished; indeed the great difficulty of the second of the two sonatas has thus far kept it from representative performance. Two of the larger pieces, however, have been printed and have even found their way to Boston—the early trio already described and a recent elegiac trio for flute, viola and harp, which also runs in a single movement. Undoubtedly in the elegiat trio the chromatic limitations of the harp have imposed certain restrictions, but in every way the piece bears out Mr. Evans's statement that Bax has now forsaken his early almost Wagnerian luxuriance of harmony for a colder and more austere style; the same tendency can be seen in comparing the later piano pieces and songs with the earlier ones. Here the composer is clearly following the present trend in music toward economy of means, even a certain astringency, although it is possible that in the case of Bax this severity is but a phase of his development. Brahms at one time subjected himself to a similar disciplining.

In his piano music Bax reminds us not a litle of our own MacDowell—both men show a preoccupation with the varying moods and aspects of Nature, and in both there is the same sensitive, subjective treatment. So far as the appeal to our ears and interests is concerned, the advantage is clearly with Bax. Not only does it serve him in good stead to have been born nearly a generation later, it is also quite obvious that he has not been compelled by a stern necessity to produce many volumes of short and often inconsequential pieces, somowhat adapted to the requirements of the amateur pianist; and although it may be heresy to suggest it, he shows himself the possessor of a more discriminating taste and a more expert musicianship.

From all accounts the most frequently played of his piano pieces in a brilliant sketch entitled "In a Vodka Shop," which, together with a nocturne, "May Night in the Ukraine," and a "Gopak," is a souvenir of his visit to Russia in 1910. It is hardly necessary to say that none of these pieces discloses his most individual bent, but they are all singularly effective, and with a strong Muscovite atmosphere. The nocturne in particular is a composition of unusual beauty and it should find a welcome from our concert pianists, were they not so obviously minded to play what every one else plays rather than to seek that which is both rare and worth while. Unless recollection is greatly at fault, the only music of Bax that has received a public hearing in Boston is a charming idyl for the piano, "The Maiden with the Daffodil," which had a place on the programme of Miss Marjorie Church's recital last February. Not all of the piano music is obtainable in the Boston music shops—"The Mountain Mood," "Nereid" and "Whirligig" are not to be found—but many of the most striking await the curious: a somber "Winter Waters," which bears the sub-title of "Tragic Landscape"; two delightful fantasies, "Apple-Blossom-Time" and "The Princess's Rose Garden"; and a lullaby, "Sleepy-Head."

Arnold Bax

From S. I. M. by Courtesy of the Public Library

None of this music is easy to play, nor is the composer's idiom readily grasped on a superficial reading. Bax is not satisfied with a melody and an accompaniment but is prone to introduce counter-melodies and decorative figuration. To "The Princess's Rose Garden" he supplies this suggestive foot-note: "This piece must be played as simply as the elaborateness of its detail will allow. No harmonic points should be made and the accompaniment figures generally should be kept wholly subservient to the melodic line." It should be noted that Bax cultivates the temporarily much neglected art of writing "horizontally," neglected because it is often easier and more immediately effective to write chords in blocks and patches than to make the harmonies appear as the result of the clash and progress of the several parts—the sort of writing that has always been characteristic of highly organized music. Besides these smaller pieces, a piano sonata in one movement has been played in England by Myra Hess, and there is also a piano concerto, at last report unperformed; both pieces are unpublished. There is, however, a highly poetic tone-poem for two pianofortes, "Moy Mell" (The Happy Plain), which may be found in the library of the Harvard Musical Association.

For Voice

As a song-writer Bax has been quite prolific, having written half a hundred or more, of which only about a quarter are published; the others, because of the difficulty of their accompaniments, still remain in manuscript. Mr. Evans's remarks on this situation are worth quoting, as they are quite applicable on this side of the water. "It is curious that, at a time when songs of the most complex texture have become not only common, but even especially favored in our concert-rooms, many of our publishers should still apply the standard of the young person who strums." For the present we in Boston must confine our acquaintance with Bax's songs to the set of seven issued by J. & W. Chester of London. None of these present unusual difficulty, so it is safe to assume that they are not among his most elaborate. In his choice of lyrics Bax shows the fine discrimination that we would expect of so scrupulous and sensitive a composer. The complete list of his vocal compositions shows a strong partiality for the poems of Fiona Macleod; we also find there William Morris, Shakspeare, Chaucer, and those of the modern poets whose tendencies are in sympathy with his own. Three of the songs in the Chester collection are set to poems of Fiona Macleod; the words of one, "The Enchanted Fiddle," are anonymous; the lyric of the most beautiful of all, "To Eire," is the work of J. H. Cousins; another is a setting of a fifteenth century Christmas carol, half Latin and half English; and the last is a Chaucer Roundel.

As these seven songs cover the period from 1906 to 1914, they may be considered fairly representative of Bax's development as a song-writer, even though his musical style is said to have undergone significant changes in the last six years. Singers will appreciate the "vocal" character of his writing, so rarely found in contemporary composers. In the carol there is an appropriate use of the old florid style, and there is a more modern ornamentation in the picturesque "Shieling Song." Eminently vocal, too, is his sparing use of chromatic intervals; in the first twenty-two measures of the voice part of "To Eire," for example, there are but two accidentals, and yet the harmonization is wholly unconventional. And even when, as in the roundel, there is a certain amount of chromatic freedom, the intervals are never difficult to grasp. Each of the seven songs might well be discussed in detail did the limits of this article permit; there is, for instance, a notable use of modal harmony in the Christmas Carol; in the roundel we find a striking example of Bax's tendency—observable in everything he has written—to vary the treatment of a melody on each repetition of it. Here on each recurrence of the couplet:

> Your eyen two wol slay me sodenly:
> I may the beauty of hem not sustene

we find a gradual and impressive intensification in the accompaniment. In this song and in "To Eire" there is a fineness of feeling, and in the latter an elevation rarely met with in any songs and almost unparalleled in songs with English text.

The Whole Man

Those who would always classify and pigeon-hole a composer will have a hard time in tracing Bax's musical ancestry. Especially in the later music it cannot be said, as with so many, that here is Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel, Strauss, Wagner or Musorgsky. But although he is a law unto himself, he does not brazenly defy convention. For one thing, he is apparently too well poised to be willing to discard entirely the old diatonic system. His music is often extremely chromatic, but with him chromaticism is accessory rather than integral. Not only does he refrain from constant modulation or, like some, ignore tonality altogether; he often displays a tendency, rare among contemporary composers, to remain in one key for measures on end. His use of dissonance is plentiful and effective, but his dissonances are arrived at logically and contrapuntally, not through arbitrary and jangling chords. The contrasting energy and reflectiveness in his music have been likened to the Florestan and Eusebius of Schumann; but such duality is natural in a well-rounded composer. It is far more significant that although his musical thought is essentially subjective, it is always controlled; and in contrast to such typical introspective writers as Schumann and MacDowell, he is apparently a thorough master of musical architecture and design. It has been well said of him that, paradoxical as it sounds, his music can be virile and at the same time robust.

WARREN STOREY SMITH

TRAN. DEC. 11

SYMPHONY TO RESUME CONCERTS

Since next week will mark the 150th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, the great master's overture, "Dedication of the House," will open the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 17 and 18. It is interesting to note that this overture was the first piece ever played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for it opened the initial program in Music Hall in 1881. Also at this concert Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time here, playing Brahms's violin concerto in D major

---

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening has been changed to pay tribute to the memory of Beethoven. It will include his "Dedication of the House" overture, the first piece on the first program the Symphony ever played. Richard Burgin, the new concert master, will be the soloist, playing Brahms' violin concerto in D major. The other numbers will be Arnold Bax's Gaelic piece, "In the Fairy Hills," and Balakireff's fantasy, "Islamey." These are novelties.

Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," opus 121, which is to be played at this week's Symphony concerts in memory of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth, was the first piece on the first program ever given by the orchestra, on Oct 22, 1881, in the old Music Hall.

◆

Richard Burgin, who will appear for the first time this week as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra, of which he is now concert master, is like Heifetz and Zimbalist, a pupil of Auer.

◆

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighth program. Overture "The Dedication of the House," Beethoven (In memoriam Ludwig van Beethoven, born Dec 1[illegible] 1770), "An Sluagh Sidhe," Bax (first times in America); Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, Brahms; "Islamey," Balakirev-Casella. Soloist Richard Burgin.

DEC. 11

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

THE discussion of the Mus[illegible] Union, of its merits and deme[illegible] its advantages and disadvant[illegible] for the whole body of orche[illegible] players, for the individual mu[illegible] cian and for the best interests of [illegible] art of music, is a long and compli[illegible] one. Not often do many of the det[illegible] however, get before the public, as [illegible] did in the excitement of last year a[illegible] the Boston Orchestra and the que[illegible] of keeping it in the path that [illegible] Higginson insisted on for so many [illegible] There is no doubt much to be sai[illegible] both sides, at any rate, much has [illegible] said on both sides. But one recent ac[illegible] of the New York union cannot b[illegible] considered, in its inevitable re[illegible] highly detrimental to the best inte[illegible] of the art and to the standards [illegible] chestral playing, and hence, in the [illegible] suicidal for the players. This is [illegible] adoption of a rule absolutely limi[illegible] the number of rehearsals permitted [illegible] great orchestral societies by the [illegible] to four a week and reducing th[illegible] hearsal time from two and a hal[illegible] to two. The weekly limit for the [illegible] phony orchestras has, till this [illegible] was taken, been five. The weekly [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

[illegible] to such e writers as Schumann,
, he is apparently a thoro musical architecture and desig well said of him that, parado ounds, his music can be wistfu same time robust.
WARREN STOREY SMITH.

ANS. DEC.11.

PHONY TO SUME CONCERTS

ext week will mark the 150th ary of Beethoven's birth, the ster's overture, "Dedication of se," will open the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given y and Saturday, Dec. 17 and 18.
eresting to note that this overs the first piece ever played by ton Symphony Orchestra, for it he initial program in Music Hall Also at this concert Richard the concertmaster of the or-will be heard as soloist for the he here, playing Brahms's violin o in D major

RAV DEC.11

PHONY PROGRAM

program for the Symphony rts next Friday afternoon and day evening has been changed ay tribute to the memory o oven. It will include his "Dedon of the House" overture, th piece on the first program th phony ever played. Richard Bu the new concert master, will b soloist, playing Brahms' viol certo in D major. The other nu will be Arnold Bax's Gae
e, "In the Fairy Hills," and B reff's fantasy, "Islamey." Th novelties.

ADVERTISER DEC.11

oven's overture, "The Dedication House," opus 124, which is to be at this week's Symphony con-memory of the 150th anniversary composer's birth, was the first n the first program ever given by chestra, on Oct 22, 1881, in the old Hall.

ard Burgin, who will appear for st time this week as soloist with ymphony Orchestra, of which he v concert master, is like Heifetz imbalist, a pupil of Auer.

day at 2:30 and Saturday at 8 T on Symphony Orchestra, eigh
ram. Overture "The Dedication House," Beethoven (In memori wig van Beethoven, born Dec
"An Sluagh Sidhe," Bax (fi
s in America); Concerto for Vio Orchestra, in D minor, Brahm amey," Balakirev-Casella. Solo ard Burgin.

GLOBE DEC.12

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

THE discussion of the Mu Union, of its merits and dem its advantages and disadvan
for the whole body of orche players, for the individual n and for the best interests o of music, is a long and compli
e. Not often do many of the d wever, get before the public, as l in the excitement of last year e Boston Orchestra and the qu keeping it in the path that gginson insisted on for so many There is no doubt much to be s th sides; at any rate, much has id on both sides. But one recent the New York union cannot nsidered, in its inevitable r ghly detrimental to the best in the art and to the standards estral playing, and hence, in th icidal for the players. This doption of a rule absolutely e number of rehearsals permitt eat orchestral societies by the four a week and reducing t earsal time from two and a hal
two. The weekly limit for th hony orchestras has, till this as taken, been five. The weekl er of hours for rehearsing is t uced from twelve and a half to The action of the union is "progressive." It always re greater and greater benefit to t
vidual member—higher salaries rehearsals, shorter hours. If th ll benefits. And if the indiv benefited and the quality of formance is not injured the n may be a cause for rejoicing.
ciency experts will tell us that t point beyond which intensive la nnot go to advantage. Musici also tell us that the New Yo
phony players are very clever and skillful in accommodatin selves to what their conducto Hence, it is said, the need for the less. But the limit of r rehearsals is far from being by the number that has hith permitted by the union; and t est cleverness cannot make a for careful polishing. The fac point has now been reached standard of rehearsal and p hitherto considered indispensa itely threatened.
Fortunately, one organizatio
York Symphony Society, wa
make a stand, for this seaso gainst this reduction of th
[illegible]

of a period of two years to the then existing rule of five weekly rehearsals of two and a half hours each, as well as to the then prevailing minimum weekly salary, out-of-town traveling allowances and number of concerts in New York. Mr. Flagler is understood to have waived his contract rights as to the minimum salary, to the number of concerts in New York and the traveling allowances. But he has insisted on enforcing the agreement as to rehearsals, not only the weekly number, but the duration of each. It is considered, and rightly so, by both him and Mr. Damrosch that the main, if not the only, reason for contributing the large subsidies that are now paid to orchestras, over and above the sum contributed by the public through the box office, is to insure sufficient rehearsal; that sufficient rehearsal is the very essence of a subsidized orchestra's reason for existence.

This agreement, however, is understood to run for one season only. Next season the union will be free to require of this orchestra what it now requires of the others, and can put the same limitations upon it. Most of the musical public will agree with Mr. Flagler that the new rule of the union is a grave error, fraught with serious consequences to the future of endowed orchestras in New York; and that the rights which he still enjoys by contract should be voluntarily accorded to the other symphony orchestras of the city.

Heaven knows that the standard has in recent years been lowered enough already by the gradual reduction of rehearsal time. There has been suspicion, and more than suspicion, that pieces have been put on the concert programs insufficiently rehearsed and even not rehearsed at all. It is quite certain that this has sometimes—it may be feared often—been the case, especially with concertos; the solo performers have on occasion been unceremoniously dumped into the concert without being allowed opportunity for any really painstaking practice with the orchestra, and sometimes actually without any rehearsal at all. The results have been obvious. They have sometimes been deplorable.

With the number of concerts that our orchestras are giving now and the number of different programs that must, therefore, be prepared, the rehearsals permitted by the union are insufficient for proper performances. It is, of course, commonplace to say that fine quality performance is attainable only by sufficient rehearsal under competent and painstaking direction. This is an elementary and obvious statement; yet the tendency is always and everywhere to say that "it is good enough"; that "it will go," possibly even, "they won't know the difference." It may go after fashion; and "they" may not appreciate the difference immediately; but the difference will make itself felt some time, and "they" will take action accordingly.

Thus the union, by its decree demolishing the rehearsal schedule, has begun the destruction of the possibility good orchestral playing, or at any ate of the finest orchestral playing. has before this made good orchestral aying not only difficult to obtain but ery expensive. Perhaps it should be pensive. But the last phase may be en approaching now. There is no ason why further reductions in rearsal may not be enforced. The time y come when "faking" and "chic" d pure "magnetism" on the part of conductor will be considered by the on enough to carry through an orestral performance.

he raising of salaries has been one the objects most steadily kept in view the union; an eminently laudable pursued properly and necessarily all workers for a salary. It has been essful, involving, necessarily, a t increase in the annual deficits of the permanent orchestras. These cits have reached figures that would made the hair of a generation ago d on end; but so would many other res of the present time. There are ys millionaires to be milked and ng to be, or made to bleed through nose and ready for that kind of botomy. Nobody pities the sorrows he millionaire guarantor. He and sorrows—which he knows how to into joys—may be taken for ted. But what cannot be taken for ted is the definite downward step money cannot stop.

union may be all powerful, but it rs to be exercising its power un- y when it takes this step, or makes cessary to be taken. The public, ps, may be educated downward h to endure what will be set be- it, or even not to know the differ- But possibly, also, it will not; dventure there may be fifty mu- y righteous within the city who raise a cry, and even without a cry will inevitably come the time when difference is appreciably felt. re is the point of honor, of common ty, to give the public the best that e done by gentlemen and artists. is the somewhat more recondite of artistic rectitude—that artists the best that in them lies because are artists and because they have rtistic ideal and an artistic con- e. We are sure, of course, that rtistic ideal is what the union hes, equally with the ideal of pay and more leisure. It has bly misconceived the results of its action, or it has allowed tempo- and purely practical notions to re for a time the fine idealism that guiding principle of artists, and of a union of artists.

Y.TIMES DEC.12.

CONCERT MASTER NEXT SOLOIST

Richard Burgin, who has recently come from eastern Europe to serve as the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be heard as soloist for the first time next Friday and Saturday, is of Polish parentage, a native of Warsaw. His training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia, and part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the east to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For 12 years he served as concert master in the fine orchestras which the largest cities of these countries possess. His first teacher was Lotto. His most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, he studied four years. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came before his time; Seidel and Piastro came later, while Heifetz was his fellow-pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, he toured Russia, Poland,

RICHARD BURGIN
Solo Violinist at the Symphony Concerts This Week

Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society and the Stockholm Society.

He has served as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Nikisch, likewise under Richard Strauss and Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania, and formed the Burgin quartet in Stockholm, which regularly toured from city to city, performing 12 recitals a season.

HERALD DEC.12.

Boston Symphony

The programme for the eighth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18, in Symphony Hall, has been changed to pay tribute to the memory of Beethoven, of whose birth this week is the 150th anniversary. It will include the great master's overture, Dedication to the House," Opus 124, which was the first piece on the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when this historical institution of Boston gave its initial public concert in Music Hall, in 1881.

Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will on this occasion be heard as soloist for the first time here, playing Brahms' violin concerto in D major.

The other numbers will be Arnold Bax's Gaelic symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills" (first time in America), and Balakireff's brilliant fantasy, "Islamey," as orchestrated by Alfred Casella (first time in Boston).

POST DEC. 12.

Special interest is manifested in the appearance of Samuel Gardner as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. His achievements in foreign fields have brought him an enviable reputation.

Mr. Gardner learned the elements of his art in this city, where he studied with Evangeline Larry, who did much to interest music lovers in his career. He later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the Kneisel Quartet. With that organization, in numerous recitals of his own, and in appearances with the different orchestras, he has captivated audience after audience by his musicianship and executive brilliance.

This musician is also a composer of importance. His string quartet was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500. Mr. Gardner received the Loeb prize of $500 for his symphonic poem, "New Russia." "A Night in the Rockies" and "From the Cane-brakes" are well known. There is naturally considerable interest, therefore, in his new concerto for his own instrument with orchestra. This work will be played by him for the first time at the coming Boston Symphony concert.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's last symphony, the Fourth, in D minor, one of the master's most poetic and beautiful works. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will open the concert and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" will close it—music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country which are treated in such strikingly original and colorful fashion as to the orchestral [illegible]

Samuel Gardner
Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening.

PROV. JOURNAL DEC.12

BURGIN SOLOIST

The program for the eighth pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, has been changed to pay tribute to the memory of Beethoven, of whose birth this week is the 150th anniversary. It will include the overture, "Dedication of the House," which was the first piece on the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it gave its first public concert in Music Hall in 1881. Richard Burgin, concert master, will be heard as soloist for the first time at these concerts. He will play Brahms's concerto. The other numbers will be Arnold Bax's Gaelic symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills" (first time in America), and Balikireff's brilliant fantasy, "Islamey," as orchestrated by Alfredo Casella (first time in Boston).

HERALD DEC.12

Mr. Monteux has put in rehearsal for performance in the near future at the Symphony Concerts, the first series of Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero." All three are woodland pieces—one, autumnal; one bright with the sunshine and the stir of summer; and the third, a nocturne "full of poetry and contemplation." A bird designates each division—"The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," "The Owl."

The managers of concerts in London have discovered that audiences will come to hear singers, pianists and violinists at five or five-thirty in the afternoon and recitals at such hours are multiplying. The similar public in American cities probably dines too early for such an experiment on this side of the Atlantic.

The Forlana, the Minuet and the Riga-

TRANS. DEC.13

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony, with Samuel Gardner, Here To-night.

By far the most significant part of the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season at Infantry Hall to-night is the appearance of Samuel Gardner as violin soloist. Mr. Gardner is a native of this city and spent most of his youth here. His first teacher was Miss Evangeline Larry, who recognized his precocity, and it was through her influence that Franz Kneisel took interest in the lad. "Sammy," as he is quite familiarly known to music followers in this city, then played second violin in the Kneisel quartet, which is one of the greatest in the work of the smaller organizations of its kind. Concerts in all parts of the country followed, until now he stands very high among the great American violinists.

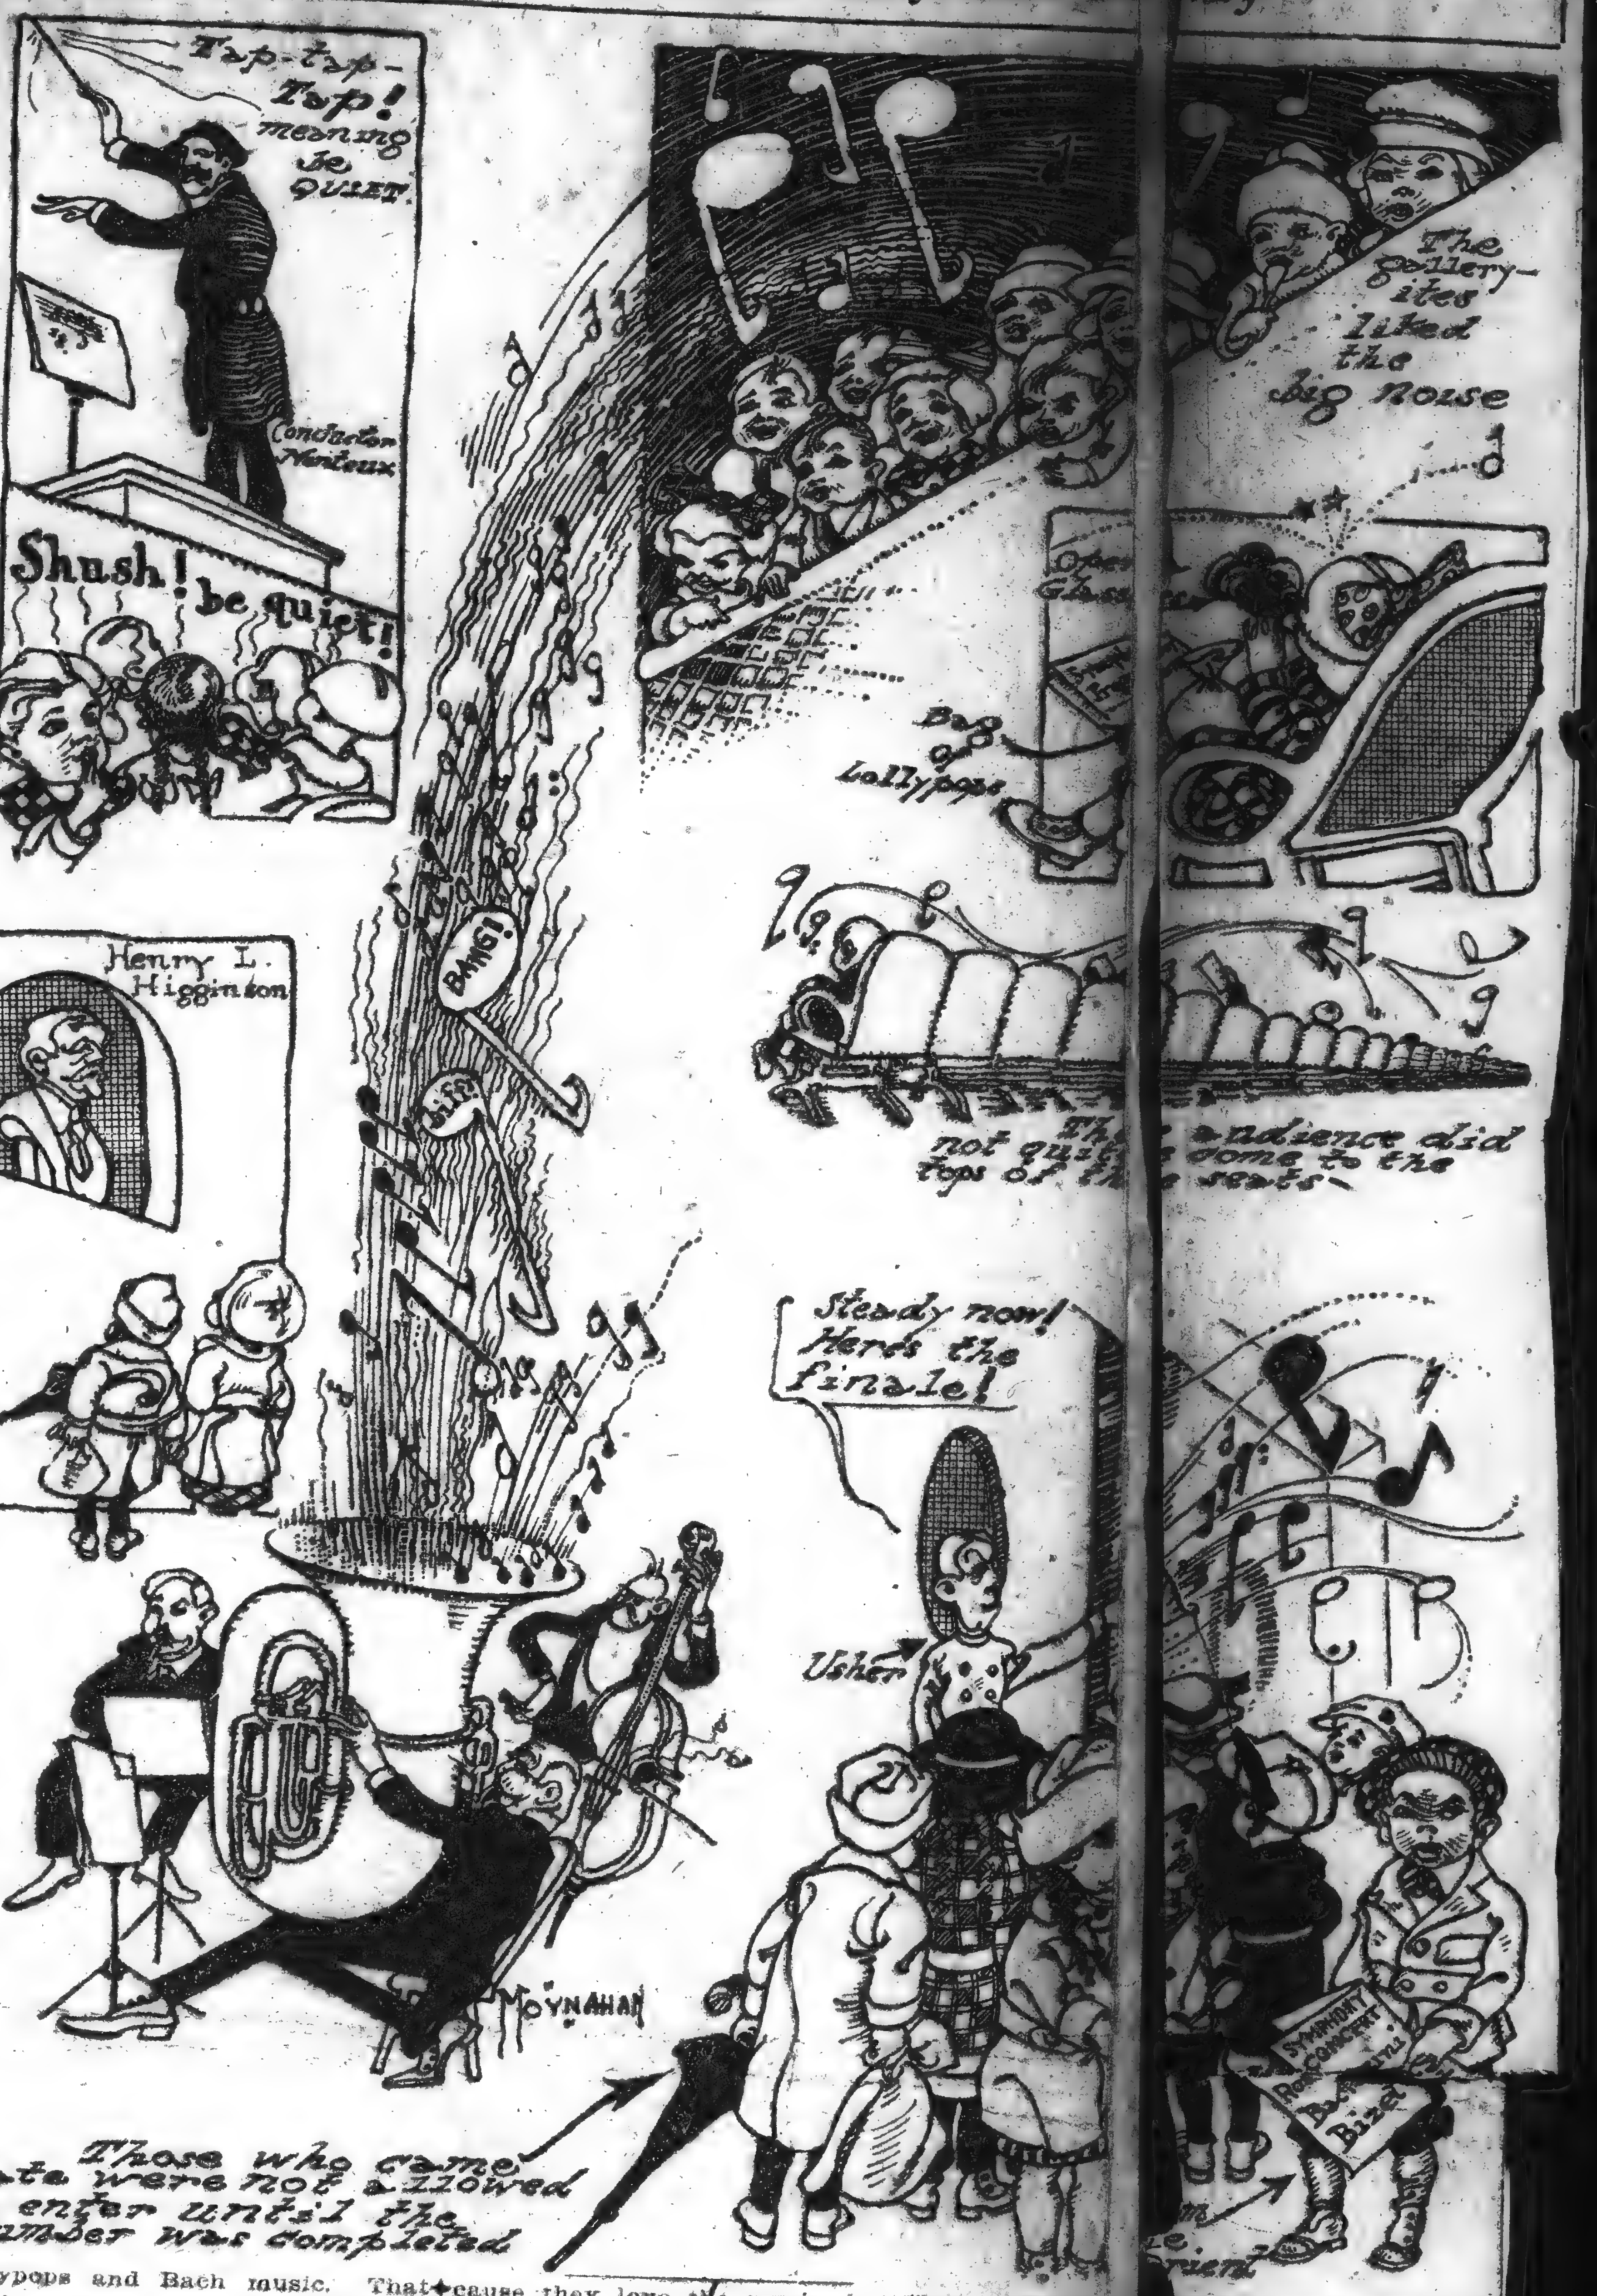
Mr. Gardner is also a composer of ability, having won the Pulitzer prize for a string quartet piece and the Loeb prize for a symphonic poem. To-night he plays for the first time his new concerto for violin and orchestra.

The main pieces of the orchestra, led by Pierre Montuex, are to be Schumann's "Fourth Symphony" in D minor and Berlioz's "Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini.'"

BROWN HERALD DEC. 14.

SYMPHONY MUSIC, LOLLYPOPS!

3,000 Boston School Children Applaud Famous Classical Strains and Contentedly Eat Candy



Tap-tap-Tap! meaning be QUIET
Conductor Monteux
Shush! be quiet!
The gallery-ites liked the big noise
Bag of Lollypops
Henry L. Higginson
BANG!
BIFF!
The audience did not quite come to the tops of the seats
Steady now! Here's the finale!
Usher
SYMPHONY CONCERT Rossini Bach Bizet
MOYNAHAN
Those who came late were not allowed to enter until the number was completed

Lollypops and Bach music. That was the combination at Symphony Hall on three afternoons last week when 3,000 Boston school children paid a nominal sum to enjoy classical music by the regular Symphony Orchestra.

It was the annual treat provided for the children. The big hall was packed at each performance and he youngsters showed as fine an ap-reciation of good music as the "reg-lars," grownups, who pay several ollars for their seats each week.
nly—the children would eat candy.

Merry-faced and expectant they led into the great hall, making a harp contrast with the audience hich attends the Friday afternon hearsals. Then women clad in silks nd furs rustle to their seats, while tside limousines and victorias await hem. Debutantes go, too, not because they love the music, but "because, my dear, you know it's the thing to do."

But last week it was different. There were no silks and furs; no limousines. Big children and little children, boys and girls of American birth and others not long over from the old world, where classical music is loved and reverenced, were there. Eager, ardent, expectant young eyes were fixed on the stage long before Pierre Monteux, conductor, came on the stage, baton in hand, and then the hall was stilled with the quiet of expectancy.

Rows on rows of little heads; many of them barely able to see over the seat in front gave the hall an unusual aspect. Here and there was a touch of the eternal feminine as some small hand was raised to straighten a bow or fix a curl. Despite watchful eye of teacher, many a lollypop was smuggled in to be enjoyed to the music of Dvorak or Rossini.

Though [illegible] t in years, the audience was long [illegible] appreciation. It didn't have to [illegible] educated "up" to good music, it [illegible] naturally loved it. Unlike mos [illegible] ton audiences, it didn't realize i [illegible] unconventional t show ap [illegible] on. So the children applaude [illegible] waved their arms when somethin [illegible] especially liked was played.

The pr [illegible] was wide in range.
There w [illegible] of Russia and of Bohemia, [illegible] nce and Germany and Italy—bu [illegible] none of America. Strange as it ma [illegible] seem, it was the delicate, technical, exact music of Bach that brought forth the first spontaneous applause.

It was the fa [illegible] ndole from the suite
"L'Arlesi [illegible] o. 2, by the French composer, [illegible] which really roused the child [illegible] e minute the first martia [illegible] were played every chi [illegible] edge of his seat and [illegible] sway to the rhythm
[illegible] oon feet were tapping, [illegible] and when the strains [illegible] way the applause broke [illegible] wanted more vivacious[illegible] are of brass instruments and clea [illegible] motif.

"Wasn't it grand?" one little shaver asked another as it finally became evident the concert was really at an end, "Don't you wish we could come again?"

They were ragged, they didn't have much in life that was pleasure and this concert of classical music had struck a sympathetic chord.

Slowly the children made their way out. None wanted to [illegible], they liked the brilliancy, the light, the warmth and above all they liked the music.

They stopped in groups to discuss it. Here and there was a teacher, but somehow they weren't needed. The children had grown up. They talked quietly.

One group of six little girls stopped to admire the bust of Major Henry Lee Higginson in the foyer. They gazed at it admiringly in silence. Perhaps they realized it was to Major Higginson more than anyone else, that their afternoon's pleasure was indirectly due.

ADVERTISER DEC.12.

TIGHT BINDING

and in contrast to such typic ve writers as Schumann an , he is apparently a thorough musical architecture and design. well said of him that, paradox ounds, his music can be wistful same time robust.

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

ANS. DEC. 1

PHONY TO SUME CONCERTS

ext week will mark the 150th ary of Beethoven's birth, the ster's overture, "Dedication of se," will open the next pair of Symphony concerts, to be given y and Saturday, Dec. 17 and 18. eresting to note that this over- the first piece ever played by ton Symphony Orchestra, for it he initial program in Music Hall Also at this concert Richard the concertmaster of the or- will be heard as soloist for the he here, playing Brahms's violin o in D major program for the Symphony rts next Friday afternoon and day evening has been changed ay tribute to the memory of oven. It will include his "Ded- n of the House" overture, the piece on the first program th phony ever played. Richard Bur the new concert master, will soloist, playing Brahms' violi erto in D major. The other num will be Arnold Bax's Gaeli e, "In the Fairy Hills," and Ba reff's fantasy, "Islamey." The novelties.

RALD DEC. 1

PHONY PROGRAM

ADVERTISER DEC. 1

oven's overture, "The Dedication House," opus 124, which is to be at this week's Symphony con- memory of the 150th anniversary composer's birth, was the first n the first program ever given by chestra, on Oct 22, 1881, in the old Hall.

* * *

ard Burgin, who will appear for st time this week as soloist with ymphony Orchestra, of which he concert master, is like Heifet imbalist, a pupil of Auer.

* * *

day at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. T on Symphony Orchestra, eigh ram. Overture "The Dedication House," Beethoven (In memori wig van Beethoven, born Dec "An Sluagh Sidhe," Bax (fi in America); Concerto for Vio Orchestra, in D minor, Brahm amey," Balakirev-Casella. Solo ard Burgin.

LOBE DEC. 12

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

THE discussion of the Mu Union, of its merits and deme its advantages and disadvant for the whole body of orche players, for the individual n and for the best interests of t of music, is a long and compli e. Not often do many of the de wever, get before the public, as l in the excitement of last year e Boston Orchestra and the qu keeping it in the path that igginson insisted on for so many There is no doubt much to be sa th sides; at any rate, much has id on both sides. But one recent the New York union cannot b nsidered, in its inevitable re ghly detrimental to the best int the art and to the standards estral playing, and hence, in th icidal for the players. This doption of a rule absolutely li e number of rehearsals permitt reat orchestral societies by the four a week and reducing t earsal time from two and a hal two. The weekly limit for th hony orchestras has, till this as taken, been five. The weekl er of hours for rehearsing is t uced from twelve and a half to The action of the union is 'progressive.' It always res reater and greater benefit to t idual member—higher salaries, rehearsals, shorter hours, if th ll benefits. And if the indiv benefited and the quality of formance is not injured the ne may be a cause for rejoicing. ciency experts will tell us that t point beyond which intensive la not go to advantage. Musici also tell us that the New Yo phony players are very clever and skillful in accommodatin selves to what their conduct Hence, it is said, the need for r is the less. But the limit of r rehearsals is far from being by the number that has hith permitted by the union; and est cleverness cannot make a for careful polishing. The fac point has now been reached standard of rehearsal and p hitherto considered indispensa nitely threatened.

Fortunately, one organizatio York Symphony Society, w make a stand, for this seaso against this reduction of the rehearsal. It made a contract which its players bound for a period of two years to the then existing rule of five weekly rehearsals of two and a half hours each, as well as to the then prevailing minimum weekly salary, out-of-town traveling allowances and number of concerts in New York. Mr. Flagler is understood to have waived his contract rights as to the minimum salary, to the number of concerts in New York and the traveling allowances. But he has insisted on enforcing the agreement as to rehearsals, not only the weekly number, but the duration of each. It is considered, and rightly so, by both him and Mr. Damrosch that the main, if not the only, reason for contributing the large subsidies that are now paid to orchestras, over and above the sum contributed by the public through the box office, is to insure sufficient rehearsal; that sufficient rehearsal is the very essence of a subsidized orchestra's reason for existence.

This agreement, however, is understood to run for one season only. Next season the union will be free to require of this orchestra what it now requires of the others, and can put the same limitations upon it. Most of the musical public will agree with Mr. Flagler that the new rule of the union is a grave error, fraught with serious consequences to the future of endowed orchestras in New York; and that the rights which he still enjoys by contract should be voluntarily accorded to the other symphony orchestras of the city.

Heaven knows that the standard has in recent years been lowered enough already by the gradual reduction of rehearsal time. There has been suspicion, and more than suspicion, that pieces have been put on the concert programs insufficiently rehearsed and even not rehearsed at all. It is quite certain that this has sometimes—it may be feared often—been the case, especially with concertos; the solo performers have on occasion been unceremoniously dumped into the concert without being allowed opportunity for any really painstaking practice with the orchestra, and sometimes actually without any rehearsal at all. The results have been obvious. They have sometimes been deplorable.

With the number of concerts that our orchestras are giving now and the number of different programs that must, therefore, be prepared, the rehearsals permitted by the union are insufficient for proper performances. It is, of course, commonplace to say that fine quality n performance is attainable only by sufficient rehearsal under competent and painstaking direction. This is an elementary and obvious statement; yet the tendency is always and everywhere to say that "it is good enough"; that " it will go," possibly even, " they won't know the difference." It may go after fashion; and " they " may not appreciate the difference immediately; but the difference will make itself felt some time, and " they " will take action accordingly.

Thus the union, by its decree demolishing the rehearsal schedule, has egun the destruction of the possibility f good orchestral playing, or at any ate of the finest orchestral playing. has before this made good orchestral laying not only difficult to obtain but ery expensive. Perhaps it should be xpensive. But the last phase may be en approaching now. There is no ason why further reductions in re- arsal may not be enforced. The time ay come when " faking " and " chic " d pure " magnetism " on the part of e conductor will be considered by the ion enough to carry through an or- estral performance.

he raising of salaries has been one the objects most steadily kept in view the union; an eminently laudable pursued properly and necessarily all workers for a salary. It has been cessful, involving, necessarily, a t increase in the annual deficits of the permanent orchestras. These cits have reached figures that would e made the hair of a generation ago d on end; but so would many other res of the present time. There are ys millionaires to be milked and ing to be, or made to bleed through nose and ready for that kind of botomy. Nobody pities the sorrows he millionaire guarantor. He and sorrows—which he knows how to into joys—may be taken for ted. But what cannot be taken for ted is the definite downward step money cannot stop.

union may be all powerful, but it rs to be exercising its power un- y when it takes this step, or makes cessary to be taken. The public, ps, may be educated downward h to endure what will be set be- it, or even not to know the differ- But possibly, also, it will not; venture there may be fifty mu- y righteous within the city who raise a cry, and even without a cry will inevitably come the time when difference is appreciably felt.

re is the point of honor, of common ty, to give the public the best that be done by gentlemen and artists. is the somewhat more recondite of artistic rectitude—that artists the best that in them lies because are artists and because they have tistic ideal and an artistic con- ce. We are sure, of course, that rtistic ideal is what the union hes, equally with the ideal of pay and more leisure. It has bly misconceived the results of its action, or it has allowed tempo- and purely practical notions to e for a time the fine idealism that guiding principle of artists, and of a union of artists.

Y. TIMES DEC. 12

CONCERT MASTER NEXT SOLOIST

Richard Burgin, who has recently come from eastern Europe to serve as the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be heard as soloist for the first time next Friday and Saturday, is of Polish parentage, a native of Warsaw. His training has nevertheless taken place largely in Russia, and part of his career has been confined by chaotic conditions in the east to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For 12 years he served as concert master in the fine orchestras which the largest cities of these countries possess. His first teacher was Lotto. His most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, he studied four years. Of Auer's pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came before his time; Seidel and Piastro came later, while Heifetz was his fellow-pupil and friend. Thus prepared for his professional career, he toured Russia, Poland,

RICHARD BURGIN
Solo Violinist at the Symphony Concerts This Week

Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society and the Stockholm Society.

He has served as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Nikisch, likewise under Richard Strauss and Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania, and formed the Burgin quartet in Stockholm, which regularly toured from city to city, performing 12 recitals a season.

HERALD DEC. 12.

Boston Symphony

The programme for the eighth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday evening, Dec. 17 and 18, in Symphony Hall, has been changed to pay tribute to the memory of Beethoven, of whose birth this week is the 150th anniversary. It will include the great master's overture, Dedication to the House," Opus 124, which was the first piece on the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when this historical institution of Boston gave its initial public concert in Music Hall, in 1881.

Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, will on this occasion be heard as soloist for the first time here, playing Brahms' violin concerto in D major.

The other numbers will be Arnold Bax's Gaelic symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills" (first time in America), and Balakireff's brilliant fantasy, "Islamey," as orchestrated by Alfred Casella (first time in Boston).

POST-DEC. 12.

Special interest is manifested in the appearance of Samuel Gardner as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. His achievements in foreign fields have brought him an enviable reputation.

Mr. Gardner learned the elements of his art in this city, where he studied with Evangeline Larry, who did much to interest music lovers in his career. He later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the Kneisel Quartet. With that organization, in numerous recitals of his own, and in appearances with the different orchestras, he has captivated audience after audience by his musicianship and executive brilliance.

This musician is also a composer of importance. His string quartet was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500. Mr. Gardner received the Loeb prize of $500 for his symphonic poem, "New Russia." "A Night in the Rockies" and "From the Cane-brake" are well known. There is naturally considerable interest, therefore, in his new concerto for his own instrument with orchestra. This work will be played by him for the first time at the coming Boston Symphony concert.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's last symphony, the Fourth, in D minor, one of the master's most poetic and beautiful works. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will open the concert and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" will close it—music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country which are treated in such strikingly original and colorful fashion as to piece the orchestral repertory.

Samuel Gardner
Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening.

PROV. JOURNAL DEC. 12.

BURGIN SOLOIST

The program for the eighth pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, has been changed to pay tribute to the memory of Beethoven, of whose birth this week is the 150th anniversary. It will include the overture, "Dedication of the House," which was the first piece on the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it gave its first public concert in Music Hall in 1881. Richard Burgin, concert master, will be heard as soloist for the first time at these concerts. He will play Brahms's concerto. The other numbers will be Arnold Bax's Gaelic symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills" (first time in America), and Balikireff's brilliant fantasy, "Islamey," as orchestrated by Alfredo Casella (first time in Boston).

HERALD DEC. 12

Mr. Monteux has put in rehearsal for performance in the near future at the Symphony Concerts, the first series of Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero." All three are woodland pieces—one, autumnal; one bright with the sunshine and the stir of summer; and the third, a nocturne "full of poetry and contemplation." A bird designates each division—"The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," "The Owl."

The managers of concerts in London have discovered that audiences will come to hear singers, pianists and violinists at five or five-thirty in the afternoon and recitals at such hours are multiplying. The similar public in American cities probably dines too early for such an experiment on this side of the Atlantic.

The Forlana, the Minuet and the Riga-

TRANS. DEC. 13

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony, with Samuel Gardner, Here To-night.

By far the most significant part of the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season at Infantry Hall to-night is the appearance of Samuel Gardner as violin soloist. Mr. Gardner is a native of this city and spent most of his youth here. His first teacher was Miss Evangeline Larry, who recognized his precocity, and it was through her influence that Franz Kneisel took interest in the lad. "Sammy," as he is quite familiarly known to music followers in this city, then played second violin in the Kneisel quartet, which is one of the greatest in the work of the smaller organizations of its kind. Concerts in all parts of the country followed, until now he stands very high among the great American violinists.

Mr. Gardner is also a composer of ability, having won the Pulitzer prize for a string quartet piece and the Loeb prize for a symphonic poem. To-night he plays for the first time his new concerto for violin and orchestra.

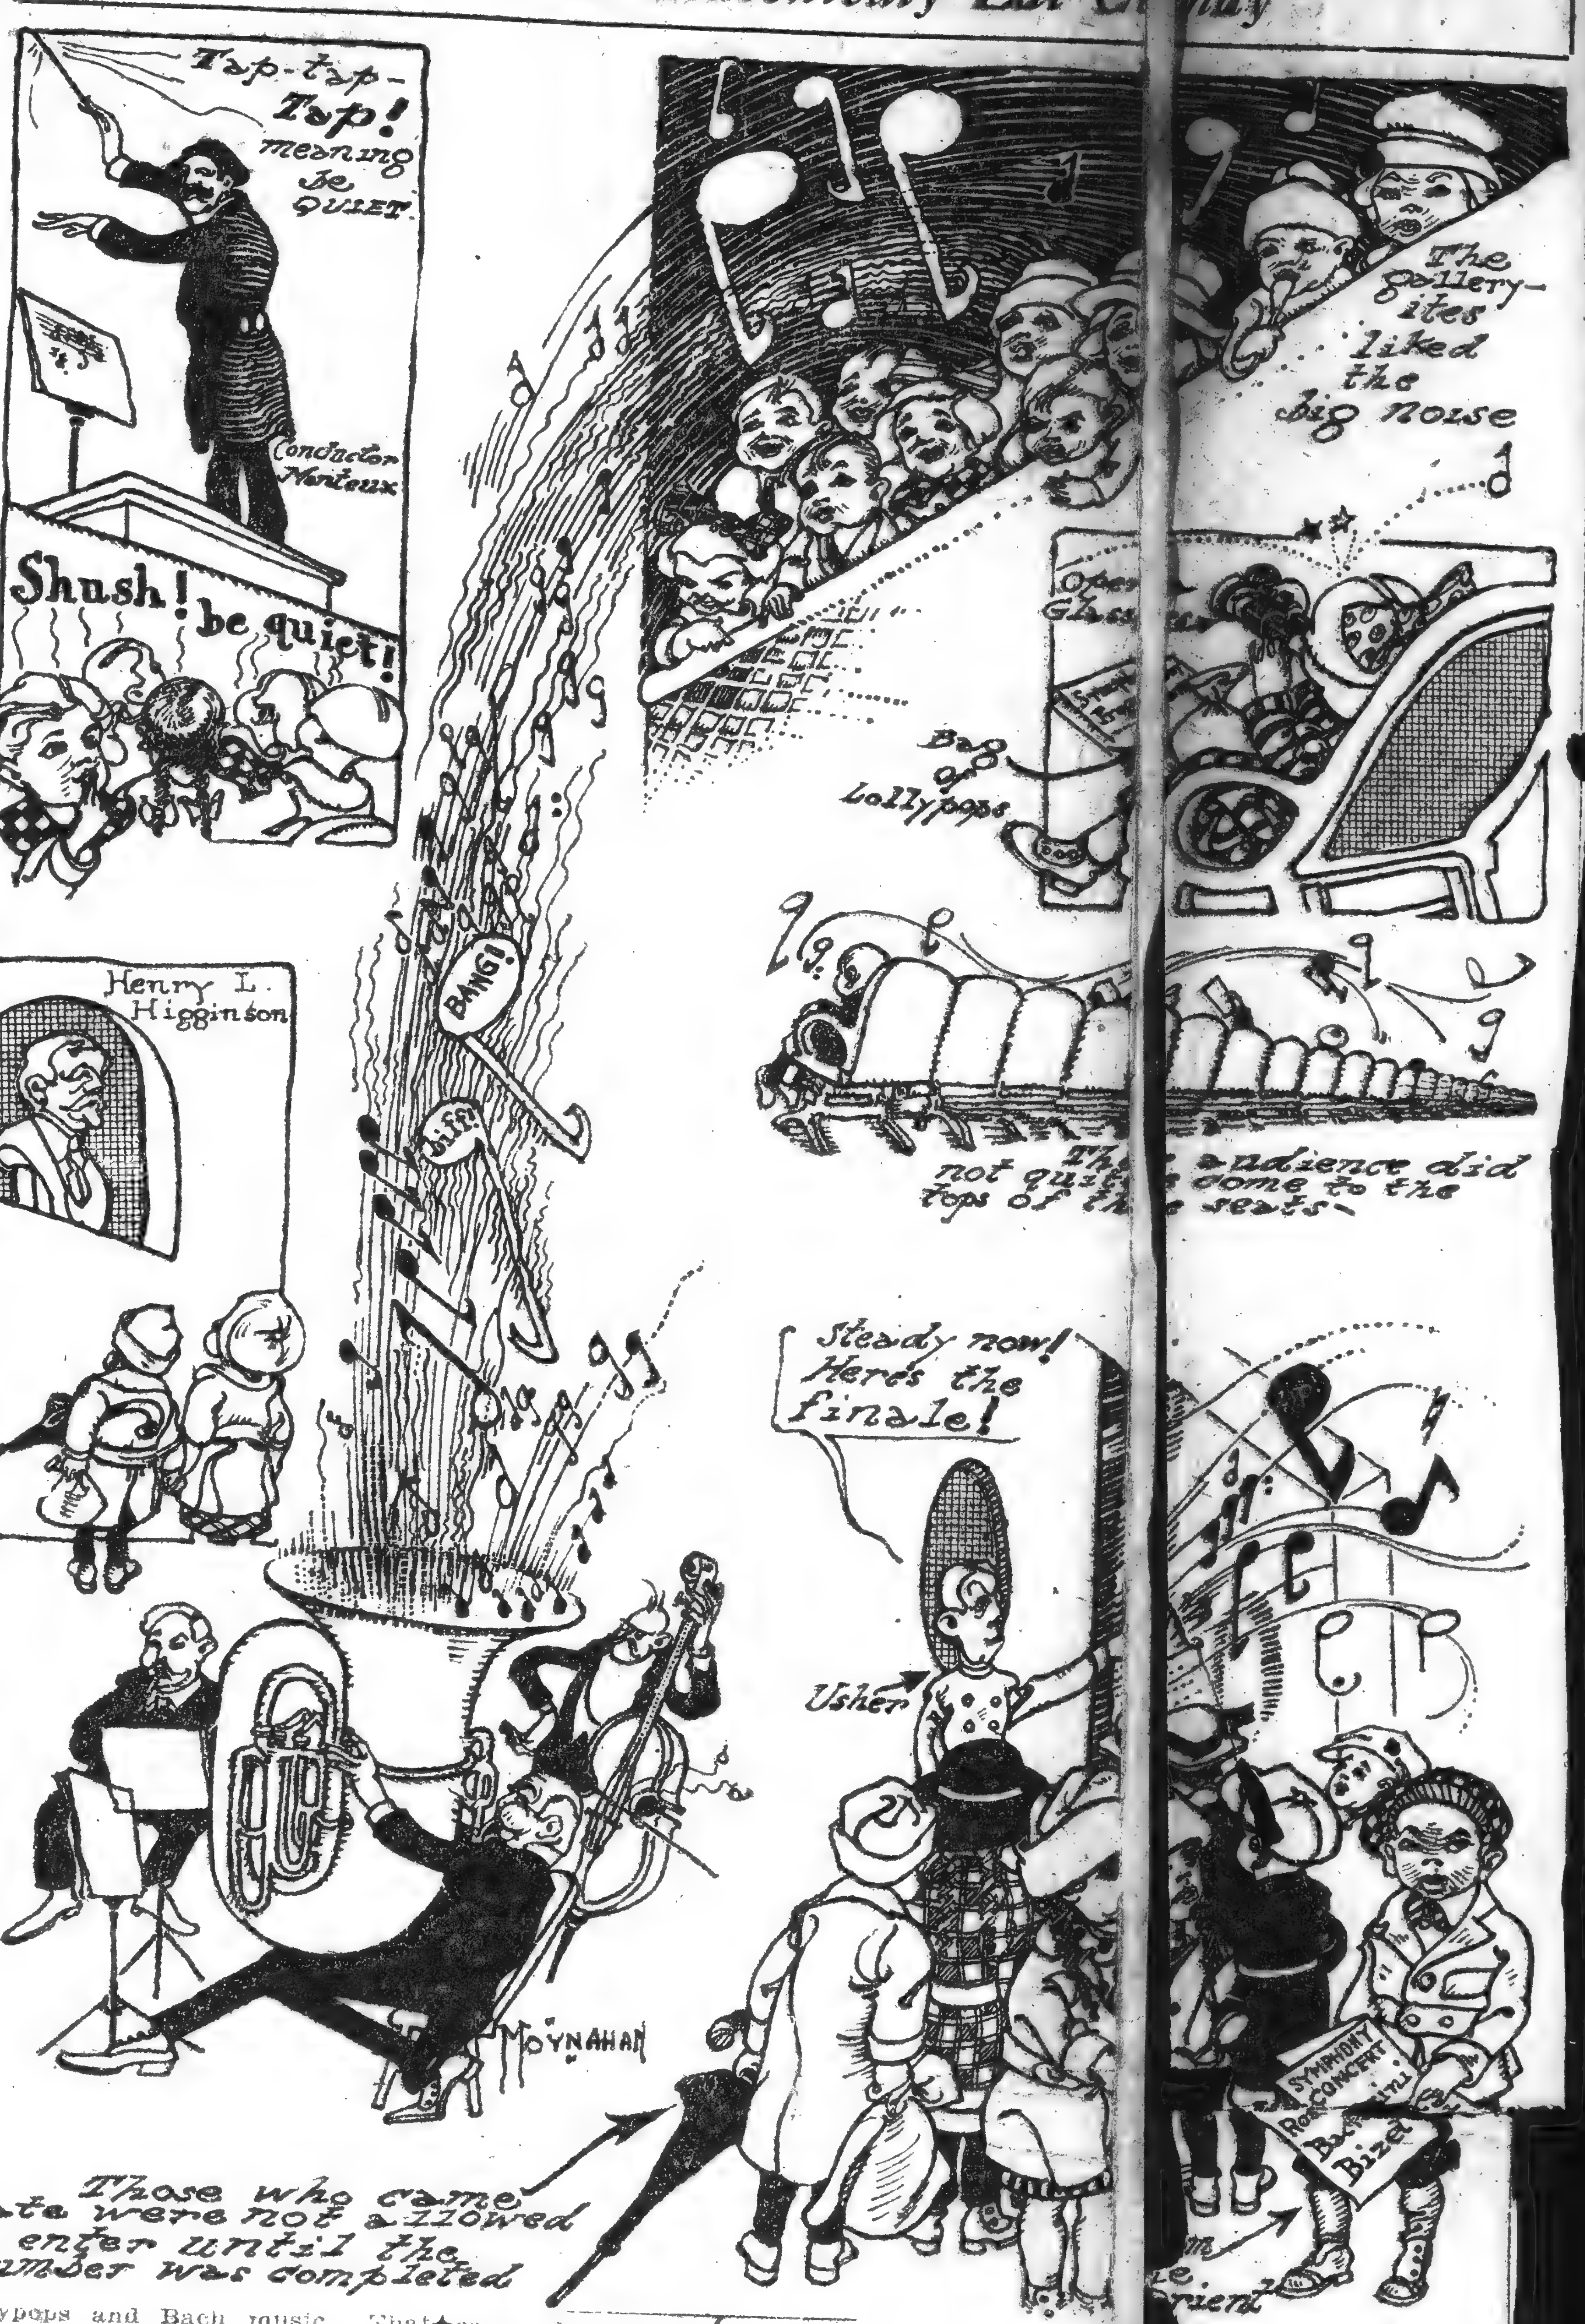
The main pieces of the orchestra, led by Pierre Montuex, are to be Schumann's "Fourth Symphony" in D minor and Berlioz's "Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini.'"

BROWN HERALD DEC. 14.

[62]

SYMPHONY MUSIC, LOLLYPOPS!

3,000 Boston School Children Applaud F mous Classical Strains and Contentedly Eat C ndy



Tap-tap-Tap! meaning be quiet.
Conductor Monteux
Shush! be quiet!
Henry L. Higginson
BANG!
The gallery-ites liked the big noise
Bag of Lollypops
The audience did not quite come to the tops of the seats.
Steady now! Here's the finale!
Usher
Symphony Concert
Bizet
MOYNAHAN
Those who came late were not allowed to enter until the number was completed

Lollypops and Bach music. That was the combination at Symphony Hall on three afternoons last week when 3,000 Boston school children paid a nominal sum to enjoy classical music by the regular Symphony Orchestra.

It was the annual treat provided for the children. The big hall was packed at each performance and he youngsters showed as fine an appreciation of good music as the "regulars," grownups, who pay several ollars for their seats each week. Only—the children would eat candy.

Merry-faced and expectant they led into the great hall, making a harp contrast with the audience which attends the Friday afternon ehearsals. Then women clad in silks nd furs rustle to their seats, while utside limousines and victorias await hem. Debutantes go, too, not because they love the music, but "because, my dear, you know it's the thing to do."

But last week it was different. There were no silks and furs; no limousines. Big children and little children, boys and girls of American birth and others not long over from the old world, where classical music is loved and reverenced, were there. Eager, ardent, expectant young eyes were fixed on the stage long before Pierre Monteux, conductor, came on the stage, baton in hand, and then the hall was stilled with the quiet of expectancy.

Rows on rows of little heads; many of them barely able to see over the seat in front gave the hall an unusual aspect. Here and there was a touch of the eternal feminine as some small hand was raised to straighten a bow or fix a curl. Despite watchful eye of teacher, many a lollypop was smuggled in to be enjoyed to the music of Dvorak or Rossini.

Thoug t in years, the audience was long appreciation. It didn't have to educated "up" to good music, it naturally loved it. Unlike mos on audiences, it didn't realize i unconventional to show ap on. So the children applaude waved their arms when somethin especially liked was played.

The pr was wide in range. There w of Russia and of Bohemia, ance and Germany and Italy—bu one of America. Strange as it may seem, it was the delicate, technical exact music of Bach that brought forth the first spontaneous applause.

It was the f ndole from the suite "L'Arlesi o. 2, by the French composer, which really roused the child e minute the first martia were played every chi edge of his seat and sway to the rhythm oon feet were tapping, and when the strains way the applause broke wanted more vivacious- are of brass instruments and clea at motif.

"Wasn't it gra d?" one little shaver asked another as it finally became evident the concert was really at an end, "Don't you wish we could come again?"

They were ragged, they didn't have much in life that was pleasure and this concert of classical music had struck a sympathetic chord.

Slowly the children made their way out. None wanted to go, they liked the brilliancy, the light, the warmth and above all they liked the music.

They stopped in groups to discuss it. Here and there was a teacher, but somehow they weren't needed. The children had grown up. They talked quietly.

One group of six little girls stopped to admire the bust of Major Henry Lee Higginson in the foyer. They gazed at it admiringly in silence. Perhaps they realized it was to Major Higginson more than anyone else, that their afternoon's pleasure was indirectly due.

ADVERTISER DEC. 12.

PROVIDENCE BOY [63] APPEARS HERE IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Samuel Gardner, a former Providence boy, appearing in the dual role of solo violinist and composer, played before a big audience in Infantry Hall last evening.

Mr. Gardner played, for the first time anywhere, his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor, in which work he scored a big success. It was a concert that held especial interest for many who were present, for to them it was a fulfilment of predictions made years ago when Mr. Gardner was a very small boy. Even in those days he showed marked talent for the violin. His musical nature and ability to play technically difficult pieces with ease caused those who heard him to say that some day "Sammy" Gardner would become a great violinist.

"Sammy" was a bright youngster, a favorite among his schoolmates, full of fun and always ready to play his violin at school affairs, little social times at the homes of his friends, or to help in any possible way with his talent. Since those boyhood days his friends have watched with pride "Sammy's" rise to fame and it was fitting that he should select his old home town as the scene of his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to choose for performance for the first time anywhere his latest and most mature work.

Mr. Gardner is now 27 years old. His career has been one of steady and healthy growth. His early excellent instruction in this city was continued under Felix Winternitz of Boston, and then for several years with Franz Kneisel, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both Mr. Winternitz and Mr. Kneisel were interested listeners at last night's concert.

TRAINED IN AMERICA

To his knowledge of harmony and a thorough general musical education obtained while under the guidance of Mr. Kneisel, the young violinist added the study of composition with Percy Goelschius of New York. So, it will be seen, Mr. Gardner is entirely an American-trained musician.

Talent for composition has led him to write many things: a symphony; a symphonic poem, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918, and a string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University, 1918. His compositions also include other works for string quartet, many pieces for violin and piano and songs.

The concerto played last evening is Mr. Gardner's most important composition to date. It was composed for the most part during his vacation this summer at Estes Park, Colorado, and orchestrated later in New York. Although at first hearing it was not easy to grasp the full significance of the work, which is decidedly modern in character, the general effect gives the critical listener a good idea of its musical value. On short acquaintance it appears to be of exceptional merit.

The solo violin voice is interesting throughout; originality is written on every page; the thematic material is excellent and in the working out of his ideas the composer has shown a fine grasp of orchestral technique. What he has to say is said in coherent musical language and there is nowhere apparent that tendency so frequently encountered in the efforts of young composers—to thicken the score in the hope to cover up the lack of ideas. The slow movement breathes the spirit of the Orient—or is it a tinge of that Russian sombreness born of generations of oppression?—for Mr. Gardner was born in Russia, and inherited mental tendencies are not easily blotted out even though one is brought up in free America.

The first movement is decidedly interesting, and there is a brilliant and effective cadenza. The final movement is sprightly, dashing, and reflects the energetic spirit which is a pleasing quality in the composer's personality. All in all the concerto seems a notable addition to the list of important American instrumental works and one that should place its creator in the front rank of this country's composers.

BRILLIANT IN TECHNIQUE

Mr. Gardner played with authority and finish. His tone is larger than when he last played here, and he displayed great technical brilliancy in portions of the work. The character of the concerto's three movements are indicated in the score, as follows: I. Ben moderato—Declamando con molto passione; Allegro con fuoco. II. Lento—alla maniera maestoso. III. Poco moderato et largamente; Allegro con quietezza.

After each movement Mr. Gardner was greeted with prolonged applause and at the close he was recalled many times.

The programme's principal orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor. It is one of that composer's finest symphonies and has been presented here many times by the Boston orchestra. Its beauties do not fade and Mr. Monteux read it with sympathetic understanding. The Romanza was given with delightful smoothness, Concertmaster Burgin's incidental violin solo being delicately and sweetly played. The Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" opened the programme. In this descriptive piece the final martial climax was brought out with tremendous brilliancy.

A Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor by the young Roumanian composer, Enesco, was the final number. This is a most novel and interesting orchestral conceit. It is a series of striking colorful musical episodes. During its progress one almost involuntarily pictures a wild peasant dance of many strange steps and postures which increase in speed and recklessness until a final whirling figure ends the spectacle. The orchestra played it with spirit, bringing out the well contrasted instrumental effects in splendid fashion.

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL - DEC. 15

Samuel Gardner

Former Providence Boy, Now Noted Violinist, Whose Concerto Was Given First Public Rendition by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Last Evening

---

JOURNAL - DEC. 15

SAMUEL GARDNER IN CONCERT

Noted Violinist Appears in Boston Symphony Orchestra Series.

There were few vacant seats in Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its able leader, Mr. Pierre Monteux, appeared on the stage amid a burst of applause. It was the second concert in the Providence series of five and Samuel Gardner, gifted violinist of New York formerly of Providence, was the soloist in his own concerto for violin and orchestra played here for the first time on any concert stage.

Naturally the knowledge on the part of local concertgoers that Samuel Gardner was to play his own concerto in this city where his early youth was spent and where he learned the elements of his art, aroused widespread interest and to this fact largely was due the great audience of last evening. There were hundreds in the audience who remembered the now celebrated violinist as "Sammy" Gardner, whose boyhood days—when he was a student of the violin here in Providence—gave promise of a future of high musical achievement, now abundantly fulfilled.

Mr. Gardner, now 27 years of age, learned the elements of his art in this city and later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the famous Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Gardner began work on the concerto played last evening in New York on June 29, 1920, and completed it at Estes Park, Col., on Aug. 15 and orchestrated it in New York Sept. 9-Oct. 24. The orchestral portion of the concerto is dedicated to Franz Kneisel who, with Felix Winternitz, an early teacher of the violinist, was in the audience last evening.

Mr. Gardner is widely known as a violinist, having played with the Symphony Society of New York, the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and given many recitals. The list of his compositions includes a symphony in F-minor; symphonic poem for orchestra, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in New York, June, 1918, performed at the Stadium, New York city, in July and August, 1919, and July, 1920, conducted by the composer, and by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Oct. 24, 1919; string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University in June, 1918 (the second movement has been performed by the Flonzaley Quartet); Prelude and Fugue for string quartet; "Hebraic Fantasie" for string quartet and clarinet; variations for string quartet; 16 pieces for violin and pianoforte; 15 songs for pianoforte and orchestra; "Splashes of Color" for the pianoforte.

Mr. Gardner's concerto is one which gives ample opportunity for the violinist to display his unquestioned virtuosity and this he did to the great delight of his listeners. Throughout the concert he gave a dazzling exhibition of technical skill. His first notes disclosed a penetrating tone full of vitality. His technique is clean, his intonation admirable and there is a refinement, a delicate finish in all his work. Of unusual beauty was his playing of the last movement of the concerto.

He was greeted with prolonged applause at the end of each movement of the concerto and at the close he received an ovation which found expression in four recalls.

That the concerto is of high musical value was the opinion of all who heard it last evening, the first movement being full of brilliant runs and passages while the finale is individualistic, spiritual and replete with delicious melody.

The full program of the concert was as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, Berlioz; "Symphony No. 4 in D-minor, Op. 120," Schumann; "Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-Minor, Op. 18," Gardner; "Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major, Op. 11, No. 1," Enesco.

The brilliant Berlioz "Overture," which opened the program, was magnificently played [illegible] orchestra and the performance of Schumann's last symphony, the "Fourth in D-minor," one of this great composer's most poetic and beautiful works, was a remarkable one; a performance indeed that might be classed as noble, a performance inspired by Mr. Monteux and characterized by an infinite variety of tonal force and color.

This symphony was first published as Schumann's "Second Symphony in D-minor," and later revised and published as "No. 4 in D-Minor."

The four movements of the symphony are closely connected besides having a common thematic material and for this reason, doubtless, it was Schumann's wish that the symphony should be played without pauses between the movements. It was so played by the orchestra last evening. An exultant finale crowns this monumental work and at its close Mr. Monteux was recalled several times, the last time, at a signal, the members of the orchestra rising and—with the conductor—acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The usual intermission of ten minutes followed the symphony, and at the close of this brief interval Mr. Gardner appeared with the orchestra amid prolonged applause.

The Rumanian Rhapsody in A Major, music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country and treated in original and colorful fashion, brought the concert to a brilliant close.

N. B. P.

TRIBUNE DEC. 15.

SAMUEL GARDNER PLAYS HIS OWN CONCERTO HERE

A few years ago when the youthful Samuel Gardner appeared here in public his friends predicted that a brilliant musical future was just ahead of him. Last night they saw their predictions spring into realization.

The young violinist and composer came to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. He played for the first time in public his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor and merited such applause from the large audience as assured him of its success. The composition, in slow movement, brings back memories of far-off Russia from which Gardner came to Providence when a boy, and then in final movement swiftly brings forth a reflection of the composer's vivid personality.

Mr. Gardner obtained his musical education in America under M. Kneisel and later under Percy Coelschius. His compositions of late years have been numerous and many of them merited high awards. His symphonic poem, "New Russia" won him the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918 and the Pulitzer prize of $1500 went to him in the same year for a string quartet in D-minor.

Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor was the principal orchestral number. The Berlioz overture and a Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor were other features.

NEWS. DEC. 15.

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge with Mr. Burgin Playing Glazunov's Concerto for Violin—Louis Bennett, a Singer at Beginnings

These are busy days for Mr. Richard Burgin; in three successive concerts, last evening in Cambridge, today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, he must not only discharge his duties as concert-master of the orchestra; he must also appear as "assisting artist." According to the original plan he was to prepare but one concerto, that of Brahms, for all three occasions; but that there might not be both a symphony and concerto by Brahms in a single programme, he substituted yesterday Glazunov's Concerto in A minor. Like most of the Russian's music, the concerto is agreeable to hear and grateful to play, but of no particular importance. In retrospect, between Brahms's E-minor Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," it seems no more than a few pretty tunes for the solo instrument, interlarded with the customary passage-work, and set against a discreet and decorous orchestral accompaniment. The true measure of Mr. Burgin's ability will be revealed in the more exacting music of Brahms. It might almost be taken for granted that he has the technical proficiency and the general musicianship that Glazunov's piece requires; and it need only be said that his performance of it met expectations. Mr. Burgin's tone is pleasig to the ear, if not remarkable either for richness or brilliance. There is, moreover, an earnestness and self-effacement in his playing, of which his work in the orchestra has already given more than a hint. It is easy to believe from the warmth of the reception accorded him last evening that he has already made a firm place for himself in the esteem of his fellow-players and of the subscribers to the concerts.

Of the symphony and the tone-poem there is little to be said at this late date, either as to the pieces themselves, or Mr. Monteux's and the orchestra's work in them. They have been played many times since they were heard in Boston a few weeks ago, and in both it is possible to note a greater smoothnes and a certain polishing of details. There is little need to wonder at the distrust with which Brahms's friends regarded his Fourth Symphony, or at his own readiness to share in it. Except in the first two movements, the piece is far less genial than its predecessors. The gaiety of the scherzo is forced and clumsy, and perhaps the very choice of the Passacaglia as form

ll b

e Finale was an admission on the part of the composer that he could not again duplicate the sweeping and sustained last movements of the other symphonies Almost inevitably patchy, the Finale o the fourth, despite the skill with which i is welded together, and in listening interes flags and revives by turns. But in th first movement, and to a less degree in th second, there is a certain grave, autumna beauty, that sets them apart from othe music. One of the curious tricks of musical chronology is found in the brief spa of ten years which separated this symphony from Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel. As the two pieces sound today, it migh have been fifty.

TRAN. DEC. 17.

NO SYMPHONY CHRISTMAS NIGHT

In order that the evening concert in Christmas week may not fall on Christmas night, it will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 23, at 8 o'clock, instead of Saturday evening. The afternoon concert will be given on Friday at 2:30 as usual.

At this, the ninth pair of concerts, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston "La Queste de Dieu," a descriptive symphony from Vincent d'Indy's Opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher."

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the noted young American artists, will be the soloists.

TRAV. DEC. 18.

BURGIN IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Concert Master Displays Sterling Equipment as Violinist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was soloist at the concert given by Mr. Monteux and his men yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Burgin played the Brahmns violin concerto. There was played for the first time in America Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the fairy hills"); for the first time in Boston, Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's picturesque piano piece, "Islamey," and the programme opened with Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House."

BURGIN'S MASTERLY PLAYIN

In other cities leading orchestras are giving complete Beethoven programmes in recognition of the 150th anniversary of that composer's birth (Dec. 16, 1770). At the Boston Symphony concerts thus far Beethoven's 150th anniversary i represented by an inferior overture, composition representative in only superficial way of the characteristic of the greatest master of symphoni composition the world has yet seen.

Mr. Burgin, playing a concerto whi will never be popular, made a deep in pression by his performance of it. A is well known, this Brahms concerto practically a symphony with an exten sive solo violin part. As such it wa interpreted with thought always fo its great lines and the interdependenc of the violin and the orchestra.

Such a virile, sincere, enthusiastic in terpretation of this work has not bee heard for a long time at these concert where the Brahms concerto frequentl figures on the programmes.

Mr. Burgin is not a violinist of ultra refinements or sophistications. Hi playing is always exceptionally straight forward, manly and in a noble spiri One could hardly think of a violinis better equipped by talent and by tem perament for this concerto. Everyon responded to the conviction and th mastery of Mr. Burgin's performanc Everyone realized as perhaps they ha not realized before the broad and mel dic character of the first two move ments, responded to the stirring gyps rhythms of the finale and understo clearly the gradual development fro initial motives of a whole great stru ture of tone.

The tone poem of Bax is an exquisi and fanciful thing. The opening is in t manner of an Oberon's horn, whi transports one to unearthly region And what is more haunting than t middle section, the melancholy so heard over the accompaniment harps, the song of the mortal asked the Sidhe to sing a song of human joy a song so sad that hearing it the fa folk wept in sorrow and ang Throughout the composition there c tains the atmosphere of fantasy grea enhanced by the mysterious and bea tiful effects of the orchestra.

As for Casellas' orchestration of " lamey," it is a wonderful box of tric and it is more, too. It is the fulfilm of the extravagant ideas of the co poser which a piano is inadequate convey. If you doubt it try yoursel play "Islamey" on your piano, t desire to go to Symphony Hall and rejo as the orchestra, boiling and crackl with a thousand wild effects, hurtling like a howling dervish to conclusion.

POST DEC 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, BRAHMS, BALAKIREV, BAX, BURGIN

An Anniversary in Wise Moderation—A Concerto for Violin to Endure, and Also Enjoy—Contrasting Exercise of Young Moderns — Orchestral Sound and Fury for Its Sake and Fairy-Picture Finely Woven

SERVICES are like sins; they may be of omission as well as commission, and Mr. Monteux surely did the public of the Symphony Concerts, a service of omission when he made no "Beethoven Programme" to celebrate the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the composer's birth. Beethoven was born on or about Dec. 16, 1770; wherefore on or about Dec. 16, 1920, crowd three of his symphonies into a single concert, or else be content with one and set it in a circle of his overtures, concertos and occasional pieces. A pleasing warmth diffuses itself over conductor, players, "assisting artists." Are not these numbers "repertory," so requiring little and none too assiduous preparation? Audiences listen tranquilly to the regular thing in the regular way. Good old Beethoven sounding the same in their ears (for the most part) yesterday, today and forever! Reviewers, especially when they have turned their sixtieth birthdays and live in New York, put to print "reverent" commonplaces that were stale in the earlier years of Victoria the Good. Incidentally they deplore "the degeneracy" of a day in which composers, exactly like Beethoven in his own time, dare to write their own music in their own way—to the wrath of the Pharisees, to the wholesome joy of publicans and sinners. So at a sesqui-centennial—imposing Latin words—is Beethoven affirmed as an "institution" and so are symphony concerts glorified as repositories of "the best models."

There is another way with Beethoven which Mr. Monteux wisely follows. These who likewise walk in it do not regard the composer as an "institution"; while they leave dates, anniversaries and all that to the learned compilers of programme-books. In their innocence and ignorance these dissenters believe the best of Bethoven's music perennially vital, stirring, enjoyable. To them it is fresh, significant, engrossing, to be heard with a will and a thrill. Therefore they would not have it played too often, until it is routine alike to conductor, orchestra and hearers. They would not have it confined to a few stock-pieces in annual or biennial round according to "the tradition." They would hear the masterpieces, as they heard the third "Leonore" overture a month ago, unexpectedly as it were, after long interval, in animating and vivid performance, as though Beethoven had written it no longer ago than last summer. They would, also, hear the music in which Beethoven is not the master, yet in degree Beethoven still. So they enjoyed the overtures to "King Stephen" and "Prometheus," resurrected last year and again yesterday the revived overture of 1822 with the clumsy title, "Dedication of the House." Of course, it is a "pièce d'occasion," written on commission to keep the pot boiling according to an ancient and by no means dishonorable human custom. None-the-less, the ample stride, the tonal pomp of the beginning are interesting to hear with Beethoven lording himself Händel-wise through his music-making. Händelian likewise is the following fugue which is also music-making—several paces near mechanics. Rightly, however, for a ceremonial occasion a ceremonial music.

Yet let none of the musically scrupulous believe that the classics were yesterday neglected. To the contrary, Mr. Monteux is a skilful and conscientious balancer of programmes. If we listeners were to have Bax and Casella, yet also had we Johannes Brahms. . . . Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 77—as some would say in length, breadth and thickness. Possibly it is somewhat late in the day to repine under the piece. Somehow the violinists have persisted these forty years in the playing of it, even violinists of widely different temperaments. Somehow conductors have found recurring room for it; somehow, and not always drowsily and perfunctorily, audiences hear and applaud. It is quite true that for long measures in the concerto Brahms is thinking his way along and by no means hiding the process. Now and again also this thinking halts or sags and the resulting music is stencil and mechanics. The motivs out of which the first movement springs are dry motivs little touching the imagination, while the orchestral measures cloud the solo-part oftener than they set it in relief.

Yet from the thick sheaf of pages rises that which stirs the performing violinist and which has been known to stir the sympathetic listener. However dry Brahms could be, he remained architect in tones; and in the first division of this belabored concerto, pillar by pillar, story by story, from foundation to pediment, he is rearing a musical edifice. The expanding lines impress, the adjusted proportions interest, the touches of ornament please; violinist and auditor join with the composer in the act of creation, even to the frieze of the cadenza and the long breath of satisfaction and completeness with which the songful melody finally returns. And the other two divisions are restful respite from these toils of ear and mind. The contemplative beauty of which Brahms still remains master among the moderns, with which he is almost always poet, glows soft and clear out of the slow movement against the autumnal tints of the orchestral background. And in the finale the grave, the bearded, the fat and spectacled Johannes is by no means impervious to the light flash of rhythm, to the motiv tossed, caught and tossed again. Did he not write certain Hungarian Dances

PROVIDENCE BOY APPEARS HERE IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

[63]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Samuel Gardner, a former Providence boy, appearing in the dual role of solo violinist and composer, played before a big audience in Infantry Hall last evening.

Mr. Gardner played, for the first time anywhere, his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor, in which work he scored a big success. It was a concert that held especial interest for many who were present, for to them it was a fulfilment of predictions made years ago when Mr. Gardner was a very small boy. Even in those days he showed marked talent for the violin. His musical nature and ability to play technically difficult pieces with ease caused those who heard him to say that some day "Sammy" Gardner would become a great violinist.

"Sammy" was a bright youngster, a favorite among his schoolmates, full of fun and always ready to play his violin at school affairs, little social times at the homes of his friends, or to help in any possible way with his talent. Since those boyhood days his friends have watched with pride "Sammy's" rise to fame and it was fitting that he should select his old home town as the scene of his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to choose for performance for the first time anywhere his latest and most mature work.

Mr. Gardner is now 27 years old. His career has been one of steady and healthy growth. His early excellent instruction in this city was continued under Felix Winternitz of Boston, and then for several years with Franz Kneisel, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both Mr. Winternitz and Mr. Kneisel were interested listeners at last night's concert.

TRAINED IN AMERICA

To his knowledge of harmony and a thorough general musical education obtained while under the guidance of Mr. Kneisel, the young violinist added the study of composition with Percy Goelschius of New York. So, it will be seen, Mr. Gardner is entirely an American-trained musician.

Talent for composition has led him to write many things: a symphony; a symphonic poem, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918, and a string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University, 1918. His compositions also include other works for string quartet, many pieces for violin and piano and songs.

The concerto played last evening is Mr. Gardner's most important composition to date. It was composed for the most part during his vacation this summer at Estes Park, Colorado, and orchestrated later in New York. Although at first hearing it was not easy to grasp the full significance of the work, which is decidedly modern in character, the general effect gives the critical listener a good idea of its musical value. On short acquaintance it appears to be of exceptional merit.

The solo violin voice is interesting throughout; originality is written on every page; the thematic material is excellent and in the working out of his ideas the composer has shown a fine grasp of orchestral technique. What he has to say is said in coherent musical language and there is nowhere apparent that tendency so frequently encountered in the efforts of young composers—to thicken the score in the hope to cover up the lack of ideas. The slow movement breathes the spirit of the Orient—or is it a tinge of that Russian sombreness born of generations of oppression?—for Mr. Gardner was born in Russia, and inherited mental tendencies are not easily blotted out even though one is brought up in free America.

The first movement is decidedly interesting, and there is a brilliant and effective cadenza. The final movement is sprightly, dashing, and reflects the energetic spirit which is a pleasing quality in the composer's personality. All in all the concerto seems a notable addition to the list of important American instrumental works and one that should place its creator in the front rank of this country's composers.

BRILLIANT IN TECHNIQUE

Mr. Gardner played with authority and finish. His tone is larger than when he last played here, and he displayed great technical brilliancy in portions of the work. The character of the concerto's three movements are indicated in the score, as follows: I. Ben moderato—Declamando con molto passione: Allegro con fuoco. II. Lento—alla maniera maestoso. III. Poco moderato et largamente; Allegro con quietezza.

After each movement Mr. Gardner was greeted with prolonged applause and at the close he was recalled many times.

The programme's principal orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor. It is one of that composer's finest symphonies and has been presented here many times by the Boston orchestra. Its beauties do not fade and Mr. Monteux read it with sympathetic understanding. The Romanza was given with delightful smoothness, Concertmaster Burgin's incidental violin solo being delicately and sweetly played. The Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" opened the programme. In this descriptive piece the final martial climax was brought out with tremendous brilliancy.

A Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor by the young Roumanian composer, Enesco, was the final number. This is a most novel and interesting orchestral conceit. It is a series of striking colorful musical episodes. During its progress one almost involuntarily pictures a wild peasant dance of many strange steps and postures which increase in speed and reckless abandon until a final whirling figure ends the spectacle. The orchestra played it with spirit, bringing out the well contrasted instrumental effects in splendid fashion.

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL- DEC. 15

Samuel Gardner

Former Providence Boy, Now Noted Violinist, Whose Concerto Was Given First Public Rendition by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Last Evening

JOURNAL-DEC. 15

SAMUEL GARDNER IN CONCERT

Noted Violinist Appears in Boston Symphony Orchestra Series.

There were few vacant seats in Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its able leader, Mr. Pierre Monteux, appeared on the stage amid a burst of applause. It was the second concert in the Providence series of five and Samuel Gardner, gifted violinist of New York formerly of Providence, was the soloist in his own concerto for violin and orchestra played here for the first time on any concert stage.

Naturally the knowledge on the part of local concertgoers that Samuel Gardner was to play his own concerto in this city where his early youth was spent and where he learned the elements of his art, aroused widespread interest and to this fact largely was due the great audience of last evening. There were hundreds in the audience who remembered the now celebrated violinist as "Sammy" Gardner, whose boyhood days—when he was a student of the violin here in Providence—gave promise of a future of high musical achievement, now abundantly fulfilled.

Mr. Gardner, now 27 years of age, learned the elements of his art in this city and later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the famous Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Gardner began work on the concerto played last evening in New York on June 29, 1920, and completed it at Estes Park, Col., on Aug. 15 and orchestrated it in New York Sept. 9-Oct. 24. The orchestral portion of the concerto is dedicated to Franz Kneisel who, with Felix Winternitz, an early teacher of the violinist, was in the audience last evening.

Mr. Gardner is widely known as a violinist, having played with the Symphony Society of New York, the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and given many recitals. The list of his compositions includes a symphony in F-minor; symphonic poem for orchestra, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in New York, June, 1918, performed at the Stadium, New York city, in July and August, 1919, and July, 1920, conducted by the composer, and by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Oct. 24, 1919; string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University in June, 1918 (the second movement has been performed by the Flonzaley Quartet); Prelude and Fugue for string quartet; "Hebraic Fantasie" for string quartet and clarinet; variations for string quartet; 16 pieces for violin and pianoforte; 15 songs for pianoforte and orchestra; "Splashes of Color" for the pianoforte.

Mr. Gardner's concerto is one which gives ample opportunity for the violinist to display his unquestioned virtuosity and this he did to the great delight of his listeners. Throughout the concert he gave a dazzling exhibition of technical skill. His first notes disclosed a penetrating tone full of vitality. His technique is clean, his intonation admirable and there is a refinement, a delicate finish in all his work. Of unusual beauty was his playing of the last movement of the concerto.

He was greeted with prolonged applause at the end of each movement of the concerto and at the close he received an ovation which found expression in four recalls.

That the concerto is of high musical value was the opinion of all who heard it last evening, the first movement being full of brilliant runs and passages while the finale is individualistic, spiritual and replete with delicious melody.

The full program of the concert was as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, Berlioz; "Symphony No. 4 in D-minor, Op. 120," Schumann; "Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-Minor, Op. 18," Gardner; "Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major, Op. 11, No. 1," Enesco.

The brilliant Berlioz "Overture" which opened the program was magnificently played by the orchestra and the performance of Schumann's last symphony, the "Fourth in D-minor," one of this great composer's most poetic and beautiful works, was a remarkable one; a performance indeed that might be classed as noble, a performance inspired by Mr. Monteux and characterized by an infinite variety of tonal force and color.

This symphony was first published as Schumann's "Second Symphony in D-minor," and later revised and published as "No. 4 in D-Minor."

The four movements of the symphony are closely connected besides having a common thematic material and for this reason, doubtless, it was Schumann's wish that the symphony should be played without pauses between the movements. It was so played by the orchestra last evening. An exultant finale crowns this monumental work and at its close Mr. Monteux was recalled several times, the last time, at a signal, the members of the orchestra rising and—with the conductor—acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The usual intermission of ten minutes followed the symphony, and at the close of this brief interval Mr. Gardner appeared with the orchestra amid prolonged applause.

The Rumanian Rhapsody in A Major, music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country and treated in original and colorful fashion, brought the concert to a brilliant close.

N. B. P.

TRIBUNE DEC. 15.

SAMUEL GARDNER PLAYS HIS OWN CONCERTO HERE

A few years ago when the youthful Samuel Gardner appeared here in public his friends predicted that a brilliant musical future was just ahead of him. Last night they saw their predictions spring into realization.

The young violinist and composer came to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. He played for the first time in public his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor and merited such applause from the large audience as assured him of its success. The composition, in slow movement, brings back memories of far-off Russia from which Gardner came to Providence when a boy, and then in final movement swiftly brings forth a reflection of the composer's vivid personality.

Mr. Gardner obtained his musical education in America under M. Kneisel and later under Percy Coelschius. His compositions of late years have been numerous and many of them merited high awards. His symphonic poem, "New Russia" won him the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918 and the Pulitzer prize of $1500 went to him in the same year for a string quartet in D-minor.

Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor was the principal orchestral number. The Berlioz overture and a Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor were other features.

NEWS. DEC. 15.

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge with Mr. Burgin Playing Glazunov's Concerto for Violin—Louis Bennett, a Singer at Beginnings

These are busy days for Mr. Richard Burgin; in three successive concerts, last evening in Cambridge, today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, he must not only discharge his duties as concert-master of the orchestra, he must also appear as "assisting artist." According to the original plan he was to prepare but one concerto, that of Brahms, for all three occasions; but that there might not be both a symphony and concerto by Brahms in a single programme, he substituted yesterday Glazunov's Concerto in A minor. Like most of the Russian's music, the concerto is agreeable to hear and grateful to play, but of no particular importance. In retrospect, between Brahms's E-minor Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," it seems no more than a few pretty tunes for the solo instrument, interlarded with the customary passage-work, and set against a discreet and decorous orchestral accompaniment. The true measure of Mr. Burgin's ability will be revealed in the more exacting music of Brahms. It might almost be taken for granted that he has the technical proficiency and the general musicianship that Glazunov's piece requires; and it need only be said that his performance of it met expectations. Mr. Burgin's tone is pleasig to the ear, if not remarkable either for richness or brilliance. There is, moreover, an earnestness and self-effacement in his playing, of which his work in the orchestra has already given more than a hint. It is easy to believe from the warmth of the reception accorded him last evening that he has already made a firm place for himself in the esteem of his fellow-players and of the subscribers to the concerts.

Of the symphony and the tone-poem there is little to be said at this late date, either as to the pieces themselves, or Mr. Monteux's and the orchestra's work in them. They have been played many times since they were heard in Boston a few weeks ago, and in both it is possible to note a greater smoothnes and a certain polishing of details. There is little need to wonder at the distrust with which Brahms's friends regarded his Fourth Symphony, or at his own readiness to share in it. Except in the first two movements, the piece is far less genial than its predecessors. The gaiety of the scherzo is forced and clumsy, and perhaps the very choice of the Passacaglia as form of the Finale was an admission on the part of the composer that he could not again duplicate the sweeping and sustained last movements of the other symphonies. Almost inevitably patchy, the Finale of the fourth, despite the skill with which it is welded together, and in listening interest flags and revives by turns. But in the first movement, and to a less degree in the second, there is a certain grave, autumnal beauty, that sets them apart from other music. One of the curious tricks of musical chronology is found in the brief span of ten years which separated this symphony from Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." As the two pieces sound today, it might have been fifty.

TRAN. DEC. 17.

NO SYMPHONY CHRISTMAS NIGHT

In order that the evening concert in Christmas week may not fall on Christmas night, it will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 23, at 8 o'clock, instead of Saturday evening. The afternoon concert will be given on Friday at 2:30 as usual.

At this, the ninth pair of concerts, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston "La Queste de Dieu," a descriptive symphony from Vincent d'Indy's Opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher."

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the noted young American artists, will be the soloists.

TRAV DEC. 18.

BURGIN IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Concert Master Displays Sterling Equipment as Violinist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was soloist at the concert given by Mr. Monteux and his men yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Burgin played the Brahmns violin concerto. There was played for the first time in America Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the fairy hills"); for the first time in Boston, Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's picturesque piano piece, "Islamey," and the programme opened with Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House."

BURGIN'S MASTERLY PLAYING

In other cities leading orchestras are giving complete Beethoven programmes in recognition of the 150th anniversary of that composer's birth (Dec. 16, 1770). At the Boston Symphony concerts thus far Beethoven's 150th anniversary is represented by an inferior overture, a composition representative in only a superficial way of the characteristics of the greatest master of symphonic composition the world has yet seen.

Mr. Burgin, playing a concerto which will never be popular, made a deep impression by his performance of it. As is well known, this Brahms concerto is practically a symphony with an extensive solo violin part. As such it was interpreted with thought always for its great lines and the interdependence of the violin and the orchestra.

Such a virile, sincere, enthusiastic interpretation of this work has not been heard for a long time at these concerts where the Brahms concerto frequently figures on the programmes.

Mr. Burgin is not a violinist of ultra refinements or sophistications. His playing is always exceptionally straightforward, manly and in a noble spirit. One could hardly think of a violinist better equipped by talent and by temperament for this concerto. Everyone responded to the conviction and the mastery of Mr. Burgin's performance. Everyone realized as perhaps they had not realized before the broad and melodic character of the first two movements, responded to the stirring gypsy rhythms of the finale and understood clearly the gradual development from initial motives of a whole great structure of tone.

The tone poem of Bax is an exquisite and fanciful thing. The opening is in the manner of an Oberon's horn, which transports one to unearthly regions. And what is more haunting than the middle section, the melancholy song heard over the accompaniment of harps, the song of the mortal asked by the Sidhe to sing a song of human joy, a song so sad that hearing it the fairy folk wept in sorrow and anger. Throughout the composition there obtains the atmosphere of fantasy greatly enhanced by the mysterious and beautiful effects of the orchestra.

As for Casellas' orchestration of "Islamey," it is a wonderful box of tricks and it is more, too. It is the fulfilment of the extravagant ideas of the composer which a piano is inadequate to convey. If you doubt it try yourself to play "Islamey" on your piano, then desist, go to Symphony Hall and rejoice as the orchestra, boiling and crackling with a thousand wild effects, goes hurtling like a howling dervish to its conclusion.

POST DEC. 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, BRAHMS, BALAKIREV, BAX, BURGIN

An Anniversary in Wise Moderation—A Concerto for Violin to Endure, and Also Enjoy—Contrasting Exercise of Young Moderns — Orchestral Sound and Fury for Its Sake and Fairy-Picture Finely Woven

SERVICES are like sins; they may be of omission as well as commission, and Mr. Monteux surely did the public of the Symphony Concerts, a service of omission when he made no "Beethoven Programme" to celebrate the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the composer's birth. Beethoven was born on or about Dec. 16, 1770; wherefore on or about Dec. 16, 1920, crowd three of his symphonies into a single concert, or else be content with one and set it in a circle of his overtures, concertos and occasional pieces. A pleasing warmth diffuses itelf over conductor, players, "assisting artists." Are not these numbers "repertory," so requiring little and none too assiduous preparation? Audiences listen tranquilly to the regular thing in the regular way. Good old Beethoven sounding the same in their ears (for the most part) yesterday, today and forever! Reviewers, especially when they have turned their sixtieth birthdays and live in New York, put to print "reverent" commonplaces that were stale in the earlier years of Victoria the Good. Incidentally they deplore "the degeneracy" of a day in which composers, exactly like Beethoven in his own time, dare to write their own music in their own way—to the wrath of the Pharisees, to the wholesome joy of publicans and sinners. So at a sesqui-centennial—imposing Latin words—is Beethoven affirmed as an "institution" and so are symphony concerts glorified as repositories of "the best models."

There is another way with Beethoven which Mr. Monteux wisely follows. Those who likewise walk in it do not regard the composer as an "institution"; while they leave dates, anniversaries and all that to the learned compilers of programme-books. In their innocence and ignorance these dissenters believe the best of Bethoven's music perennially vital, stirring, enjoyable. To them it is fresh, significant, engrossing, to be heard with a will and a thrill. Therefore they would not have it played too often, until it is routine alike to conductor, orchestra and hearers. They would not have it confined to a few stock-pieces in annual or biennial round according to "the tradition." They would hear the masterpieces, as they heard the third "Leonore" overture a month ago, unexpectedly as it were, after long interval, in animating and vivid performance, as though Beethoven had written it no longer ago than last summer. They would, also, hear the music in which Beethoven is not the master, yet in degree Beethoven still. So they enjoyed the overtures to "King Stephen" and "Prometheus," resurrected last year and again yesterday the revived overture of 1822 with the clumsy title, "Dedication of the House." Of course, it is a "pièce d'occasion," written on commission to keep the pot boiling according to an ancient and by no means dishonorable human custom. None-the-less, the ample stride, the tonal pomp of the beginning are interesting to hear with Beethoven lording himself Händel-wise through his music-making. Händelian likewise is the following fugue which is also music-making—several paces near mechanics. Rightly, however, for a ceremonial occasion a ceremonial music.

Yet let none of the musically scrupulous believe that the classics were yesterday neglected. To the contrary, Mr. Monteux is a skilful and conscientious balancer of programmes. If we listeners were to have Bax and Casella, yet also had we Johannes Brahms. . . . Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 77—as some would say in length, breadth and thickness. Possibly it is somewhat late in the day to repine under the piece. Somehow the violinists have persisted these forty years in the playing of it, even violinists of widely different temperaments. Somehow conductors have found recurring room for it; somehow, and not always drowsily and perfunctorily, audiences hear and applaud. It is quite true that for long measures in the concerto Brahms is thinking his way along and by no means hiding the process. Now and again also this thinking halts or sags and the resulting music is stencil and mechanics. The motivs out of which the first movement springs are dry motivs little touching the imagination, while the orchestral measures cloud the solo-part oftener than they set it in relief.

Yet from the thick sheaf of pages rises that which stirs the performing violinist and which has been known to stir the sympathetic listener. However dry Brahms could be, he remained architect in tones, and in the first division of this belabored concerto, pillar by pillar, story by story, from foundation to pediment, he is rearing a musical edifice. The expanding lines impress, the adjusted proportions interest, the touches of ornament please, violinist and auditor join with the composer in the act of creation, even to the frieze of the cadenza and the long breath of satisfaction and completeness with which the songful melody finally returns. And the other two divisions are restful respite from these toils of ear and mind. The contemplative beauty of which Brahms still remains master among the moderns, with which he is almost always poet, flows soft and clear out of the slow movement against the autumnal tints of the orchestral background. And in the finale the grave, the bearded, the fat and spectacled Johannes is by no means impervious to the light flash of rhythm, to the motiv tossed, caught and tossed again. Did he write certain Hungarian Dances wi

TIGHT BINDING

MPHONY CONCERT

OVEN, BRAHMS, BALAKIREV, BAX, BURGIN

iversary in Wise Moderation o for Violin to Endure, and Also -Contrasting Exercise of Young s — Orchestral Sound and Fury Sake and Fairy-Picture Finely

VICES are like sins; they may of omission as well as commis- n, and Mr. Monteux surely did public of the Symphony Con- ervice of omission when he made hoven Programme" to celebrate ed and fiftieth anniversary of the s birth. Beethoven was born on Dec. 16, 1770; wherefore on or c. 16, 1920, crowd three of his es into a single concert, or else be ith one and set it in a circle of his concertos and occasional pieces. g warmth diffuses itself over players, "assisting artists." hese numbers "repertory," so re- tle and none too assiduous prep. Audiences listen tranquilly to r thing in the regular way. Good oven sounding the same in their the most part) yesterday, today er!. Reviewers, especially when turned their sixtieth birthdays n New York, put to print "rever- nonplaces that were stale in the ars of Victoria the Good. Inci- ey deplore "the degeneracy" of a which composers, exactly like in his own time, dare to write music in their own way—to the he Pharisees, to the wholesome blicans and sinners. So at a ennial—imposing Latin words— en affirmed as an "institution" symphony concerts glorified as of "the best models."

another way with Beethoven Monteux wisely follows. Those se walk in it do not regard the as an "institution"; while they anniversaries and all that to compilers of programme-books. nnocence and ignorance these believe the best of Bethoven's nnially vital, stirring, enjoyable. is fresh, significant, engrossing, rd with a will and a thrill. hey would not have it played until it is routine alike to con- estra and hearers. They would confined to a few stock-pieces or biennial round according to on." They would hear the mas- s they heard the third "Leo- ure a month ago, unexpectedly after long interval, in animat- vivid performance, as though had written it no longer ago mmer. They would, also, hear in which Beethoven is not the in degree Beethoven still. So d the overtures to "King Ste- "Prometheus," resurrected last again yesterday the revived 1822 with the clumsy title, of the House." Of course, pièce d'occasion," written on to keep the pot boiling to an ancient and by no norable human custom. None- ample stride, the tonal pomp nning are interesting to hear oven lording himself Händel- h his music-making. Händel- is the following fugue which is naking—several paces near me- ghtly, however, for a ceremo a ceremonial music.

ne of the musically scrupulous the classics were yesterday To the contrary, Mr. Monteux and conscientious balancer of If we listeners were to have asella, yet also had we Jo- hms. . . . Concerto in D iolin and Orchestra, Opus 77— ld say in length, breadth and Possibly it is somewhat late to repine under the piece. violinists have persisted these n the playing of it, even vio- dely different temperaments. nductors have found recurring somehow, and not always perfunctorily, audiences hear It is quite true that for long the concerto Brahms is think- along and by no means hid- ss. Now and again also this s or sags and the resulting cil and mechanics. The mo- which the first movement ry motive little touching the while the orchestral measures o-part oftener than they set he thick sheaf of pages rises stirs the performing violinist as been known to stir the dry listener. However dry be, he remained architect in the first division of this be- rto, pillar by pillar, story by oundation to pediment, he is sical edifice. The expanding the adjusted proportions in- ouches of ornament please, auditor join with the com- act of creation, even to the denza and the long breath of nd completeness with which melody finally returns. And divisions are restful respite ils of ear and mind. The beauty of which Brahms master among the moderns, is almost always poet, glows out of the slow movement tumnal tints of the orchestral And in the finale the grave, he fat and spectacled Jo- no means impervious to the rhythm, to the motiv tossed ssed again. Did he not [illegible] ertain animation and something more o; the concerto for violin is not mere rahms and mere classic; the "thoughtful" eople who hear it "with reverence" can ot altogether wizen it; even "the degen rates" who love their ultra-moderns ma nd a pleasure in it.

The violinist yesterday was Mr. Burgin ager to prove new merit to an audienc nd orchestra that already knows him a concert-master animating and steadyin his fellow-players of the string choir. Possibly, indeed, Mr. Burgin was too percepti bly eager. It was good that he should d his utmost with the music; not so goo that outwardly and visibly he should show this striving. By all means the inner fire the powers stretched taut, but may no the audience better hear these things i the voice of the music that see them in th bearing of the player? So middle ag counsels in its dull way and forgets th fine pleasure from Mr. Burgin of a violinis young to the eye, young to the ear, wh really cares and is not ashamed to show his caring. Not a technical pitfall of th concerto trapped him and by chance o design Brahms opened many. Throughou the accuracy of his playing never wavered His tone was clearness itself, a mirror t the course and the inflections of the musi through the first movement; warm an gently lustrous in the slow song. brigh and light in the finale. As yet it lacks heights, depths, subtleties and so is truly characteristic of Mr. Burgin himself. With the violin and with the concerto he kep to the golden and pleasurable mean o skill, understanding, sensibility and wha is called "expression." So far he is n very individual violinist. Enough for hin for the present to be unclouded voice t the music and to his own fine devotions nd sincerities.

So to the moderns of the afternoon one f whom asks no more than short shrift. Mr. Casella, if readers are to believe half page of the programme-book, is a glutton or work. When he is not conducting, he s composing; when he is not composing he s teaching; or else he is writing for what enators—a queer lot—call the public prints, r he fills an odd moment with the arrangement of some one's music in a medium or which that some one did not choose to write. Balakirev preferred to make his "Islamey" a piano-piece; the diligent Cas- lla would have it also "Oriental Fantasia or Orchestra." The transforming process eemingly consisted in the copying of some f the figures, progressions and other idio- yncrasies of Balakirev's own symphonic oem, "Thamar," and the liberal applica- ion of a full modern orchestra when it is eiterating rhythms, splotching on instru- nental and harmonic color and in general hreshing through a wilderness of modula- ion. Mr. Casella lays on and spares not, ndividually, by groups, by choirs and en masse the orchestra does feats of strength nd agility. "Islamey" itself is caught un- er, tossed up, whirled about until there is o breath left in its or anyone's else body. Apparently Mr. Casella has mistaken the annered hosts of Balakirev's imagining or a concourse of dervishes in the practice f their energetic calling. He has also for- otten a motto for the title-page, say hakpeare's line about sound, fury and sig- ificance.

Bax's tone-poem, "In the Fairy Hills," music of far different voice and mood, esign and suggestion. Rare is his imag- ation and fine his skill in the use of in- vidual instruments or of slender choirs r the character and the color they may nd. As with many a modernist in these ings, his touch is divining, sparing, sure. s rare and fine is his sense of the imagi- ative prompting, the illusion that har- onic background, modulation and progres- on may work. In a sense, in this particu- r piece, he is all for the magic of music summon vision, for the veils it may ape around it. The texture of his tone- oem is accordingly soft, misty, glamorous. t there are moments in which the music ainly has ribs to give it frame; when runs clear in melodic contours, when ore than rhythm unifies and more than hords fasten it. For these modernists e as solicitous for form—for their form— ever were the ancient or the classical. ly they will not move by prescribed ocess or travel in orthodox ruts. As eir ears and fingers are finer with in- ruments and choirs, so are they more ely tempered as to form and unity. In fact Bax is so sedulous for both that met mes he makes his choice of ways and an too obviously in public. He spreads em, as it were, before his hearers and so comes diffuse as one unwilling to discard better for the best, to forego quite all at he might have used. Even so the agic of the music is but seldom dimmed stayed. It sounds—and the sea-mists e over the cliffs of the deep inlets to eath the brown hills, to spin wisps into e valley. It sounds—and the mists and the air rustle gently with the trooping the fairy folk. The mists glimmer fair shimmer deeper; above the rustling d the whirrings stir the fairy voices w plaintive, now joyous, remote, ur rthly. The spell deepens; it is as thoug possessed those that see and hear. The shiver, wonder and darkness and ce. What Bax was minded to summ music brings.

H. T. PARKER

ymphony Orchestra

HE evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra next week has been shifted from Saturday—Christmas night—to hursday. The afternoon concert will take ace as usual on Friday. For both Mr. onteux has set a programme of five ort items: the overture to Mozart's pera, "Don Juan"; Mozart's concerto in flat for two pianos with the solo parts ayed by Messrs. Maier and Pattison; the chestral interlude, "The Quest of God," om d'Indy's recent opera, "The Legend Saint Christopher"; the first set of alipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero"; and elius's "Dance Rhapsody." The fragment om "Saint Christopher" stands in cond act of d'Indy's music-drama eeks to suggest the wandering of ave, Auferus—afterward the saint artyr—up and down the earth in quest The King of Heaven"; his coming to mperial City" when it is celebrating east of the Resurrection"; the [illegible] rom "The Holy Pontiff" that [illegible] miracle; and his departure homeward cast down and discouraged." The three "Impressions" of Malipiero are labelled with the names of woodland birds—the blackcap, the wood-pecker, the little horned owl. The first tone-picture is autumnal in mood; the second depicts the forest in the stir and sheen of summer; the third is a night-piece. As usual Malipiero writes in ultra-modern and highly individual manner. As "personal" a music is Delius's "Dance Rhapsody" with a title sufficiently hinting course and contents. D'Indy's Malipiero's and Delius's pieces will all be heard for the first times at the Symphony Concerts.

TRANS. DEC. 18

BAX TONE POEM PLAYED IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on December 17, was as follows: Beethoven, overture "Dedication of the House," op. 124; Bax, symphonic poem, "In the Faery Hills"; Brahms, concerto for violin and orchestra; Balakireff, "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

Beethoven's overture had not been performed at a Boston symphony concert for 11 years. It must be admitted that this apparent neglect is not wholly undeserved. It is most certainly not one of Beethoven's most inspired works, and yet it is not unworthy of an occasional hearing. Experienced concert goers are apt to become restive when forced to listen to these revivals, but their appearance from time to time on programs is of salutary effect, if only to give a proper perspective for the judgment of more agreeable compositions.

Of supreme interest was the symphonic poem of Arnold Bax which was played for the first time in America. It is one of the few opportunities Boston has had of hearing the compositions of the new English school. Previous to Mr. Monteux's advent as conductor of our concerts, the extreme neglect of modern music was to be deplored. Since his assuming the conductorship, however, we are beginning to learn that the art of music has progressed, and that there are composers in England, France and Italy, as well as in Germany, who have something to say and the technic to say it in an original and interesting way.

This symphonic poem is one of the most imaginative of the modern works that we have heard up to the present. It immediately evokes an atmosphere of fairyland, of mystery, of far off times. We are immediately, from the first measure in fact, transported to another world, the magic world of Irish legend and fancy; and this impression is kept up throughout the piece without ever becoming tiresome and without apparent effort. There are no pages of "filling in"; no moments of apparent marking-time. The work is one spontaneous flow of inspiration from beginning to end. The orchestration, while original, seems to be evolved naturally from the musical ideas themselves, and is never forced. A second hearing of the piece is to be hoped for in the near future.

Mr. Richard Burgin, the new concert-master of the orchestra, chose the Brahms concerto for his first appearance as soloist at these concerts. After the graceful, imaginative music of Bax, this concerto seemed heavy-footed and labored. Mr. Burgin might have chosen a more interesting medium for the display of his evident talents as a violinist, or at least it so seemed to us. He possesses a clean technic and a small and rather unsympathetic tone. Yet his playing was in many ways meritorious. His presence is unaffected and he is undoubtedly a serious, painstaking artist. Casella's transcription of Balakireff's "Islamey" is effective. It served to bring an interesting and well-balanced program to a brilliant close.

MONITOR DEC. 18.

EIGHTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

"In the Faery Hills," Bax, Is Interesting Feature of Program

CHRISTMAS WEEK PLANS CHANGED

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House"; Bax, "In the Faery Hills" symphonic poem (first time in America); Brahms, Violin Concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Balakireff-Casella, "Islamey" (first time in Boston.)

Beethoven was born 150 years ago this week. Pious homage was paid him at this concert by the performance of an overture, not one of his best. There was an interest attached to the performance, for the overture was the first piece on the program of the first concert given by this orchestra (Oct. 22, 1881.) There was a time when the overture was popular in Boston. Mr. Gericke was fond of it, but it has not been played at these concerts since 1909. Here and there are reminders of the greater Beethoven, but the music is interesting chiefly because it shows the influence of Handel for whom Beethoven had the liveliest admiration. The few measures that introduce the main body of the overture might be transitional measures from any concerto of Handel; while the fugal pages are often in the manner of that master, and the theme is eminently Handelian. There are pages in which Beethoven cut loose and wrote at his own will. The introduction was played with the requisite pomp and ceremony. The fugal section was performed brilliantly.

The name of Arnold Bax is little known here, yet he is a fecund composer. Born in London, and educated there, he went as a young man to Ireland, where he fell in with the writers of the "Irish Renaissance," the myths and legends of Ireland. The romantic folk lore obsessed him, nor did a visit to Russia and subsequent life in London free him from the spell. For a time the poetry of Swinburne gave him musical ideas, but he soon returned to his first love. In this symphonic poem he endeavored, according to his own story, "to shadow forth the atmosphere of mystery and almost of terror with which the Irish people regard their faery compatriots." The middle section was inspired by a passage in W. B. Yeats's "Wanderings of Oisin."

Although this symphonic poem is somewhat diffuse; although there are passages here and there that seem extraneous, unnecessary, Mr. Bax has succeeded admirably in the one great demand put upon him: he has reproduced in tones what Matthew Arnold described as "the Celtic aerialness and magic." The music is fanciful, not fantastical; it is poetic. There is the glamour of the strange, wild legends. There is the wistful sadness of the old folk songs. At times one would think that Mr. Yeats had written the music; the Yeats of the earlier years, before he began to revise his poems; before he became self-conscious and finical. Mr. Bax has been neither realistic nor is he a slave to impressionism. He is not afraid of well-defined melody, even when it might be mistaken for a folk-song. In his suggestion of "the good people," he does not hark back to Weber, Mendelssohn or Berlioz. He writes as though the Sidhe had come from a hill at twilight to hear his music, and hearing it, they had sung and harped to him other strains for his pleasure and advantage.

Balakireff's "Islamey" was long regarded as the most difficult composition in the literature of the piano. We have heard pianists of the first rank play it and were not impressed, save by a passage that might have been written for Balakireff's "Thamar." Casella's version for orchestra is as difficult, probably more difficult, for the players, than the piano piece is for pianists. Has the music itself gained in effect through the orchestration? We doubt it. With the exception of the theme for English horn and the treatment of it, there is vertiginous monotony. The dizzy, mad whirling is without sufficient relief in orchestral color. To play the fantasy is a tour de force. Yesterday the orchestra was a virtuoso.

Brahms's violin concerto cannot be ranked with his first and third symphonies, his "Tragic" overture, some of his chamber music and songs. The music in the second movement before the entrance of the solo violin is beautiful. The oboist, Mr. Longy, and his co-mates brought out the beauty in full. The rhythm of the Finale at the beginning is inspiriting. As a whole, the concerto is granitic and forbidding; at times frankly dull. Yet violinists play it. The concerto has been on the program of this orchestra in Boston 14 times, and nine different violinists have been applauded vigorously by the faithful Brahmsites, big and little, palpitating in the family pews. It is possible that the applause on some occasions was a tribute to the endurance of the violinist.

Mr. Burgin, the excellent concert master of the orchestra, the 10th violinist to play this music at a Symphony concert, gave a thoughtful, intelligent, one might say, intellectual performance. The music itself is never sensuous, it is seldom if ever emotional. When there is beauty, as in the Adagio, the beauty is of a contemplative nature. Mr. Burgin was warmly welcomed; he was imperatively recalled many times.

The concert will be repeated tonight. As next week Saturday is Christmas day, the concert that usually takes place Saturday night will be on the night of next Thursday. The afternoon concert will be on Friday, as is customary. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Overture to "Don Giovanni"; Concerto in E flat major for two pianos (Messrs. Maier and Pattison); d'Indy, "The Search After God"; descriptive symphony from the opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher" (first time in Boston); Malpiero, "Impressions from Nature," Suite I., 1, The Blackcap; 2, The Woodpecker; 3, The Owl (first time in America); Delius, Dance Rhapsody (first time at these concerts).

HERALD DEC. 18.

BURGIN EFFECTIVE IN VIOLIN CONCERTO

Balakirev's "Islamey" Is Given by Symphony

Beethoven and Bax Divide Honors in Remainder of Program

Richard Burgin's thoughtful and polished playing in the Brahms violin concerto and Casella's ingeniously boisterous orchestration of Balakirev's piano piece, "Islamey," were the most remarkable features of yesterday's Symphony concert.

Mr Burgin, to judge by the warmth of the applause, has already many admirers among those who have followed his admirable playing as concert master of the orchestra since he came here last October. He played with the delicacy and restraint which Brahms' music more than that of almost any other composer demands. Mr Monteux and the orchestra were rather too heavy-handed and clumsy with the accompaniment.

Orchestrated versions of piano pieces are usually less effective than the originals on which they are based. It is impossible for an orchestra to do what the pedal on the pianoforte does with the overtones. The strings and percussion, on the other hand, can secure better and more subtly graded accents than are possible on the piano.

Casella, who is a concert pianist as well as a master of the resources of the modern orchestra, wisely tried to express Balakirev's ideas in terms of the new medium instead of endeavoring to make the orchestra sound like a piano. The result far surpasses Balakirev's piano version in brilliance, energy and color.

Arnold's Bax' "In the Fairy Hills," the other novelty, contains the material for an effective little piano piece spread rather thinly and pretentiously through a long symphonic poem. The harmonies are often in questionable taste; dissonant, but still squashy and trite. The orchestration is colorless.

Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," added belatedly to the program to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth, which most other orchestras have devoted whole programs to celebrating, was given a sloppy and lifeless performance. The music, written somewhat in the style of Handel, may not be Beethoven's best, but it would sound nobler and more imaginative if played with absolutely precise attacks, balanced crescendos and an occasional nuance.

Mr Monteux had too evidently spent most of his pains at rehearsals on securing the requisite dash and fire in "Islamey" and in trying to galvanize Br Bax' music into a semblance of sustained life.

Next week the evening concert has been shifted on account of the holiday from Saturday to Thursday at 8. The afternoon concert will be given at the usual hour on Friday. The soloists are Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play a double piano concerto by Mozart. There are three other unfamiliar numbers, D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu"; Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" and delius' "Dance Rhapsody." The only familia piece will be Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni."

GLOBE DEC. 18.

BERGIN AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

By FRED J. McISAAC

Richard Bergin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his debut as a soloist yesterday afternoon. He chose the long and immensely difficult Brahms concerto in D major which was composed for Joachim.

Mr. Bergin has been concert master of several important European orchestras and led a string quartet in Christiania which had a fine reputation. Nevertheless, as a soloist, he is not an extraordinary figure. His appearance as he plays is uncouth. He rocks back and forth like a ship in a gale. When you close your eyes so that his mannerisms won't prejudice you, you discover that he scrapes a good deal, his tone is only a fair quality, and though he accomplishes the difficult passages of the concerto, there is little brilliancy to his work.

A very interesting novelty on the program was "An Sluagh Sidhe," the second movement of a tone poem "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold Bax. Bax is an English composer who sought his inspiration in the folk lore of Ireland. "An Sluagh Sidhe" is suggestive of the "little people" in the hills at twlight. Bax's instrumentation is very modern. He knows his Debussy, but he has combined vague, formless atmospheric music with occasional snatches of Celtic melody. It was effective music.

More remarkable still was "Islamey," an Oriental fantasy. This is a piano composition by the Russian Balakiroff, orchestrated by the Italian, Casella. The piece is full of vigorous and fantastic imagery, and Casella has succeeded in getting the proper orchestral color. It is a very wonderful piece of instrumentation.

The playing of the orchestra was distinguished for fine tone and good spirit, and Monteux conducted admirably.

AMER. DEC. 18.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

In order that the evening Boston Symphony concert in Christmas week may not fall on Christmas night, it will be given next Thursday evening Dec. 23, at 8 o'clock, instead of Saturday evening. The afternoon concert will be given Friday at 2:30 as usual.

At this, the ninth pair of concerts, there will be two soloists—Guy Maier anl Lee Pattison. They will play Mozart's double concerto for two pianos in E flat. Preceding this, Mr. Monteux will conduct the Overture to the opera "Don Giovanni" by the same master. "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from "The Legend of St. Christopher" by Vincent d'Indy, will have its first performances in Boston. This is one of the latest works of the living French composer. A new Italian number on this programme will be the first suite from Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions of Spring"), which will have its first performance in America. The movements are entitled "Il Capinero" ("The Blackcap"), "Il Picchio" ("The Woodpecker"), and "Il Chiu" ("The Owl"). The concerts will close with the Dance Rhapsody by Fritz Delius, the noted English composer.

POST. DEC. 19

Symphony Concert Date Shifted to Thursday

The Symphony concert which should regularly be given on Saturday evening of this week has been shifted to Thursday at 8 in order that the subscribers may have the holiday evening free without missing a concert. The Friday afternoon concert will be given as usual at 2:30 Dec 24. In past years concerts given on Christmas Day have usually attracted what the writer once heard called "an audience of cooks and poor relations."

By exception there are to be two soloists, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the local pianists who have made an enviable reputation for themselves here and elsewhere in recitals of music for two pianos. They will play with the orchestra a double concerto by Mozart.

Mr Monteux has chosen several interesting novelties for this program. D'Indy's "Legend of Saint Christopher," originally conceived as an oratorio but given last Fall at the Paris Opera in operatic form with success, is an important modern piece still unheard here. The orchestra will play a suite from it, called "La Queste de Dieu." Malipiero, whose "Pauses of Silence" was favorably received here two years ago, will be represented by three of his "Impressioni dal Vero." Delius, the individual and much praised English composer, gets a hearing which has been too long delayed with his "Dance Rhapsody." The only familiar number on the whole list is the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni."

Thursday at 8:00 and Friday at 2:30. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, ninth program. Overture to "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Double Concerto for Two Pianofortes and Orchestra, Mozart; "La Queste de Dieu," D'Indy; "Impressioni dal Vero," Malipiero; Dance Rhapsody, Delius. Soloists, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison.

As usual, there are few concerts scheduled for the holiday weeks. The Symphony concert which should regularly fall on Christmas night has been shifted to Thursday, Dec 23, at 8. The two

GLOBE DEC. 19.

Oscar F. Roller writes: "The editorial in the PUBLIC LEDGER of November 19 entitled 'We're Twenty' is a fine expression of appreciation of the existence of a musical organization which today stands second to none in this country; and all that you say in praise of the men and women who so unselfishly gave of their time and money to make this orchestra a success is most deserving. As one who has always been keenly interested in the higher class music and symphony orchestral work, having been a regular subscriber to the Boston Symphony concerts for over thirty years, it is difficult to express the feeling of gratification now that one of the greatest symphony orchestras of the world is in fact Philadelphia's own possession.

PHILA. LEDGER. DEC. 19.

TWO PIANOS

Many of us have found pleasure in hearing Messrs. Maier and Pattison play music written or arranged for two pianos, especially when the music was originally composed for them. Others are of a different opinion. When Arthur Rubinstein and Miss Germaine Taillefer played together in London last month, The Times was moved to say: "We hope that the public performance of music for two pianos is not to become fashionable, for it is nearly always much more interesting to the players than agreeable to the listeners." When Miss Bristow and Miss Gray played music by Bach the Times remarked: "It is true that with these mountains of tone the mere volume can be got more easily and more equably by four hands than two, and that in Busoni arrangements—to use the word as the name of a brand—there is always a sense of effort, however capable the player—unless it is Busoni himself. Yet the fact that one mind guides the whirlwind and directs the storm makes all the difference. Under a dual control, if it is really dual, there must be compromise, and art has nothing to do with compromise. As a palliation it is possible to rehearse all the effects beforehand and to map out the divided authority, and one felt that this had been done; but that is only a palliation, because the lines of longitude and latitude are too apparent. Thus the E minor was plotted in neat little rhythmic compartments, and the toccata arranged in nicely regulated strengths; it was topography, in fact, not scenery. But one did not feel this in the concertos, where the composer had made his own arrangements."

And in this country we find Mr. Daniel G. Mason saying: "In general it may be held that two pianos form the least agreeable of all chamber music combinations, degenerate most easily of all to the mechanical. If the many possible permutations of strings and piano do not supply sufficient variety, it would seem better to resort to voices or woodwind instruments, as was done last year."

Having heard Messrs. Maier and Pattison several times we cannot join these objectors.

[64]

Plain Progress

If the public of the Symphony Concerts need proof of the new quality of the orchestra, they received it, and amply, at the concerts of last week. In all its days the band has ventured few pieces more taxing technically than Mr. Bax's tone-poem of the fairies in Irish hills, or Mr. Casella's orchestral version of Balakirev's "Islamey." Mr. Bax makes much of individual instruments or of sharply defined and slender choirs. His modulations are unsparing. Yet to even the knowing ear, the orchestra seemed at ease. It not only played his notes; it gained the atmosphere, color, suggestion which are his end. Mr. Casella, and incidentally Balakirev, demands demoniacal rhythms and treats them as though they were all in the day's play. Mr. Monteux took cue from him; the orchestra from both; and the audience on Saturday evening caught the excitement of the game. More familiarly, it heard the rich sonorities, the striding pace or the quick flash and interplay of Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," or listened to an orchestra and a conductor equally mindful in the violin-concerto of Brahmsian vigors and Brahmsian mellowness. Mr. Monteux is both modest and right when he says there is still much to do with the "new orcehtra," but weekly the progress praises both it and him.

TRANS. DEC. 20

TWO PIANISTS GIVE FINISHED RENDITION

Maier and Pattison Play With the Symphony

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the soloists at yesterday's Symphony concert, gave a finished and eloquent performance of Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat. They played with an ensemble so accurate that the listener was seldom reminded of the fact that there were two pianos instead of one. Little of the deftness and grace of the two delicately spirited allegros escaped them. They made the andante thoroughly romantic.

The orchestra gave a routine performance of the overture to "Don Giovanni." One was reminded of Saint-Saens' words, quoted in the program book, "A piece like this can be played in apparently respectable fashion and yet make no impression." The chief fault was a lack of subtle graduations of accent.

D'Indy's "Le Quest de Dieu" has a vitality too often lacking in his music, much ingenious and effective combination of rhythms and genuine harmonic originality. Yet the general effect was as though Wagner, who had learned nothing since "Rienzi," except modern harmony and scholarly counterpoint, had tried to write a new scene for "Parsifal." D'Indy mistakes vehemence for eloquence.

Malipiero's "Impressions of Nature" is light music which would be pleasing if it were not so pretentious. Commonplaces are agreeable only when disguised with less labor.

The other novelty, Delius' "Dance Rhapsody," was by far the best of the three new pieces. It does not attempt to storm the heavens or to disguise banalities. Delius has achieved what he attempted, and written some original and beautiful variations on dance themes which make a composition with no taint of either pedantry or freakishness about it. One would gladly hear more of his music.

The afternoon concert will be given today at 2:30 as usual. Next week Percy Grainger will play the piano part in Saint-Saens' familiar G minor concerto. The orchestra will give Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan" and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

GLOBE DEC. 20?

A PLENTIFUL GRIST OF NOVEL PIECES

Unfamiliar Music by d'Indy, Malipiero, Delius, and Even Mozart, from the Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow—Other Impending Programmes—An Unusual Concerto Heard in New York—Items, Incidents, Opinions

UNFAMILIAR music—most of it played for the first time in America or in Boston or "at these concerts"—abounds on the programme of the Symphony Orchestra for tomorrow evening and Friday afternoon. Only Mozart's overture to his opera, "Don Juan," may be counted as familiar piece, and hereabouts it owes a precarious existence rather to the concert-hall than the theatre. Even Mozart's concerto in E flat for two pianos, dating from 1780 and now revived by Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison, falls among the novel numbers. A paragraph from Jahn's life of the composer clearly and timely describes the music:

> There is no intention apparent of making the two instruments independent; the players emulate each other in the delivery of the melodies and passages, sometimes together, sometimes in succession, often breaking off in rapid changes and interruptions; the melodies are sometimes simply repeated, sometimes with variations so divided between the two instruments that neither can be said to have the advantage over the other. There are somewhat greater difficulties of execution than have been usual hitherto, a few passages, for instance, in octaves and thirds, but very modest ones; the passages generally have more variety and elegance. The orchestra is simply and judiciously, but very delicately, treated, the wind instruments in sustained chords, as a foundation for the clavier passages.

Next on the list stands the orchestral fragment, "The Quest of God," from d'Indy's opera, "The Legend of Saint Christopher," first heard in Paris last spring. It occurs in the second and before it a Narrator sets forth the search of the slave, Auferus, afterward the saint and the martyr for the kingdom of heaven. These [illegible] "programme" to the symphonic fragment and necessary preface to it:

> And Auferus departed in search of the King of Heaven. He travelled throughout the earth, visiting the most powerful rulers, thinking he would find him for whom he searched in the palaces of illustrious kings. But each potentate replied: "I am not the King of Heaven." Auferus betook himself to the great wars, under the clouds that hid the sun. He questioned the most famous men of arms. . . . But the great conquerors replied: "I am not the King of Heaven." Then pursuing his long journey, he arrived at the Imperial City upon the day on which was being celebrated the festival of the Resurrection. The bells were clanging joyfully, and palms ornamented the temples. He believed that at last he had fulfilled his mission, and he prostrated himself before the Holy Pontiff. But looking at him, the Pastor of Souls said to Auferus: "I am not the King of Heaven. But in truth I say to thee: When the great pine trees in the forest bloom with white roses thy Saviour will take pity on thee and the King of Heaven will descend unto thee." . . . Then, cast down and discouraged by seven years of fruitless searching, Auferus returned to his native land.

After d'Indy, Malipiero and those who expect to find in his "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions of Nature"), effects such as those in his "Pauses of Silence," will be disappointed—agreeably or otherwise. As the scores of the three pieces appear to the eye, and as they will undoubtedly sound, they are singularly clear for music of their kind and time. We notice first of all a marked economy of means; the texture of the music is relatively simple—far more so than that of Delius's Rhapsody—the harmonization, though at times freely dissonant, is not excessively chromatic, and the orchestral requirements are slight. In none of the pieces do we find the heavier brass instruments, the trombones and tuba; there is no celesta and no second harp. In the first and last piece the composer also dispenses with the trumpets and all of the percussive instruments—save the glockenspiel—and contents himself with only two horns. The second is more fully scored. Unquestionably this music shows the influence of Debussy and, more particularly, of Ravel, but even in these comparatively youthful days, Malipiero's voice was intrinsically his own.

Each of the three pieces bears for its title the name of a bird—an ingenious bit of symbolism. The first, "Il Capinero"—the blackcap—is autumnal, tinged with melancholy. The second, "Il Picchio"—the woodpecker—is in the nature of a scherzo; the tempo here is "presto," and a sharp rhythm of four sixteenths and an eighth prevails in nearly every measure; there is a plentiful employment of the pulsatile instruments, and their task is chiefly to emphasize this rhythmic figure. The whole piece is vibrant with life, suggesting, no doubt, the stir and movement of the forest. The third, "Il Chiu"—the little horned owl—returns in its general character to the mood of the first, but the suggestion here is obviously of nocturnal quiet. The opening theme, in the Lydian mode, recalls the serenity of the early madrigalists; throughout the piece there is a marked beauty of melody, harmony and instrumental color, and a fine sensibility and restraint. An interesting technical detail is the low G for the two flutes which, sounded at the beginning of every measure, runs without cessation through the entire piece. In conclusion, it may be said that those skeptics who declare that the ultra moderns ignore the art of counterpoint, may study these "Impressioni dal Vero" with considerable profit.

For ending, Delius's "Dance Rhapsody," played here four years ago by the little heeded Minneapolis Orchestra. A more illuminating and suggestive title for the piece would have been "An Improvisation on a Dance Tune"; the music is almost entirely derived from a single melody, and the dance character is not always too much in evidence. The theme which serves the composer as a basis and background is a lilting folk-dance, somewhat suggestive of the Scotch Reel. From it he derives the brief introduction with its individual harmonies and timbres; by change of pace and rhythm he transforms it into an expressive adagio; but for the most part it is faithful to its original character. The course, some contrasting materials, including one theme of a pronounced Eastern ng one theme of a pronounced Eastern flavor. Like all modern composers of distinction, Delius is a master of instrumentation, and his treatment of the orchestra in this Rhapsody is always highly effective, and often original. In the introduction and elsewhere he makes prominent use of the bass oboe, an instrument that is rarely met.

Those who pine for Chaikovsky at the Symphony Concerts and "cannot understand" why both French and German conductors nowadays have so little zest for his music, will be gratified next week by a revival of his "Manfred Symphony," suggested by Byron's play of like title. Deservedly Mr. Monteux will also include in his programme, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," tone-poem by the late Mr. Griffes first heard and much liked in Boston a year ago.

TRANS. DEC. 22.

Chaikovsky's "Manfred Symphony" and Mr. Griffes's "Kubla Khan"—Also Percy Grainger—Mr. Rosenblatt to His Usual Public and Minor Recitals

THE unusual will befall at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first time through many a week no piece new to Boston stands on the programme. For the first time within long recollection a symphony by Chaikovsky is to be played in the regular course of the concerts. Finally music by an American composer, heard and liked last season, is to be repeated while it is still easy to recall. The symphony by Chaikovsky is the music kindled in him by Byron's dramatic poem, "Manfred." The first movement summons Manfred as wanderer among the Alps in torture of spirit. The second pictures the fairy within the rainbow by the waterfall. The third is pastoral piece soon pierced and penetrated by Manfred's bitter musings. The finale begins with reveries in the subterranean palace of Arimanes (the Evil Principle) which are Chaikovsky's and not Byron's invention. The wraith of Astarte summons Manfred to death. Grimly he dies. By the signs of this programme the "Manfred Symphony" runs the familiar course of Chaikovsky's symphonic music—struggle and despair, contrasting episodes of lighter voice and imagery, a finale beginning furiously and ending tragically. Hence also a characteristic music of his prime.

The piece by an American composer to be heard anew is the late Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Fourteen months ago it was played, for the first times anywhere, at the Symphony Concerts, and warmly received. Audiences in New York were equally impressed and up and down the country conductors began to seek out Mr. Griffes's orchestral music. Death stayed his hand, but sped his fortunes and for the time at least he has assured place in the younger generation of American composers. In itself, as well, the tone-poem deserves repetition. It is music of both ingenuity and imagination. What Coleridge suggested in his Oriental verse, Mr. Griffes has amplified and colored in his tones. The other items of the impending programme are nearer to routine—Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys" and Saint-Saëns's concerto G minor for piano and orchestra. In the concerto, Mr. Grainger, appearing for the first times "at these concerts," will play the piano-part—an interesting and inspiriting figure whatever he may undertake in whatever circumstance.

TRANS. DEC. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MOZART, MODERNS AND A NOTABLE NEW PIECE

An Orchestral Fragment from d'Indy's "Saint Christopher" Proves a Superb Music—"Impressions of Nature" and a New Side to Malipiero—"Back to Mozart" and Not in Vain

MOZART and the moderns divided the Symphony Concert of last evening. Both were interesting, whereas neither he nor they are always so. By the virtues of contrast each enhanced the merit of other—desirable circumstance, likewise, if we are to believe, as the books tell us, that the current of music flows unbroken yesterday, today and forever. It is good to hear the classics when they are not so familiar as to be coated thick with routine, when they are not so rare as to seem like curiosities lifted from a case in a museum, dusted, varnished and set, as it were, upon rather totting pins. Nobody nowadays expects to hear in the theatre the overture to Mozart's opera, "Don Juan." In its present state this "capital of music" prefers to receive "lyric-drama" in driblets from primi donne making money and losing reputation as entertainers on Sunday afternoons. Not too often has the overture been repeated at the Symphony Concerts. There, indeed, like many another prelude of the opera house, it seems to lead nowhere. The hearer, again as the books say, must take it as self-contained. Fortunately at the back of nearly everyone's head is some notion of Don Juan, his fortunes and his fate. If there were not few can be so dull as to hear without responding ear and mood the threatening chords, the sombre, mysterious figures of Mozart's first measures. A little orchestra he used, as we say in these days of an hundred players, a relatively small orchestra gave him voice yesterday, but with it and with what economy he gained his ends. In the distant year of grace, 1787, atmosphere (as the present word goes) and illusion were quite possible in music. They are not nearly so modern discoveries as some of us believe. After all it is the individual imagination and not the implements or what the wise call "the time-spirit" that makes the music.

Again, when Mozart goes forward more swiftly and lightly, is the Don Juan rising from page and orchestra a whit less vivid than the Don Juan whom Strauss flings out of his tone-poem on the canvas of our ears and minds in the panoply of modern harmonic and instrumental color, in the light and shade of modern romantic feeling? Is he less glowing, less conquering figure, less in amorous prowess or unearthly fate? Hardly, if only we think of Mozart's overture as the tone-picturing that it really is, yesterday, today and forever; if only on this particular occasion Mr. Monteux had played this Allegro, as the formalists call it, less urgently and more plastically.

Music of another sort was the Mozartean rarity of the evening—the concerto in E-flat for two pianos, seemingly the one and only piece available when paired virtuosi are joined with an orchestra. Years ago Mr. Randolph and Mr. Hutcheson played it at the Symphony Concerts in Boston; the other day Mme. Samaroff and Mr. Gebhard undertook it in New York; yesterday Mr Maier and Mr. Pattison had their turn. It is music almost of an improvising Mozart. Possibly he spent days or a full week in the making of it, whereas, according to legend, the overture to "Don Juan" was written in a single night. Yet, as his unique way was, pains, if there were any, did not dim or stiffen spontaneity. The melodies spring lightly into being and forthwith charm by flowing grace, pensive fancy, or deft sparkle. The variations and the modulations seem the intuitions of the instant. From the tips of Mozart's fingers fall delicately the orchestral background and accompaniment. The simplicity, fancy, elegance, serenity of the whole music seem inexhaustible second nature in the composer. The hearer, too wonted to the strivings of these our days, basks in them.

If ever there was music of the gossamer of tone it is this concerto and, like light glinting gently through it, is the interplay of the two voices. The one pianist completes the melody that the ot has begun; or lets his fellow sing it, wh he weaves his garlands of arabesq Back and forth they toss variations a figures; ornament from the one sugge more ornament from the other, and there is a cadenza. And so forth throu a half hour of seeming improvisati

Moreover, Mozartean as Mozart were Maier and Mr. Pattison face to face acr their two pianos. Their tone—for th have but one—was limpid and light, bri and sensitive. Their fingers were inseparable when the melody flowed from the Figure and ornament kept Mozarte fancy and grace, seemed the common pulse of the instant in the two virtuo With the composer they shared serene a smiling elegance. Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison have attained more than a flawle unity of touch and tone, more than a li responsiveness when the piece in han divides their voices. They perceive musi feel it, play it as with a single mind an spirit. The eye sees two pianists; the ea and every other perceptive faculty discovers but one. Yesterday, moreover, a thir and essential voice—Mozart's own—was a completely fused with theirs. Through all went a hint of miracle—Mozart's wa again.

Not in garden but in woods Malipiero received the sensations out of which he mad the music of three "Impressions of Nature," played in Boston by Mr. Monteux for the first time in America, as Mr. Bodanzky played the other three two months ago in New York. The names of birds—blackcap, wood-pecker, owl—label them and beyond mistaking. The wood-pecke drums intermittently through his particular piece. In fact, however, all three ar tone-pictures in little, according to familiar exercise of our composing youth. I is summer in the woods and they are asti with light and life. Malipiero writes no delineative music after the example o Wagner in the familiar scene in "Siegfried." Rather, he finds a rhythmi figure (as Musorgsky liked to do) and sets it flashing here, there and everywhere until the music becomes a sunlit web quivering in the bright air. The background shimmers; the motion never halts. It i Malipiero's own poetry of this summe woodland—a clear and simple poetry withal. Then the poetry of silent night in woodland dusky and still. For it Malipiero discovers melody, simple, low-voiced, suffused with dim harmonies; shadowy o color—music that may have sounded i his ear as from long vista felt rather tha seen. Again, the woods of autumn, th conventional mood of melancholy, with touch of convention (as musical convention goes in these days) in the expressio of it. This first "impression" may pass fo preluding. The other two affirm anew the sensitive temper, the sensitive hand o Malipiero. He can summon his own beauty and suggestion into musical speech he can also use, as some have doubted, a relative simplicity of means.

Finally, the composer of constriction, the Delius, whose music even in a "Dance Rhapsody" is never so articulate as his imagination would make it. He would improvise bravely upon a well-rhythmed readily manipulated motive. He would make it dance; he would make it sing. But no sooner does he set the dance in motion than somehow beclog its feet as by excess of tension; while no sooner does he sign than cloudy harmonies descend unan the ring. Only with a mighty effort toward the end does he finally set his motive free. The gods of music have been cruel to Delius. Imagination they gave him and then denied him speech.

D'Indy led the moderns—the d'Indy of the one fragment from the music-drama of Saint Christopher that it is possible to transfer to the concert-hall—a symphonic poem, in brief rather than in little, that is epitome, in the second act, of the journey of the slave who was to be martyr, up and down the world in quest of the King of Heaven. Of course, it should be the obligation of the Metropolitan Opera House to set on the American stage this "Legend of Saint Christopher," with which an illustrious composer would crown his career in which he has written as only he in our time writes. By the token, moreover of this symphonic fragment, he would no fail upon the ears, the minds, the heart of hearers. The music is masterfull made, with the fertility in invention an resource; the ever unfolding unity that ar d'Indy's intent and desire fulfilled. Int music he would transmute mediæval legen and often out of these pages rise th modes, the accents of mediæval psalmody None the less, being of these days an of his own voice and manner, d'Indy impregnates them with modern sonoritie sharpens them with twentieth-century dissonance, enriches them with the harmon and the color of a later time. Learning wisdom, resource aid in the process, but veritable divination guides it. Seemingl in this music of his final years, the loftiness, the austerity of d'Indy's mind an spirit speak unfettered and unclouded There is more than one resemblance between his "Saint Christopher" and Wagner's "Parsifal." Not the least is the equa impression of old design and deeply se purpose at last and altogether fulfilled.

The outcome, in this symphonic fragment, with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra adding their own eloquence, is musi that less persuades by beauty than commands by power. There is superb largeness of substance; there is a strippe might of march and movement. Dow the winds of time, blow the echoes o battles, in old legend. Far yet near sti the tonal pomps of kings and pontiffs keeping high and holy festival. Here an there sound the voices of the vicars an the lords whom God, in those days, se over men. These things come and go while the great longing in the heart o the slave for the King of Heaven eve haunts the music, as in undertone; whil in overtone, go the wonder, the beauty, the power of that celestial presence. Le the pedants pick their way into the occasional Wagnerian suggestion—for d'Indy cannot escape the master who, hardly less than Franck, swayed his younger prime. Let them seek out also for delight or derision what some will call the "me [illegible] of "Saint Christopher." T [illegible] power, the exaltation remain and [illegible] the rarest of qualities, whatever [illegible] other glories of composers in our [illegible] ticular day. For the most part they [illegible] in their gardens. D'Indy prefers his tower.

H. T. PAR

SYMPHONY IN NINTH CONCER

Messrs. Maier and Pattiso Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

MALPIERO'S SUITE NEW TO AMERIC

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteaux, conductor, took place Thursday night. Th concert was repeated yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows Mozart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" an Concerto for two pianos (K. 365); d'Ind "The Search for God"; Malpiero, "Impressions from Nature," Suite No. (The Blackcap; the Woodpecker; th Owl); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. Th pianists were Guy Maier and Lee Patt son.

We write with reference to the conce of yesterday.

After a spirited performance of t overture to the opera that, in spite of the years, is to be ranked with "Pelle and Melisande" as the supreme achievement of lyrically dramatic art, widel different as the operas are in form an in expression, Messrs. Maier and Pattison gave an admirable performance Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The Herald has more than once extolled the ensemble playing of these musicians. Yesterday they not only displayed the qualities that have excited praise in cities this country, Paris and London; the also showed their nice appreciation the Concerto's character. There was n attempt to modernize the music, to giv it incongruous, destructive importance They accepted the music as it is, suav tender and also lightsome, and played Mozart wished; for he once wrote th music should always "sound," meanin that it should be euphonious; and he demanded of a pianist that running pa sages should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony fro his opera, "The Legend of Saint Christopher," was played for the first time Boston; Malpiero's Suite for the fir time in America; the Rhapsody of Deliu for the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealou in the observance of religious rites an ceremonies, it was natural that th legend of Christopher should appe strongly to him. This symphonic musi is played before the second act, after th narrator has told of the giant's searc for the king of heaven. The giant visit kings and emperors; he questions conquerors of the battlefield; he asks Hi Holiness the Pope himself; they all te him in turn that they are not the kin of heaven; then, weary and sorrowfu he goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today New York, that the music of d'Indy only cerebral; that it is never emotiona To some, yes to many, this reproa may seem just. His music has often aristocratic character that is forbidding it is often austere, as if the compos stood proudly aloof. He does not we his heart on his sleeve. Yet who c hear his second symphony and this d scriptive symphony, not to mention oth works by him, without feeling that t cent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly em tional. "The Search for God" is nece sarily episodic, as there must be musi expression of each guest of the gia but here is no panoramic music, no mu for films; even without the story mind, the music would be impres whether it portrays the pomp of p tates, the fury of battle, or the joyf bells and the exultation of the faith on the feast day of the Resurrection. d'Indy here is not cold and repell His heart beats as warmly for huma as did the heart of his master C Franck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful work, with interesting and poetic i deftly expressed by the instrum His scheme of orchestration seems his own; nor is he in his harm scheme an imitator. They are pieces, these impressions received the three birds, but there is more in them than in many huge symph and pretentious symphonic poems. discreet, yet how telling is his em ment of instruments! Each has significance. Mr. Monteux, who ducted throughout skilfully and amore, is to be heartily thanked bringing out noteworthy modern positions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was formed here by the Chicago Symp Orchestra in 1916. It then seemed ferior in construction and interes his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," which in the repertory of the Boston phony Orchestra; far inferior t beautiful "Summer Garden." In Rhapsody there is too little rhap glow. The dancers, as the English cording to the old saying, take pleasure sadly. There is a reserv most a melancholy, that charact much of this composer's music idiom is still strange to us.

The program of the concerts week will be as follows: Tschaik "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" Saens, Piano Concerto G mino (Percy Grainger, pianist); Lal ture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD DEC. 2

Events and

Mr Monteux has put [illegible] interesting piece on [illegible] phony program, Griffes' [illegible] first performed last year [illegible] the most significant [illegible] American composition [illegible] years. The composer, w [illegible] last November to share in [illegible] enthusiastic applause, has [illegible] the age of 35. The other [illegible] Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens [illegible] are repertory pieces of a [illegible] popular in the 1890's than [illegible] are not novelties, nor are a [illegible] likely to become classics wi [illegible] heard in the year 2000.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday [illegible] ton Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] "Manfred" Symphony, Tsc [illegible] second piano concerto, [illegible] "The Pleasure Dome of Khu [illegible] Griffes; overture to "Le [illegible] Lalo. Soloist, Percy Graing

GLOBE DEC.

GRAINGER SOLO

[illegible] the 10th pair of Boston [illegible] concerts, to be given in Symph [illegible] Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, a [illegible] day evening, Jan. 1, Mr. Mon [illegible] conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manf [illegible] phony, based on Byron's drama [illegible] Although this large-proportione [illegible] less known than the three last [illegible] of Tschaikowsky, it is [illegible] one of his most impressive sco [illegible] Monteux will repeat the tone [illegible] Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleas [illegible] of Kubla Khan," after the poe [illegible] ridge, which was heard at t [illegible] certs with so much enthusiasm [illegible] son. The performance of th [illegible] praised work was shortly fol [illegible] the death of its composer, [illegible] American of great talent. Th [illegible] number will be Lalo's brilliant [illegible] the "King of Ys." The solo [illegible] occasion will be Percy Grain [illegible] was never before played with [illegible] tra. He will be heard in th [illegible] Concerto of Saint-Saens in G mi

HERALD DEC.

Boston Symphony

At the tenth pair of Boston Sy [illegible] concerts, to be given in Symph [illegible] Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and [illegible] evening, Jan. 1, Pierre Mont [illegible] conduct Tschaikowsky's "M [illegible] Symphony, which is based on [illegible] dramatic poem. Although th [illegible] proportioned work is less kno [illegible] other symphonies by the Russ [illegible] it is nevertheless conside [illegible] his finest and most impressiv [illegible] The four movements depict "M [illegible] Wanderings and Despair," "T [illegible] of the Alps," "Pastorale," "Th [illegible] of Arimanes," "Invocation to A [illegible] and "Manfred's Death." At t [illegible] concerts Mr. Monteux will re [illegible] tone poem by Charles T. Griff [illegible] Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan [illegible] the poem of Coleridge, which w [illegible] at these concerts with so much [illegible] last season. The perform [illegible] this highly praised work was [illegible] followed by the death of its c [illegible] young American of great [illegible] Since his death there has been [illegible] interest in his different works. [illegible] ing number will be Lalo's brillia [illegible] ture to the "King of Ys." Th [illegible] of the occasion will be Percy G [illegible] eminent Australian pianist, [illegible] never before played with this [illegible] tra. He will be heard in the s [illegible] Second Concerto of Saint-Saen [illegible] minor.

POST DEC. 2

mphony Orchestra and Mr [illegible] t Cambridge—Notable Pl [illegible] Piano-Concerto and [illegible] "Pieces"—Mme. Szumowsk [illegible] as Pianist with Many [illegible] Upon Her Programme

[illegible] riginally announced, the pr [illegible] the Symphony Concert [illegible] ridge last evening was to h [illegible] with the overture to Lal [illegible] d'Y's," but to the great [illegible] of most of those who we [illegible] symphonic sketches, [illegible] played in its stead. The re [illegible] proceeded according to [illegible] began with Mozart's ove [illegible] Giovanni"; the symphony w [illegible] in D minor; and Katherine [illegible] the solo part in Griegs con [illegible] and orchestra. After the re [illegible] terlude, it was good to h [illegible] round, full-bodied, satisfy [illegible] own orchestra. And with [illegible] to those whose brains [illegible] the recollection of a cert [illegible] afternoon and evening of [illegible]

Plain Progress

If the public of the Symphony Concerts need proof of the new quality of the orchestra, they received it, and amply, at the concerts of last week. In all its days the band has ventured few pieces more taxing technically than Mr. Bax's tone-poem of the fairies in Irish hills, or Mr. Casella's orchestral version of Balakirev's "Islamey." Mr. Bax makes much of individual instruments or of sharply defined and slender choirs. His modulations are unsparing. Yet to even the knowing ear, the orchestra seemed at ease. It not only played his notes; it gained the atmosphere, color, suggestion which are his end. Mr. Casella, and incidentally Balakirev, demands demoniacal rhythms and treats them as though they were all in the day's play. Mr. Monteux took cue from him; the orchestra from both; and the audience on Saturday evening caught the excitement of the game. More familiarly, it heard the rich sonorities, the striding pace or the quick flash and interplay of Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," or listened to an orchestra and a conductor equally mindful in the violin-concerto of Brahmsian vigors and Brahmsian mellowness. Mr. Monteux is both modest and right when he says there is still much to do with the "new orcehtra," but weekly the progress praises both it and him.

TRANS. DEC. 20

TWO PIANISTS GIVE FINISHED RENDITION

Maier and Pattison Play With the Symphony

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the soloists at yesterday's Symphony concert, gave a finished and eloquent performance of Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat. They played with an ensemble so accurate that the listener was seldom reminded of the fact that there were two pianos instead of one. Little of the deftness and grace of the two delicately spirited allegros escaped them. They made the andante thoroughly romantic.

The orchestra gave a routine performance of the overture to "Don Giovanni." One was reminded of Saint-Saens' words, quoted in the program book, "A piece like this can be played in apparently respectable fashion and yet make no impression." The chief fault was a lack of subtle graduations of accent.

D'Indy's "Le Quest de Dieu" has a vitality too often lacking in his music, much ingenious and effective combination of rhythms and genuine harmonic originality. Yet the general effect was as though Wagner, who had learned nothing since "Rienzi," except modern harmony and scholarly counterpoint, had tried to write a new scene for "Parsifal." D'Indy mistakes vehemence for eloquence.

Malipiero's "Impressions of Nature" is light music which would be pleasing if it were not so pretentious. Commonplaces are agreeable only when disguised with less labor.

The other novelty, Delius' "Dance Rhapsody," was by far the best of the three new pieces. It does not attempt to storm the heavens or to disguise banalities. Delius has achieved what he attempted, and written some original and beautiful variations on dance themes which make a composition with no taint of either pedantry or freakishness about it. One would gladly hear more of his music.

The afternoon concert will be given today at 2:30 as usual. Next week Percy Grainger will play the piano part in Saint-Saens' familiar G minor concerto. The orchestra will give Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan" and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

GLOBE DEC. 20

A PLENTIFUL GRIST OF NOVEL PIECES

Unfamiliar Music by d'Indy, Malipiero, Delius, and Even Mozart, from the Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow—Other Impending Programmes—An Unusual Concerto Heard in New York—Items, Incidents, Opinions

UNFAMILIAR music—most of it played for the first time in America or in Boston or "at these concerts"—abounds on the programme of the Symphony Orchestra for tomorrow evening and Friday afternoon. Only Mozart's overture to his opera, "Don Juan," may be counted as familiar piece, and hereabouts it owes a precarious existence rather to the concert-hall than the theatre. Even Mozart's concerto in E flat for two pianos, dating from 1780 and now revived by Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison, falls among the novel numbers. A paragraph from Jahn's life of the composer clearly and timely describes the music:

> There is no intention apparent of making the two instruments independent; the players emulate each other in the delivery of the melodies and passages, sometimes together, sometimes in succession, often breaking off in rapid changes and interruptions; the melodies are sometimes simply repeated, sometimes with variations so divided between the two instruments that neither can be said to have the advantage over the other. There are somewhat greater difficulties of execution than have been usual hitherto, a few passages, for instance, in octaves and thirds, but very modest ones; the passages generally have more variety and elegance. The orchestra is simply and judiciously, but very delicately, treated, the wind instruments in sustained chords, as a foundation for the clavier passages.

Next on the list stands the orchestral fragment, "The Quest of God," from d'Indy's opera, "The Legend of Saint Christopher," first heard in Paris last spring. It occurs in the second and before it a Narrator sets forth the search of the slave, Auferus, afterward the saint and the martyr for the kingdom of heaven. These sayings are as "programme" to the symphonic fragment and necessary preface to it:

> And Auferus departed in search of the King of Heaven. He travelled throughout the earth, visiting the most powerful rulers, thinking he would find him for whom he searched in the palaces of illustrious kings. But each potentate replied: "I am not the King of Heaven. Auferus betook himself to the great wars, under the clouds that hid the sun. He questioned the most famous men of arms. . . . But the great conquerors replied: "I am not the King of Heaven." Then pursuing the his long journey, he arrived at the Imperial City upon the day on which was being celebrated the festival of the Resurrection. The bells were clanging joyfully, and palms ornamented the temples. He believed that at last he had fulfilled his mission, and he prostrated himself before the Holy Pontiff. But looking at him, the Pastor of Souls said to Auferus: "I am not the King of Heaven. But in truth I say to thee: When the great pine trees in the forest bloom with white roses thy Saviour will take pity on thee and the King of Heaven will descend unto thee." . . . Then, cast down and discouraged by seven years of fruitless searching, Auferus returned to his native land.

After d'Indy, Malipiero and those who expect to find in his "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions of Nature"), effects such as those in his "Pauses of Silence," will be disappointed—agreeably or otherwise. As the scores of the three pieces appear to the eye, and as they will undoubtedly sound, they are singularly clear for music of their kind and time. We notice first of all a marked economy of means; the texture of the music is relatively simple—far more so than that of Delius's Rhapsody—the harmonization, though at times freely dissonant, is not excessively chromatic, and the orchestral requirements are slight. In none of the pieces do we find the heavier brass instruments, the trombones and tuba; there is no celesta and no second harp. In the first and last piece the composer also dispenses with the trumpets and all of the percussive instruments—save the glockenspiel—and contents himself with only two horns. The second is more fully scored. Unquestionably this music shows the influence of Debussy and, more particularly, of Ravel, but even in these comparatively youthful days, Malipiero's voice was intrinsically his own.

Each of the three pieces bears for its title the name of a bird—an ingenious bit of symbolism. The first, "Il Capinero"—the blackcap—is autumnal, tinged with melancholy. The second, "Il Picchio"—the woodpecker—is in the nature of a scherzo; the tempo here is "presto," and a sharp rhythm of four sixteenths and an eighth prevails in nearly every measure; there is a plentiful employment of the pulsatile instruments, and their task is chiefly to emphasize this rhythmic figure. The whole piece is vibrant with life, suggesting, no doubt, the stir and movement of the forest. The third, "Il Chiu"—the little horned owl—returns in its general character to the mood of the first, but the suggestion here is obviously of nocturnal quiet. The opening theme, in the Lydian mode, recalls the serenity of the early madrigalists; throughout the piece there is a marked beauty of melody, harmony and instrumental color, and a fine sensibility and restraint. An interesting technical detail is the low G for the two flutes which, sounded at the beginning of every measure, runs without cessation through the entire piece. In conclusion, it may be said that those skeptics who declare that the ultra moderns ignore the art of counterpoint, may study these "Impressioni dal Vero" with considerable profit.

For ending, Delius's "Dance Rhapsody," played here four years ago by the little heeded Minneapolis Orchestra. A more illuminating and suggestive title for the piece would have been "An Improvisation on a Dance Tune"; the music is almost entirely derived from a single melody, and the dance character is not always too much in evidence. The theme which serves the composer as a basis and background is a lilting folk-dance, somewhat suggestive of the Scotch Reel. From it he derives the brief introduction with its individual harmonies and timbres; by change of pace and rhythm he transforms it into an expressive adagio; but for the most part it is faithful to its original character. The course, some contrasting materials, including one theme of a pronounced Eastern ng one theme of a pronounced Eastern flavor. Like all modern composers of distinction, Delius is a master of instrumentation, and his treatment of the orchestra in this Rhapsody is always highly effective, and often original. In the introduction and elsewhere he makes prominent use of the bass oboe, an instrument that is rarely met.

Those who pine for Chaikovsky at the Symphony Concerts and "cannot understand" why both French and German conductors nowadays have so little zest for his music, will be gratified next week by a revival of his "Manfred Symphony," suggested by Byron's play of like title. Deservedly Mr. Monteux will also include in his programme, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," tone-poem by the late Mr. Griffes first heard and much liked in Boston a year ago.

TRANS. DEC. 22.

Chaikovsky's "Manfred Symphony" and Mr. Griffes's "Kubla Khan"—Also Percy Grainger—Mr. Rosenblatt to His Usual Public and Minor Recitals

THE unusual will befall at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first time through many a week no piece new to Boston stands on the programme. For the first time within long recollection a symphony by Chaikovsky is to be played in the regular course of the concerts. Finally music by an American composer, heard and liked last season, is to be repeated while it is still easy to recall. The symphony by Chaikovsky is the music kindled in him by Byron's dramatic poem, "Manfred." The first movement summons Manfred as wanderer among the Alps in torture of spirit. The second pictures the fairy within the rainbow by the waterfall. The third is pastoral piece soon pierced and penetrated by Manfred's bitter musings. The finale begins with reveiries in the subterranean palace of Arimanes (the Evil Principle) which are Chaikovsky's and not Byron's invention. The wraith of Astarte summons Manfred to death. Grimly he dies. By the signs of this programme the "Manfred Symphony" runs the familiar course of Chaikovsky's symphonic music—struggle and despair, contrasting episodes of lighter voice and imagery, a finale beginning furiously and ending tragically. Hence also a characteristic music of his prime.

The piece by an American composer to be heard anew is the late Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Fourteen months ago it was played, for the first times anywhere, at the Symphony Concerts, and warmly received. Audiences in New York were equally impressed and up and down the country conductors began to seek out Mr. Griffes's orchestral music. Death stayed his hand, but sped his fortunes and for the time at least he has assured place in the younger generation of American composers. In itself, as well, the tone-poem deserves repetition. It is music of both ingenuity and imagination. What Coleridge suggested in his Oriental verse, Mr. Griffes has amplified and colored in his tones. The other items of the impending programme are nearer to routine—Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys" and Saint-Saëns's concerto G minor for piano and orchestra. In the concerto, Mr. Grainger, appearing for the first times "at these concerts," will play the piano-part—an interesting and inspiriting figure whatever he may undertake in whatever circumstance.

TRANS. DEC. 25.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MOZART, MODERNS AND A NOTABLE NEW PIECE

An Orchestral Fragment from d'Indy's "Saint Christopher" Proves a Superb Music—"Impressions of Nature" and a New Side to Malipiero—"Back to Mozart" and Not in Vain

MOZART and the moderns divided the Symphony Concert of last evening. Both were interesting, whereas neither he nor they are always so. By the virtues of contrast each enhanced the merit of other—desirable circumstance, likewise, if we are to believe, as the books tell us, that the current of music flows unbroken yesterday, today and forever. It is good to hear the classics when they are not so familiar as to be coated thick with routine, when they are not so rare as to seem like curiosities lifted from a case in a museum, dusted, varnished and set, as it were, upon rather totting pins. Nobody nowadays expects to hear in the theatre the overture to Mozart's opera, "Don Juan." In its present state this "capital of music" prefers to receive "lyric-drama" in driblets from primi donne making money and losing reputation as entertainers on Sunday afternoons. Not too often has the overture been repeated at the Symphony Concerts. There, indeed, like many another prelude of the opera house, it seems to lead nowhere. The hearer, again as the books say, must take it as self-contained. Fortunately at the back of nearly everyone's head is some notion of Don Juan, his fortunes and his fate. If there were not few can be so dull as to hear without responding ear and mood the threatening chords, the sombre, mysterious figures of Mozart's first measures. A little orchestra he used, as we say in these days of an hundred players, a relatively small orchestra gave him voice yesterday, but with it and with what economy he gained his ends. In the distant year of grace, 1787, atmosphere (as the present word goes) and illusion were quite possible in music. They are not nearly so modern discoveries as some of us believe. After all it is the individual imagination and not the implements or what the wise call "the time-spirit" that makes the music.

Again, when Mozart goes forward more swiftly and lightly, is the Don Juan rising from page and orchestra a whit less vivid than the Don Juan whom Strauss flings out of his tone-poem on the canvas of our ears and minds in the panoply of modern harmonic and instrumental color, in the light and shade of modern romantic feeling? Is he less glowing, less conquering figure, less in amorous prowess or unearthly fate? Hardly, if only we think of Mozart's overture as the tone-picturing that it really is, yesterday, today and forever; if only on this particular occasion Mr. Monteux had played this Allegro, as the formalists call it, less urgently and more plastically.

Music of another sort was the Mozartean rarity of the evening—the concerto in E-flat for two pianos, seemingly the one and only piece available when paired virtuosi are joined with an orchestra. Years ago Mr. Randolph and Mr. Hutcheson played it at the Symphony Concerts in Boston; the other day Mme. Samaroff and Mr. Gebhard undertook it in New York; yesterday Mr Maier and Mr. Pattison had their turn. It is music almost of an improvising Mozart. Possibly he spent days or a full week in the making of it, whereas, according to legend, the overture to "Don Juan" was written in a single night. Yet, as his unique way was, pains, if there were any, did not dim or stiffen spontaneity. The melodies spring lightly into being and forthwith charm by flowing grace, pensive fancy, or deft sparkle. The variations and the modulations seem the intuitions of the instant. From the tips of Mozart's fingers fall delicately the orchestral background and accompaniment. The simplicity, fancy, elegance, serenity of the whole music seem inexhaustible second nature in the composer. The hearer, too wonted to the strivings of these our days, basks in them.

If ever there was music of the gossamer of tone it is this concerto and, like light glinting gently through it, is the interplay of the two voices. The one pianist completes the melody that the oth has begun; or lets his fellow sing it, wh he weaves his garlands of arabesq Back and forth they toss variations a figures; ornament from the one sugge more ornament from the other, and there is a cadenza. And so forth throu a half hour of seeming improvisati

Moreover, Mozartean as Mozart were Maier and Mr. Pattison face to face acr their two pianos. Their tone—for th have but one—was limpid and light, bri and sensitive. Their fingers were inse rable when the melody flowed from the Figure and ornament kept Mozarte fancy and grace, seemed the common pulse of the instant in the two virtuo With the composer they shared serene a smiling elegance. Mr. Maier and Mr. Pa tison have attained more than a flawle unity of touch and tone, more than a li responsiveness when the piece in har divides their voices. They perceive musi feel it, play it as with a single mind an spirit. The eye sees two pianists; the ea and every other perceptive faculty discovers but one. Yesterday, moreover, a thir and essential voice—Mozart's own—was a completely fused with theirs. Through all went a hint of miracle—Mozart's wa again.

Not in garden but in woods Malipiero received the sensations out of which he mad the music of three "Impressions of Nature," played in Boston by Mr. Monteux for the first time in America, as Mr. Bodanzky played the other three two months ago in New York. The names of birds—blackcap, wood-pecker, owl—label them and beyond mistaking. The wood-pecke drums intermittently through his particular piece. In fact, however, all three ar tone-pictures in little, according to familiar exercise of our composing youth. I is summer in the woods and they are asti with light and life. Malipiero writes n delineative music after the example o Wagner in the familiar scene in "Siegfried." Rather, he finds a rhythmi figure (as Musorgsky liked to do) and sets it flashing here, there and everywhere until the music becomes a sunlit web quivering in the bright air. The backgroun shimmers; the motion never halts. It i Malipiero's own poetry of this summe woodland—a clear and simple poetr withal. Then the poetry of silent night i woodland dusky and still. For it Malipier discovers melody, simple, low-voiced, suffused with dim harmonies; shadowy o color—music that may have sounded i his ear as from long vista felt rather tha seen. Again, the woods of autumn, th conventional mood of melancholy, with touch of convention (as musical convention goes in these days) in the expressio of it. This first "impression" may pass fo preluding. The other two affirm anew the sensitive temper, the sensitive hand o Malipiero. He can summon his own beauty and suggestion into musical speech he can also use, as some have doubted, a relative simplicity of means.

Finally, the composer of constriction, the Delius, whose music even in a "Dance Rhapsody" is never so articulate as his imagination would make it. He would improvise bravely upon a well-rhythmed readily manipulated motive. He would make it dance; he would make it sing But no sooner does he set the dance in motion than somehow beclog its feet as by excess of tension; while no sooner does he sign than cloudy harmonies descend upon the ring. Only with a mighty effort toward the end does he finally set his motive free. The gods of music have been cruel to Delius. Imagination they gave him and then denied him speech.

D'Indy led the moderns—the d'Indy of the one fragment from the music-drama of Saint Christopher that it is possible to transfer to the concert-hall—a symphonic poem, in brief rather than in little, that is epitome, in the second act, of the journey of the slave who was to be martyr, up and down the world in quest of the King of Heaven. Of course, it should be the obligation of the Metropolitan Opera House to set on the American stage this "Legend of Saint Christopher," with which an illustrious composer would crown his career in which he has written as only he in our time writes. By the token, moreover of this symphonic fragment, he would no fail upon the ears, the minds, the heart of hearers. The music is masterfull made, with the fertility in invention an resource; the ever unfolding unity that ar d'Indy's intent and desire fulfilled. Int music he would transmute mediæval legen and often out of these pages rise th modes, the accents of mediæval psalmody None the less, being of these days an of his own voice and manner, d'Indy impregnates them with modern sonoritie sharpens them with twentieth-century dissonance, enriches them with the harmon and the color of a later time. Learning wisdom, resource aid in the process, but a veritable divination guides it. Seemingl in this music of his final years, the loftiness, the austerity of d'Indy's mind an spirit speak unfettered and unclouded There is more than one resemblance between his "Saint Christopher" and Wagner's "Parsifal." Not the least is the equa impression of old design and deeply se purpose at last and altogether fulfilled.

The outcome, in this symphonic fragment, with Mr. Monteux and the orchestra adding their own eloquence, is musi that less persuades by beauty than commands by power. There is superb largeness of substance; there is a strippe might of march and movement. Dow the winds of time, blow the echoes o battles, in old legend. Far yet near sti the tonal pomps of kings and pontiffs keeping high and holy festival. Here an there sound the voices of the vicars an the lords whom God, in those days, se over men. These things come and go while the great longing in the heart o the slave for the King of Heaven eve haunts the music, as in undertone; while in overtone, go the wonder, the beauty, the power of that celestial presence. Let the pedants pick their way into the occasional Wagnerian suggestion—for d'Indy cannot escape the master who, hardly less than Franck, swayed his younger prime. Let them seek out also for delight or derision what some will call the "med [illegible] of Saint Christopher." T power, the exaltation remain and b the rarest of qualities, whatever b other glories, of composers in our ticular day. For the most part they in their gardens. D'Indy prefers his tower.

H. T. PAR

SYMPHONY IN NINTH CONCER

Messrs. Maier and Pattison, Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

MALPIERO'S SUITE NEW TO AMERIC

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteaux, conductor, took place Thursday night. Th concert was repeated yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows Mozart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" an Concerto for two pianos (K. 365); d'Indy "The Search for God"; Malpiero, "Impressions from Nature," Suite No. (The Blackcap; the Woodpecker; th Owl); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. T pianists were Guy Maier and Lee Patt son.

We write with reference to the conce of yesterday.

After a spirited performance of t overture to the opera that, in spite o the years, is to be ranked with "Pelle and Melisande" as the supreme achievement of lyrically dramatic art, widel different as the operas are in form an in expression, Messrs. Maier and Patti son gave an admirable performance o Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The Herald has more than once extolled the ensemble playing of these musicians. Yesterday they not only displayed the qualities that have excited praise in cities o this country, Paris and London; the also showed their nice appreciation o the Concerto's character. There was n attempt to modernize the music, to giv it incongruous, destructive importanc They accepted the music as it is, suav tender and also lightsome, and played a Mozart wished: for he once wrote tha music should always "sound," meanin that it should be euphonious; and he demanded of a pianist that running passages should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony fro his opera, "The Legend of Saint Christopher," was played for the first time Boston; Malpiero's Suite for the firs time in America; the Rhapsody of Deliu for the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealou in the observance of religious rites an ceremonies, it was natural that th legend of Christopher should appea strongly to him. This symphonic musi is played before the second act, after th narrator has told of the giant's searc for the king of heaven. The giant visi kings and emperors; he questions conquerors of the battlefield; he asks H Holiness the Pope himself; they all te him in turn that they are not the kin of heaven; then, weary and sorrowfu he goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today New York, that the music of d'Indy i only cerebral; that it is never emotiona To some, yes to many, this reproac may seem just. His music has often a aristocratic character that is forbidding it is often austere, as if the compose stood proudly aloof. He does not wea his heart on his sleeve. Yet who ca hear his second symphony and this de scriptive symphony, not to mention oth works by him, without feeling that V cent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly em tional. "The Search for God" is nece sarily episodic, as there must be mus expression of each guest of the g but here is no panoramic music, no m for films; even without the story mind, the music would be impress whether it portrays the pomp of po tates, the fury of battle, or the joy bells and the exultation of the fait on the feast day of the Resurrection. d'Indy here is not cold and repe His heart beats as warmly for hum as did the heart of his master C Franck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful l work, with interesting and poetic deftly expressed by the instrum His scheme of orchestration seems his own; nor is he in his harm scheme an imitator. They are pieces, these impressions received f the three birds, but there is more in them than in many huge symph and pretentious symphonic poems. discreet, yet how telling is his em ment of instruments! Each ha significance. Mr. Monteux, who ducted throughout skilfully and amore, is to be heartily thanked bringing out noteworthy modern positions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was formed here by the Chicago Symp Orchestra in 1916. It then seemed ferior in construction and intere his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," whic in the repertory of the Boston phony Orchestra; far inferior to beautiful "Summer Garden." In Rhapsody there is too little rhap glow. The dancers, as the Englis cording to the old saying, take pleasure sadly. There is a rese most a melancholy, that chara much of this composer's music idiom is still strange to us.

The program of the concert week will be as follows: Tschai "Manfred" Symphony; Griffe Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan; Saens, Piano Concerto G mino (Percy Grainger, pianist); La ture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD DEC. 25

Events and Con

Mr Monteux has put but o interesting piece on this w phony program, Griffes' "Khu st performed last year, wh the most significant an American composition hear years. The composer, who last November to share in the enthusiastic applause, has si the age of 35. The other n Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens are repertory pieces of a popular in the 1890's than are not novelties, nor are a likely to become classics, wh heard in the year 2000.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturda on Symphony Orchestra, 10 "Manfred" Symphony, Tsc second piano concerto, S The Pleasure Dome of Khu Griffes; overture to "Le Lalo. Soloist, Percy Graing

---

GLOBE DEC.

GRAINGER SOLOI

At the 10th pair of Boston concerts, to be given in Symp Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, a day evening, Jan. 1, Mr. Mon conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manf phony, based on Byron's drama Although this large-proportione less known than the three last of Tschaikowsky, it is c one of his most impressive sc Monteux will repeat the tone Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleas Kubla Khan," after the poem ridge, which was heard at t certs with so much enthusiasm son. The performance of th praised work was shortly foll the death of its composer, American of great talent. Th number will be Lalo's brilliant the "King of Ys." The solo occasion will be Percy Grain never before played with chestra. He will be heard in the Concerto of Saint-Saens in G m

---

HERALD DEC

Boston Symphony

At the tenth pair of Boston Sy concerts, to be given in Symphe Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and evening, Jan. 1, Pierre Mont conduct Tschaikowsky's "M Symphony, which is based on dramatic poem. Although th proportioned work is less kno other symphonies by the Russi ter, it is nevertheless conside of his finest and most impressiv The four movements depict "M Wanderings and Despair," "T of the Alps," "Pastorale," "Th of Arimanes," "Invocation to and "Manfred's Death." At t concerts Mr. Monteux will re tone poem by Charles T. Griff Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan the poem of Coleridge, which w at these concerts with so much and last season. The perform this highly praised work was followed by the death of its c a young American of great Since his death there has been interest in his different works. ing number will be Lalo's brillia ture to the "King of Ys." Th of the occasion will be Percy the eminent Australian pianist, never before played with this tra. He will be heard in the Second Concerto of Saint-Sae minor.

POST DEC. 26

ymphony Orchestra and Mr at Cambridge—Notable Pl Grieg's Piano-Concerto and "Sea Pieces"—Mme. Szumowsk as Pianist with Many Pieces Upon Her Programme

As originally announced, the pr of the Symphony Concert bridge last evening was to h with the overture to Lalo "Le Roi d'Ys," but to the great of most of those who we Debussy's symphonic sketches, "L played in its stead. The res proceeded according to th began with Mozart's ove Giovanni"; the symphony w in D minor; and Katherine the solo part in Griegs concerto. [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

r ... for the most part the ... D'Indy prefers his

H. T. PA

MPHONY IN NINTH CONCER

ssrs. Maier and Pattiso Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

ALPIERO'S SUITE NEW TO AMERIC

By PHILIP HALE

he ninth concert of the Boston Sym ny orchestra, Mr. Monteux, con tor, took place Thursday night. Th cert was repeated yesterday after n. The program was as follow zart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" an ncerto for two pianos (K. 365); d'Indy he Search for God"; Malpiero, "Im ssions from Nature," Suite No. he Blackcap, the Woodpecker, th l); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. Th nists were Guy Maier and Lee Patt

We write with reference to the conce yesterday.

After a spirited performance of th erture to the opera that, in spite o e years, is to be ranked with "Pelleas d Melisande" as the supreme achieve- ent of lyrically dramatic art, widely fferent as the operas are in form an expression, Messrs. Maier and Patti n gave an admirable performance o ozart's Concerto in E flat. The Her d has more than once extolled the en mble playing of these musicians. Yes rday they not only displayed the qua es that have excited praise in cities o is country, Paris and London; the so showed their nice appreciation o e Concerto's character. There was n tempt to modernize the music, to giv incongruous, destructive importanc ey accepted the music as it is, suav nder and also lightsome, and played a ozart wished; for he once wrote th usic should always "sound," meanin at it should be euphonious; and he de anded of a pianist that running pa ges should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony fro s opera, "The Legend of Saint Chris pher," was played for the first time i oston; Malpiero's Suite for the firs me in America; the Rhapsody of Deliu r the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealou the observance of religious rites an remonies, it was natural that th gend of Christopher should appea rongly to him. This symphonic musi played before the second act, after th rrator has told of the giant's searc r the king of heaven. The giant visit ngs and emperors; he questions con herors of the battlefield; he asks Hi oliness the Pope himself; they all te m in turn that they are not the kin heaven; then, weary and sorrowfu e goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today i ew York, that the music of d'Indy i nly cerebral; that it is never emotional o some, yes to many, this reproach ay seem just. His music has often a istocratic character that is forbidding is often austere, as if the compose tood proudly aloof. He does not wea is heart on his sleeve. Yet who ca ear his second symphony and this de criptive symphony, not to mention othe orks by him, without feeling that Vin ent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly emo ional. "The Search for God" is neces arily episodic, as there must be musical xpression of each guest of the giant ut here is no panoramic music, no musi or films; even without the story i mind, the music would be impressive whether it portrays the pomp of poten ates, the fury of battle, or the joyou ells and the exultation of the faithfu n the feast day of the Resurrection. N 'Indy here is not cold and repellin His heart beats as warmly for humanit s did the heart of his master Cesa Franck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful litt ork, with interesting and poetic idea eftly expressed by the instrumen His scheme of orchestration seems to is own; nor is he in his harmon cheme an imitator. They are litt ieces, these impressions received fro he three birds, but there is more fa n them than in many huge sympho nd pretentious symphonic poems. H iscreet, yet how telling is his empl ent of instruments! Each has significance. Mr. Monteux, who ucted throughout skilfully and amore, is to be heartily thanked bringing out noteworthy modern c positions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was formed here by the Chicago Symph Orchestra in 1916. It then seemed ferior in construction and interes his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," which in the repertory of the Boston phony Orchestra; far inferior to beautiful "Summer Garden." In Rhapsody there is too little rhap glow. The dancers, as the English, cording to the old saying, take pleasure sadly. There is a reserv most a melancholy, that characte much of this composer's music. idiom is still strange to us.

The program of the concerts week will be as follows: Tschaik "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes, Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saens, Piano Concerto G minor, (Percy Grainger, pianist); Lalo, ture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

Events and Comments

Mr Monteux has put but one especially interesting piece on this week's Symphony program, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," first performed last year, when it seemed the most significant and beautiful American composition heard in many years. The composer, who was present last November to share in the unusually enthusiastic applause, has since died at the age of 35. The other numbers, by Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens and Lalo, are repertory pieces of a sort more popular in the 1890's than now. They are not novelties, nor are any of them likely to become classics, which will be heard in the year 2000.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. "Manfred" Symphony, Tschaikowsky; second piano concerto, Saint-Saens; "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," Griffes; overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo. Soloist, Percy Grainger.

GLOBE DEC. 26

GRAINGER SOLOIST

At the 10th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, Mr. Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, based on Byron's dramatic poem. Although this large-proportioned work is less known than the three last symphonies of Tschaikowsky, it is considered one of his most impressive scores. Mr. Monteux will repeat the tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge, which was heard at these concerts with so much enthusiasm last season. The performance of this highly praised work was shortly followed by the death of its composer, a young American of great talent. The closing number will be Lalo's brilliant Overture to the "King of Ys." The soloist of the occasion will be Percy Grainger, who has never before played with this orchestra. He will be heard in the Second Concerto of Saint-Saens in G minor.

HERALD-DEC. 26.

Boston Symphony

At the tenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, which is based on Byron's dramatic poem. Although this large-proportioned work is less known than other symphonies by the Russian master, it is nevertheless considered one of his finest and most impressive scores. The four movements depict "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes," "Invocation to Astarte," and "Manfred's Death." At the same concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge, which was heard at these concerts with so much enthusiasm last season. The performance of this highly praised work was shortly followed by the death of its composer, a young American of great talents. Since his death there has been a keen interest in his different works. The closing number will be Lalo's brilliant overture to the "King of Ys." The soloist of the occasion will be Percy Grainger, the eminent Australian pianist, who has never before played with this orchestra. He will be heard in the sparkling Second Concerto of Saint-Saens in G minor.

POST-DEC. 26.

Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Good- n at Cambridge—Notable Playing of rieg's Piano-Concerto and Debussy's Sea-Pieces"—Mme. Szumowska Reappears as Pianist with Many a Polish ece Upon Her Programme

S originally announced, the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening was to have con- ed with the overture to Lalo's opera Roi d'Y's," but to the greater enter- ment of most of those who were there, ussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," played in its stead. The rest of the ert proceeded according to the initial It began with Mozart's overture to Giovanni"; the symphony was Schu- n's in D minor; and Katherine Goodson ed the solo part in Griegs concerto for o and orchestra. After the recent ex- g interlude, it was good to hear once the round, full-bodied, satisfying tone ur own orchestra. And with all due ect to those whose brains are still with the recollection of a certain sen- nal afternoon and evening of the week passed, it may be said that it was also to hear orchestral pieces as they ably sounded in the mind of the com- r, and not necessarily as they may en to sound in the mind of a highly , though nevertheless somewhat er- conductor. Last evening the per- ance of overture, suite and symphony each in its way highly effective. While Muck frequently found a place on his amme for Debussy's "La Mer," he no secret of the fact that he did like it; and it was easy to discern r. Monteux's reading of it a greater athy with the composer's means and ions. There was a greater plasticity, e poetic quality; and seldom have the umental voices sounded so luminous heir progress so lucid. And never has Debussy's orchestral palette nted such a variety of tints and half- or, at times, of glowing and garish . As is usual when the music in tempts their better powers, the or- a displayed genuine virtuosity. Al- time has begun to winnow Debussy's much of it now seems to be no than a following of formulas, even they were formulas that Debussy f created. But "La Mer" must un- onably be classed with his more en- things, by reason of its melodic, ic, and orchestral beauty, its high [illegible] quality and its structural

For a much [illegible] sifting has been at work with the compositions, small and large, of Robert Schumann. It now seems that of the four symphonies, this one in D minor has the greatest vitality, the freshest appeal. For all their obvious unsuitability for symphonic treatment, its themes have a vigorous directness that is still appealing, nor is the thickness of the orchestral writing wholly inappropriate to the lusty spirit of the music. Though it is less true in music than in the other arts, there are times when the idea matters more than the form in which it is cast. Only thus can we account for the survival of Schumann's symphonic writing. On merely technical grounds it should have perished long ago.

It would not be easy to think of Grieg as the composer of symphonies; fortunately he never tried. The nearest he came to it, saving an early and discarded attempt, was to write this concerto for the piano. As with Schumann the themes are not too well suited to their purpose; they do not lend themselves readily to development, and they receive little enough of it, in the accepted sense of the word. Also as with Schumann, the music is short-breathed, patchy, and episodic, although there is far more skillful handling of the orchestra. But once again it is the quality of sheer inspiration, the ability to invest salient and individual ideas that saved the situation, and this concerto is fresher after its fifty-two and a half years than much that was put on paper the day before yesterday. Perhaps a little of the credit for the effect of the piece last evening should be laid to the performance, not only of Mme. Goodson, but of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, who were evidently caught up and carried along by the amazing eloquence and vividness of her playing. It was several years ago that Mme. Goodson played the concerto here for the first time, but from last evening it might have been a new and exciting experience for her. In these days of refinements and super-refinements it is refreshing to hear—and see—a pianist "cut loose." Especially when, as was the case, it is done without any sacrifice of the finer and more exacting qualities of performance.

TRANS. JAN-14

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

DEBUSSY'S SEA-MUSIC SAVES AN AFTERNOON

Otherwise Mr. Monteux Sets a Dull Programme — Tedious Resurrections from Schubert and Haydn, and Threadbare Bruch—Miss Menges for None Too Interesting Violinist—Mr. Dadmun Proves Singer of Notable Quality

FOR the first time within recollection Mr. Monteux, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, narrowly escaped a dull programme. He had searched out neglected pieces by classic composers—an Overture "in the Italian style" by Schubert, a "military" Symphony by Haydn—and they hardly warranted rediscovery. He had sanctioned Miss Menges's choice of Bruch's first Concerto for Violin as solo-number of the day, and time, change, repetition have worn it threadbare. An audience, quick by habit to applaud the songful Schubert, the melodious, playful, easy-going Haydn, heard the Overture impassively, the Symphony coldly; while through the Concerto, it had quite as many eyes for Miss Menges, who is not usual of aspect, as ears for the music. Salvation came with Debussy's Sea-Pieces, seizing and stirring imagination in themselves and played with high eloquence.

Clearly Mr. Monteux's best and truest field is the modern and the ultra-modern composers. Among their pieces he chooses interestingly, variously, rewardingly. He plays them with penetration, sympathy, revelation, impressing his hearers. He is not, however, a conductor to gild the commonplace, like Schubert's Overture of yesterday or, the other day, Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House." With reason, he avoids the routine of the "classic repertory," since in French clearness of mind, he perceives that it is staling many a masterpiece. Usually his discoveries on the borders of it have praised him; but not Haydn's "Military Symphony." In a sense, however, it was cynical satisfaction to find Mr. Monteux thus fallible. Week after week, through all one season and half another, he has set programmes for the Symphony Concerts. Hardly one of them has failed to interest from beginning to end—a unique record in the forty years of the orchestra. In the descent of yesterday, came the humanizing touch. If a conductor never slips, by the same token—usually—he never rises.

In Schubert's Overture, the virtuosi of the wood-wind choir sang pretty Italianate measures in glamoring tones of smooth, rich sensuous texture. Of themselves and of Mr. Monteux, they gave these measures long-breathed, curving, Italianate phrasing. Now the strings set in background; again they darkened or brightened the song; yet again they interrupted it with rushing figures. Toward the end came the inevitable crescendo "of the Italian style" in the days of Rossini and through the first half of the nineteenth century. Even then, the scornful called it a "gallopade." The discreet Schubert escapes this reproach—in tameness. So did he do his duty to a fashion in music at Vienna in the year of grace 1817; while a hundred years later at Boston, an audience as dutifully heard him—and, probably, with as little inner glow of satisfaction.

Better, however, Schubert Italian than Haydn military—if to be military consists in an Allegretto in a subdued march-rhythm with light claps of the cymbals and light taps upon the bass drum to accent it. Add thereto a Finale similarly pointed and broken by a modest trumpet-call and the martial Haydn is complete. Unfortunately, putting on this panoply, he puts off more familiar, more desirable graces. There is no heartiness, no sprightliness [illegible] much inven- [illegible] sprightly [illegible] making to fill the [illegible] commission of the estimable Johann Peter Salomon. The veiled march of the second movement needs more than the "military" trimmings to escape as routine composition. A connoisseur of Haydn might hardly pick the Minuet from a hundred others written all in the day's work in the Vienna or the London of his time. The lusty, fanciful, sportive Haydn of many a Finale distinctly drags his usually skipping feet, takes refuge in a trumpet-call. Good old Haydn, the simple, the charming yesterday, today, and forever; but when charm flies out of the window, as in this Military Symphony, the simplicity draggles near to commonplace. Those who obstinately set all "the masters" above every human frailty will say that Mr. Monteux failed to catch the flavor, the accent of the music. But was there any such—except of a commission fulfilled by the faithful Haydn working rain or shine?

Poor old Bruch snapping and snarling at "the enemy" through the war, while with more reason he might have reviled the fate overtaking his violin-pieces! Naught else of his music survives outside Germany and hardly there. No longer do "Odysseus," "Arminius" and his other blends of sentiment and sonority, workmanship and effect, stir even the musical backwaters of this world; while before his Concerto or his Scottish Fantasia the expectant hearer merely asks nowadays what the violinist is likely to make of it. In spite of symphonic pretence and of many ingenuities, down they have come to the level of Ernst's and Vieuxtemps's and Wieniawski's concertos and fantasias, as merely "grateful music for the violinist." As he or she plays them so are they—suave Adagios, florid or finical "passage-work," glinting Finales. And Miss Menges played the Concerto well enough. Her technical means sufficed, even if her ear and fingers were not always quite unerring. Her tone flowed warmly, pliantly. It is full-bodied, bright of texture, if not always exactly edgeless. In a richer music, it might be sensuous and sumptuous. Without apparent effort Miss Menges did Bruch's feats of skill and agility; added tremors of tone to his sentimental song, which is hardly necessary; projected his bolder phrases, his more energetic rhythms. The regular thing in the regular way—but always with the lurking suspicion that, given a stranger, more imaginative and higher-pitched music, there would emerge a violinist with individuality, with even a propensity for the fantastical. To the eye the English Miss Menges may look Greenwich Village and its equivalent in London which is Chelsea. Yet in her aspect is hint of something more and rarer. Possibly Bruch is only her sop to the musical bourgeoisie.

Finally, to efface all that had gone before, the Sea-Pieces of Debussy. Nowhere has he stretched so ample a canvas, filled it with so large a tonal design. Those who would have him a maker of miniatures forget that, for once at least, in this sea-music, he is also a master of architecture. There are symphonic scope and sweep, expansion and cumulation in "La Mer." Steadily the first "sketch," as he chooses to call it, broadens and deepens. The pale sea, the calm sea of the misty dawn gains color, motion, force. In the music is impetus, driving, irresistible. Again in the third "sketch," wind and sea soon cease murmuring; swiftly they become voices of power. The waves surge upward; the gusts descend to meet them; reverberant are their voices. Between, for contrast in a far-flung music, the curling and the rippling of the waters when they play with each other and the sun and the breeze.

Like a fresco—and no miniature—in tones is this music. The rhythms beat strongly; full-voiced is many a modulation; the harmonic background is stretched tense; the chords ring large; often the instrumental coloring is bold and sharp; always there is motion. In his own grand manner may Debussy write, if he choose, and in it he has designed and fashioned the sea-pieces. Large as it is, it is still his own, because everywhere, out of rhythm, harmony, timbre, modulation, he is still weaving a characteristic imagery and atmosphere. Here in tones is the sea as light traverses it, plays upon it, transforms it—the sea sombre, the sea radiant, the sea in countless aspects between. Here also and by like means and in like medium are manifold moods of the ocean—inert at the beginning, then stirring into changeful life and aspect; at play in the intermezzo; uprearing its might in the Finale. Here, besides, in tones are the voices of the sea when the wind caresses or whips it into speech—from whisper to thunders. Of course, there are minute strokes; Debussy would not be himself did he not make them. Yet on the instant they fall as details into the might and magnitude of the whole. Mr. Monteux missed nothing in the music. He sustained its formal substance; he released its imagery. For the first time not a few of his hearers knew a Debussy grandiose.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. JAN. 15.

FRANCK'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Les Djinns" Played for the First Time in Boston

Beethoven, Bingham and Roger-Ducasse Also in Program

Franck's "Les Djinns," a symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, suggested by the poem of Victor Hugo, was performed for the first time at the Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, heard here as soloist last season, played [illegible] part. The piece was an experiment to test the possibilities of the piano as an orchestral instrument. Franck did not intend it as a concerto.

Mr Schmitz respected the composer's intention in subordinating his part in the performance. His staccato is too brittle, lacking in vigor. The music is groping toward an orientalism it does not succeed in suggesting. It is not in the class with Franck's Symphony, or his violin sonata.

Seth Bingham's Passacaglia is somewhat in the spirit of Franck's organ pieces. Mr Bingham, like his teacher, D'Indy, has not learned to write as few notes and as few parts as possible. His counterpoint and his orchestration are often thick and muddied. The musical ideas in his Passacaglia are of considerable interest.

One wondered whether the composer did not think in terms of the organ, as Schumann thought in terms of the piano and then arrange his ideas for orchestra. The audience seemed favorably impressed. One would like to hear more of Mr Bingham's music. It is individual and imaginative in conception.

Roger-Ducasse undertook to crystalize the practices of modern French composers in his "Suite Francaise." The result certainly strikes an average between Massenet and Faure. If Beethoven, whose "First Symphony" began the program which M Roger-Ducasse's piece ended, had merely wanted to reduce Haydn, Mozart and others now forgotten to a neat and effective musical formula, called perhaps a "Viennese Suite," it seems doubtful if his fame would have lasted to our day.

Instead, he did revolutionary things, such as persistently accenting off beats, even in his "First Symphony," which caused the conservatives to make unkind remarks about "confused explosions of the outrageous effrontery of a young man."

He later did greater and more daring things which have made it a fashion to call this symhony badly diluted Haydn. It is still agreeable music to listen to, especially when played with the skill and taste shown yesterday by Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

GLOBE JAN. 22.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 27 1920

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Wednesday Evening.

On Wednesday evening, December 1, the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give the second of its season's concerts, when the soloist will be Frances Alda, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from Boito's "Mefistofele," and the "Vissi d'Arte" aria, from Puccini's "Tosca."

Instead of the Brahms symphony, No. 4, originally announced, the orchestra will play as its principal number the Mendelssohn Octette for Strings, in E flat, Op. 20, other numbers being Gustav Strube's "Four Preludes for Orchestra," which will be given its first local hearing at this concert, and an orchestral suite arranged from the Stravinsky ballet "Petrouchka," with a solo piano part which will be played by Raymond Havens.

ESTABLISHED NOV 27

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

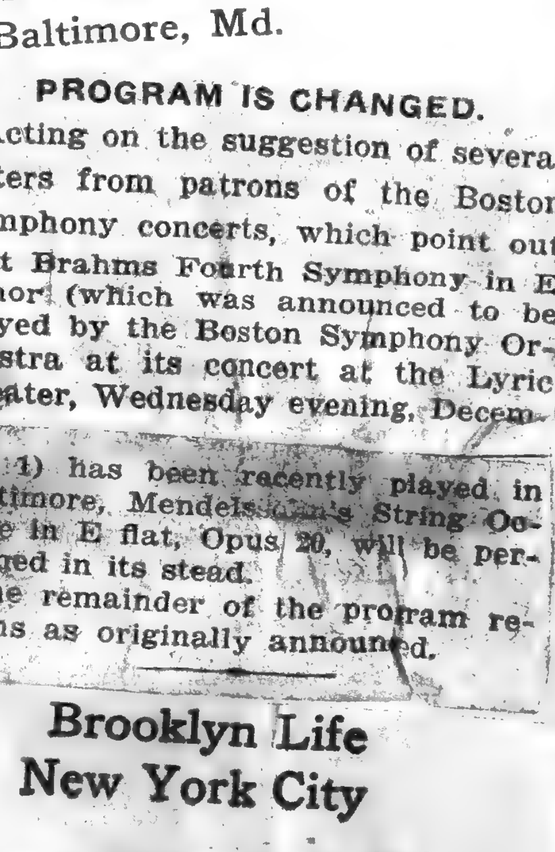
PROGRAM IS CHANGED.

Acting on the suggestion of several letters from patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts, which point out that Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor (which was announced to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evening, December 1) has been recently played in Baltimore, Mendelssohn's String Octette in E flat, Opus 20, will be performed in its stead.

The remainder of the program remains as originally announced.

Brooklyn Life
New York City

NOV 27 K



MARY JORDAN
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, Friday evening,
December third

[66]

Brooklyn Life
New York City K

The Next Boston Symphony Concert

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of singularly varied interest. There will be the familiar "Arabian Nights" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the Ballet Russe used for "Schéhérazde"—despite the protests of the composer's widow—and also the "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which the Russian dancers turned to similar account with telling American scenic aid. The remaining orchestral number will be Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou. The soloist will be Mary Jordan, a contralto, who will be a most agreeable surprise to those unfamiliar with her ability as a concert singer.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 28 K

The "Leonore" No. 3 Overture is the opening number on the program.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8:15 o'clock, Jean Bedetti, the illustrious solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for this instrument with the orchestra.

Mr. Bedetti came from Europe last season to fill his present post, and has more than justified his reputation in the Old World where this first-prize pupil of the Paris conservatory attracted attention not only in his own recitals but by his services as solo 'cellist with the famous orchestra of Paris. Mendelssohn's string octette, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The novelty of the evening will be symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka" which will be heard for the first time in this city. This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet by the revolutionary Russian composer, depicting fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd, uses the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The notable piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

In order that the evening Boston Symphony concert in Christmas week may not fail on Christmas night, it will be given next Thursday evening at o'clock instead of Saturday evening. The afternoon concert will be on Friday at 2:30, as usual.

At this, the ninth pair of concerts there will be two soloists—Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who, in their concerts of music for two pianos, have created a fresh interest in music in this form. They will play Mozart's concerto for two pianos in E-flat. Preceding this, Mr. Monteux will conduct the overture to "Don Giovanni." "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from "The Legend of St. Christopher," by D'Indy will have its first performances in Boston. One of his latest works, it is considered by many to be his masterpiece. A new Italian number on this program will be the first suite from Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero," played for the first time in America; "Il Capinero" ("The Blackcap"), "Il Picchio" ("The Woodpecker") and "Il Chiu" ("The Owl"). The concerts will close with the Dance Rhapsody by Delius, the English composer (first time at these concerts).

---

will sing with the orchestra the Prison Scene of Marguerite from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." Her other aria will be the Prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." The concert will open with Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E flat, which, by popular request, has been substituted for the Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor, announced for this concert. This symphony was played here by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra a week ago, and it is to avoid repetition that the change has been made. Particular interest will center in the first performance in Baltimore of Four Preludes for Orchestra by Gustav Strube, head of the department of harmony at the Peabody Conservatory of Music and director of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. Another novelty, which will be the last number on the program, is a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "Petrouchka," which will also have its first performance in Baltimore on this

---

m ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 28

Petrouchka At Boston Symphony Concert

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8.15, Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for this instrument with the orchestra. Mendelsohn's string Octette, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The feature of the evening will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka," which will be head for the first time in this city. This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet by the revolutionary Russian composer, depicting fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd, is considered to create a precedent in the use of the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The piano part will be played by Mr. [illegible] he exaltation remain and bo rarest of qualities, whatever b glories, of composers in our r day. For the most part they eir gardens. D'Indy prefers his

H. T. PARK

YMPHONY IN NINTH CONCERT

ssrs. Maier and Pattiso Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

ALPIERO'S SUITE NEW TO AMERIC

By PHILIP HALE

he ninth concert of the Boston Sym ny orchestra, Mr. Monteaux, con tor, took place Thursday night. Th cert was repeated yesterday after n. The program was as follows zart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" an certo for two pianos (K. 365); d'Indy he Search for God"; Malpiero, "Im ssions from Nature," Suite No. he Blackcap; the Woodpecker; th l); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. Th nists were Guy Maier and Lee Patt n.

We write with reference to the conce yesterday.

After a spirited performance of th erture to the opera that, in spite o e years, is to be ranked with "Pellea d Melisande" as the supreme achievement of lyrically dramatic art, widely fferent as the operas are in form and expression, Messrs. Maier and Patti n gave an admirable performance o ozart's Concerto in E flat. The Her l has more than once extolled the en mble playing of these musicians. Yes day they not only displayed the qua es that have excited praise in cities o is country, Paris and London; the so showed their nice appreciation o e Concerto's character. There was n tempt to modernize the music, to giv incongruous, destructive importanc ey accepted the music as it is, suave nder and also lightsome, and played a ozart wished; for he once wrote tha usic should always "sound," meanin at it should be euphonious; and he de anded of a pianist that running pas ges should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony fro s opera, "The Legend of Saint Chris pher," was played for the first time i ston; Malpiero's Suite for the firs me in America; the Rhapsody of Deliu r the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealou the observance of religious rites an remonies, it was natural that th gend of Christopher should appea rongly to him. This symphonic musi played before the second act, after th rrator has told of the giant's searc r the king of heaven. The giant visit ings and emperors; he questions con nerors of the battlefield; he asks Hi oliness the Pope himself; they all te im in turn that they are not the kin heaven; then, weary and sorrowfu e goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today i ew York, that the music of d'Indy i nly cerebral; that it is never emotional o some, yes to many, this reproach ay seem just. His music has often an istocratic character that is forbidding is often austere, as if the composer tood proudly aloof. He does not wear is heart on his sleeve. Yet who ca ear his second symphony and this descriptive symphony, not to mention othe orks by him, without feeling that Vin ent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly emo ional. "The Search for God" is neces arily episodic, as there must be musica xpression of each guest of the giant ut here is no panoramic music, no musi or films; even without the story i ind. the music would be impressive whether it portrays the pomp of poten ates, the fury of battle, or the joyou ells and the exultation of the faithfu n the feast day of the Resurrection. N 'Indy here is not cold and repelling His heart beats as warmly for humanit as did the heart of his master Cesa Franck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful litt work, with interesting and poetic idea deftly expressed by the instrument His scheme of orchestration seems to his own; nor is he in his harmon cheme an imitator. They are litt pieces, these impressions received fro he three birds, but there is more fan in them than in many huge symphon and pretentious symphonic poems. H liscreet, yet how telling is his empl nent of instruments! Each has significance. Mr. Monteux, who lucted throughout skilfully and amore, is to be heartily thanked bringing out noteworthy modern c ositions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was formed here by the Chicago Symph Orchestra in 1916. It then seemed ferior in construction and interest his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," which in the repertory of the Boston S phony Orchestra; far inferior to beautiful "Summer Garden." In Rhapsody there is too little rhap glow. The dancers, as the English cording to the old saying, take pleasure sadly. There is a reserv most a melancholy, that characte much of this composer's music. idiom is still strange to us.

The program of the concerts week will be as follows: Tschaiko "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes, Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saens, Piano Concerto G minor, (Percy Grainger, pianist); Lalo, ture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD DEC. 25

Events and Comments

Mr Monteux has put but one especial y interesting piece on this week's Symphony program, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," irst performed last year, when it seem d the most significant and beautiful American composition heard in many years. The composer, who was present ast November to share in the unusually enthusiastic applause, has since died at the age of 35. The other numbers, by Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens and Lalo, are repertory pieces of a sort more popular in the 1890's than now. They are not novelties, nor are any of them likely to become classics, which will be heard in the year 2000.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. "Manfred" Symphony, Tschaikowsky; second piano concerto, Saint-Saens; "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," Griffes; overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo. Soloist, Percy Grainger.

DEC. 26

GRAINGER SOLOIST

At the 10th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon. Dec. 31, and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, Mr. Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, based on Byron's dramatic poem. Although this large-proportioned work is less known than the three last symphonies of Tschaikowsky, it is considered one of his most impressive scores. Mr. Monteux will repeat the tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge, which was heard at these concerts with so much enthusiasm last season. The performance of this highly praised work was shortly followed by the death of its composer, a young American of great talent. The closing number will be Lalo's brilliant Overture to the "King of Ys." The soloist of the occasion will be Percy Grainger, who has never before played with this orchestra. He will be heard in the Second Concerto of Saint-Saens in G minor.

DEC. 26

Boston Symphony

At the tenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, which is based on Byron's dramatic poem. Although this large-proportioned work is less known than other symphonies by the Russian master, it is nevertheless considered one of his finest and most impressive scores. The four movements depict "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes," "Invocation to Astarte," and "Manfred's Death." At the same concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge, which was heard at these concerts with so much enthusiasm last season. The performance of this highly praised work was shortly followed by the death of its composer, a young American of great talents. Since his death there has been a keen interest in his different works. The closing number will be Lalo's brilliant overture to the "King of Ys." The soloist of the occasion will be Percy Grainger, the eminent Australian pianist, who has never before played with this orchestra. He will be heard in the sparkling Second Concerto of Saint-Saens in G minor.

DEC. 26

e Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Goodson at Cambridge—Notable Playing of rieg's Piano-Concerto and Debussy's Sea-Pieces"—Mme. Szumowska Reappears as Pianist with Many a Polish ece Upon Her Programme

S originally announced, the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening was to have con ed with the overture to Lalo's opera Roi d'Y's," but to the greater enter ment of most of those who were there, ussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," e played in its stead. The rest of the ert proceeded according to the initial . It began with Mozart's overture to n Giovanni"; the symphony was Schu n's in D minor; and Katherine Goodson ed the solo part in Griegs concerto for o and orchestra. After the recent ex g interlude, it was good to hear once the round, full-bodied, satisfying tone ur own orchestra. And with all due ect to those whose brains are still with the recollection of a certain sen nal afternoon and evening of the week passed, it may be said that it was also to hear orchestral pieces as they ably sounded in the mind of the com r, and not necessarily as they may en to sound in the mind of a highly d, though nevertheless somewhat cr conductor. Last evening the per ance of overture, suite and symphony each in its way highly effective. While Muck frequently found a place on his ramme for Debussy's "La Mer," he no secret of the fact that he did like it; and it was easy to discern r. Monteux's reading of it a greater athy with the composer's means and tions. There was a greater plasticity, e poetic quality; and seldom have the umental voices sounded so luminous their progress so lucid. And never, has Debussy's orchestral palette nted such a variety of tints and half or, at times, of glowing and garish . As is usual when the music in tempts their better powers, the or a displayed genuine virtuosity. Al time has begun to winnow Debussy's much of it now seems to be no than a following of formulas, even they were formulas that Debussy f created. But "La Mer" must un onably be classed with his more en things, by reason of its melodic, nic, and orchestral beauty, its high ginative quality, and its structural th.

For a much longer period this process of sifting has been at work with the compositions, small and large, of Robert Schumann. It now seems that of the four symphonies, this one in D minor has the greatest vitality, the freshest appeal. For all their obvious unsuitability for symphonic treatment, its themes have a vigorous directness that is still appealing, nor is the thickness of the orchestral writing wholly inappropriate to the lusty spirit of the music. Though it is less true in music than in the other arts, there are times when the idea matters more than the form in which it is cast. Only thus can we account for the survival of Schumann's symphonic writing. On merely technical grounds it should have perished long ago.

It would not be easy to think of Grieg as the composer of symphonies; fortunately he never tried. The nearest he came to it, saving an early and discarded attempt, was to write this concerto for the piano. As with Schumann the themes are not too well suited to their purpose; they do not lend themselves readily to development, and they receive little enough of it, in the accepted sense of the word. Also as with Schumann, the music is short-breathed, patchy, and episodic, although there is far more skillful handling of the orchestra. But once again it is the quality of sheer inspiration, the ability to invest salient and individual ideas that saved the situation, and this concerto is fresher after its fifty-two and a half years than much that was put on paper the day before yesterday. Perhaps a little of the credit for the effect of the piece last evening should be laid to the performance, not only of Mme. Goodson, but of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, who were evidently caught up and carried along by the amazing eloquence and vividness of her playing. It was several years ago that Mme. Goodson played the concerto here for the first time, but from last evening it might have been a new and exciting experience for her. In these days of refinements and super-refinements it is refreshing to hear—and see—a pianist "cut loose." Especially when, as was the case, it is done without any sacrifice of the finer and more exacting qualities of performance.

TRANS. JAN-14

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

DEBUSSY'S SEA-MUSIC SAVES AN AFTERNOON

Otherwise Mr. Monteux Sets a Dull Programme — Tedious Resurrections from Schubert and Haydn, and Threadbare Bruch—Miss Menges for None Too Interesting Violinist—Mr. Dadmun Proves Singer of Notable Quality

FOR the first time within recollection Mr. Monteux, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, narrowly escaped a dull programme. He had searched out neglected pieces by classic composers—an Overture "in the Italian style" by Schubert, a "military" Symphony by Haydn—and they hardly warranted rediscovery. He had sanctioned Miss Menges's choice of Bruch's first Concerto for Violin as solo-number of the day, and time, change, repetition have worn it threadbare. An audience, quick by habit to applaud the songful Schubert, the melodious, playful, easy-going Haydn, heard the Overture impassively, the Symphony coldly; while through the Concerto, it had quite as many eyes for Miss Menges, who is not usual of aspect, as ears for the music. Salvation came with Debussy's Sea-Pieces, seizing and stirring imagination in themselves and played with high eloquence.

Clearly Mr. Monteux's best and truest field is the modern and the ultra-modern composers. Among their pieces he chooses interestingly, variously, rewardingly. He plays them with penetration, sympathy, revelation, impressing his hearers. He is not, however, a conductor to gild the commonplace, like Schubert's Overture of yesterday or, the other day, Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House." With reason, he avoids the routine of the "classic repertory," since in French clearness of mind, he perceives that it is staling many a masterpiece. Usually his discoveries on the borders of it have praised him; but not Haydn's "Military Symphony." In a sense, however, it was cynical satisfaction to find Mr. Monteux thus fallible. Week after week, through all one season and half another, he has set programmes for the Symphony Concerts. Hardly one of them has failed to interest from beginning to end—a unique record in the forty years of the orchestra. In the descent of yesterday, came the humanizing touch. If a conductor never slips, by the same token—usually—he never rises.

In Schubert's Overture, the virtuosi of the wood-wind choir sang pretty Italianate measures in glamoring tones of smooth, rich sensuous texture. Of themselves and of Mr. Monteux, they gave these measures long-breathed, curving, Italianate phrasing. Now the strings set in background; again they darkened or brightened the song; yet again they interrupted it with rushing figures. Toward the end came the inevitable crescendo "of the Italian style" in the days of Rossini and through the first half of the nineteenth century. Even then, the scornful called it a "gallopade." The discreet Schubert escapes this reproach—in tameness. So did he do his duty to a fashion in music at Vienna in the year of grace 1817; while a hundred years later at Boston, an audience as dutifully heard him—and, probably, with as little inner glow of satisfaction.

Better, however, Schubert Italian than Haydn military—if to be military consists in an Allegretto in a subdued march-rhythm with light claps of the cymbals and light taps upon the bass drum to accent it. Add thereto a Finale similarly pointed and broken by a modest trumpet-call and the martial Haydn is complete. Unfortunately, putting on this panoply, he puts off more familiar, more desirable graces. There is no heartiness, no sprightliness in the first movement, not much invention, few sprightly strokes, only music-making to fill the profitable commission of the estimable Johann Peter Salomon. The veiled march of the second movement needs more than the "military" trimmings to escape as routine composition. A connoisseur of Haydn might hardly pick the Minuet from a hundred others written all in the day's work in the Vienna or the London of his time. The lusty, fanciful, sportive Haydn of many a Finale distinctly drags his usually skipping feet, takes refuge in a trumpet-call. Good old Haydn, the simple, the charming yesterday, today, and forever; but when charm flies out of the window, as in this Military Symphony, the simplicity draggles near to commonplace. Those who obstinately set all "the masters" above every human frailty will say that Mr. Monteux failed to catch the flavor, the accent of the music. But was there any such—except of a commission fulfilled by the faithful Haydn working rain or shine?

Poor old Bruch snapping and snarling at "the enemy" through the war, while with more reason he might have reviled the fate overtaking his violin-pieces! Naught else of his music survives outside Germany and hardly there. No longer do "Odysseus," "Arminius" and his other blends of sentiment and sonority, workmanship and effect, stir even the musical backwaters of this world; while before his Concerto or his Scottish Fantasia the expectant hearer merely asks nowadays what the violinist is likely to make of it. In spite of symphonic pretence and of many ingenuities, down they have come to the level of Ernst's and Vieuxtemps's and Wjeniawski's concertos and fantasias, as merely "grateful music for the violinist." As he or she plays them so are they—suave Adagios, florid or finical "passage-work," glinting Finales. And Miss Menges played the Concerto well enough. Her technical means sufficed, even if her ear and fingers were not always quite unerring. Her tone flowed warmly, pliantly. It is full-bodied, bright of texture, if not always exactly edgeless. In a richer music, it might be sensuous and sumptuous. Without apparent effort Miss Menges did Bruch's feats of skill and agility; added tremors of tone to his sentimental song, which is hardly necessary; projected his bolder phrases, his more energetic rhythms. The regular thing in the regular way—but always with the lurking suspicion that, given a stranger, more imaginative and higher-pitched music, there would emerge a violinist with individuality, with even a propensity for the fantastical. To the eye the English Miss Menges may look Greenwich Village and its equivalent in London which is Chelsea. Yet in her aspect is hint of something more and rarer. Possibly Bruch is only her sop to the musical bourgeoisie.

Finally, to efface all that had gone before, the Sea-Pieces of Debussy. Nowhere has he stretched so ample a canvas, filled it with so large a tonal design. Those who would have him a maker of miniatures forget that, for once at least, in this sea-music, he is also a master of architecture. There are symphonic scope and sweep, expansion and cumulation in "La Mer." Steadily the first "sketch," as he chooses to call it, broadens and deepens. The pale sea, the calm sea of the misty dawn gains color, motion, force. In the music is impetus, driving, irresistible. Again in the third "sketch," wind and sea soon cease murmuring; swiftly they become voices of power. The waves surge upward; the gusts descend to meet them; reverberant are their voices. Between, for contrast in a far-flung music, the curling and the rippling of the waters when they play with each other and the sun and the breeze.

Like a fresco—and no miniature—in tones is this music. The rhythms beat strongly; full-voiced is many a modulation; the harmonic background is stretched tense; the chords ring large; often the instrumental coloring is bold and sharp; always there is motion. In his own grand manner may Debussy write, if he choose, and in it he has designed and fashioned the sea-pieces. Large as it is, it is still his own, because everywhere, out of rhythm, harmony, timbre, modulation, he is still weaving a characteristic imagery and atmosphere. Here in tones is the sea as light traverses it, plays upon it, transforms it—the sea sombre, the sea radiant, the sea in countless aspects between. Here also and by like means and in like medium are manifold moods of the ocean—inert at the beginning, then stirring into changeful life and aspect; at play in the intermezzo; uprearing its might in the Finale. Here, besides, in tones are the voices of the sea when the wind caresses or whips it into speech—from whisper to thunders. Of course, there are minute strokes; Debussy would not be himself did he not make them. Yet on the instant they fall as details into the might and magnitude of the whole. Mr. Monteux missed nothing in the music. He sustained its formal substance; he reelased its imagery. For the first time not a few of his hearers knew a Debussy grandiose.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. JAN. 15.

FRANCK'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Les Djinns" Played for the First Time in Boston

Beethoven, Bingham and Roger-Ducasse Also in Program

Franck's "Les Djinns," a symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, suggested by the poem of Victor Hugo, was performed for the first time at the Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, heard here as soloist last season, played the piano part. The piece was an experiment to test the possibilities of the piano as an orchestral instrument. Franck did not intend it as a concerto.

Mr Schmitz respected the composer's intention in subordinating his part in the performance. His staccato is too brittle, lacking in vigor. The music is groping toward an orientalism it does not succeed in suggesting. It is not in the class with Franck's Symphony, or his violin sonata.

Seth Bingham's Passacaglia is somewhat in the spirit of Franck's organ pieces. Mr Bingham, like his teacher, D'Indy, has not learned to write as few notes and as few parts as possible. His counterpoint and his orchestration are often thick and muddled. The musical ideas in his Passacaglia are of considerable interest.

One wondered whether the composer did not think in terms of the organ, as Schumann thought in terms of the piano and then arrange his ideas for orchestra. The audience seemed favorably impressed. One would like to hear more of Mr Bingham's music. It is individual and imaginative in conception.

Roger-Ducasse undertook to crystalize the practices of modern French composers in his "Suite Francaise." The result certainly strikes an average between Massenet and Faure. If Beethoven, whose "First Symphony" began the program which M Roger-Ducasse's piece ended, had merely wanted to reduce Haydn, Mozart and others now forgotten to a neat and effective musical formula, called perhaps a "Viennese Suite," it seems doubtful if his fame would have lasted to our day.

Instead, he did revolutionary things, such as persistently accenting off beats, even in his "First Symphony," which caused the conservatives to make unkind remarks about "confused explosions of the outrageous effrontery of a young man."

He later did greater and more daring things which have made it a fashion to call this symhony badly diluted Haydn. It is still agreeable music to listen to, especially when played with the skill and taste shown yesterday by Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

GLOBE JAN. 22.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 27

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Wednesday Evening.

On Wednesday evening, December 1, the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give the second of its season's concerts, when the soloist will be Frances Alda, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from Boito's "Mefistofele," and the "Vissi d'Arte" aria, from Puccini's "Tosca."

Instead of the Brahms symphony, No. 4, originally announced, the orchestra will play as its principal number the Mendelssohn Octette for Strings, in E flat, Op. 20, other numbers being Gustav Strube's "Four Preludes for Orchestra," which will be given its first local hearing at this concert, and an orchestral suite arranged from the Stravinsky ballet, "Petrouchka," with a solo piano part which will be played by Raymond Havens.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

PROGRAM IS CHANGED.

Acting on the suggestion of several letters from patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts, which point out that Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor (which was announced to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evening, December 1) has been recently played in Baltimore, Mendelssohn's Octette in E flat, Opus 20, will be performed in its stead.

The remainder of the program remains as originally announced.

Brooklyn Life
New York City

NOV 27 K

MARY JORDAN
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, Friday evening, December third

[66]

Brooklyn Life
New York City K

The Next Boston Symphony Concert

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of singularly varied interest. There will be the familiar "Arabian Nights" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the Ballet Russe used for "Schéherazde"—despite the protests of the composer's widow—and also the Russian Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which the dancers turned to similar account with telling American scenic aid. The remaining orchestral number will be ekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou. The soloist will be Mary Jordan, a contralto, who will be a most agreeable surprise to those unfamiliar with her ability as a concert singer.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 28 K

The "Leonore" No. 3 Overture is the opening number on the program.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8:15 o'clock, Jean Bedetti, the illustrious solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for this instrument with the orchestra.

Mr. Bedetti came from Europe last season to fill his present post, and has more than justified his reputation in the Old World where this first-prize pupil of the Paris conservatory attracted attention not only in his own recitals but by his services as solo 'cellist with the famous orchestra of Paris. Mendelssohn's string octette, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The novelty of the evening will be symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka" which will be heard for the first time in this city. This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet by the revolutionary Russian composer, depicting fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd, uses the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The notable piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

In order that the evening Bos Symphony concert in Christmas we may not fail on Christmas night, it w be given next Thursday evening at o'clock instead of Saturday evenin The afternoon concert will be on Frida at 2:30, as usual.

At this, the ninth pair of concerts there will be two soloists—Guy Maie and Lee Pattison, who, in their concerts of music for two pianos, hav created a fresh interest in music in thi form. They will play Mozart's concert for two pianos in E-flat. Precedin this, Mr. Monteux will conduct the over ture to "Don Giovanni." "La Queste d Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from "Th Legend of St. Christopher," by D'Indy will have its first performances in Bo ton. One of his latest works, it is consid ered by many to be his masterpiece. new Italian number on this progran will be the first suite from Malipiero' "Impressioni dal Vero," played for th first time in America; "Il Capinero ("The Blackcap"), "Il Picchio" ("Th Woodpecker") and "Il Chiu" ("Th Owl"). The concerts will close wit the Dance Rhapsody by Delius, th English composer (first time at thes concerts).

---

will sing with the orchestra the Prison Scene of Marguerite from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." Her other aria will be the Prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." The concert will open with Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E flat, which, by popular request, has been substituted for the Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor, announced for this concert. This symphony was played here by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra a week ago, and it is to avoid repetition that the change has been made. Particular interest will center in the first performance in Baltimore of Four Preludes for Orchestra by Gustav Strube, ead of the department of harmony at he Peabody Conservatory of Music and irector of the Baltimore Symphony Orhestra. Another novelty, which will be e last number on the program, is a ymphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "Petrouchka," which will also have s first performance in Baltimore on this

---

m ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Petrouchka At Boston Symphony Concert

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8.15, Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for this instrument with the orchestra. Mendelsohn's string Octette, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The feature of the evening will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka," which will be head for the first time in this city. This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet by the revolutionary Russian composer, depicting fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd, is considered to create a precedent in the use of the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The piano part will be played by Mr. Ray-r the exaltation remain and bo rarest of qualities, whatever be glories, of composers in our r day. For the most part they eir gardens. D'Indy prefers his r.

H. T. PARK

MPHONY IN NINTH CONCER

ssrs. Maier and Pattison Pianists, Assist in Admirable Program

ALPIERO'S SUITE NEW TO AMERICA

By PHILIP HALE

he ninth concert of the Boston Sym ny orchestra, Mr. Monteaux, con tor, took place Thursday night. The cert was repeated yesterday after n. The program was as follows zart, Overture to "Don Giovanni" and certo for two pianos (K. 365); d'Indy he Search for God"; Malpiero, "Im essions from Nature," Suite No. he Blackcap; the Woodpecker; th l); Delius, A Dance Rhapsody. The nists were Guy Maier and Lee Patt n.

We write with reference to the conce yesterday.

After a spirited performance of th erture to the opera that, in spite o e years, is to be ranked with "Pellea d Melisande" as the supreme achieve ent of lyrically dramatic art, widely fferent as the operas are in form and expression, Messrs. Maier and Patti n gave an admirable performance o ozart's Concerto in E flat. The Her d has more than once extolled the en nble playing of these musicians. Yes day they not only displayed the qual es that have excited praise in cities o is country, Paris and London; the so showed their nice appreciation o e Concerto's character. There was n tempt to modernize the music, to giv incongruous, destructive importance ey accepted the music as it is, suave nder and also lightsome, and played a ozart wished; for he once wrote tha usic should always "sound," meanin at it should be euphonious; and he de anded of a pianist that running pas ges should flow like oil.

D'Indy's descriptive symphony fro s opera, "The Legend of Saint Chri pher," was played for the first time f oston; Malpiero's Suite for the firs ne in America; the Rhapsody of Deliu r the first time at these concerts.

As d'Indy is a devout Catholic, zealou the observance of religious rites and remonies, it was natural that th gend of Christopher should appea rongly to him. This symphonic musi played before the second act, after th arrator has told of the giant's searc or the king of heaven. The giant visit ings and emperors; he questions co nerors of the battlefield; he asks Hi oliness the Pope himself; they all te im in turn that they are not the kin heaven; then, weary and sorrowfu e goes back to his native land.

It has been said, it is said today i ew York, that the music of d'Indy i nly cerebral; that it is never emotional o some, yes to many, this reproac ay seem just. His music has often a ristocratic character that is forbidding is often austere, as if the compose tood proudly aloof. He does not wea is heart on his sleeve. Yet who ca ear his second symphony and this de criptive symphony, not to mention othe orks by him, without feeling that Vin ent d'Indy is profoundly, nobly emo ional. "The Search for God" is nece arily episodic, as there must be musica xpression of each guest of the giant ut here is no panoramic music, no mus or films; even without the story mind, the music would be impressiv whether it portrays the pomp of pote ates, the fury of battle, or the joyou ells and the exultation of the faithf n the feast day of the Resurrection. 'Indy here is not cold and repellin His heart beats as warmly for human s did the heart of his master Ce ranck.

Malpiero's Suite is a delightful li work, with interesting and poetic ide eftly expressed by the instrume His scheme of orchestration seems to his own; nor is he in his harm scheme an imitator. They are pieces, these impressions received he three birds, but there is more n them than in many huge sympho and pretentious symphonic poems. discreet, yet how telling is his em ment of instruments! Each has significance. Mr. Monteux, who ducted throughout skilfully and amore, is to be heartily thanked bringing out noteworthy modern positions.

The Rhapsody of Delius was formed here by the Chicago Sym Orchestra in 1916. It then seeme ferior in construction and inter his "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," whi in the repertory of the Boston phony Orchestra; far inferior beautiful "Summer Garden." I Rhapsody there is too little rh glow. The dancers, as the Engli cording to the old saying, tak pleasure sadly. There is a rese most a melancholy, that chara much of this composer's mus idiom is still strange to us.

The program of the concer week will be as follows: Tschai "Manfred" Symphony; Griffe Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" Saens, Piano Concerto G mino (Percy Grainger, pianist); Lal ture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD DEC. 29

Events and Comments

Mr Monteux has put but one especially interesting piece on this week's Symphony program, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," first performed last year, when it seemed the most significant and beautiful American composition heard in many years. The composer, who was present last November to share in the unusually enthusiastic applause, has since died at the age of 35. The other numbers, by Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens and Lalo, are repertory pieces of a sort more popular in the 1890's than now. They are not novelties, nor are any of them likely to become classics, which will be heard in the year 2000.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. "Manfred" Symphony, Tschaikowsky; second piano concerto, Saint-Saens; "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," Griffes; overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo. Soloist, Percy Grainger.

DEC. 26

GRAINGER SOLOIST

At the 10th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, Mr. Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, based on Byron's dramatic poem. Although this large-proportioned work is less known than the three last symphonies of Tschaikowsky, it is considered one of his most impressive scores. Mr. Monteux will repeat the tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge, which was heard at these concerts with so much enthusiasm last season. The performance of this highly praised work was shortly followed by the death of its composer, a young American of great talent. The closing number will be Lalo's brilliant Overture to the "King of Ys." The soloist of the occasion will be Percy Grainger, who has never before played with this orchestra. He will be heard in the Second Concerto of Saint-Saens in G minor.

DEC. 26

Boston Symphony

At the tenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, which is based on Byron's dramatic poem. Although this large-proportioned work is less known than other symphonies by the Russian master, it is nevertheless considered one of his finest and most impressive scores. The four movements depict "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes," "Invocation to Astarte," and "Manfred's Death." At the same concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge, which was heard at these concerts with so much enthusiasm last season. The performance of this highly praised work was shortly followed by the death of its composer, a young American of great talents. Since his death there has been a keen interest in his different works. The closing number will be Lalo's brilliant overture to the "King of Ys." The soloist of the occasion will be Percy Grainger, the eminent Australian pianist, who has never before played with this orchestra. He will be heard in the sparkling Second Concerto of Saint-Saens in G minor.

F DEC. 26.

e Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Goodn at Cambridge—Notable Playing of rieg's Piano-Concerto and Debussy's ea-Pieces"—Mme. Szumowska Reap- ars as Pianist with Many a Polish ece Upon Her Programme

S originally announced, the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening was to have concluded with the overture to Lalo's opera Roi d'Y's," but to the greater entertainment of most of those who were there, ussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," played in its stead. The rest of the ert proceeded according to the initial . It began with Mozart's overture to n Giovanni"; the symphony was Schun's in D minor; and Katherine Goodson ed the solo part in Griegs concerto for o and orchestra. After the recent ex- g interlude, it was good to hear once the round, full-bodied, satisfying tone ur own orchestra. And with all due ect to those whose brains are still with the recollection of a certain sennal afternoon and evening of the week passed, it may be said that it was also to hear orchestral pieces as they ably sounded in the mind of the com-, and not necessarily as they may en to sound in the mind of a highly , though nevertheless somewhat cr- conductor. Last evening the per- ance of overture, suite and symphony each in its way highly effective. While Muck frequently found a place on his amme for Debussy's "La Mer," he no secret of the fact that he did like it; and it was easy to discern r. Monteux's reading of it a greater athy with the composer's means and ions. There was a greater plasticity, e poetic quality; and seldom have the mental voices sounded so luminous heir progress so lucid. And never, has Debussy's orchestral palette nted such a variety of tints and half- or, at times, of glowing and garish As is usual when the music in tempts their better powers, the or- a displayed genuine virtuosity. Al- time has begun to winnow Debussy's much of it now seems to be no than a following of formulas, even they were formulas that Debussy f created. But "La Mer" must un- onably be classed with his more en- things, by reason of its melodic, nic, and orchestral beauty, its high ginative quality, and its structural

For a much longer period this process of sifting has been at work with the compositions, small and large, of Robert Schumann. It now seems that of the four symphonies, this one in D minor has the greatest vitality, the freshest appeal. For all their obvious unsuitability for symphonic treatment, its themes have a vigorous directness that is still appealing, nor is the thickness of the orchestral writing wholly inappropriate to the lusty spirit of the music. Though it is less true in music than in the other arts, there are times when the idea matters more than the form in which it is cast. Only thus can we account for the survival of Schumann's symphonic writing. On merely technical grounds it should have perished long ago.

It would not be easy to think of Grieg as the composer of symphonies; fortunately he never tried. The nearest he came to it, saving an early and discarded attempt, was to write this concerto for the piano. As with Schumann the themes are not too well suited to their purpose; they do not lend themselves readily to development, and they receive little enough of it, in the accepted sense of the word. Also as with Schumann, the music is short-breathed, patchy, and episodic, although there is far more skillful handling of the orchestra. But once again it is the quality of sheer inspiration, the ability to invest salient and individual ideas that saved the situation, and this concerto is fresher after its fifty-two and a half years than much that was put on paper the day before yesterday. Perhaps a little of the credit for the effect of the piece last evening should be laid to the performance, not only of Mme. Goodson, but of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, who were evidently caught up and carried along by the amazing eloquence and vividness of her playing. It was several years ago that Mme. Goodson played the concerto here for the first time, but from last evening it might have been a new and exciting experience for her. In these days of refinements and super-refinements it is refreshing to hear—and see—a pianist "cut loose." Especially when, as was the case, it is done without any sacrifice of the finer and more exacting qualities of performance.

TRANS. JAN-14

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

DEBUSSY'S SEA-MUSIC SAVES AN AFTERNOON

Otherwise Mr. Monteux Sets a Dull Programme — Tedious Resurrections from Schubert and Haydn, and Threadbare Bruch—Miss Menges for None Too Interesting Violinist—Mr. Dadmun Proves Singer of Notable Quality

FOR the first time within recollection Mr. Monteux, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, narrowly escaped a dull programme. He had searched out neglected pieces by classic composers—an Overture "in the Italian style" by Schubert, a "military" Symphony by Haydn—and they hardly warranted rediscovery. He had sanctioned Miss Menges's choice of Bruch's first Concerto for Violin as solo-number of the day, and time, change, repetition have worn it threadbare. An audience, quick by habit to applaud the songful Schubert, the melodious, playful, easy-going Haydn, heard the Overture impassively, the Symphony coldly; while through the Concerto, it had quite as many eyes for Miss Menges, who is not usual of aspect, as ears for the music. Salvation came with Debussy's Sea-Pieces, seizing and stirring imagination in themselves and played with high eloquence.

Clearly Mr. Monteux's best and truest field is the modern and the ultra-modern composers. Among their pieces he chooses interestingly, variously, rewardingly. He plays them with penetration, sympathy, revelation, impressing his hearers. He is not, however, a conductor to gild the commonplace, like Schubert's Overture of yesterday or, the other day, Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House." With reason, he avoids the routine of the "classic repertory," since in French clearness of mind, he perceives that it is staling many a masterpiece. Usually his discoveries on the borders of it have praised him; but not Haydn's "Military Symphony." In a sense, however, it was cynical satisfaction to find Mr. Monteux thus fallible. Week after week, through all one season and half another, he has set programmes for the Symphony Concerts. Hardly one of them has failed to interest from beginning to end—a unique record in the forty years of the orchestra. In the descent of yesterday, came the humanizing touch. If a conductor never slips, by the same token—usually—he never rises.

In Schubert's Overture, the virtuosi of the wood-wind choir sang pretty Italianate measures in glamoring tones of smooth, rich sensuous texture. Of themselves and of Mr. Monteux, they gave these measures long-breathed, curving, Italianate phrasing. Now the strings set in background; again they darkened or brightened the song; yet again they interrupted it with rushing figures. Toward the end came the inevitable crescendo "of the Italian style" in the days of Rossini and through the first half of the nineteenth century. Even then, the scornful called it a "gallopade." The discreet Schubert escapes this reproach—in tameness. So did he do his duty to a fashion in music at Vienna in the year of grace 1817; while a hundred years later at Boston, an audience as dutifully heard him—and, probably, with as little inner glow of satisfaction.

Better, however, Schubert Italian than Haydn military—if to be military consists in an Allegretto in a subdued march-rhythm with light claps of the cymbals and light taps upon the bass drum to accent it. Add thereto a Finale similarly pointed and broken by a modest trumpet-call and the martial Haydn is complete. Unfortunately, putting on this panoply, he puts off more familiar, more desirable graces. There is no heartiness, no sprightliness in the first movement, not much invention, few sprightly strokes, only music-making to fill the profitable commission of the estimable Johann Peter Salomon. The veiled march of the second movement needs more than the "military" trimmings to escape as routine composition. A connoisseur of Haydn might hardly pick the Minuet from a hundred others written all in the day's work in the Vienna or the London of his time. The lusty, fanciful, sportive Haydn of many a Finale distinctly drags his usually skipping feet, takes refuge in a trumpet-call. Good old Haydn, the simple, the charming yesterday, today, and forever; but when charm flies out of the window, as in this Military Symphony, the simplicity draggles near to commonplace. Those who obstinately set all "the masters" above every human frailty will say that Mr. Monteux failed to catch the flavor, the accent of the music. But was there any such—except of a commission fulfilled by the faithful Haydn working rain or shine?

Poor old Bruch snapping and snarling at "the enemy" through the war, while with more reason he might have reviled the fate overtaking his violin-pieces! Naught else of his music survives outside Germany and hardly there. No longer do "Odysseus," "Arminius" and his other blends of sentiment and sonority, workmanship and effect, stir even the musical backwaters of this world; while before his Concerto or his Scottish Fantasia the expectant hearer merely asks nowadays what the violinist is likely to make of it. In spite of symphonic pretence and of many ingenuities, down they have come to the level of Ernst's and Vieuxtemps's and Wieniawski's concertos and fantasias, as merely "grateful music for the violinist." As he or she plays them so are they—suave Adagios, florid or finical "passage-work," glinting Finales. And Miss Menges played the Concerto well enough. Her technical means sufficed, even if her ear and fingers were not always quite unerring. Her tone flowed warmly, pliantly. It is full-bodied, bright of texture, if not always exactly edgeless. In a richer music, it might be sensuous and sumptuous. Without apparent effort Miss Menges did Bruch's feats of skill and agility; added tremors of tone to his sentimental song, which is hardly necessary; projected his bolder phrases, his more energetic rhythms. The regular thing in the regular way—but always with the lurking suspicion that, given a stranger, more imaginative and higher-pitched music, there would emerge a violinist with individuality, with even a propensity for the fantastical. To the eye the English Miss Menges may look Greenwich Village and its equivalent in London which is Chelsea. Yet in her aspect is hint of something more and rarer. Possibly Bruch is only her sop to the musical bourgeoisie.

Finally, to efface all that had gone before, the Sea-Pieces of Debussy. Nowhere has he stretched so ample a canvas, filled it with so large a tonal design. Those who would have him a maker of miniatures forget that, for once at least, in this sea-music, he is also a master of architecture. There are symphonic scope and sweep, expansion and cumulation in "La Mer." Steadily the first "sketch," as he chooses to call it, broadens and deepens. The pale sea, the calm sea of the misty dawn gains color, motion, force. In the music is impetus, driving, irresistible. Again in the third "sketch," wind and sea soon cease murmuring; swiftly they become voices of power. The waves surge upward; the gusts descend to meet them; reverberant are their voices. Between, for contrast in a far-flung music, the curling and the rippling of the waters when they play with each other and the sun and the breeze.

Like a fresco—and no miniature—in tones is this music. The rhythms beat strongly; full-voiced is many a modulation; the harmonic background is stretched tense; the chords ring large; often the instrumental coloring is bold and sharp; always there is motion. In his own grand manner may Debussy write, if he choose, and in it he has designed and fashioned the sea-pieces. Large as it is, it is still his own, because everywhere, out of rhythm, harmony, timbre, modulation, he is still weaving a characteristic imagery and atmosphere. Here in tones is the sea as light traverses it, plays upon it, transforms it—the sea sombre, the sea radiant, the sea in countless aspects between. Here also and by like means and in like medium are manifold moods of the ocean—inert at the beginning, then stirring into changeful life and aspect; at play in the intermezzo; uprearing its might in the Finale. Here, besides, in tones are the voices of the sea when the wind caresses or whips it into speech—from whisper to thunders. Of course, there are minute strokes; Debussy would not be himself did he not make them. Yet on the instant they fall as details into the might and magnitude of the whole. Mr. Monteux missed nothing in the music. He sustained its formal substance; he reelased its imagery. For the first time not a few of his hearers knew a Debussy grandiose.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. JAN. 15.

FRANCK'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Les Djinns" Played for the First Time in Boston

Beethoven, Bingham and Roger-Ducasse Also in Program

Franck's "Les Djinns," a symphonic poem for orchestra and piano, suggested by the poem of Victor Hugo, was performed for the first time at the Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon. E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, heard here as soloist last season, played the piano part. The piece was an experiment to test the possibilities of the piano as an orchestral instrument. Franck did not intend it as a concerto.

Mr Schmitz respected the composer's intention in subordinating his part in the performance. His staccato is too brittle, lacking in vigor. The music is groping toward an orientalism it does not succeed in suggesting. It is not in the class with Franck's Symphony, or his violin sonata.

Seth Bingham's Passacaglia is somewhat in the spirit of Franck's organ pieces. Mr Bingham, like his teacher, D'Indy, has not learned to write as few notes and as few parts as possible. His counterpoint and his orchestration are often thick and muddled. The musical ideas in his Passacaglia are of considerable interest.

One wondered whether the composer did not think in terms of the organ, as Schumann thought in terms of the piano and then arrange his ideas for orchestra. The audience seemed favorably impressed. One would like to hear more of Mr Bingham's music. It is individual and imaginative in conception.

Roger-Ducasse undertook to crystalize the practices of modern French composers in his "Suite Francaise." The result certainly strikes an average between Massenet and Faure. If Beethoven, whose "First Symphony" began the program which M Roger-Ducasse's piece ended, had merely wanted to reduce Haydn, Mozart and others now forgotten to a neat and effective musical formula, called perhaps a "Viennese Suite," it seems doubtful if his fame would have lasted to our day.

Instead, he did revolutionary things, such as persistently accenting off beats, even in his "First Symphony," which caused the conservatives to make unkind remarks about "confused explosions of the outrageous effrontery of a young man."

He later did greater and more daring things which have made it a fashion to call this symhony badly diluted Haydn. It is still agreeable music to listen to, especially when played with the skill and taste shown yesterday by Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

GLOBE JAN. 22.

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 27

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Wednesday Evening.

On Wednesday evening, December 1, the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give the second of its season's concerts, when the soloist will be Frances Alda, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from Boito's "Mefistofele," and the "Vissi d'Arte" aria, from Puccini's "Tosca."

Instead of the Brahms symphony, No. 4, originally announced, the orchestra will play as its principal number the Mendelssohn Octette for Strings, in E flat, Op. 20, other numbers being Gustav Strube's "Four Preludes for Orchestra," which will be given its first local hearing at this concert, and an orchestral suite arranged from the Stravinsky ballet, "Petrouchka," with a solo piano part which will be played by Raymond Havens.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

PROGRAM IS CHANGED.

Acting on the suggestion of several letters from patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts, which point out that Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor (which was announced to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric Theater, Wednesday evening, December 1) has been recently played in Baltimore, Mendelssohn's String Octette in E flat, Opus 20, will be performed in its stead.

The remainder of the program remains as originally announced.

Brooklyn Life
New York City

NOV 27 K

MARY JORDAN
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Academy of Music, Friday evening, December third

---

Brooklyn Life
New York City
K

The Next Boston Symphony Concert

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Pierre Monteux has arranged a program of singularly varied interest. There will be the familiar "Arabian Nights" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the Ballet Russe used for "Schéhérazde"—despite the protests of the composer's widow—and also the "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which the Russian dancers turned to similar account with telling American scenic aid. The remaining orchestral number will be Lekeu's symphonic fantasia on two folk songs of Anjou. The soloist will be Mary Jordan, a contralto, who will be a most agreeable surprise to those unfamiliar with her ability as a concert singer.

Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 28 K

The "Leonore" No. 3 Overture is the opening number on the program.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8:15 o'clock, Jean Bedetti, the illustrious solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for this instrument with the orchestra.

Mr. Bedetti came from Europe last season to fill his present post, and has more than justified his reputation in the Old World where this first-prize pupil of the Paris conservatory attracted attention not only in his own recitals but by his services as solo 'cellist with the famous orchestra of Paris. Mendelssohn's string octette, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The novelty of the evening will be symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka" which will be heard for the first time in this city. This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet by the revolutionary Russian composer, depicting fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd, uses the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The notable piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

Sun NOV 28 M
Baltimore, Md.

Lyric—The Baltimore Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert this afternoon with Guy Maier and Lee Pattison as assisting artists. They will play the Two-Piano Concerto in E flat, by Mozart. The program will be opened by Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's drama, "Egmont." Following the concerto will come the first performance in many years of Tschaikowsky's Overture Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet." An interesting feature will be a joint number, consisting of two arrangements for orchestra by local composers. Gustav Strube's orchestral setting of Cui's "Orientale" will be played again and Gustav Klemm's arrangement of Cyril Scott's "Dance Negre" will receive its premiere performance.

The soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given on Wednesday evening will be Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, as opera singer and concert singer, has been highly admired here. She will sing with the orchestra the Prison Scene of Marguerite from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." Her other aria will be the Prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." The concert will open with Mendelssohn's Octette for Strings in E flat, which, by popular request, has been substituted for the Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor, announced for this concert. This symphony was played here by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra a week ago, and it is to avoid repetition that the change has been made. Particular interest will center in the first performance in Baltimore of Four Preludes for Orchestra by Gustav Strube, ead of the department of harmony at he Peabody Conservatory of Music and irector of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. Another novelty, which will be he last number on the program, is a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "Petrouchka," which will also have s first performance in Baltimore on this

---

m ENQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Petrouchka At Boston Symphony Concert

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music at 8.15, Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for this instrument with the orchestra. Mendelsohn's string Octette, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The feature of the evening will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's Ballet "Petrouchka," which will be head for the first time in this city. This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet by the revolutionary Russian composer, depicting fantastic events at a fair in Petrograd, is considered to create a precedent in the use of the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The piano part will be played by Mr. Ray-

Record NOV 28 K [67]
Philadelphia, Pa.

—At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music, Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for the 'cello with the orchestra. Bedetti came from Europe last season to fill his present position and has more than justified his reputation in the old world where he was first prize pupil of the Paris Conservatory. Mendelssohn's string octet, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The novelty of the evening will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka." This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet, is considered to create a precedent in the use of the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

NOV 28
rom
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Flowers For

ONE of the newest and best methods of having beautiful flowers in the schoolroom or home during the winter months is to grow the spring-flowering bulbs in the cocoanut fibre, which is now sold by practically all seedsmen and many florists. It is simply a mixture of ground cocoanut fibre with charcoal and shells, and possibly a little commercial fertilizer added. It is not expensive and may be used over again if one desires.

With half a peck of this fibre and a few bulbs you can easily have beautiful, fragrant blossoms from Thanksgiving until Easter, and you can grow them about as well in water-tight flower jars as the florist can grow them in the most conditions of his greenhouse

---

THE amateur listener at symphony concerts cannot resist the curiosity to know "what makes the wheels go round." He sees the hall, the orchestra, the conductor, the soloist; he is aware of his fellow-listeners; he hears the music. Somehow he understands that all together make the whole thing that is a symphony concert. But how, he wonders, do they combine? Does the audience have any effect on the orchestra and the conductor? Does weather affect the concert? Why should the first violins sit on the conductor's left? Does the conductor labor more vigorously in fortissimo passages or is his burden as heavy when the still small voice of the orchestra sings?

The listener knows that there are books to aid him, but life is so short and art is so long that he fears the length of dissertation. Yet curiosity will not down; how does a concert happen? Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is glad to take time from his busy life to explain in terms of the amateur brain.

The amateur has noticed that different conductors set different paces for the same piece of music. He has read the words of critics that a movement was taken too fast or too slow. He has even been astonished, sometimes, that the tempo is different from what he had expected; in such cases he has always found that what he received was better than what he expected. Now, who, he wonders, knows what the right time is? "Can a conductor know," he asks Mr. Monteux, "that he has set the right tempo for a piece of music?"

"That," comes the quick answer, "is all a matter of feeling. I study a score. I hum, I think about it, and finally I find just how I fell that it should be played. Of course, there is the metronome—I can consult it. But sometimes it is very wrong—to my mind! I never take the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven so rapidly as the metronome marks call for. I feel that such speed would make a wrong effect.

"That is why conductors differ—they do not feel alike. Members of the orchestra do not feel alike. Each has his own idea of what the time should be."

Then here, cries the amateur to himself, is the answer to the aged question, "Why is a conductor?" The lady just behind him whispered at the last concert, "I wish they didn't have a conductor! Don't you think a man looks silly waving his arms?" She had never listened, probably, to 16 first violins each going at its own sweet will through the sweeps and melodies of a symphony. The ancient question of the one or the many is quickly answered for the orchestra: it must be the one, and he is the conductor.

The same is true of the volume of sound. "That, too, is a matter of feeling," Mr. Monteux asserts. "How soft, how loud? I decide by how I feel to different degrees, whether one or another gives just the feeling that the music ought to have. I never can tell, of course, whether we shall have in the concert exactly the shade of tone that we had in rehearsal. We have rehearsed thoroughly until we know what is to be done, but the conductor must be alert at every moment to see that the orchestra does not forget. If we make too much volume, I make signs to reduce, and if tones are too thin, I must ask for more."

The amateur has been wondering about the demands of old and modern music. Which requires more rehearsing and why? Is there not a temptation to change older music to suit a changed orchestra, to remake Beethoven in the way that he would probably have chosen

"Old and new must have about the same amount of rehearsing," Mr. Monteux explains. "The older music often is more difficult for the individual instrument to play, but the modern music needs more rehearsing to show the balance and the meaning of each part. I must often, in rehearsing modern music, ask one section of the orchestra to remain silent and listen to what another section plays, so that we shall all understand the meaning of the whole composition. Older music is very clear in its intention, and is so beautiful that we must take the greatest pains to make it sing exactly as it should be sung. But we must never change older music to suit modern possibilities. There it is, as the composer meant to have it when he wrote. We are a museum to keep it in just as he left it."

Does the orchestra play as well in rehearsal as in concert? Is it better to conduct with or without score?

"No, we never do so well in rehearsal. Something must always be left for the concert to make it perfect. It is impossible to tell just why this is so, but it is. We try to do everything at the rehearsal, we go over everything and leave no point without its refinement. But it is never quite right. Then we go to the concert—and we do much more than we had done before. I am often astonished at the difference. I hear members of the orchestra remark on the change and declare that they did not know we could do so well.

"I used to conduct without score. It is no more difficult than when one uses the score. But I noticed that people paid too much attention to me and too little to the music. I discussed the question with M. Rabaud, and decided that I would always use the score, so that people should pay all attention to the main thing—the music. So I have placed the harps at the rear of the orchestra, because people used to watch the harpist's foot too closely and forget that they had come to listen to music. Whatever interferes with that must step aside."

Then why does a conductor arrange his orchestra as he does, why proportion it as he does? Are there any instruments on which he cannot depend? Does he lack instruments to express his desires?

"There are both tradition and reason in the arrangement," is Mr. Monteux's reply. "With the violins there is reason. The first violins carry the melody—the important part—most often. The melody must be dominant. So we have the players sit on the conductor's left hand, where their instruments will have the opening of the body toward the audience. That throws the sound out in fuller volume. With other instruments the position is chiefly a matter of tradition and varies with different orchestras. Some have the basses at one side; we have them at the rear.

"The number of stringed instruments is far greater than that of wind or percussion, as anyone can see. The strings make the body of the orchestra. But some composers wish not to write one voice to be sung by 16 first violins. Stavinsky, when I saw him last, declared that he is now going to write an individual part for each violin; if he has 16, each will play its own melody. Why, he asks, should 16 do the same thing? Each flute plays its own part, each oboe, each clarinet. So with the strings. If he wants fewer than 16 parts, he will have fewer violins. Each instrument will have its solo, then. No, it will be no more difficult to conduct such an orchestra. The score will be larger and harder to read, perhaps, but that is all.

"Instruments are now so well made that they can be depended upon to do what is required. There are also plenty of instruments to express whatever the music calls for. It is the composer, not the conductor, who sometimes needs new instruments. I remember once at the opera in Paris a composer needed an instrument to express the feelings of a weak, ill woman. The violin was too sharp, too loud. Finally some one hollowed out a walking stick, stretched a single string over it, and the result was a thin tune that was exactly what was required.

"I fear that modern music will continue to demand new instruments more and more. I see no limit to what we may expect. More and more music becomes complex—and to meet this complexity more instruments are necessary. That means a larger orchestra, unless composers definitely restrict themselves to writing music for a small body of players."

Is conducting more or less difficult when the full orchestra plays? Does weather affect the playing? How can the conductor indicate his desires to the men?

"When the full orchestra plays," says Mr. Monteux, "it is the easy time for the conductor. He must then beat time, and that is all. The full orchestra runs itself almost. It is the pianissimo passages, where great delicacy is required and where the shading is at once evident and of great importance, that the conductor is most called upon for his ability.

"Does weather affect the music? I wish it did not! Violins in rainy times grow wet, strings are like wrapping twine! A soloist like Mr. Kreisler wishes above everything for a pleasant day for his concert.

"I cannot tell exactly how I indicate my wishes to the members of the orchestra. It is like driving an automobile; you cannot tell just what you will do in a crowd when you need to go to the right, swerve to the left, stop short. You do what is necessary when the time comes. I have no certain number of signs. I just do by instinct what seems best at the moment, and we understand each other."

And the present orchestra—what of it? All the listeners have gloried in the rising above the troubles of last year. All see new faces, many of them young. Are young or old players more desired by a conductor? "I assure you," says Mr. Monteux, "that both young and old are satisfactory, essential. The young men now sit in the last seats of their section—they want to sit in the front seats. So they work! Older players have more experience to make them sure, even if they have not so much 'pep.' Experience and enthusiasm—the combination makes a perfect orchestra.

"Is the orchestra as good as it used to be? That is for some one else to say. All that I would say is, I think we have a very fine orchestra."—Boston Sunday Herald.

ENQUIRER
ess: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 30 M

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in a Peculiar Programme at the Academy Last Night

The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon its second local appearance for the season at the Academy of Music last evening was characterized if not commended by some peculiarities and innovations which, while not without interest or merit, can hardly be unreservedly approved. Why Conductor Pierre Monteux should have chosen to substitute Mendelssohn's string octette for a symphony is with difficulty imaginable. Presumably, he wanted to display the fine quality of his strings, and it will have to be recorded that the polished and melodious music was played with considerable beauty of tone and a praiseworthy precision of movement; but if such were his purpose, it might have been more advantageously and acceptably attained in another way.

There is always a loss when chamber music written for performances in a room or small hall by a limited number of performers is done in a spacious auditorium like that of the Academy, and if Mr. Monteux wanted to exploit the string section of his organization he might better have fulfilled this purpose by the selection of some symphony, such as the one by Schumann in D minor, where the strings and especially the violins are very conspicuously employed. People who go to a symphony concert desire and expect to hear a symphony, and last evening's audience was disappointed in being deprived of that pleasure. It had the Mendelssohn octette, which is all very well in its way, but which was not in order, and it had a nearer approach to a symphony in the shape of a suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "Petrouchka," with which many or most of those present must have been more or less familiar.

Although it loses much of its significance and interest by its detachment from the dance and pantomime which it is designed to accompany, Stravinsky's score is so strikingly original that it arrests the attention even of the unsympathetic listener, and the version of it produced last evening, in which important use is made of the piano—cleverly played by Mr. Raymond Havens—as an obligato instrument, was decidedly impressive. The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished 'cellist, Mr. Jean Bedetti, whose voluminous and luscious tone and well-developed technique were effectively exhibited in a masterly interpretation of Lalo's well-known and justly-admired concerto. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, January

---

TABLISHED 1881 NOV 30
rom
ublic Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCE

Bedetti, the Soloist, Gives Superb Performance of Lalo Concerto

THE PROGRAM

Octet for strings..............Mendelssohn
Concerto for cello..............Lalo
Jean Bedetti.
Suite, "Petrouchka"............Stravinsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a really notable concert at the Academy of Music last evening. For the first time since the recent trouble, the orchestra and the leader seemed to be working in complete harmony, with the result that the ensemble was tremendously improved and the whole program was given with an enthusiasm and an accuracy which will compare very favorably with the work of any orchestra in this city this season.

The first number was the Mendelssohn Octet, arranged for string orchestra, the contra bass part being cleverly devised from the second cello part. In it the strings showed an excellent color and and tone quality and a fine sense of rhythym. Mr. Monteux took the last movement at a very fast pace with the result of a little cloudiness here and there. The composition lends itself admirably to the transcription, if it can be called such, for string orchestra.

Mr. Bedetti gave what was to a Philadelphia audience a practically new interpretation of the Lalo concerto and one exceedingly beautiful. He has a tone of great refinement and beauty and a restrained but forceful style of playing. In spite of the heavy scoring of the work, his tone was always clear, although the masterly accompaniment provided by Mr. Monteux had its part in this effect—one, by the way, not often heard in the Lalo. Mr. Bedetti's technique is ample, but it is apparent that he makes it a means to an end and does not play for the purpose of exhibiting what he can do in the way of digital dexterity. It was one of the most satisfactory cello concertos heard in this city for a long time.

The program closed with the unique orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." This is an ultramodern work, with some features which have in them a touch of the classics—such as for instance the fact that the melodies are always diatonic, despite the bizarre harmonization which accompanies them. Stravinsky is always interesting, whether one agrees with the manner in which he depicts his ideas, a characteristic which cannot be granted to all modern composers. His orchestral technique is remarkable and he is always able to put his idea through. In the first and last movements the idea of the fete was wonderfully carried out—only the second movement seemed at times to lack conviction. His harmonization is somewhat strong for ears attuned to that of the classics, but, nevertheless, the evident sincerity of the work does much to make it the success which the audience of last evening acclaimed it.

---

rom NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 30 M

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE PROGRAM

Jean Bedetti, Cellist, Gives Exhibition of Virtuosity in Concerto

WARMLY GREETED

The soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy last night was the orchestra itself. Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, played the Lalo concerto, the string choirs played the Mendelssohn Octette in E flat, and the entire organization gave an exhibition of virtuosity in the "Petrouchka" ballet music that brought back vivid recollection of this band's former estate.

When Mr. Bedetti was first heard in some solo passages in a Beethoven ballet suite which was played early last season the impression was given that a very distinguished player had joined the Boston forces. This impression was emphatically confirmed by his playing last night. The tone of Mr. Bedetti's instrument is full and rich, exquisite in the upper scales and sonorous in the lower reaches without a trace of the "grittiness" that is unfortunately too common. He plays with a fine appreciation of the dramatic but the lyric passages of the second movement of the Lalo work were handled with beautiful delicacy. The concerto itself is a grateful composition for the soloist, and the audience as well. The applause which greeted Mr. Bedetti's playing was warm and spontaneous.

In the Mendelssohn Octette the strings sounded with a fullness and intensity that was not only unusual for this band in recent years but that has not been equaled by any other organization so far heard this season in Philadelphia. The choirs have been enlarged since last season and the result is gratifying. It is a question whether a strictly chamber composition should be played with full choirs. The contrasts of the work become greater, but much of the delicacy and intimacy of the work are lost. Only in the Scherzo did Mr. Monteux retain the original spirit of the work. The other three movements were not shaded and given the dynamic coloring that the score offered. The work itself is chiefly remarkable as an example of a 16-year-old precocity.

Mr. Monteux was entirely at home in conducting the "Petrouchka" music. It is hard to imagine any one being more completely in accord with this spirit of this racily human work. The composition baffles brief analysis. Its humor, its folk coloring, its rhythmic variety, its orchestration offer matter for pages of discussion. The work could stand innumerable nearings without palling. May fate send us more Stravinsky like this. Besides a formidable battery of percussion instruments and an augmented brass choir the score calls for some most effective and difficult piano passages. These were played by Raymond Havens, who revealed gifts that entitle him to more serious consideration than as an orchestral augmentation.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 30

"Acting on the suggestion of several letters from patrons," in which it was pointed out that early duplication would result if the Boston Symphony Orchestra played, on Wednesday night of this week, Brahms' fourth symphony (in E minor), the orchestra's press representative announces it has substituted Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat, Opus 20, for stringed instruments. This will be appreciated by many of those who attend all orchestra concerts. The Brahms symphony was played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra on November 17.

Remainder of the promising program will be as announced previously, with Mme. Frances Alda (soprano) as special soloist. Orchestrally, it will be notable through inclusion of the orchestral suite from Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky's recent ballet "Petrouchka" and of the "Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, of Baltimore. The suite employs the piano as an orchestral instrument, and it will be so played upon this occasion by Raymond Havens.

HERALD
Washington, D.C.
DEC 1

Symphony Concert Showers Glories Upon Orchestra

With Pierre Monteux conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestr ave the second concert of its local season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon under th management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene. The soloist was France Alda, soprano.

Lekeu's captivating Symphon Fantasia on "Two Folk-Songs Anjou" served to show that th orchestra has regained to a larg measure its past glories, as we as the superlative excellence of th days before this country entere the war and caused some upset in the orchestra. While a joyousness predominatees in this work there is revived at intervals tha characteristic quality of this composer—a sadness so weighted wit suffering and lamentation that on imagines he almost feels the approach of death, for this importan composer died at the age of 24.

The symphony was Mozart's i C major (Kochel No. 425). Thi proved to be an interesting number that should have satisfied those desiring an unfamiliar work. An air of mystery surrounds this orchestral number and no little doubt is attached to its authorship.

Tremendous applause rewarded Mme. Alda at the completion of Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." But a greater demonstration marked the close of The Prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." The singer possesses a voice of marvelous range and flexibility, and her singing was pronounced the most satisfying heard this season.

Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, closed the program. On this composition Beethoven lavished the wealth of his genius, and by it established the legitimate relations of the overture to the work it preluded. It is a masterpiece of dramatic unity, strength and passion, as well as of unique and imposing musical construction. The concert in its entirety was of exceptional interest.

---

m EVENING STAR
dress Washington, D. C. e
DEC 1

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its second concert of the season at the New National Theater, yesterday afternoon, gave a finished program, in which Mme. Frances Alda, soloist, played a pleasing and conspicuous part. The orchestra program was particularly well chosen, and was well handled by Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Mozart's symphony in C major, one of the master works of that great composer, was the opening number. The four movements were given with the musicianship they demand, but over and above this the orchestra played with a subtle something, a unity of touch and tone, which placed the performance outside the usual. The simple third movement, menuetto, was charming, especially the delicate trio. In the allegro spiritoso, poco adagio and presto movements the orchestra was perhaps at its best.

The novelty of the program was the performance of Leku's symphonic fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, a spirited and striking number. The fantasia is a splendid composition, striking alike for its string passages and later the employment of the brass and woodwind sections of the orchestra.

In Beethoven's overture to "Lenore," No. 3, which closed the orchestral program, the orchestra worked up to a splendid climax, following the effective trumpet playing off-stage.

Mme. Alda scored a triumph in the prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from Puccini's "Tosca," and in Marguerite's prison song, "l'Altra Notte," from Boito's "Mefistofele." Her clear, easy voice was heard perhaps to best advantage in the favorite Puccini number, but her singing of both was beautiful. Despite extended applause she did not sing again.

From DEC 1
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Regrets Change Of Symphony Program.

To THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—Many of us regret that some one has persuaded the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play the Mendelssohn Octette instead of the interesting and beautiful symphony of Brahms. Not everyone in Baltimore was able to be at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert, and I am sure that it is a symphony which one can appreciate on hearing it a second time. It is a great disappointment that it is not to be given tomorrow evening.

R. W.

Baltimore, Nov. 30.

Evening Sun
altimore, Md.
DEC 2 M

LYRIC

The Boston Symphony.

After hearing the Boston Orchestra lay the Mendelssohn "Octette" at the Lyric last evening it became perfectly evident why Pierre Monteux selected this old-fashioned number to replace the Brahms Symphony. For certainly nothing that he could have chosen would have in any like degree exploited the very extraordinary virtuosity of the band's string choirs, their vibrant, biting tone, their suggestion of rich fluency. The men played magnificently last evening, and while the work itself is what in these last days we are apt to regard as merely "a fine piece of musicianship," a thing not especially inspired, but very skillfully written, it was an interesting to hear. The fact

Record NOV 28
Philadelphia, Pa.

[67]

* * *

—At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music, Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for the 'cello with the orchestra. Bedetti came from Europe last season to fill his present position and has more than justified his reputation in the old world where he was first prize pupil of the Paris Conservatory. Mendelssohn's string octet, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The novelty of the evening will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka." This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet, is considered to create a precedent in the use of the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

NOV 25

---

rom
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Flowers For

ONE of the newest and best methods of having beautiful flowers in the schoolroom or home during the winter months is to grow the spring-flowering bulbs in the cocoanut fibre, which is now sold by practically all seedsmen and many florists. It is simply a mixture of ground cocoanut fibre with charcoal and shells, and possibly a little commercial fertilizer added. It is not expensive and may be used over again if one desires.

With half a peck of this fibre and a few bulbs you can easily have beautiful, fragrant blossoms from Thanksgiving until Easter, and you can grow them about as well in water-tight flower jars as the florist can grow them in the most

---

THE amateur listener at symphony concerts cannot resist the curiosity to know "what makes the wheels go round." He sees the hall, the orchestra, the conductor, the soloist; he is aware of his fellow-listeners; he hears the music. Somehow he understands that all together make the whole thing that is a symphony concert. But how, he wonders, do they combine? Does the audience have any effect on the orchestra and the conductor? Does weather affect the concert? Why should the first violins sit on the conductor's left? Does the conductor labor more vigorously in fortissimo passages or is his burden as heavy when the still small voice of the orchestra sings?

The listener knows that there are books to aid him, but life is so short and art is so long that he fears the length of dissertation. Yet curiosity will not down; how does a concert happen? Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is glad to take time from his busy life to explain in terms of the amateur brain.

The amateur has noticed that different conductors set different paces for the same piece of music. He has read the words of critics that a movement was taken too fast or too slow. He has even been astonished, sometimes, that the tempo is different from what he had expected; in such cases he has always found that what he received was better than what he expected. Now, who, he wonders, knows what the right time is? "Can a conductor know," he asks Mr. Monteux, "that he has set the right tempo for a piece of music?"

"That," comes the quick answer, "is all a matter of feeling. I study a score, I hum, I think about it, and finally I find just how I fell that it should be played. Of course, there is the metronome—I can consult it. But sometimes it is very wrong—to my mind! I never take the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven so rapidly as the metronome marks call for. I feel that such speed would make a wrong effect.

"That is why conductors differ—they do not feel alike. Members of the orchestra do not feel alike. Each has his own idea of what the time should be."

Then here, cries the amateur to himself, is the answer to the aged question, "Why is a conductor?" The lady just behind him whispered at the last concert, "I wish they didn't have a conductor! Don't you think a man looks silly waving his arms?" She had never listened, probably, to 16 first violins each going at its own sweet will through the sweeps and melodies of a symphony. The ancient question of the one or the many is quickly answered for the orchestra: it must be the one, and he is the conductor.

The same is true of the volume of sound. "That, too, is a matter of feeling," Mr. Monteux asserts. "How soft, how loud? I decide by how I feel to different degrees, whether one or another gives just the feeling that the music ought to have. I never can tell, of course, whether we shall have in the concert exactly the shade of tone that we had in rehearsal. We have rehearsed thoroughly until we know what is to be done, but the conductor must be alert at every moment to see that the orchestra does not forget. If we make too much volume, I make signs to reduce, and if tones are too thin, I must ask for more."

The amateur has been wondering about the demands of old and modern music. Which requires more rehearsing and why? Is there not a temptation to change older music to suit a changed orchestra, to remake Beethoven in the way that he would probably have chosen

"Old and new must have about the same amount of rehearsing," Mr. Monteux explains. "The older music often is more difficult for the individual instrument to play, but the modern music needs more rehearsing to show the balance and the meaning of each part. I must often, in rehearsing modern music, ask one section of the orchestra to remain silent and listen to what another section plays, so that we shall all understand the meaning of the whole composition. Older music is very clear in its intention, and is so beautiful that we must take the greatest pains to make it sing exactly as it should be sung. But we must never change older music to suit modern possibilities. There it is, as the composer meant to have it when he wrote. We are a museum to keep it in just as he left it."

Does the orchestra play as well in rehearsal as in concert? Is it better to conduct with or without score?

"No, we never do so well in rehearsal. Something must always be left for the concert to make it perfect. It is impossible to tell just why this is so, but it is. We try to do everything at the rehearsal, we go over everything and leave no point without its refinement. But it is never quite right. Then we go to the concert—and we do much more than we had done before. I am often astonished at the difference. I hear members of the orchestra remark on the change and declare that they did not know we could do so well.

"I used to conduct without score. It is no more difficult than when one uses the score. But I noticed that people paid too much attention to me and too little to the music. I discussed the question with M. Rabaud, and decided that I would always use the score, so that people should pay all attention to the main thing—the music. So I have placed the harps at the rear of the orchestra, because people used to watch the harpist's foot too closely and forget that they had come to listen to music. Whatever interferes with that must step aside."

Then why does a conductor arrange his orchestra as he does, why proportion it as he does? Are there any instruments on which he cannot depend? Does he lack instruments to express his desires?

"There are both tradition and reason in the arrangement," is Mr. Monteux's reply. "With the violins there is reason. The first violins carry the melody—the important part—most often. The melody must be dominant. So we have the players sit on the conductor's left hand, where their instruments will have the opening of the body toward the audience. That throws the sound out in fuller volume. With other instruments the position is chiefly a matter of tradition and varies with different orchestras. Some have the basses at one side; we have them at the rear.

"The number of stringed instruments is far greater than that of wind or percussion, as anyone can see. The strings make the body of the orchestra. But some composers wish not to write one voice to be sung by 16 first violins. Stavinsky, when I saw him last, declared that he is now going to write an individual part for each violin; if he has 16, each will play its own melody. Why, he asks, should 16 do the same thing? Each flute plays its own part, each oboe, each clarinet. So with the strings. If he wants fewer than 16 parts, he will have fewer violins. Each instrument will have its solo, then. No, it will be no more difficult to conduct such an orchestra. The score will be larger and harder to read, perhaps, but that is all.

"Instruments are now so well made that they can be depended upon to do what is required. There are also plenty of instruments to express whatever the music calls for. It is the composer, not the conductor, who sometimes needs new instruments. I remember once at the opera in Paris a composer needed an instrument to express the feelings of a weak, ill woman. The violin was too sharp, too loud. Finally some one hollowed out a walking stick, stretched a single string over it, and the result was a thin tune that was exactly what was required.

"I fear that modern music will continue to demand new instruments more and more. I see no limit to what we may expect. More and more music becomes complex—and to meet this complexity more instruments are necessary. That means a larger orchestra, unless composers definitely restrict themselves to writing music for a small body of players."

Is conducting more or less difficult when the full orchestra plays? Does weather affect the playing? How can the conductor indicate his desires to the men?

"When the full orchestra plays," says Mr. Monteux, "it is the easy time for the conductor. He must then beat time, and that is all. The full orchestra runs itself almost. It is the pianissimo passages, where great delicacy is required and where the shading is at once evident and of great importance, that the conductor is most called upon for his ability.

"Does weather affect the music? I wish it did not! Violins in rainy times grow wet, strings are like wrapping twine! A soloist like Mr. Kreisler wishes above everything for a pleasant day for his concert.

"I cannot tell exactly how I indicate my wishes to the members of the orchestra. It is like driving an automobile; you cannot tell just what you will do in a crowd when you need to go to the right, swerve to the left, stop short. You do what is necessary when the time comes. I have no certain number of signs. I just do by instinct what seems best at the moment, and we understand each other."

And the present orchestra—what of it? All the listeners have gloried in the rising above the troubles of last year. All see new faces, many of them young. Are young or old players more desired by a conductor? "I assure you," says Mr. Monteux, "that both young and old are satisfactory, essential. The young men now sit in the last seats of their section—they want to sit in the front seats. So they work! Older players have more experience to make them sure, even if they have not so much 'pep.' Experience and enthusiasm—the combination makes a perfect orchestra.

"Is the orchestra as good as it used to be? That is for some one else to say. All that I would say is, I think we have a very fine orchestra."—Boston Sunday Herald.

ENQUIRER
ess: Philadelphia, Pa.
M

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in a Peculiar Programme at the Academy Last Night

The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon its second local appearance for the season at the Academy of Music last evening was characterized if not commended by some peculiarities and innovations which, while not without interest or merit, can hardly be unreservedly approved. Why Conductor Pierre Monteux should have chosen to substitute Mendelssohn's string octette for a symphony is with difficulty imaginable. Presumably, he wanted to display the fine quality of his strings, and it will have to be recorded that the polished and melodious music was played with considerable beauty of tone and a praiseworthy precision of movement; but if such were his purpose, it might have been more advantageously and acceptably attained in another way.

There is always a loss when chamber music written for performances in a room or small hall by a limited number of performers is done in a spacious auditorium like that of the Academy, and if Mr. Monteux wanted to exploit the string section of his organization he might better have fulfilled this purpose by the selection of some symphony, such as the one by Schumann in D minor, where the strings and especially the violins are very conspicuously employed. People who go to a symphony concert desire and expect to hear a symphony, and last evening's audience was disappointed in being deprived of that pleasure. It had the Mendelssohn octette, which is all very well in its way, but which was not in order, and it had a nearer approach to a symphony in the shape of a suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "Petrouchka," with which many or most of those present must have been more or less familiar.

Although it loses much of its significance and interest by its detachment from the dance and pantomime which it is designed to accompany, Stravinsky's score is so strikingly original that it arrests the attention even of the unsympathetic listener, and the version of it produced last evening, in which important use is made of the piano—cleverly played by Mr. Raymond Havens—as an obligato instrument, was decidedly impressive. The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished 'cellist, Mr. Jean Bedetti, whose voluminous and luscious tone and well-developed technique were effectively exhibited in a masterly interpretation of Lalo's well-known and justly-admired concerto. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, Janua

---

STABLISHED 1881
rom
ublic Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCE

Bedetti, the Soloist, Gives Superb Performance of Lalo Concerto

THE PROGRAM
Octet for strings .... Mendelssohn
Concerto for cello .... Lalo
Jean Bedetti
Suite, "Petrouchka" .... Stravinsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a really notable concert at the Academy of Music last evening. For the first time since the recent trouble, the orchestra and the leader seemed to be working in complete harmony, with the result that the ensemble was tremendously improved and the whole program was given with an enthusiasm and an accuracy which will compare very favorably with the work of any orchestra in this city this season.

The first number was the Mendelssohn Octet, arranged for string orchestra, the contra bass part being cleverly devised from the second cello part. In it the strings showed an excellent color and and tone quality and a fine sense of rhythym. Mr. Monteux took the last movement at a very fast pace with the result of a little cloudiness here and there. The composition lends itself admirably to the transcription, if it can be called such. for string orchestra.

Mr. Bedetti gave what was to a Philadelphia audience a practically new interpretation of the Lalo concerto and one exceedingly beautiful. He has a tone of great refinement and beauty and a restrained but forceful style of playing. In spite of the heavy scoring of the work, his tone was always clear, although the masterly accompaniment provided by Mr. Monteux had its part in this effect—one, by the way, not often heard in the Lalo. Mr. Bedetti's technique is ample, but it is apparent that he makes it a means to an end and does not play for the purpose of exhibiting what he can do in the way of digital dexterity. It was one of the most satisfactory cello concertos heard in this city for a long time.

The program closed with the unique orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." This is an ultra-modern work, with some features which have in them a touch of the classics—such as for instance the fact that the melodies are always diatonic, despite the bizarre harmonization which accompanies them. Stravinsky is always interesting, whether one agrees with the manner in which he depicts his ideas, a characteristic which cannot be granted to all modern composers. His orchestral technique is remarkable and he is always able to put his idea through. In the first and last movements the idea of the fete was wonderfully carried out—only the second movement seemed at times to lack conviction. His harmonization is somewhat strong for ears attuned to that of the classics, but, nevertheless, the evident sincerity of the work does much to make it the success which the audience of last evening acclaimed it.

---

rom NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 30 M

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE PROGRAM

Jean Bedetti, Cellist, Gives Exhibition of Virtuosity in Concerto

WARMLY GREETED

The soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy last night was the orchestra itself. Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, played the Lalo concerto, the string choirs played the Mendelssohn Octette in E flat, and the entire organization gave an exhibition of virtuosity in the "Petrouchka" ballet music that brought back vivid recollection of this band's former estate.

When Mr. Bedetti was first heard in some solo passages in a Beethoven ballet suite which was played early last season the impression was given that a very distinguished player had joined the Boston forces. This impression was emphatically confirmed by his playing last night. The tone of Mr. Bedetti's instrument is full and rich, exquisite in the upper scales and sonorous in the lower reaches without a trace of the "grittiness" that is unfortunately too common. He plays with a fine appreciation of the dramatic but the lyric passages of the second movement of the Lalo work were handled with beautiful delicacy. The concerto itself is a grateful composition for the soloist, and the audience as well. The applause which greeted Mr. Bedetti's playing was warm and spontaneous.

In the Mendelssohn Octette the strings sounded with a fullness and intensity that was not only unusual for this band in recent years but that has not been equaled by any other organization so far heard this season in Philadelphia. The choirs have been enlarged since last season and the result is gratifying. It is a question whether a strictly chamber composition should be played with full choirs. The contrasts of the work become greater, but much of the delicacy and intimacy of the work are lost. Only in the Scherzo did Mr. Monteux retain the original spirit of the work. The other three movements were not shaded and given the dynamic coloring that the score offered. The work itself is chiefly remarkable as an example of a 16-year-old precocity.

Mr. Monteux was entirely at home in conducting the "Petrouchka" music. It is hard to imagine any one being more completely in accord with this spirit of this racily human work. The composition baffles brief analysis. Its humor, its folk coloring, its rhythmic variety, its orchestration offer matter for pages of discussion. The work could stand innumerable nearings without palling. May fate send us more Stravinsky like this. Besides a formidable battery of percussion instruments and an augmented brass choir the score calls for some most effective and difficult piano passages. These were played by Raymond Havens, who revealed gifts that entitle him to more serious consideration than as an orchestral augmentation.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

"Acting on the suggestion of several letters from patrons," in which it was pointed out that early duplication would result if the Boston Symphony Orchestra played, on Wednesday night of this week, Brahms' fourth symphony (in E minor), the orchestra's press representative announces it has substituted Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat, Opus 20, for stringed instruments. This will be appreciated by many of those who attend all orchestra concerts. The Brahms symphony was played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra on November 17.

Remainder of the promising program will be as announced previously, with Mme. Frances Alda (soprano) as special soloist. Orchestrally, it will be notable through inclusion of the orchestral suite from Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky's recent ballet "Petrouchka" and of the "Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, of Baltimore. The suite employs the piano as an orchestral instrument, and it will be so played upon this occasion by Raymond Havens.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
DEC 1

Symphony Concert Showers Glories Upon Orchestra

With Pierre Monteux conducting Boston Symphony Orchestr ave the second concert of its lo al season at the New National The ater yesterday afternoon under th management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene. The soloist was France Alda, soprano.

Lekeu's captivating Symphon Fantasia on "Two Folk-Songs o Anjou" served to show that th orchestra has regained to a larg measure its past glories, as we as the superlative excellence of th days before this country entere the war and caused some upset in the orchestra. While a joyous ness predominatees in this work there is revived at intervals tha characteristic quality of this com poser—a sadness so weighted wit suffering and lamentation that on imagines he almost feels the ap proach of death, for this importan composer died at the age of 24.

The symphony was Mozart's i C major (Kochel No. 425). Thi proved to be an interesting number that should have satisfied those desiring an unfamiliar work. An air of mystery surrounds this orchestral number and no little doubt is attached to its authorship.

Tremendous applause rewarded Mme. Alda at the completion of Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." But a greater demonstration marked the close of The Prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." The singer pessesses a voice of marvelous range and flexibility, and her singing was pronounced the most satisfying heard this season.

Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, closed the program. On this composition Beethoven lavished the wealth of his genius, and by it established the legitimate relations of the overture to the work it preluded. It is a masterpiece of dramatic unity, strength and passion, as well as of unique and imposing musical construction. The concert in its entirety was of exceptional interest.

---

m EVENING STAR
dress Washington, D. C.
e

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its second concert of the season at the New National Theater, yesterday afternoon, gave a finished program, in which Mme. Frances Alda, soloist, played a pleasing and conspicuous part. The orchestra program was particularly well chosen, and was well handled by Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Mozart's symphony in C major, one of the master works of that great composer, was the opening number. The four movements were given with the musicianship they demand, but over and above this the orchestra played with a subtle something, a unity of touch and tone, which placed the performance outside the usual. The simple third movement, menuetto, was charming, especially the delicate trio. In the allegro spiritoso, poco adagio and presto movements the orchestra was perhaps at its best.

The novelty of the program was the performance of Leku's symphonic fantasia on two folk-songs of Anjou, a spirited and striking number. The fantasia is a splendid composition, striking alike for its string passages and later the employment of the brass and woodwind sections of the orchestra.

In Beethoven's overture to "Lenore," No. 3, which closed the orchestral program, the orchestra worked up to a splendid climax, following the effective trumpet playing off-stage.

Mme. Alda scored a triumph in the prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from Puccini's "Tosca," and in Marguerite's prison song, "L'Altra Notte," from Boito's "Mefistofele." Her clear, easy voice was heard perhaps to best advantage in the favorite Puccini number, but her singing of both was beautiful. Despite extended applause she did not sing again.

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Regrets Change Of Symphony Program.

To THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—Many of us regret that some one has persuaded the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play the Mendelssohn Octette instead of the interesting and beautiful symphony of Brahms. Not everyone in Baltimore was able to be at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert, and I am sure that it is a symphony which one can appreciate on hearing it a second time. It is a great disappointment that it is not to be given tomorrow evening.

R. W.

Baltimore, Nov. 30.

Evening Sun
altimore, Md.
DEC 2 M

LYRIC

The Boston Symphony.

After hearing the Boston Orchestra play the Mendelssohn "Octette" at the Lyric last evening it became perfectly evident why Pierre Monteux selected this old-fashioned number to replace the Brahms Symphony. For certainly nothing that he could have chosen would have in any like degree exploited the very extraordinary virtuosity of the band's string choirs, their vibrant, biting tone, their suggestion of rich fluency. The men played magnificently last evening, and while the work itself is what in these last days we are apt to regard as merely "a fine piece of musicianship," a thing not especially inspired, but very skillfully written, it was an interesting thing to hear. The fact that it

Record NOV 28

Philadelphia, Pa.

K

[67]

* * * *

—At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given tomorrow night in the Academy of Music, Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, playing Lalo's popular concerto for the 'cello with the orchestra. Bedetti came from Europe last season to fill his present position and has more than justified his reputation in the old world where he was first prize pupil of the Paris Conservatory. Mendelssohn's string octet, chosen by Pierre Monteux for this concert in lieu of a symphony, should reveal the present quality of the string sections of the orchestra. The novelty of the evening will be a symphonic suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka." This score, which selects the more purely symphonic parts of the noted ballet, is considered to create a precedent in the use of the piano as an important instrument in a symphony orchestra. The piano part will be played by Raymond Havens.

NOV 28

---

rom

Sun

Baltimore, Md.

Pierre Monteux Gives Inside View Of Great Symphony Orchestra

The Conductor Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra In A Recent Interview Tells Some Of The Difficulties Faced By The Director And Explains Much That Sometimes Puzzles Ahe Average Member Of An Audience.

THE amateur listener at symphony concerts cannot resist the curiosity to know "what makes the wheels go round." He sees the hall, the orchestra, the conductor, the soloist; he is aware of his fellow-listeners; he hears the music. Somehow he understands that all together make the whole thing that is a symphony concert. But how, he wonders, do they combine? Does the audience have any effect on the orchestra and the conductor? Does weather affect the concert? Why should the first violins sit on the conductor's left? Does the conductor labor more vigorously in fortissimo passages or is his burden as heavy when the still small voice of the orchestra sings?

The listener knows that there are books to aid him, but life is so short and art is so long that he fears the length of dissertation. Yet curiosity will not down; how does a concert happen? Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is glad to take time from his busy life to explain in terms of the amateur brain.

The amateur has noticed that different conductors set different paces for the same piece of music. He has read the words of critics that a movement was taken too fast or too slow. He has even been astonished, sometimes, that the tempo is different from what he had expected; in such cases he has always found that what he received was better than what he expected. Now, who, he wonders, knows what the right time is? "Can a conductor know," he asks Mr. Monteux, "that he has set the right tempo for a piece of music?"

"That," comes the quick answer, "is all a matter of feeling. I study a score. I hum, I think about it, and finally I find just how I fell that it should be played. Of course, there is the metronome—I can consult it. But sometimes it is very wrong—to my mind! I never take the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven so rapidly as the metronome marks call for. I feel that such speed would make a wrong effect.

"That is why conductors differ—they do not feel alike. Members of the orchestra do not feel alike. Each has his own idea of what the time should be."

Then here, cries the amateur to himself, is the answer to the aged question, "Why is a conductor?" The lady just behind him whispered at the last concert, "I wish they didn't have a conductor! Don't you think a man looks silly waving his arms?" She had never listened, probably, to 16 first violins each going at its own sweet will through the sweeps and melodies of a symphony. The ancient question of the one or the many is quickly answered for the orchestra: it must be the one, and he is the conductor.

The same is true of the volume of sound. "That, too, is a matter of feeling," Mr. Monteux asserts. "How soft, how loud? I decide by how I feel to different degrees, whether one or another gives just the feeling that the music ought to have. I never can tell, of course, whether we shall have in the concert exactly the shade of tone that we had in rehearsal. We have rehearsed thoroughly until we know what is to be done, but the conductor must be alert at every moment to see that the orchestra does not forget. If we make too much volume, I make signs to reduce, and if tones are too thin, I must ask for more."

The amateur has been wondering about the demands of old and modern music. Which requires more rehearsing and why? Is there not a temptation to change older music to suit a changed orchestra, to remake Beethoven in the way that he would probably have chosen to write in 1920?

"Old and new must have about the same amount of rehearsing," Mr. Monteux explains. "The older music often is more difficult for the individual instrument to play, but the modern music needs more rehearsing to show the balance and the meaning of each part. I must often, in rehearsing modern music, ask one section of the orchestra to remain silent and listen to what another section plays, so that we shall all understand the meaning of the whole composition. Older music is very clear in its intention, and is so beautiful that we must take the greatest pains to make it sing exactly as it should be sung. But we must never change older music to suit modern possibilities. There it is, as the composer meant to have it when he wrote. We are a museum to keep it in just as he left it."

Does the orchestra play as well in rehearsal as in concert? Is it better to conduct with or without score?

"No, we never do so well in rehearsal. Something must always be left for the concert to make it perfect. It is impossible to tell just why this is so, but it is. We try to do everything at the rehearsal, we go over everything and leave no point without its refinement. But it is never quite right. Then we go to the concert—and we do much more than we had done before. I am instruments to express his desires?

"There are both tradition and reason in the arrangement," is Mr. Monteux's reply. "With the violins there is reason. The first violins carry the melody—the important part—most often. The melody must be dominant. So we have the players sit on the conductor's left hand, where their instruments will have the opening of the body toward the audience. That throws the sound out in fuller volume. With other instruments the position is chiefly a matter of tradition and varies with different orchestras. Some have the basses at one side; we have them at the rear.

"The number of stringed instruments is far greater than that of wind or percussion, as anyone can see. The strings make the body of the orchestra. But some composers wish not to write one voice to be sung by 16 first violins. Stavinsky, when I saw him last, declared that he is now going to write an individual part for each violin; if he has 16, each will play its own melody. Why, he asks, should 16 do the same thing? Each flute plays its own part, each oboe, each clarinet. So with the strings. If he wants fewer than 16 parts, he will have fewer violins. Each instrument will have its solo, then. No, it will be no more difficult to conduct such an orchestra. The score will be larger and harder to read, perhaps, but that is all.

"Instruments are now so well made that they can be depended upon to do what is required. There are also plenty of instruments to express whatever the music calls for. It is the composer, not the conductor, who sometimes needs new instruments. I remember once at the opera in Paris a composer needed an instrument to express the feelings of a weak, ill woman. The violin was too sharp, too loud. Finally some one hollowed out a walking stick, stretched a single string over it, and the result was a thin tune that was exactly what was required.

"I fear that modern music will continue to demand new instruments more and more. I see no limit to what we may expect. More and more music becomes complex—and to meet this complexity more instruments are necessary. That means a larger orchestra, unless composers definitely restrict themselves to writing music for a small body of players."

Is conducting more or less difficult when the full orchestra plays? Does weather affect the playing? How can the conductor indicate his desires to the men?

"When the full orchestra plays," says Mr. Monteux, "it is the easy time for the conductor. He must then beat time, and that is all. The full orchestra runs itself almost. It is the pianissimo passages, where great delicacy is required and where the shading is at once evident and of great importance, that the conductor is most called upon for his ability.

"Does weather affect the music? I wish it did not! Violins in rainy times grow wet, strings are like wrapping twine! A soloist like Mr. Kreisler wishes above everything for a pleasant day for his concert.

"I cannot tell exactly how I indicate my wishes to the members of the orchestra. It is like driving an automobile; you cannot tell just what you will do in a crowd when you need to go to the right, swerve to the left, stop short. You do what is necessary when the time comes. I have no certain number of signs. I just do by instinct what seems best at the moment, and we understand each other."

And the present orchestra—what of it? All the listeners have gloried in the rising above the troubles of last year. All see new faces, many of them young. Are young or old players more desired by a conductor? "I assure you," says Mr. Monteux, "that both young and old are satisfactory, essential. The young men now sit in the last seats of their section—they want to sit in the front seats. So they work! Older players have more experience to make them sure, even if they have not so much 'pep.' Experience and enthusiasm—the combination makes a perfect orchestra.

"Is the orchestra as good as it used to be? That is for some one else to say. All that I would say is, I think we have a very fine orchestra."—Boston Sunday Herald.

ENQUIRER

ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 30 M

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in a Peculiar Programme at the Academy Last Night

The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon its second local appearance for the season at the Academy of Music last evening was characterized if not commended by some peculiarities and innovations which, while not without interest or merit, can hardly be unreservedly approved. Why Conductor Pierre Monteux should have chosen to substitute Mendelssohn's string octette for a symphony is with difficulty imaginable. Presumably, he wanted to display the fine quality of his strings, and it will have to be recorded that the polished and melodious music was played with considerable beauty of tone and a praiseworthy precision of movement; but if such were his purpose, it might have been more advantageously and acceptably attained in another way.

There is always a loss when chamber music written for performances in a room or small hall by a limited number of performers is done in a spacious auditorium like that of the Academy, and if Mr. Monteux wanted to exploit the string section of his organization he might better have fulfilled this purpose by the selection of some symphony, such as the one by Schumann in D minor, where the strings and especially the violins are very conspicuously employed. People who go to a symphony concert desire and expect to hear a symphony, and last evening's audience was disappointed in being deprived of that pleasure. It had the Mendelssohn octette, which is all very well in its way, but which was not in order, and it had a nearer approach to a symphony in the shape of a suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "Petrouchka," with which many or most of those present must have been more or less familiar.

Although it loses much of its significance and interest by its detachment from the dance and pantomime which it is designed to accompany, Stravinsky's score is so strikingly original that it arrests the attention even of the unsympathetic listener, and the version of it produced last evening, in which important use is made of the piano—cleverly played by Mr. Raymond Havens—as an obligato instrument, was decidedly impressive. The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished 'cellist, Mr. Jean Bedetti, whose voluminous and luscious tone and well-developed technique were effectively exhibited in a masterly interpretation of Lalo's well-known and justly-admired concerto. The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, Janua [illegible]

TABLISHED 1881

rom

ublic Ledger

Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCE

Bedetti, the Soloist, Gives Superb Performance of Lalo Concerto

THE PROGRAM

Octet for strings.................Mendelssohn

Concerto for cello.........................Lalo

Jean Bedetti

Suite, "Petrouchka"............Stravinsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a really notable concert at the Academy of Music last evening. For the first time since the recent trouble, the orchestra and the leader seemed to be working in complete harmony, with the result that the ensemble was tremendously improved and the whole program was given with an enthusiasm and an accuracy which will compare very favorably with the work of any orchestra in this city this season.

The first number was the Mendelssohn Octet, arranged for string orchestra, the contra bass part being cleverly devised from the second cello part. In it the strings showed an excellent color and and tone quality and a fine sense of rhythym. Mr. Monteux took the last movement at a very fast pace with the result of a little cloudiness here and there. The composition lends itself admirably to the transcription, if it can be called such, for string orchestra.

Mr. Bedetti gave what was to a Philadelphia audience a practically new interpretation of the Lalo concerto and one exceedingly beautiful. He has a tone of great refinement and beauty and a restrained but forceful style of playing. In spite of the heavy scoring of the work, his tone was always clear, although the masterly accompaniment provided by Mr. Monteux had its part in this effect—one, by the way, not often heard in the Lalo. Mr. Bedetti's technique is ample, but it is apparent that he makes it a means to an end and does not play for the purpose of exhibiting what he can do in the way of digital dexterity. It was one of the most satisfactory cello concertos heard in this city for a long time.

The program closed with the unique orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka." This is an ultra-modern work, with some features which have in them a touch of the classics—such as for instance the fact that the melodies are always diatonic, despite the bizarre harmonization which accompanies them. Stravinsky is always interesting, whether one agrees with the manner in which he depicts his ideas, a characteristic which cannot be granted to all modern composers. His orchestral technique is remarkable and he is always able to put his idea through. In the first and last movements the idea of the fete was wonderfully carried out—only the second movement seemed at times to lack conviction. His harmonization is somewhat strong for ears attuned to that of the classics, but, nevertheless, the evident sincerity of the work does much to make it the success which the audience of last evening acclaimed it.

---

rom NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 30 M

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE PROGRAM

Jean Bedetti, Cellist, Gives Exhibition of Virtuosity in Concerto

WARMLY GREETED

The soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy last night was the orchestra itself. Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, played the Lalo concerto, the string choirs played the Mendelssohn Octette in E flat, and the entire organization gave an exhibition of virtuosity in the "Petrouchka" ballet music that brought back vivid recollection of this band's former estate.

When Mr. Bedetti was first heard in some solo passages in a Beethoven ballet suite which was played early last season the impression was given that a very distinguished player had joined the Boston forces. This impression was emphatically confirmed by his playing last night. The tone of Mr. Bedetti's instrument is full and rich, exquisite in the upper scales and sonorous in the lower reaches without a trace of the "grittiness" that is unfortunately too common. He plays with a fine appreciation of the dramatic but the lyric passages of the second movement of the Lalo work were handled with beautiful delicacy. The concerto itself is a grateful composition for the soloist, and the audience as well. The applause which greeted Mr. Bedetti's playing was warm and spontaneous.

In the Mendelssohn Octette the strings sounded with a fullness and intensity that was not only unusual for this band in recent years but that has not been equaled by any other organization so far heard this season in Philadelphia. The choirs have been enlarged since last season and the result is gratifying. It is a question whether a strictly chamber composition should be played with full choirs. The contrasts of the work become greater, but much of the delicacy and intimacy of the work are lost. Only in the Scherzo did Mr. Monteux retain the original spirit of the work. The other three movements were not shaded and given the dynamic coloring that the score offered. The work itself is chiefly remarkable as an example of a 16-year-old precocity.

Mr. Monteux was entirely at home in conducting the "Petrouchka" music. It is hard to imagine any one being more completely in accord with this spirit of this racily human work. The composition baffles brief analysis. Its humor, its folk coloring, its rhythmic variety, its orchestration offer matter for pages of discussion. The work could stand innumerable nearings without palling. May fate send us more Stravinsky like this. Besides a formidable battery of percussion instruments and an augmented brass choir the score calls for some most effective and difficult piano passages. These were played by Raymond Havens, who revealed gifts that entitle him to more serious consideration than as an orchestral augmentation.

AMERICAN,

Baltimore, Md.

30

"Acting on the suggestion of several letters from patrons," in which it was pointed out that early duplication would result if the Boston Symphony Orchestra played, on Wednesday night of this week, Brahms' fourth symphony (in E minor), the orchestra's press representative announces it has substituted Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat, Opus 20, for stringed instruments. This will be appreciated by many of those who attend all orchestra concerts. The Brahms symphony was played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra on November 17.

Remainder of the promising program will be as announced previously, with Mme. Frances Alda (soprano) as special soloist. Orchestrally, it will be notable through inclusion of the orchestral suite from Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky's recent ballet "Petrouchka" and of the "Four Preludes" by Gustav Strube, of Baltimore. The suite employs the piano as an orchestral instrument, and it will be so played upon this occasion by Raymond Havens.

HERALD

Washington, D.C.

DEC 1 B

Symphony Concert Showers Glories Upon Orchestra

With Pierre Monteux conducti
Boston Symphony Orches
ave the second concert of its al season at the New National T ater yesterday afternoon under management of Mrs. Katie Wils
Greene. The soloist was Fra Alda, soprano.

Lekeu's captivating Sympho
Fantasia on "Two Folk-Songs Anjou" served to show that orchestra has regained to a la measure its past glories, as as the superlative excellence of days before this country ente the war and caused some up in the orchestra. While a joyo ness predominatees in this w there is revived at intervals characteristic quality of this c poser—a sadness so weighted suffering and lamentation that imagines he almost feels the proach of death, for this impor composer died at the age of 24

The symphony was Mozart's
C major (Kochel No. 425).
proved to be an interesting n

ber that should have satisfied those desiring an unfamiliar work. An air of mystery surrounds this orchestral number and no little doubt is attached to its authorship.

Tremendous applause rewarded Mme. Alda at the completion of Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." But a greater demonstration marked the close of The Prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from the second act of Puccini's "La Tosca." The singer pessesses a voice of marvelous range and flexibility, and her singing was pronounced the most satisfying heard this season.

Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, closed the program. In this composition Beethoven lavished the wealth of his genius, and by it established the legitimate relations of the overture to the work it preluded. It is a masterpiece of dramatic unity, strength, and passion, as well as of unique and imposing musical construction. The concert in its entirety was of exceptional interest.

---

m EVENING STAR

dress Washington, D.

e

DEC

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr
its second concert of the season
New National Theater, yesterday noon, gave a finished program, in Mme. Frances Alda, soloist, pla pleasing and conspicuous part. T chestra program was particular chosen, and was well handled by Monteux, conductor.

Mozart's symphony in C major,
the master works of that great poser, was the opening number four movements were given wi musicianship they demand, but ov above this the orchestra played subtle something, a unity of tou tone, which placed the performan side the usual. The simple third ment, menuetto, was charming, cially the delicate trio. In the spiritoso, poco adagio and presto ments the orchestra was perhaps best.

The novelty of the program w performance of Leku's symphoni tasia on two folk-songs of An spirited and striking number. Th tasia is a splendid composition, ing alike for its string passage later the employment of the bras woodwind sections of the orchest

In Beethoven's overture to "Le
No. 3, which closed the orchestral gram, the orchestra worked up splendid climax, following the eff trumpet playing off-stage.

Mme. Alda scored a triumph in prayer, "Vissi d'Arte," from Puc
"Tosca," and in Marguerite's p on, "L'Altra Notte," from Boito's fistofele." Her clear, easy voice heard perhaps to best advantag the favorite Puccini number, but singing of both was beautiful. De extended applause she did not again.

From

Evening Sun

Baltimore, Md.

Regrets Change Of Symphony Pro

To THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING

Sir—Many of us regret that some o persuaded the Boston Symphony Orc to play the Mendelsohn Octette inste the interesting and beautiful sympho Brahms. Not everyone in Baltimore able to be at the Philadelphia Orc concert, and I am sure that it is a sym which one can appreciate on hearing second time. It is a great disappoin that it is not to be given tomorrow ev

R.

Baltimore, Nov. 30.

Evening Sun

altimore, Md.

DEC 2 M

LYRIC

The Boston Symphony.

After hearing the Boston Orchestra lay the Mendelssohn "Octette" at the Lyric last evening it became perfectly evident why Pierre Monteux selected this old-fashioned number to replace the Brahms Symphony. For certainly nothng that he could have chosen would have in any like degree exploited the very extraordinary virtuosity of the band's string choirs, their vibrant, biting tone, their suggestion of rich fluency. The men played magnificently last evening, and while the work itself is what in these last days we are apt to regard as merely "a fine piece of musicianship," a thing not especially inspired, but very skillfully written, it was an interesting thing to hear. The fact that it wo

TIGHT BINDING

Made a

EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.
DEC 1

Boston Symphony.

Change Of Symphony Program.
Editor of The Evening Sun:

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Nov. 30. R. W.

LYRIC
Boston Symphony.

…ly be more inte… if played …eight instruments instead of half a …undred is beside the question.

In marked contrast were the four lit- e "Preludes" by our own Gustav trube, beautiful musical "color notes" the modern idiom, effective bits of rchestra writing that in the case of the Quasi Adagio," at least, rose to definite ights of inspirational beauty. This isode, pastoral in quality, but curious lyric in conception and possessing mething of the mystery of the Orient, real musical distinction and made lasting impression.

The orchestral interest of the concert, owever, very naturally centered in the resentation of an elaborate arrangement r full orchestra and piano, of the score Stravinsky's much-discussed ballet, etrouchka." It is obviously impossi- e to gain any very adequate impression of the interpretative values of this piece of program music when hearing it apart from the action of the dancers. It is an xtraordinary work, an expression of vio- ent and rapidly changing moods. Almost entirely devoid of what is known s "sustained melody," it suggests imme- iately breathless action. In the first lace, "Petrouchka" is a representation f puppet life, of the loves and hates of olls at festival time, so that this rich rchestral fabric (principally interesting exploiting combinations of instru- ents and the effects obtained by their se) becomes a kind of satire on human life, as expressed by the emotions of uppets, pictured in sound waves. It was all very remarkable and fascinating, fine piece of humorous, metaphysical writing, that must have appealed particularly to the imaginative minds in the audience.

The assisting artist was Frances Alda, who has not been heard here since she sang the soprano role in "Quo Vadis" and who last evening was in superb voice. She gave first the rarely heard "Marguerite's Prison Song," from Boito's "Mefistofele," and afterward the "Vissi d'Arte" aria from Puccini's "Tosca," pouring forth the rich round tones which are the distinguishing feature of her art—an art that has gained extraordinarily in authority and poise—with an opulence and freedom that was entirely admirable. One rarely hears more satisfying lyric singing.

I O L

NEW YORK
TABLISHED 1881
rom DEC 3 M
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

THE THREE ARTS

Music Drama, Painting

R. W." writes to express disapproval of substitution on the Boston Symphony gram of the Mendelssohn Octette for the hms Fourth Symphony, pointing out that eat many people did not hear the Phila- phia Orchestra play the symphony last k, and further reminding me that, if any e, so wonderful a work as the Brahms urth" cannot be heard too often, espe- ly readings of it by different conductors. rom one point of view this is certainly a nd argument, and, after all, the very polite ndelssohn work was but a poor substitute the glories of Brahms.

ut I do not think the time ripe in Balti- e for immediate repetitions.

hen our own orchestra has developed ciently to give Friday afternoon and Sat- y evening concerts weekly for 20 weeks— plan is followed in most of the larger s—then it will be time to advocate the ating by visiting orchestras of the works we have heard played by our own organ- ion.

ut we do not possess in Baltimore a "nu- background" of 40 symphony concerts. only symphonies we hear are the—still rtunately—"occasional" ones by our own estra and the ones played on the monthly s of the "foreign" bands.

it is that one returns to the original ise that, there being so few concerts and a wide field of musical literature to , we cannot as yet give the time to titions.

e, all of us, surely, hope that one day the imore Symphony, developing in a way mensurate with the civic growth and im- nce of Baltimore, will become a great estra of the first class, with weekly "pub hearsals" and concerts at which all the classic works will be consistently and gly interpreted.

we will welcome the contrasted "read- of visitors. But the time is not yet.

---

ning Public Ledger
hiladelphia, Pa.
DEC 4

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

PRACTICALLY every "chamber music hound" in Philadelphia was in the audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last Monday evening, his fell purpose being to see how the Mendelssohn Octet for strings was going to sound when played by all the strings of a great orchestra. Many of them were of the opinion, some privately, others vociferously, that the effect was going to be rather poor, even when the fact was pointed out to them [illegible] had appended [illegible] to be played [illegible]

---

the composition as a whole contained little of the distinct idiom of chamber music and much of the idiom of the orchestra.

However, in this, as in everything else in music that is, of the classics, the ear is the final judge and there is no denying that the work sounds fully as well for the full string section of an orchestra as it does for the eight-string instruments for which it was originally composed.

Herein it was in distinct contrast to the two movements for string quartet, played by all the strings of the orchestra, which Mr. Damrosch has introduced in two of his programs during the past few years. This, however, was entirely due to the compositions selected and not to any difference in the rendition, for Mr. Damrosch's men gave just as good a performance as the very excellent one which Mr. Monteux conducted last Monday evening.

From JOURNAL DEC 4 A
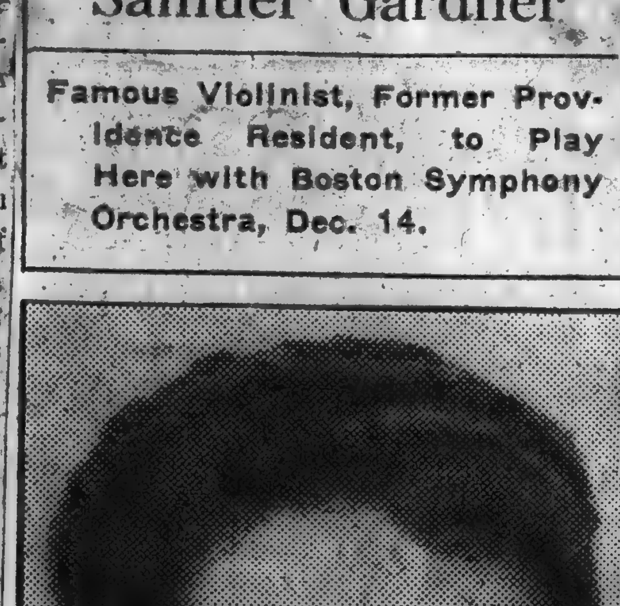
Providence, R. I.

Samuel Gardner

Famous Violinist, Former Providence Resident, to Play Here with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 14.



TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
DEC 5 A

SAMUEL GARDNER TO PLAY.

Keen anticipation on the part of Providence concertgoers centres in the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 14, because of the fact that Samuel Gardner, the brilliant young violinist of New York, formerly of Providence, will be the soloist and on that evening will perform his own new violin concerto with the orchestra for the first time on any concert stage.

Samuel Gardner, known to the musical public as the winner of the Pulitzer $1500 prize for the most noteworthy composition by an American composer, is also a violinist of growing popularity.

Mr. Gardner's "Night in the Rockies," is an interesting mood engendered by the silent and somewhat oppressive grandeur of a night under the skies hemmed in on all sides by the massive outlines of the mountain peaks. It was in the year 1918 that his String Quartet in D was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University as the work most worthy of praise among the many submitted to the jury. The fact that he Flonzaley Quartet added this work to its repertoire speaks in no undecided way for the value of the composition.

His most recent success, and one which indubitably places him before the public as a genius to be counted among the greatest our country has produced, was his engagement for a pair of concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra, where he appeared as soloist, conductor and composer. His reception was little short of sensational.

From JOURNAL DEC 5 A
Providence, R. I.

Providence folk have a special interes in the soloist who will appear with th Boston Symphony Orchestra at its con cert in this city on Dec. 14. Samue Gardner, violinist, is essentially a loca man, having lived in this city since h was brought to America as a baby b his parents. Born near Odessa, in 189 his family was forced to leave Russi because of the terrible persecutions o that time. In this city he received hi early musical training under [illegible] Wendelschaefer.

[68]

ESTABLISHED 1881 HERALD
From DEC 9
FALL RIVER, MASS.

SYMPHONY IS TO PLAY AT EMPIRE SUNDAY, DEC. 26

The second musical event of the season in Fall River will be the concert by the pre-eminent Boston Symphony orchestra to be given under the auspices of the woman's club in the Empire theatre, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26, at 3 sharp.

This great orchestra, for so long a by-word not only in America but also in the musical world, is now celebrating in a highly successful fashion the fortieth anniversary season of its history. Not only in Boston but in New York and other cities where it has already visited, the fine quality of its personnel, 100 strong, and the genius of its conductor, Pierre Monteux, have been generally praised. Mr. Monteux has arranged a rather popular program for Fall River, which nevertheless represents the finest achievement in the orchestral repertoire.

The symphony for the occasion will be that of the Bohemian composer, Dvorak, which he wrote during his visit to this country and entitled, "From the New World." Whether he used actual melodies from our negro music or was merely influenced by the characteristic rhythm of their dances and "spirituals" was the subject of prolonged and fruitless controversy. However, all that is important is that the music bears these characteristics, is also Bohemian in spirit and one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written. Its popularity in this country from that time to this has been unflagging, particularly famous for the Largo with the melancholy and haunting melody for English horn solo.

The two celebrated soloist at this concert, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play a concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra in E-flat by Mozart, with the great orchestra, are well known here. In a number of eastern cities, these two young American artists have attracted enthusiastic attention by their adjoint concerts, in which they wrought music for two pianos to a perfection of performance, hitherto scarcely known. They are to play this same double concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston, previous to their appearance here. Mr. Maier was active in France during the war, giving many concerts for the soldiers there in recitals of his own. Both in Europe and America, he has caused considerable stir in the musical world.

Pierre Monteux will close the afternoon with the highly brilliant, dashing "Roumanian Rhapsody," by Georges Enesco, the famous composer of Roumania.

Single seats for this concert go on sale next Monday morning, Dec. 13, at the Empire theatre. As the supply is limited, owing to the large subscription sale, those desiring tickets are advised to apply early.

From Dec. 11, 1920
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Second Boston Symphony Con

A few vacant seats in the Opera House of the Academy of Music last week, Friday evening, again offered proof of a slight decline in interest in the visits of the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is distinctly as it should not be. The interest in the five concerts ought, in fact, to be such as to occasion the "All seats sold" announcement in advance of each concert—as was the case when the New York Philharmonic played in the same auditorium the following Sunday afternoon. As for last week's concert, it was varied enough and "popular" enough to have aroused the audience to rather more enthusiasm than it did. The sole novelty, the "Symphonic Fantasia" by Guillaume Lekeu, the Belgian composer, who died the day after his twenty-fourth birthday, is a work of much merit—based on two Anjou folk songs, the first of which is delightfully "given out by the clarinet," to quote the program. It expresses with real beauty the eternal call of love, which will not take no for a reply. Both the opening number, the "Schéhérazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the closing number "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," are familiar not only on concert programs but, through the Ballet Russe, on the stage. They were played finely and the indications were that of the two the audience preferred the Russian composition, with its ingratiating melodies, rather than the more complicated musical structure from Germany. Even more familiar were Mary Jordan's two contributions to the program—"Ah, mon fils" from "Le Prophète" and "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila." In neither was Miss Jordan, who is a singer with a deservedly fine reputation, heard to the best advantage, and it is a pity that at least one of them was not replaced by something non-operatic. Among those in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Henry F. Noyes, Mr. and Mrs. John Taylor Arms, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. John Hills, Mrs. William L. Van Sinderen, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Miss Gra Collins, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Peabody, Mr. John att Brewer, Mrs. John W. Chapman, Miss Anna Hal , Mr. Walter H. Crittenden and Mr. Elijah R. Ken .

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 Globe
From DEC 9 F
FALL RIVER, MA

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DEC. 26

The second musical event of the season in Fall River will be the concert by the pre-eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given under the auspices of the Woman's Club in the Empire Theatre, Fall River, on Sunday afternoon, December 26, at 3 o'clock sharp.

This great orchestra, for so long a by-word not only in America but also in the musical world, is now celebrating in a highly successful fashion the fortieth anniversary season of its history. Not only in Boston but in New York and other cities where it has already visited, the fine quality of its personnel, 100 strong, and the genius of its conductor, Pierre Monteux, has been generally praised. Mr. Monteux has arranged a rather popular program for Fall River, which nevertheless represents the finest achievement in the orchestral repertoire.

The two celebrated soloists at this concert, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play a concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra in E-flat by Mozart, with the great orchestra, are well known here. In a number of our eastern cities, these two young American artists have attracted enthusiastic attention by their adjoint concerts, in which they wrought music for two pianos to a perfection of performance, hitherto scarcely known. They are to play this same double concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, previous to their appearance here. Mr. Maier was active in France during the war, giving many concerts for the soldiers there in recitals of his own. Both in Europe and America, he has caused considerable stir in the musical world.

Pierre Monteux will close the afternoon with the highly brilliant, dashing "Roumanian Rhapsody," by Georges Enesco, the famous composer of Roumania.

Single seats for this concert go on sale next Monday morning, December 13th, at the Empire Theatre. As the supply is limited, owing to the large subscription sale, those desiring tickets are advised to apply early.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
DEC 12 A

Special interest is manifested in the ppearance of Samuel Gardner as soloist ith the Boston Symphony Orchestra at he second concert of the season in In- antry Hall on Tuesday evening. His chievements in foreign fields have rought him an enviable reputation.

Mr. Gardner learned the elements of is art in this city, where he studied ith Evangeline Larry, who did much o interest music lovers in his career. e later studied with Franz Kneisel and ecame a member of the Kneisel Quar- et. With that organization, in numer- us recitals of his own, and in appear- nces with the different orchestras, he as captivated audience after audience by his musicianship and executive brilliance.

This musician is also a composer of importance. His string quartet was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500. Mr. Gardner received the Loeb prize of $500 for his symphonic poem, "New Russia." "A Night in the Rockies" and "From the Cane-brake" are well known. There is naturally considerable interest, therefore, in his new concerto for his own instrument with orchestra. This work will be played by him for the first time at the coming Boston Symphony concert.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's last symphony, the Fourth, in D-minor, one of the master's most poetic and beautiful works. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will open the concert and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" will close it—music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country which are treated in such strikingly original and colorful fashion as to make this piece one of the most popular in the orchestral repertory.

---

m TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
DEC 12

GARDNER BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Several years ago a very young citizen of Providence attracted considerable attention hereabouts by his remarkable talent, playing the violin in semi-private musicales. This boy, Samuel Gardner, has since become a young man. He has travelled about the world, studied and played, easily taking a foremost place among the rising violinists of our day.

His genius equally accepted by all, he is returning to Providence and will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 14, at 8:15.

Mr. Gardner learned the elements of his art in Providence, but later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the Kneisel Quartet. With that eminent organization, in numerous recitals of his own, and in appearances with the different orchestras, he has captivated audience after audience by the supreme beauty of his tone and his executive brilliance.

This fine musician is also a composer of importance. His string quartet was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500. Mr. Gardner also received the Loeb prize of $500 for his symphonic poem, "New Russia." "A Night in the Rockies" and "From the Cane-brake," are even better known. There is naturally considerable interest, therefore, in his new concerto for his own instrument with orchestra. This work will be played by him for the first time at the coming Boston Symphony concert.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's last symphony, the Fourth, in D-minor, one of the master's most poetic and beautiful works. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will open the concert and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" will close it—music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country which are treated in such strikingly original and colorful fashion as to make this piece one of the most popular in the orchestral repertory.

---

rom
JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town this past week and gave two concerts in Carnegie Hall. As usual, this organization attracted large audiences, not as large, however, as the audiences that used to attend these concerts. There were some vacant seats in the hall, a thing unknown some years ago when the Boston organization was in the height of its popularity.

There is always a feeling of regret in attending a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in these days. While there is undoubted merit in much of its performances, one misses that perfection of tone and ensemble that distinguished its playing in the days before adversity set in upon the fortunes of this old and honorable society. There was a time when the Boston Symphony was unsurpassed, if equalled, by any organization in this country, or in the whole world for that matter. The entire troubles of the Boston orchestra can be laid directly to the world war. It has never been the same since Dr. Muck was forced to leave the post of conductor. Whatever one may say of Dr. Muck, there is no gainsaying the fact that he was a conductor of eminent distinction and brought the Boston orchestra to a plane of the highest excellence.

From
Providence, R. I.
DEC 15

SAMUEL GARDNER PLAYS HIS OWN CONCERTO HERE

A few years ago when the youthful Samuel Gardner appeared here in public his friends predicted that a brilliant musical future was just ahead of him. Last night they saw their predictions spring into realization.

The young violinist and composer came to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. He played for the first time in public his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor and merited such applause from the large audience as assured him of its success. The composition, in slow movement, brings back memories of far-off Russia from which Gardner came to Providence when a boy, and then in final movement swiftly brings forth a reflection of the composer's vivid personality.

Mr. Gardner obtained his musical education in America under M. Kneisel and later under Percy Goetschius. His compositions of late years have been numerous and many of them merited high awards. His symphonic poem, "New Russia" won him the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918 and the Pulitzer prize of $1500 went to him in the same year for a string quartet in D-minor.

Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor was the principal orchestral number. The Berlioz overture and a Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor were other features.

TIGHT BINDING

gton, D. C.

DEC 1

Made a

VENING STAR
Washington, D. C.

DEC 1

Boston Symphony.

oston Symphony Orchestra, for d concert of the season at the ional Theater, yesterday after- ve a finished program, in which rances Alda, soloist, played a and conspicuous part. The or- program was particularly well and was well handled by Pierre . conductor.

t's symphony in C major, one of ter works of that great com- as the opening number. The ovements were given with the they demand, but over and his the orchestra played with a omething, a unity of touch and hich placed the performance out- usual. The simple third move- menuetto, was charming, espe- he delicate trio. In the allegro , poco adagio and presto move- he orchestra was perhaps at its novelty of the program was the ance of Leku's symphonic fan- , two folk-songs of Anjou, a and striking number. The fan- a splendid composition, strik- e for its string passages and e employment of the brass and nd sections of the orchestra. eethoven's overture to "Lenore," which closed the orchestral pro- the orchestra worked up to a climax, following the effective playing off-stage.

Alda scored a triumph in the "Vissi d'Arte," from Puccini's ," and in Marguerite's prison Altra Notte," from Boito's "Me- ." Her clear, easy voice was perhaps to best advantage in vorite Puccini number, but her of both was beautiful. Despite ed applause she did not sing

DEC 1
ening Sun
imore, Md.

Change Of Symphony Program.

EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Many of us regret that some one has d the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Mendelsohn Octette instead of eresting and beautiful symphony of . Not everyone in Baltimore was be at the Philadelphia Orchestra and I am sure that it is a symphony one can appreciate on hearing it a time. It is a great disappointment is not to be given tomorrow evening.

R. W.

more, Nov. 30.

ing Sun
nore, Md.
DEC 2 M

LYRIC

The Boston Symphony.

er hearing the Boston Orchestra the Mendelssohn "Octette" at the last evening it became perfectly why Pierre Monteux selected ld-fashioned number to replace the ms Symphony. For certainly noth- at he could have chosen would have y like degree exploited the very rdinary virtuosity of the band's choirs, their vibrant, biting tone, suggestion of rich fluency. The layed magnificently last evening, hile the work itself is what in last days we are apt to regard as "a fine piece of musicianship," g not especially inspired, but very written, it was an interesting obably be more interesting if played eight instruments instead of half a ndred is beside the question.

---

In marked contrast were the four lit- e "Preludes" by our own Gustav trube, beautiful musical "color notes" the modern idiom, effective bits of rchestra writing that in the case of the Quasi Adagio," at least, rose to definite ights of inspirational beauty. This pisode, pastoral in quality but curious lyric in conception and possessing mething of the mystery of the Orient, s real musical distinction and made lasting impression.

The orchestral interest of the concert, owever, very naturally centered in the resentation of an elaborate arrangement r full orchestra and piano, of the score Stravinsky's much-discussed ballet, etrouchka." It is obviously imposi- le to gain any very adequate impression of the interpretative values of this piece of program music when hearing it apart from the action of the dancers. It is an xtraordinary work, an expression of vio- lent and rapidly changing moods. Al- most entirely devoid of what is known s "sustained melody," it suggests imme- diately breathless action. In the first lace, "Petrouchka" is a representation f puppet life, of the loves and hates of olls at festival time, so that this rich rchestral fabric (principally interesting s exploiting combinations of instru- nents and the effects obtained by their se) becomes a kind of satire on human life, as expressed by the emotions of puppets, pictured in sound waves. It was all very remarkable and fascinating, a fine piece of humorous, metaphysical writing, that must have appealed par- ticularly to the imaginative minds in the audience.

The assisting artist was Frances Alda, who has not been heard here since she sang the soprano role in "Quo Vadis" and who last evening was in superb voice. She gave first the rarely heard "Marguerite's Prison Song," from Boito's "Mefistofele," and afterward the "Vissi d'Arte" aria from Puccini's "Tosca," pouring forth the rich round tones which are the distinguishing fea- ture of her art—an art that has gained extraordinarily in authority and poise— with an opulence and freedom that was entirely admirable. One rarely hears more satisfying lyric singing.

J O L

TABLISHED 1881
rom DEC 3 M
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

THE THREE ARTS
Music Drama, Painting

R. W." writes to express disapproval of substitution on the Boston Symphony gram of the Mendelssohn Octette for the ahms Fourth Symphony, pointing out that reat many people did not hear the Phila- phia Orchestra play the symphony last k, and further reminding me that, in any , so wonderful a work as the Brahms ourth" cannot be heard too often, espe- lly readings of it by different conductors.

From one point of view this is certainly a nd argument, and, after all, the very polite ndelssohn work was but a poor substitute the glories of Brahms.

But I do not think the time ripe in Balti- e for immediate repetitions.

When our own orchestra has developed iciently to give Friday afternoon and Sat- ay evening concerts weekly for 20 weeks— plan is followed in most of the larger es—then it will be time to advocate the eating by visiting orchestras of the works we have heard played by our own organ- ion.

But we do not possess in Baltimore a "mu- l background" of 40 symphony concerts. only symphonies we hear are the—still ortunately—"occasional" ones by our own estra and the ones played on the monthly s of the "foreign" bands.

o it is that one returns to the original mise that, there being so few concerts and a wide field of musical literature to r, we cannot as yet give the time to titions.

e, all of us, surely, hope that one day the imore Symphony, developing in a way mensurate with the civic growth and in- nce of Baltimore, will become a great estra of the first class, with weekly "pub- ehearsals" and concerts at which all the classic works will be consistently and gly interpreted.

n we will welcome the contrasted "read- of visitors. But the time is not yet.

ning Public Ledger
hiladelphia, Pa.

DEC 4 M

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

PRACTICALLY every "chamber music hound" in Philadelphia was in the udience of the Boston Symphony Or- hestra at the Academy last Monday vening, his fell purpose being to see ow the Mendelssohn Octet for strings as going to sound when played by all e strings of a great orchestra. Many f them were of the opinion, some pri- ately, others vociferously, that the ffect was going to be rather poor, even hen the fact was pointed out to them at the composer himself had appended the music the words "to be played in the manner of a symphony" and that the composition as a whole contained little of the distinct idiom of chamber music and much of the idiom of the orchestra.

However, in this, as in everything else in music that is, of the classics, the ear is the final judge and there is no denying that the work sounds fully as well for the full string section of an orchestra as it does for the eight-string instruments for which it was originally composed.

Herein it was in distinct contrast to the two movements for string quartet, played by all the strings of the orchestra, which Mr. Damrosch has introduced in two of his programs during the past few years. This, however, was entirely due to the compositions selected and not to any difference in the rendition, for Mr. Damrosch's men gave just as good a performance as the very excellent one which Mr. Monteux conducted last Monday evening.

From
JOURNAL DEC 4
Providence, R. I.

Samuel Gardner

Famous Violinist, Former Providence Resident, to Play Here with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 14.

TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.

DEC 5 A

SAMUEL GARDNER TO PLAY.

Keen anticipation on the part of Providence concertgoers centres in the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 14, because of the fact that Samuel Gardner, the brilliant young violinist of New York, formerly of Providence, will be the soloist and on that evening will perform his own new violin concerto with the orchestra for the first time on any concert stage.

Samuel Gardner, known to the musical public as the winner of the Pulitzer $1500 prize for the most noteworthy composition by an American composer, is also a violinist of growing popularity.

Mr. Gardner's "Night in the Rockies," is an interesting mood engendered by the silent and somewhat oppressive grandeur of a night under the skies hemmed in on all sides by the massive outlines of the mountain peaks. It was in the year 1918 that his String Quartet in D was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University as the work most worthy of praise among the many submitted to the jury. The fact that he Flonzaley Quartet added this work to its repertoire speaks in no undecided way for the value of the composition.

His most recent success, and one which indubitably places him before the public as a genius to be counted among the greatest our country has produced, was his engagement for a pair of concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra, where he appeared as soloist, conductor and composer. His reception was little short of sensational.

From JOURNAL DEC 5 A
Providence, R. I.

Providence folk have a special interes in the soloist who will appear with th Boston Symphony Orchestra at its con cert in this city on Dec. 14. Samue Gardner, violinist, is essentially a loca man, having lived in this city since h was brought to America as a baby b his parents. Born near Odessa, in 1892 his family was forced to leave Russi because of the terrible persecutions o that time. In this city he received hi early musical training under [illegible] Wendelschaefer.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From C. 9 ERALD

SYMPHONY IS TO PLAY AT EMPIRE SUNDAY, DEC. 26

The second musical event of the season in Fall River will be the concert by the pre-eminent Boston Symphony orchestra to be given under the auspices of the woman's club in the Empire theatre, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26, at 3 sharp.

This great orchestra, for so long a by-word not only in America but also in the musical world, is now celebrating in a highly successful fashion the fortieth anniversary season of its history. Not only in Boston but in New York and other cities where it has already visited, the fine quality of its personnel, 100 strong, and the genius of its conductor, Pierre Monteux, have been generally praised. Mr. Monteux has arranged a rather popular program for Fall River, which nevertheless represents the finest achievement in the orchestral repertoire.

The symphony for the occasion will be that of the Bohemian composer, Dvorak, which he wrote during his visit to this country and entitled, "From the New World.' Whether he used actual melodies from our negro music or was merely influenced by the characteristic rhythm of their dances and "spirituals" was the subject of prolonged and fruitless controversy. However, all that is important is that the music bears these characteristics, is also Bohemian in spirit and one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written. Its popularity in this country from that time to this has been unflagging, particularly famous for the Largo with the melancholy and haunting melody for English horn solo.

The two celebrated soloist at this concert, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play a concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra in E-flat by Mozart, with the great orchestra, are well known here. In a number of eastern cities, these two young American artists have attracted enthusiastic attention by their adjoint concerts, in which they wrought music for two pianos to a perfection of performance, hitherto scarcely known. They are to play this same double concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston, previous to their appearance here. Mr. Maier was active in France during the war, giving many concerts for the soldiers there in recitals of his own. Both in Europe and America he has caused considerable stir in the musical world.

Pierre Monteux will close the afternoon with the highly brilliant, dashing "Roumanian Rhapsody," by Georges Enesco, the famous composer of Roumania.

Single seats for this concert go on sale next Monday morning, Dec. 13, at the Empire theatre. As the supply is limited, owing to the large subscription sale, those desiring tickets are advised to apply early.

From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Second Boston Symphony Con

A few vacant seats in the Opera House of the Academy of Music last week, Friday evening, again offered proof of a slight decline in interest in the visits of the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is distinctly as it should not be. The interest in the five concerts ought, in fact, to be such as to occasion the "All seats sold" announcement in advance of each concert—as was the case when the New York Philharmonic played in the same auditorium the following Sunday afternoon. As for last week's concert, it was varied enough and "popular" enough to have aroused the audience to rather more enthusiasm than it did. The sole novelty, the "Symphonic Fantasia" by Guillaume Lekeu, the Belgian composer, who died the day after his twenty-fourth birthday, is a work of much merit—based on two Anjou folk songs, the first of which is delightfully "given out by the clarinet," to quote the program. It expresses with real beauty the eternal call of love, which will not take no for a reply. Both the opening number, the "Schéhérazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the closing number "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," are familiar not only on concert programs but, through the Ballet Russe, on the stage. They were played finely and the indications were that of the two the audience preferred the Russian composition, with its ingratiating melodies, rather than the more complicated musical structure from Germany. Even more familiar were Mary Jordan's two contributions to the program—"Ah, mon fils" from "Le Prophète" and "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila." In neither was Miss Jordan, who is a singer with a deservedly fine reputation, heard to the best advantage, and it is a pity that at least one of them was not replaced by something non-operatic. Among those in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Henry F. Noyes, Mr. and Mrs. John Taylor Arms, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. John Hills, Mrs. William L. Van Sinderen, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Miss Grac Collins, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Peabody, Mr. John yatt Brewer, Mrs. John W. Chapman, Miss Anna Hal, Mr. Walter H. Crittenden and Mr. Elijah R. Ken y.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 Globe
From DEC 9 F

FALL RIV

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DEC. 26

The second musical event of the season in Fall River will be the concert by the pre-eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given under the auspices of the Woman's Club in the Empire Theatre, Fall River, on Sunday afternoon, December 26, at 3 o'clock sharp.

This great orchestra, for so long a by-word not only in America but also in the musical world, is now celebrating in a highly successful fashion the fortieth anniversary season of its history. Not only in Boston but in New York and other cities where it has already visited, the fine quality of its personnel, 100 strong, and the genius of its conductor, Pierre Monteux, has been generally praised. Mr. Monteux has arranged a rather popular program for Fall River, which nevertheless represents the finest achievement in the orchestral repertoire.

The two celebrated soloists at this concert, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will play a concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra in E-flat by Mozart, with the great orchestra, are well known here. In a number of our eastern cities, these two young American artists have attracted enthusiastic attention by their adjoint concerts, in which they wrought music for two pianos to a perfection of performance, hitherto scarcely known. They are to play this same double concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, previous to their appearance here. Mr. Maier was active in France during the war, giving many concerts for the soldiers there in recitals of his own. Both in Europe and America, he has caused considerable stir in the musical world.

Pierre Monteux will close the afternoon with the highly brilliant, dashing "Roumanian Rhapsody," by Georges Enesco, the famous composer of Roumania.

Single seats for this concert go on sale next Monday morning, December 13th, at the Empire Theatre. As the supply is limited, owing to the large subscription sale, those desiring tickets are advised to apply early.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

DEC 2 A

Special interest is manifested in the ppearance of Samuel Gardner as soloist ith the Boston Symphony Orchestra at he second concert of the season in In- antry Hall on Tuesday evening. His chievements in foreign fields have rought him an enviable reputation.

Mr. Gardner learned the elements of is art in this city, where he studied ith Evangeline Larry, who did much o interest music lovers in his career. e later studied with Franz Kneisel and ecame a member of the Kneisel Quar- et. With that organization, in numer- us recitals of his own, and in appear- nces with the different orchestras, he as captivated audience after audience by his musicianship and executive brilliance.

This musician is also a composer of importance. His string quartet was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500. Mr. Gardner received the Loeb prize of $500 for his symphonic poem, "New Russia." "A Night in the Rockies" and "From the Cane-brake" are well known. There is naturally considerable interest, therefore, in his new concerto for his own instrument with orchestra. This work will be played by him for the first time at the coming Boston Symphony concert.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's last symphony, the Fourth, in D-minor, one of the master's most poetic and beautiful works. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will open the concert and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" will close it—music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country which are treated in such strikingly original and colorful fashion as to make this piece one of the most popular in the orchestral repertory.

TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.

DEC 12

GARDNER BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Several years ago a very young citizen of Providence attracted considerable attention hereabouts by his remarkable talent, playing the violin in semi-private musicales. This boy, Samuel Gardner, has since become a young man. He has travelled about the world, studied and played, easily taking a foremost place among the rising violinists of our day.

His genius equally accepted by all, he is returning to Providence and will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 14, at 8:15.

Mr. Gardner learned the elements of his art in Providence, but later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the Kneisel Quartet. With that eminent organization, in numerous recitals of his own, and in appearances with the different orchestras, he has captivated audience after audience by the supreme beauty of his tone and his executive brilliance.

This fine musician is also a composer of importance. His string quartet was awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500. Mr. Gardner also received the Loeb prize of $500 for his symphonic poem, "New Russia." "A Night in the Rockies" and "From the Cane-brake," are even better known. There is naturally considerable interest, therefore, in his new concerto for his own instrument with orchestra. This work will be played by him for the first time at the coming Boston Symphony concert.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's last symphony, the Fourth, in D-minor, one of the master's most poetic and beautiful works. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will open the concert and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" will close it—music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country which are treated in such strikingly original and colorful fashion as to make this piece one of the most popular in the orchestral repertory.

---

rom

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town this past week and gave two concerts in Carnegie Hall. As usual, this organization attracted large audiences, not as large, however, as the audiences that used to attend these concerts. There were some vacant seats in the hall, a thing unknown some years ago when the Boston organization was in the height of its popularity.

There is always a feeling of regret in attending a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in these days. While there is undoubted merit in much of its performances, one misses that perfection of tone and ensemble that distinguished its playing in the days before adversity set in upon the fortunes of this old and honorable society. There was a time when the Boston Symphony was unsurpassed, if equalled, by any organization in this country, or in the whole world for that matter. The entire troubles of the Boston orchestra can be laid directly to the world war. It has never been the same since Dr. Muck was forced to leave the post of conductor. Whatever one may say of Dr. Muck, there is no gainsaying the fact that he was a conductor of eminent distinction and brought the Boston orchestra to a plane of the highest excellence.

From

SAMUEL GARDNER PLAYS HIS OWN CONCERTO HERE

A few years ago when the youthful Samuel Gardner appeared here in public his friends predicted that a brilliant musical future was just ahead of him. Last night they saw their predictions spring into realization.

The young violinist and composer came to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. He played for the first time in public his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor and merited such applause from the large audience as assured him of its success. The composition, in slow movement, brings back memories of far-off Russia from which Gardner came to Providence when a boy, and then in final movement swiftly brings forth a reflection of the composer's vivid personality.

Mr. Gardner obtained his musical education in America under M. Kneisel and later under Percy Coelschius. His compositions of late years have been numerous and many of them merited high awards. His symphonic poem, "New Russia," won him the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918 and the Pulitzer prize of $1500 went to him in the same year for a string quartet in D-minor.

Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor was the principal orchestral number. The Berlioz overture and a Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor were other features.

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 12

From
WORLD,
New York City

MUSICAL "POTTERISM"

By James Gibbons Huneker.

We blush to utter such Potterisms. There should be no necessity for these obvious criticisms. Another annoying Potterism is the growing hero worship of conductors—nothing rare, by the way, in the history of art. We remember Theodore Thomas in his palmy days; remember that smoothly fitting dress coat of his. Yes, there were many women who attended the Philharmonic Society concerts to gaze ecstatically upon the shapely back and harmonious movements of this handsome conductor. Another prima donna conductor was Arthur Nikisch of the Boston band. He waved lily white hands; his weaving motions fascinated the eye. They seemed in their rhythmic variety the externalization of the music he was interpreting, and, according to Delsarte and Dalcroze, they were. But both Thomas and Nikisch were great conductors—Nikisch still is; indeed, he is the dean of great conductors. His personal mannerisms were and are taken as a matter of course. We do not include Artur Bodanzky among the prima donna baton heroes. Nevertheless, he is a hero, and a hero always in a hurry. He is the most precise and businesslike of our conductors. He seems as if he were making a train to Eldorado. Yet it is only a fancy. He is absolutely master of his technical and intellectual resources. The enormous dynamic energy of the man, his driving power, are concentrated at the tip of his stick. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra boasts a demon drummer, the National Symphony Orchestra can boast a demon conductor. Bodanzky is demoniacal when he cuts loose. At the second "Tristan" performance he galloped his men at such a pace that the singers could only pant after them. A great conductor is Artur with the Weber profile and the propulsive right hand. If he had a calm left hand like Thomas or Nikisch his readings would benefit thereby. But how stimulating is his conducting! You swing along on the crest of exaltation and forget the composer's intentions in the tumultuous symphonic sea. A brilliant apparition, a stork of genius, but with brains, always brains. The dark horse of American conductors is Ossip Gabrilowitsch. That young man will bear watching.

* * *

His antipodes is Walter Damrosch, who is as familiar a spectacle nowadays as Trinity Church. Walter leaves nothing to chance. He doesn't believe in the imprevu; with him the unexpected never happens. There is a sense of security at his Symphony Society, the sort of security that appeals to you when sitting under a long beloved preacher. Since 1881, on and off, we have sat metaphorically at the feet of Walter Damrosch, and not once has he startled, not once has he altogether disappointed us. He is safe, sane and—sometimes—soporific. But he never uses rouge or pencils the eyebrows of his interpretations; perfume is to him abhorrent. Good old Walter! His has been a long race, and his a sober victory. Leopold Stokowski is a pocket edition of Nikisch, a Nikisch without genius. He is the ideal prima donna conductor and exudes sweetness and light (Einstein says that light exudes), and as regards the technique of the baton he has all his contemporaries beaten to a frazzle—save one, Arturo Toscanini. Such economy of gesture, such weighty significance in every motion are praiseworthy. His musicianship is excellent, his memory remarkable, although commanding intellectuality is absent. He too has a sinuous line in his back that enchants his feminine audience. He is graceful, and inevitably makes his entrance carrying his baton as if it were a baby. The Philadelphia Orchestra is largely composed of mediocre material, but thanks to the admirable disciplinarian, that is, Stokowski, it sounds at times as if of prime quality. And tonal quality is precisely what it lacks. Its conductor hypnotizes his audience into thinking it is so. Ah, these Poles! The Oriental mango magic trick over again. Stokowski is young, blond, and has a Chopinesque head, but in profile his chin is as diffident as a poached egg. Pierre Monteux, like a happy nation, has no personal history. He is an accomplished chef. We enjoy his cuisine. There is a savory touch of the Midi in his musical ragouts. And to my horror I find myself indulging in the most reprehensible musical Potterism.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Commercial
New York

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 8. The The program for the evening concert will comprise Tschaikovsky's little known symphony "Manfred" after Byron's dramatic poem. This work, constructed on large lines, describes Manfred's Wanderings and Despair. The Fairy of the Alps. Pastorale. The Palace of Arimanes; invocation to Astartes; Manfred's Death. Mr. Monteux will also give a notable work by Arnold Bax, of Gaelic subject, its first performance in New York "Au Sluagh Sidhe" (In the Fairy Hills). The program includes d'Indy's excerpt "La Queste de Dieu" (The Search for God) from his newest opera "The Legend of St. Christopher," and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

For the matinee, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor will be prefaced by Mozart's Overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni."

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 26 1920

From
STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Concerts

Boston Symphony—Cortot.

At the third concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon January 4, Pierre Monteux will present Schumann's romantic "Fourth Symphony in D Minor," one of the favorite orchestral works of this master; Lalo's brilliant overture to the "King of Ys," which features a cello solo, and Balakireff's oriental fantasy, "Islamey," the notable Russian piano score of which has been orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, the revolutionary Italian composer. The soloist of the afternoon will be Alfred Cortot, famed as the finest pianist of France, in the "Fifth Concerto," by Saint-Saens, in F major. This music is distinctive by its oriental subject and character and the "Nubian Love Song," which is the theme of the slow movement.

From DEC 15 1920
Vogue
New York City

It can no longer be disguised that in New York, at least, the Philadelphia Orchestra is now holding, both musically and socially, the position of supremacy so long enjoyed by the Boston Symphony. This is due not only to the constantly increasing excellence of the former, but also to the gradual deterioration and disintegration of the latter, since Pierre Monteux became the conductor. The cause, on the face of it, seems to be a purely nationalistic one. The new leader is a Frenchman,—a fact sufficient in itself to arouse antagonism among those members of the organization who happened to be of opposing sympathies. Whether or not this is the true reason, it is certainly significant that certain of these members, after hindering Mr. Monteux's work by the most flagrant and open hostility, eventually defected to another orchestra and thus disrupted the greatest symphonic band in this country. Their action occasions no gratitude, and it is to be hoped that the sympathies of the public will be with Mr. Monteux.

The Philadelphia organization again showed, at its opening concert, that superb virtuosity and perfection of ensemble that have given it the lead among American orchestras; but it has not yet acquired that golden quality of tone which made the Boston Symphony world famous. Its leader, perhaps, has gained even more, artistically, since last season attaining new climactic effects which before seemed beyond his powers. This was especially noticeable in Alfredo Casella's orchestral rhapsody "Italia", which received its first hearing in New York.

AMERICAN, DEC 19
Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next concert here on January 5.

Arrigo Serato, violinist, is to give the next Friday afternoon Peabody recital, on January 7, 1921.

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.

DEC 15

SAMUEL GARDNER IN CONCERT

Noted Violinist Appears in Boston Symphony Orchestra Series.

There were few vacant seats in Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its able leader, Mr. Pierre Monteux, appeared on the stage amid a burst of applause. It was the second concert in the Providence series of five and Samuel Gardner, gifted violinist of New York formerly of Providence, was the soloist in his own concerto for violin and orchestra played here for the first time on any concert stage.

Naturally the knowledge on the part of local concertgoers that Samuel Gardner was to play his own concerto in this city where his early youth was spent and where he learned the elements of his art, aroused widespread interest and to this fact largely was due the great audience of last evening. There were hundreds in the audience who remembered the now celebrated violinist as "Sammy" Gardner, whose boyhood days—when he was a student of the violin here in Providence—gave promise of a future of high musical achievement, now abundantly fulfilled.

Mr. Gardner, now 27 years of age, learned the elements of his art in this city and later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the famous Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Gardner began work on the concerto played last evening in New York on June 29, 1920, and completed it at Estes Park, Col., on Aug. 15 and orchestrated it in New York Sept. 9-Oct. 24. The orchestral portion of the concerto is dedicated to Franz Kneisel who, with Felix Winternitz, an early teacher of the violinist, was in the audience last evening.

Mr. Gardner is widely known as a violinist, having played with the Symphony Society of New York, the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and given many recitals. The list of his compositions includes a symphony in F-minor; symphonic poem for orchestra, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in New York, June, 1918, performed at the Stadium, New York city, in July and August, 1919, and July, 1920, conducted by the composer, and by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Oct. 24, 1919; string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University in June, 1918 (the second movement has been performed by the Flonzaley Quartet); Prelude and Fugue for string quartet; "Hebraic Fantasie" for string quartet and clarinet; variations for string quartet; 16 pieces for violin and pianoforte; 15 songs for pianoforte and orchestra; "Splashes of Color" for the pianoforte.

Mr. Gardner's concerto is one which gives ample opportunity for the violinist to display his unquestioned virtuosity and this he did to the great delight of his listeners. Throughout the concert he gave a dazzling exhibition of technical skill. His first notes disclosed a penetrating tone full of vitality. His technique is clean, his intonation admirable and there is a refinement, a delicate finish in all his work. Of unusual beauty was his playing of the last movement of the concerto.

He was greeted with prolonged applause at the end of each movement of the concerto and at the close he received an ovation which found expression in four recalls.

That the concerto is of high musical value was the opinion of all who heard it last evening, the first movement being full of brilliant runs and passages while the finale is individualistic, spiritual and replete with delicious melody.

The full program of the concert was as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, Berlioz; "Symphony No. 4 in D-minor, Op. 120," Schumann; "Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-Minor, Op. 18," Gardner; "Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major, Op. 11, No. 1," Enesco.

The brilliant Berlioz "Overture," which opened the program, was magnificently played by the orchestra and the performance of Schumann's last symphony, the "Fourth in D-minor," one of this great composer's most poetic and beautiful works, was a remarkable one; a performance indeed that might be classed as noble, a performance inspired by Mr. Monteux and characterized by an infinite variety of tonal force and color.

This symphony was first published as Schumann's "Second Symphony in D-minor," and later revised and published as "No. 4 in D-Minor."

The four movements of the symphony are closely connected besides having a common thematic material and for this reason, doubtless, it was Schumann's wish that the symphony should be played without pauses between the movements. It was so played by the orchestra last evening. An exultant finale crowns this monumental work and at its close Mr. Monteux was recalled several times, the last time, at a signal, the members of the orchestra rising and—with the conductor—acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The usual intermission of ten minutes followed the symphony, and at the close of this brief interval Mr. Gardner appeared with the orchestra amid prolonged applause.

The Rumanian Rhapsody in A Major, music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country and treated in original and colorful fashion, brought the concert to a brilliant close.

N. B. P.

From DEC 15
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

GARDNER CONCERTO HAS PREMIERE HERE

Former Providence Boy Appears As Composer-Soloist.

IS TENDERED OVATION

Infantry Hall Audience, Charmed by Boston Symphony Orchestra's Rendition of Samuel Gardner's Composition, Recalls Young Violinist Many Times at Close.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Samuel Gardner, a former Providence boy, appearing in the dual role of solo violinist and composer, played before a big audience in Infantry Hall last evening.

Mr. Gardner played, for the first time anywhere, his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor, in which work he scored a big success. It was a concert that held especial interest for many who were present, for to them it was a fulfilment of predictions made years ago when Mr. Gardner was a very small boy. Even in those days he showed marked talent for the violin. His musical nature and ability to play technically difficult pieces with ease caused those who heard him to say that some day "Sammy" Gardner would become a great violinist.

"Sammy" was a bright youngster, a favorite among his schoolmates, full of fun and always ready to play his violin at school affairs, little social times at the homes of his friends, or to help in any possible way with his talent. Since those boyhood days his friends have watched with pride "Sammy's" rise to fame and it was fitting that he should select his old home town as the scene of his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to choose for performance for the first time anywhere his latest and most mature work.

Mr. Gardner is now 27 years old. His career has been one of steady and healthy growth. His early excellent instruction in this city was continued under Felix Winternitz of Boston, and then for several years with Franz Kneisel, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both Mr. Winternitz and Mr. Kneisel were interested listeners at last night's concert.

TRAINED IN AMERICA

To his knowledge of harmony and a thorough general musical education obtained while under the guidance of Mr. Kneisel, the young violinist added the study of composition with Percy Goelschius of New York. So, it will be seen, Mr. Gardner is entirely an American-trained musician.

Talent for composition has led him to write many things: a symphony; a symphonic poem, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918, and a string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University, 1918. His compositions also include other works for string quartet, many pieces for violin and piano and songs.

The concerto played last evening is Mr. Gardner's most important composition to date. It was composed for the most part during his vacation this summer at Estes Park, Colorado, and orchestrated later in New York. Although at first hearing it was not easy to grasp the full significance of the work, which is decidedly modern in character, the general effect gives the critical listener a good idea of its musical value. On short acquaintance it appears to be of exceptional merit.

The solo violin voice is interesting throughout; originality is written on every page; the thematic material is excellent and in the working out of his ideas the composer has shown a fine grasp of orchestral technique. What he has to say is said in coherent musical language and there is nowhere apparent that tendency so frequently encountered in the efforts of young composers—to thicken the score in the hope to cover up the lack of ideas. The slow movement breathes the spirit of the Orient—or is it a tinge of that Russian sombreness born of generations of oppression?—for Mr. Gardner was born in Russia, and inherited mental tendencies are not easily blotted out even though one is brought up in free America.

The first movement is decidedly interesting, and there is a brilliant and effective cadenza. The final movement is sprightly, dashing, and reflects the energetic spirit which is a pleasing quality in the composer's personality. All in all the concerto seems a notable addition to the list of important American instrumental works and one that should place its creator in the front rank of this country's composers.

BRILLIANT IN TECHNIQUE

Mr. Gardner played with authority and finish. His tone is larger than when he last played here, and he displayed great technical brilliancy in portions of the work. The character of the concerto's three movements are indicated in the score, as follows: I. Ben moderato—Declamando con molto passione; Allegro con fuoco. II. Lento—alla maniera maestoso. III. Poco moderato et largamente; Allegro con quietezza.

After each movement Mr. Gardner was greeted with prolonged applause and at the close he was recalled many times.

The programme's principal orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor. It is one of that composer's finest symphonies and has been presented here many times by the Boston orchestra. Its beauties do not fade and understanding. The [illegible] was [illegible] with delightful smoothness, Concertmaster Burgin's incidental violin solo being delicately and sweetly played. The Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" opened the programme. In this descriptive piece the final martial climax was brought out with tremendous brilliancy.

A Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor by the young Roumanian composer, Enesco, was the final number. This is a most novel and interesting orchestral concert. It is a series of striking colorful musical episodes. During its progress one almost involuntarily pictures a wild peasant dance of many strange steps and postures which increase in speed and reckless abandon until a final whirling figure ends the spectacle. The orchestra played it with spirit, bringing out the well contrasted instrumental effects in splendid fashion.

A. F. P.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Brahms To Be Played.

Brahms' fourth symphony (in E minor), playing of which was deferred courteously by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at its last Baltimore concert after it was brought to his attention the large work had been played here two weeks before by another orchestra, will be played by the orchestra at its next Baltimore concert on January 5.

Mr. Monteux has decided upon this not only because considerable time has elapsed, now, since the last performance of the symphony but also because several patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts here have written to him of their desire to hear it. It is understood, also, by the orchestra's management that its subscribers in Baltimore are mostly different from those of the other orchestras' concerts.

This decision of Mr. Monteux is equally as wise as his former one (which was for benefit of those who attend practically all concerts). Mendelssohn's octet for stringed instruments, which was substituted for the former occasion, also was enjoyed largely not only for itself, but also for its seldom hearing. The Brahms' symphonies are monumental art works, however, and no illegitimate circumstance should be allowed to hinder their exhibition, particularly in the period when their enjoyment is keenest and appreciation is growing.

Mr. Monteux has earned gratitude again.

Another seldom heard but by no means ancient work will be presented in Baltimore at this same concert by Alfred Cortot, noted French pianist. This is Saint-Saens' fifth concerto (in F major) for solo piano and orchestra.

The overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" will be the closing piece of the concert.

From
Evening Sun

Lyric—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concert here on the evening of January 5 with Alfred Cortot, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist. He will play the Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens in F major. The orchestral numbers will include Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

On December 29 the seat sale will begin for the fourth concert of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which takes place at the Lyric on Sunday afternoon, January 9. The soloist will be Cecil Arden, contralto, now in her fifth season with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The symphony will be the one in E flat by Mozart.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

DEC 26

Cortot as Soloist.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony season, to be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 4, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's romantic and melodically beautiful Fourth Symphony in D minor, which has long been one of the favorite orchestral works of this master.

He will also present Lalo's brilliant Overture to the "King of Ys," which features a 'cello solo, and will conclude the concert with Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey."

The soloist of the afternoon will be Alfred Cortot, the finest pianist of France, who will be heard in the brilliant Fifth Concerto by Saint-

---

TIMES, DEC 26
Brooklyn, N. Y.

CORTOT BOSTON SOLOIST.

At the third regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 7, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's romantic and melodically beautiful Fourth Symphony in D minor, which has long been one of the favorite orchestral works of this master. He will also present Mozart's overture to the opera "Don Giovanni," and will conclude the concert with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," which notable Russian piano score has been orchestrated by the revolutionary Italian composer, Alfred Casella. The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, indisputably named as the finest pianist in France, who will be heard in the brilliant Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens, in F major. This music is distinctive by its Oriental subject and character and the Nubian Love Song, which [illegible] theme of the slow movement.

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 12 L

From
WORLD,
New York City

MUSICAL "POTTERISM"

By James Gibbons Huneker.

We blush to utter such Potterisms. There should be no necessity for these obvious criticisms. Another annoying Potterism is the growing hero worship of conductors—nothing rare, by the way, in the history of art. We remember Theodore Thomas in his palmy days; remember that smoothly fitting dress coat of his. Yes, there were many women who attended the Philharmonic Society concerts to gaze ecstatically upon the shapely back and harmonious movements of this handsome conductor. Another prima donna conductor was Arthur Nikisch of the Boston band. He waved lily white hands; his weaving motions fascinated the eye. They seemed in their rhythmic variety the externalization of the music he was interpreting, and, according to Delsarte and Dalcroze, they were. But both Thomas and Nikisch were great conductors—Nikisch still is; indeed, he is the dean of great conductors. His personal mannerisms were and are taken as a matter of course. We do not include Artur Bodanzky among the prima donna baton heroes. Nevertheless, he is a hero, and a hero always in a hurry. He is the most precise and businesslike of our conductors. He seems as if he were making a train to Eldorado. Yet it is only a fancy. He is absolutely master of his technical and intellectual resources. The enormous dynamic energy of the man, his driving power, are concentrated at the tip of his stick. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra boasts a demon drummer, the National Symphony Orchestra can boast a demon conductor. Bodanzky is demoniacal when he cuts loose. At the second "Tristan" performance he galloped his men at such a pace that the singers could only pant after them. A great conductor is Artur with the Weber profile and the propulsive right hand. If he had a calm left hand like Thomas or Nikisch his readings would benefit thereby. But how stimulating is his conducting! You swing along on the crest of exaltation and forget the composer's intentions in the tumultuous symphonic sea. A brilliant apparition, a stork of genius, but with brains, always brains. The dark horse of American conductors is Ossip Gabrilowitsch. That young man will bear watching.

* * *

His antipodes is Walter Damrosch, who is as familiar a spectacle nowadays as Trinity Church. Walter leaves nothing to chance. He doesn't believe in the imprevu; with him the unexpected never happens. There is a sense of security at his Symphony Society, the sort of security that appeals to you when sitting under a long beloved preacher. Since 1881, on and off, we have sat metaphorically at the feet of Walter Damrosch, and not once has he startled, not once has he altogether disappointed us. He is safe, sane and—sometimes—soporific. But he never uses rouge or pencils the eyebrows of his interpretations; perfume is to him abhorrent. Good old Walter! His has been a long race, and his a sober victory. Leopold Stokowski is a pocket edition of Nikisch, a Nikisch without genius. He is the ideal prima donna conductor and exudes sweetness and light (Einstein says that light exudes), and as regards the technique of the baton he has all his contemporaries beaten to a frazzle—save one, Arturo Toscanini. Such economy of gesture, such weighty significance in every motion are praiseworthy. His musicianship is excellent, his memory remarkable, although commanding intellectuality is absent. He too has a sinuous line in his back that enchants his feminine audience. He is graceful, and inevitably makes his entrance carrying his baton as if it were a baby. The Philadelphia Orchestra is largely composed of mediocre material, but thanks to the admirable disciplinarian, that is, Stokowski, it sounds at times as if of prime quality. And tonal quality is precisely what it lacks. Its conductor hypnotises his audience into thinking it is so. Ah, these Poles! The Oriental mango magic trick over again. Stokowski is young, blond, and has a Chopinesque head, but in profile his chin is as diffident as a poached egg. Pierre Monteux, like a happy nation, has no personal history. He is an accomplished chef. We enjoy his cuisine. There is a savory touch of the Midi in his musical ragouts. And to my horror I find myself indulging in the most reprehensible musical Potterism.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Commercial
New York

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 8. The The program for the evening concert will comprise Tschaikovsky's little known symphony "Manfred" after Byron's dramatic poem. This work, constructed on large lines, describes Manfred's Wanderings and Despair. The Fairy of the Alps. Pastorale. The Palace of Arimanes; invocation to Astartes; Manfred's Death. Mr. Monteux will also give a notable work by Arnold Bax, of Gaelic subject, its first performance in New York "Au Sluagh Sidhe" (In the Fairy Hills). The program includes d'Indy's excerpt "La Queste de Dieu" (The Search for God) from his newest opera "The Legend of St. Christopher," and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

For the matinee, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor will be prefaced by Mozart's Overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Concerts

Boston Symphony—Cortot.

At the third concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 4, Pierre Monteux will present Schumann's romantic "Fourth Symphony in D Minor," one of the favorite orchestral works of this master; Lalo's brilliant overture to the "King of Ys," which features a cello solo, and Balakireff's oriental fantasy, "Islamey," the notable Russian piano score of which has been orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, the revolutionary Italian composer. The soloist of the afternoon will be Alfred Cortot, famed as the finest pianist of France, in the "Fifth Concerto," by Saint-Saens, in F major. This music is distinctive by its oriental subject and character and the "Nubian Love Song," which is the theme of the slow movement.

From DEC 15 1920 K
Vogue
New York City

It can no longer be disguised that in New York, at least, the Philadelphia Orchestra is now holding, both musically and socially, the position of supremacy so long enjoyed by the Boston Symphony. This is due not only to the constantly increasing excellence of the former, but also to the gradual deterioration and disintegration of the latter, since Pierre Monteux became the conductor. The cause, on the face of it, seems to be a purely nationalistic one. The new leader is a Frenchman,—a fact sufficient in itself to arouse antagonism among those members of the organization who happened to be of opposing sympathies. Whether or not this is the true reason, it is certainly significant that certain of these members, after hindering Mr. Monteux's work by the most flagrant and open hostility, eventually defected to another orchestra and thus disrupted the greatest symphonic band in this country. Their action occasions no gratitude, and it is to be hoped that the sympathies of the public will be with Mr. Monteux.

The Philadelphia organization again showed, at its opening concert, that superb virtuosity and perfection of ensemble that have given it the lead among American orchestras; but it has not yet acquired that golden quality of tone which made the Boston Symphony world famous. Its leader, perhaps, has gained even more, artistically, since last season attaining new climactic effects which before seemed beyond his powers. This was especially noticeable in Alfredo Casella's orchestral rhapsody "Italia", which received its first hearing in New York.

From AMERICAN, 9 M
Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next concert here on January 5.

Arrigo Serato, violinist, is to give the next Friday afternoon Peabody recital, on January 7, 1921.

TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
DEC 5

SAMUEL GARDNER IN CONCERT

Noted Violinist Appears in Boston Symphony Orchestra Series.

There were few vacant seats in Infantry Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its able leader, Mr. Pierre Monteux, appeared on the stage amid a burst of applause. It was the second concert in the Providence series of five and Samuel Gardner, gifted violinist of New York formerly of Providence, was the soloist in his own concerto for violin and orchestra played here for the first time on any concert stage.

Naturally the knowledge on the part of local concertgoers that Samuel Gardner was to play his own concerto in this city where his early youth was spent and where he learned the elements of his art, aroused widespread interest and to this fact largely was due the great audience of last evening. There were hundreds in the audience who remembered the now celebrated violinist as "Sammy" Gardner, whose boyhood days—when he was a student of the violin here in Providence—gave promise of a future of high musical achievement, now abundantly fulfilled.

Mr. Gardner, now 27 years of age, learned the elements of his art in this city and later studied with Franz Kneisel and became a member of the famous Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Gardner began work on the concerto played last evening in New York on June 29, 1920, and completed it at Estes Park, Col., on Aug. 15 and orchestrated it in New York Sept. 9-Oct. 24. The orchestral portion of the concerto is dedicated to Franz Kneisel who, with Felix Winternitz, an early teacher of the violinist, was in the audience last evening.

Mr. Gardner is widely known as a violinist, having played with the Symphony Society of New York, the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and given many recitals. The list of his compositions includes a symphony in F-minor; symphonic poem for orchestra, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in New York, June, 1918, performed at the Stadium, New York city, in July and August, 1919, and July, 1920, conducted by the composer, and by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Oct. 24, 1919; string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University in June, 1918 (the second movement has been performed by the Flonzaley Quartet); Prelude and Fugue for string quartet; "Hebraic Fantasie" for string quartet and clarinet; variations for string quartet; 16 pieces for violin and pianoforte; 15 songs for pianoforte and orchestra; "Splashes of Color" for the pianoforte.

Mr. Gardner's concerto is one which gives ample opportunity for the violinist to display his unquestioned virtuosity and this he did to the great delight of his listeners. Throughout the concert he gave a dazzling exhibition of technical skill. His first notes disclosed a penetrating tone full of vitality. His technique is clean, his intonation admirable and there is a refinement, a delicate finish in all his work. Of unusual beauty was his playing of the last movement of the concerto.

He was greeted with prolonged applause at the end of each movement of the concerto and at the close he received an ovation which found expression in four recalls.

That the concerto is of high musical value was the opinion of all who heard it last evening, the first movement being full of brilliant runs and passages while the finale is individualistic, spiritual and replete with delicious melody.

The full program of the concert was as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, Berlioz; "Symphony No. 4 in D-minor, Op. 120," Schumann; "Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-Minor, Op. 18," Gardner; "Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major, Op. 11, No. 1," Enesco.

The brilliant Berlioz "Overture," which opened the program, was magnificently played by the orchestra and the performance of Schumann's last symphony, the "Fourth in D-minor," one of this great composer's most poetic and beautiful works, was a remarkable one; a performance indeed that might be classed as noble, a performance inspired by Mr. Monteux and characterized by an infinite variety of tonal force and color.

This symphony was first published as Schumann's "Second Symphony in D-minor," and later revised and published as "No. 4 in D-Minor."

The four movements of the symphony are closely connected besides having a common thematic material and for this reason, doubtless, it was Schumann's wish that the symphony should be played without pauses between the movements. It was so played by the orchestra last evening. An exultant finale crowns this monumental work and at its close Mr. Monteux was recalled several times, the last time, at a signal, the members of the orchestra rising and—with the conductor—acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The usual intermission of ten minutes followed the symphony, and at the close of this brief interval Mr. Gardner appeared with the orchestra amid prolonged applause.

The Rumanian Rhapsody in A Major, music constructed upon folk tunes of the composer's native country and treated in original and colorful fashion, brought the concert to a brilliant close.

N. B. P.

From JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

GARDNER CONCERTO HAS PREMIERE HERE

Former Providence Boy Appears As Composer-Soloist.

IS TENDERED OVATION

Infantry Hall Audience, Charmed by Boston Symphony Orchestra's Rendition of Samuel Gardner's Composition, Recalls Young Violinist Many Times at Close.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Samuel Gardner, a former Providence boy, appearing in the dual role of solo violinist and composer, played before a big audience in Infantry Hall last evening.

Mr. Gardner played, for the first time anywhere, his new concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor, in which work he scored a big success. It was a concert that held especial interest for many who were present, for to them it was a fulfilment of predictions made years ago when Mr. Gardner was a very small boy. Even in those days he showed marked talent for the violin. His musical nature and ability to play technically difficult pieces with ease caused those who heard him to say that some day "Sammy" Gardner would become a great violinist.

"Sammy" was a bright youngster, a favorite among his schoolmates, full of fun and always ready to play his violin at school affairs, little social times at the homes of his friends, or to help in any possible way with his talent. Since those boyhood days his friends have watched with pride "Sammy's" rise to fame and it was fitting that he should select his old home town as the scene of his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to choose for performance for the first time anywhere his latest and most mature work.

Mr. Gardner is now 27 years old. His career has been one of steady and healthy growth. His early excellent instruction in this city was continued under Felix Winternitz of Boston, and then for several years with Franz Kneisel, former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both Mr. Winternitz and Mr. Kneisel were interested listeners at last night's concert.

TRAINED IN AMERICA

To his knowledge of harmony and a thorough general musical education obtained while under the guidance of Mr. Kneisel, the young violinist added the study of composition with Percy Goelschius of New York. So, it will be seen, Mr. Gardner is entirely an American-trained musician.

Talent for composition has led him to write many things: a symphony; a symphonic poem, "New Russia," awarded the Loeb prize of $500 in 1918, and a string quartet in D-minor, awarded the Pulitzer prize of $1500 by Columbia University, 1918. His compositions also include other works for string quartet, many pieces for violin and piano and songs.

The concerto played last evening is Mr. Gardner's most important composition to date. It was composed for the most part during his vacation this summer at Estes Park, Colorado, and orchestrated later in New York. Although at first hearing it was not easy to grasp the full significance of the work, which is decidedly modern in character, the general effect gives the critical listener a good idea of its musical value. On short acquaintance it appears to be of exceptional merit.

The solo violin voice is interesting throughout; originality is written on every page; the thematic material is excellent and in the working out of his ideas the composer has shown a fine grasp of orchestral technique. What he has to say is said in coherent musical language and there is nowhere apparent that tendency so frequently encountered in the efforts of young composers—to thicken the score in the hope to cover up the lack of ideas. The slow movement breathes the spirit of the Orient—or is it a tinge of that Russian sombreness born of generations of oppression?—for Mr. Gardner was born in Russia, and inherited mental tendencies are not easily blotted out even though one is brought up in free America.

The first movement is decidedly interesting, and there is a brilliant and effective cadenza. The final movement is sprightly, dashing, and reflects the energetic spirit which is a pleasing quality in the composer's personality. All in all the concerto seems a notable addition to the list of important American instrumental works and one that should place its creator in the front rank of this country's composers.

BRILLIANT IN TECHNIQUE

Mr. Gardner played with authority and finish. His tone is larger than when he last played here, and he displayed great technical brilliancy in portions of the work. The character of the concerto's three movements are indicated in the score, as follows: I. Ben moderato—Declamando con molto passione; Allegro con fuoco. II. Lento—alla maniera maestoso. III. Poco moderato et largamente; Allegro con quietezza.

After each movement Mr. Gardner was greeted with prolonged applause and at the close he was recalled many times.

The programme's principal orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor. It is one of that composer's finest symphonies and has been presented here many times by the Boston orchestra. Its beauties do not fade and Mr. Monteux read it with sympathetic understanding. The Romanza was given with delightful smoothness, Concertmaster Burgin's incidental violin solo being delicately and sweetly played. The Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" opened the programme. In this descriptive piece the final martial climax was brought out with tremendous brilliancy.

A Roumanian Rhapsody in A-minor by the young Roumanian composer, Enesco, was the final number. This is a most novel and interesting orchestral concert. It is a series of striking colorful musical episodes. During its progress one almost involuntarily pictures a wild peasant dance of many strange steps and postures which increase in speed and reckless abandon until a final whirling figure ends the spectacle. The orchestra played it with spirit, bringing out the well contrasted instrumental effects in splendid fashion.

A. F. P.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

Brahms To Be Played.

Brahms' fourth symphony (in E minor), playing of which was deferred courteously by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at its last Baltimore concert after it was brought to his attention the large work had been played here two weeks before by another orchestra, will be played by the orchestra at its next Baltimore concert on January 5.

Mr. Monteux has decided upon this not only because considerable time has elapsed, now, since the last performance of the symphony but also because several patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts here have written to him of their desire to hear it. It is understood, also, by the orchestra's management that its subscribers in Baltimore are mostly different from those of the other orchestras' concerts.

This decision of Mr. Monteux is equally as wise as his former one (which was for benefit of those who attend practically all concerts). Mendelssohn's octet for stringed instruments, which was substituted for the former occasion, also was enjoyed largely not only for itself, but also for its seldom hearing. The Brahms' symphonies are monumental art works, however, and no illegitimate circumstance should be allowed to hinder their exhibition, particularly in the period when their enjoyment is keenest and appreciation is growing.

Mr. Monteux has earned gratitude again.

Another seldom heard but by no means ancient work will be presented in Baltimore at this same concert by Alfred Cortot, noted French pianist. This is Saint-Saens' fifth concerto (in F major) for solo piano and orchestra.

The overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" will be the closing piece of the concert.

From
Evening Sun

Lyric—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concert here on the evening of January 5 with Alfred Cortot, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist. He will play the Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens in F major. The orchestral numbers will include Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

On December 29 the seat sale will begin for the fourth concert of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which takes place at the Lyric on Sunday afternoon, January 9. The soloist will be Cecil Arden, contralto, now in her fifth season with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The symphony will be the one in E flat by Mozart.

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

Cortot as Soloist.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony season, to be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 4, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's romantic and melodically beautiful Fourth Symphony in D minor, which has long been one of the favorite orchestral works of this master.

He will also present Lalo's brilliant Overture to the "King of Ys," which features a 'cello solo, and will conclude the concert with Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey."

The soloist of the afternoon will be Alfred Cortot, the finest pianist of France, who will be heard in the brilliant Fifth Concerto by Saint-

---

TIMES, N. Y.
Brooklyn, N. Y.

CORTOT BOSTON SOLOIST.

At the third regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 7, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's romantic and melodically beautiful Fourth Symphony in D minor, which has long been one of the favorite orchestral works of this master. He will also present Mozart's overture to the opera "Don Giovanni," and will conclude the concert with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," which notable Russian piano score has been orchestrated by the revolutionary Italian composer, Alfred Casella. The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, indisputably named as the finest pianist in France, who will be heard in the brilliant Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens, in F major. This music is distinctive by its Oriental subject and character, and the Nubian Love Song, which is the theme of the slow movement.

COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPH
HERE JANU

At Parsons's Hartf
Hear Magnifi
Music.

Considerable interest c performance of "Scheher
the Boston Symphony O
Parsons's Theater on M
ing, January 10, at 8:15,
will be one of the first of this popular suite by ra under the guidance Monteux, who was so fa gnificent reading of ballet version when Ballet Russe Orchest ic form of this eously colored musi Nights is of course its authentic for sakoff, the Russian c solely for orchestral r his death in 1908 into a "choreographi ow protested this d
every legal mean
but without success.
ic is so descriptive ing and scenery d
add to its effective score is more diffic than this, nor bet reveal the attainme
o orchestra. There upon each of the ments—the violin,
e, clarinet, flute, b
the drum. The most important o nsuous cadenza-lik
h the concert maste music depicts Sch
an's consort, begi her thousand and certo could exact n master and indeed an opportunity to ts of Richard Bu
ly come to that po
Boston Symphony
ts described in t sky-Korsakoff, wh of setting fairy
The Sea and Sindb of the Kalande
g Prince and the Festival at Bag
Ship goes to Pi surmounted by Conclusion. Th
tures describing th
bad's ship is wrec famous, and th wreck near the c everyone sit on other numbers to concert January 1
sky's Violin Concer ro, the renowned st, and Liszt's s ic poem, "Tasso."
at Sedgwick & C

POST
Washington,

Coming Conc

the third concert o ony season, to be al Theater on , January 4, at ux will conduct symphony in D re to "The King
es a cello solo,
the concert with al fantasy "Islan
by Alfredo Casell Italian composer afternoon will be ench pianist, who brilliant fifth conc n F major. Ticke from Mrs. Wilson ureau, in Droop streets.

LISHED 1881
ning Telegr ew York

Boston Symphony
third pair of all Thursday eve ernoon. The concert will com ttle known but y entitled "M dramatic poem.
he matinee Sch ny in D minor art's overture to

DEC
TH AMERICAN
adelphia, Pa

e Boston Symp
in the Acad January 3 series here)
l present Tc Symphony.
ch pianist,
Saint-Saens
F major.

TIGHT BINDING

...g. The Romanza was given
...tful smoothness. Concertmas-
...s incidental violin solo being
...nd sweetly played. The Ber-
...re to "Benvenuto Cellini"
...programme. In this descrip-
...he final martial climax was
...with tremendous brilliancy.
...ian Rhapsody in A minor by
...Roumanian composer, Enesco,
...nal number. This is a most
...nteresting orchestral concert
...s of striking colorful musical
...uring its progress one al-
...tarily pictures a wild peasant
...any strange steps and pos-
...increase in speed and reck-
...until a final whirling figure
...ectacle. The orchestra played
...t, bringing out the well con-
...rumental effects in splendid

A. F. P.

ICAN, DEC 26

more, Md.

hms To Be Played.

fourth symphony (in E aying of which was de-urteously by the Boston Orchestra, Pierre Monteux at its last Baltimore con-it was brought to his ate large work had been e two weeks before by anhestra, will be played by stra at its next Baltimore n January 5.

n'eux has decided upon this because considerable time ed, now, since the last per-of the symphony but also several patrons of the Bosphony Orchestra's concerts written to him of their dear it. It is understood, also, rchestra's management that cribers in Baltimore are ifferent from those of the chestras' concerts.
ecision of Mr. Monteux is as wise as his former one vas for benefit of those who ractically all concerts). Men's octet for stringed instruhich was substituted for the occasion, also was enjoyed not only for itself, but also eldom hearing. The Brahms' ies are monumental art however, and no illegitimate ance should be allowed to heir exhibition, particularly eriod when their enjoyment st and appreciation is grow-onteux has earned gratitude

er seldom heard but by no ncient work will be presented more at this same concert by Cortot, noted French pianist.
Saint-Saens' fifth concerto (in or) for solo piano and or-overture to Lalo's "Le Roi ill be the closing piece of the

Sun

he Boston Symphony Or be heard in concert here on of January 5 with Alfred istinguished French pianist.
He will play the Fifth Con-int-Saens in F major. The umbers will include Brahms' phony in E minor and Lalo's
"Le Roi d'Ys."

ber 29 the seat sale will be-fourth concert of the Balti-hony Orchestra, which takes Lyric on Sunday afternoon.
The soloist will be Cecil ralto. now in her fifth season etropolitan Opera Company. ny will be the one in E flat

ERALD

Washington, D. C.

DEC 26

rtot as Soloist.

ird concert of the Boston season, to be given in the nal Theater on Tuesday January 4, at 4:30, Pierre will conduct Schumann's nd melodically beautiful phony in D minor, which een one of the favorite works of this master.
also present Lalo's bril-ure to the "King of Ys," res a 'cello solo, and will e concert with Balakial Fantasy, "Islamey."
t of the afternoon will Cortot, the finest pianist who will be heard in the fth Concerto by Saint-

---

n, N. Y. DEC 26

BOSTON SOLOIST.

rd regular concert of the phony Orchestra, to be e Academy of Music on
ing, January 7, at 8:15,
eux will conduct Schu-nantic and melodically ourth Symphony in D has long been one of the estral works of this mas-ill also present Mozart's the opera "Don Giovanni," onclude the concert with Oriental fantasy, "Islanotable Russian piano en orchestrated by the revalian composer, Alfred Caistinguished soloist of the be Alfred Cortot, indis-ned as the finest pianist in will be heard in the bril-Concerto by Saint-Saens, in This music is distinctive by subject and character, and Love Song, which is the

COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE JANUARY 10

At Parsons's Hartford Will Hear Magnificent Music.

Considerable interest centers in the performance of "Scheherazade," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Parsons's Theater on Monday evening, January 10, at 8:15, in that this will be one of the first performances of this popular suite by the orchestra under the guidance of Pierre Monteux, who was so famous for his magnificent reading of this score in its ballet version when he conducted the Ballet Russe Orchestra. The symphonic form of this oriental and gorgeously colored music of the Arabian Nights is of course its finest and also its authentic form. Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote it solely for orchestral use, and only after his death in 1908 was it hashed up into a "choreographic drama." His widow protested this desecration and used every legal means to prevent it, but without success. Indeed, the music is so descriptive in itself that dancing and scenery detract rather than add to its effectiveness. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, horn, even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these, and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concert master intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the Sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. No concerto could exact more of a concert master and indeed this will afford an opportunity to estimate the talents of Richard Burgin, who has newly come to that post of honor in the Boston Symhpony Orchestra. The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakoff, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are The Sea and Sindbad's Ship. The Story of the Kalander-Prince. The Young Prince and the Young Princess. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. The undulating measures describing the sea on which Sindbad's ship is wrecked have long been famous, and th climax of the shipwreck near the close is such to make everyone sit on the edge of his seat.

The other numbers to be played at the concert January 10 are Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto, with Mishel Piastro, the renowned violinist as soloist, and Liszt's splendid symphonic poem, "Tasso." Seats now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's.

POST

s: Washington, D. C.

Coming Concerts

At the third concert of the Boston ymphony season, to be given in the ational Theater on Tuesday afrnoon, January 4, at 4:30, Pierre onteux will conduct Schumann's urth symphony in D minor, Lalo's verture to "The King of Ys," which atures a cello solo, and will con-ude the concert with Balakireff's iental fantasy "Islamey," orches-ated by Alfredo Casella, the revolu-onary Italian composer. The soloist the afternoon will be Alfred Cortot, e French pianist, who will be heard the brilliant fifth concerto by Saintens in F major. Tickets may be ob-ined from Mrs. Wilson-Greene's con-rt bureau, in Droop's, Thirteenth d G streets.

STABLISHED 1881

rom

Morning Telegraph
New York

he Boston Symphony Orchestra will e its third pair of concerts in Car-ie Hall Thursday evening and Satur-afternoon. The program for the ning concert will comprise Tschaikow-
's little known but highly praised phony entitled "Manfred," after on's dramatic poem.
or the matinee Schumann's Fourth phony in D minor will be prefaced Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni."

---

om

ORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ncert in the Academy on Monday ening, January 3 (the third in the rrent series here), Conductor Mon-ux will present Tchaikovski's "Maned" Symphony. The soloist will be e French pianist, Alfred Cortot, who ll play Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Con-to, in F major. The closing number the program will be Balakireff's ental fantasy, "Islamey," which has n arranged for orchestra by Alfredo sella, the modern Italian composer.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 6

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

CORTOT—BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony season to be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 4, at 4:30, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's romantic and melodically beatuful Fourth Symphony in D minor, which has long been one of the favorite orchestral works of this master. He will also present Lalo's brilliant overture to the "King of Ys," which features a cello solo, and will conclude the concert with Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey," this notable Russian piano score having been orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, the revolutionary Italian composer.

Alfred Cortot, indisputably named as the foremost pianist of France, will be the soloist. He will play the brilliant Fifth Concerto, F. major, by Saint-Saens, which is distinctive in its Oriental subject and type and for the Nubian love sing that is the theme of the slow movement. Alfred Cortot is identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school, being a favorite soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts in Paris. In addition to his career as pianist, he was "repetiteur" at Bayreuth and under his conductorship in Paris the Wagner operas had notable performances.

The concerts are under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

---

om EAGLE

ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

At the third regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7, Pierre Monteux will conduct Schumann's romantic, beautiful Fourth Symphony in D minor. He will also present Mozart's Overture to the Opera "Don Giovanni," and will conclude the concert with Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy "Islamey," orchestrated by the revolutionary Italian composer, Alfred Casella. The soloist of the evening will be Alfred Cortot, who will be heard in the Fifth Concerto by Saint-Saens in F major.

---

m EAGLE

dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

Lite.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 8. The program for the evening concert will comprise Tschaikowsky's symphony entitled "Manfred," after Byron's dramatic poem. This work, constructed on large lines, describes "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair, the Fairy of the Alps, Pastorale, the Palace of Arimanes, Invocation to Astartes, Manfred's Death." At this same concert Mr. Monteux will give a work by Arnold Bax, of a Gaelic subject, its first performance in New York, "Au Sluagh Sidhe" (In the Faery Hills). He will also conduct d'Indy's excerpt, "La Questo de Dieu" (The Search for God), from his newest opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher." And the final number will be Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

For the matinee, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor will be prefaced by Mozart's Overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni." The pictorial score, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles T. Griffes, the promising and talented young American composer who died recently, will be played at this concert. Mr. Monteux gave this piece its first performance in New York at one of the Thursday evening concerts last season. The first of the two suites by Francesco Malipiero, entitled "Impressioni dal Vero," will at this concert hav its first performance in New York. The movements describe: First, Il Capinero (the Blackcap); second, Il Capichio (the Woodpecker); third, Il Chiu (The Owl). The closing number will be Balakireff's Oriental Fantasy, "Islamey," orchestrated by the Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

From DEC 30 1920
EVENING POST,
New York City

...usic from Wagner's "Walkyrie."

For the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 8, at 2:30, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programmes: For Thursday evening, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony; a symphonic excerpt from d'Indy's new opera "The Legend of St. Christopher"—"La Queste de Dieu"; "An Slaugh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York; and Lalo's Overture to "The King of Ys." For the Saturday afternoon concert, Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after the poem of Coleridge. Malipiero's first suite, "Impressioni dal Vero," will have its first performance in New York, and the concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 30 1920
From
EVENING MAIL,
New York City

CONCERT

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES

FOR the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night, January 6, and the following Saturday afternoon, the following programmes will be played:

Thursday: Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, a symphonic excerpt from D'Indy's new opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," the "La Questa de Dieu," recently played by the N. Y. Symphony; "An Slaugh Sidhe" (In the Fayery Hills) a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will have its first performance in New York; and Lalo's overture to the "King of Ys."

Saturday afternoon: Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after Coleridge's poem, Malipiero's First Suite "impressioni del Vero," with the movements; Il Capinoro, Il Picchio, Il Chiu, will have its first New York performance.

The concert will close with Brickereff's oriental fantasy, orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schaherazade" to Be Presented at Parsons's on January 10.

Considerable interest centers in the performance of "Scheherazade" by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 10, at 8:15, in that this will be one of the first performances of this popular suite by the orchestra under the guidance of Pierre Monteux, who was so famous for his magnificent reading of this score in its ballet version when he conducted the Ballet Russe orchestr The symphonic form of this oriental and gorgeously colored music of the Arabian Nights is of course its finest and also its authentic form. Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian colorist, wrote it solely for orchestral use, and only after his death in 1908 was it hashed up into a "choreographic drama." His widow protested this desecration and used every legal means to prevent it, but without success. Indeed, the music is so descriptive in itself that dancing and scenery detract rather than add to its effectiveness. Perhaps no score is more difficult and exacting than this, nor better calculated to reveal the attainments of a virtuoso orchestra. There are important solos upon each of the principal instruments—the violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, flute, bassoon, horn, even the drum. The violin solo is the most important of these, and a sensuous cadenza-like theme with which the concertmaster intersperses the music depicts Scheherazade, the sultan's consort, beginning another of her thousand and one tales. No concerto could exact more of a concertmaster, and indeed this will afford an opportunity to estimate the talents of Richard Burgin, who has newly come to that post of honor in the Boston Symphony orchestra. The events described in this score by Rimsky-Korsakoff, who was always fond of setting fairy tales to music are—"The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalander-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad." "The Sea," "The Ship Goes to Pieces Against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior" and "Conclusion." The undulating measures describing the sea on which Sindbad's ship is wrecked have long been famous, and the climax of the shipwreck near the close is such to make everyone sit on the edge of his seat.

The other numbers to be played at the concert January 10 are Tschaikowsky's "Violin Concerto," with Mishel Piastro, the renowned violinist as soloist, and Liszt's splendid symphonic poem, "Tasso." Seats now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From DEC 31 1920
EVENING POST,
New York City

For the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 8, at 2:30, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programmes: For Thursday evening, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony; a symphonic excerpt from d'Indy's new opera "The Legend of St. Christopher"—"La Queste de Dieu"; "An Slaugh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York; and Lalo's Overture to "The King of Ys." For the Saturday afternoon concert, Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after the poem of Coleridge. Malipiero's first suite, "Impressioni dal Vero," will have its first performance in New York, and the concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

---

m POST

ress: Washington, D. C.

te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will come to the National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Alfred Cortot, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau in Droops, Thirteenth and G streets.

---

ew York City JOURNAL

DEC 31

...day evening.

The Boston Orchestra will give its next pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. For his first programme Pierre Monteux has chosen Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony; the interlude from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "La legende de Saint Christophe"; Arnold Bax, the English composer's Gaelic piece, "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), this to be its first performance here, and Lalo's overture to "Le roi d'Ys."

On Saturday afternoon Schumann's Fourth Symphony will be played, the late Charles T. Griffes's "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Francesco Malipiero's first set of "Impressioni dal Vero," to be given here for the first time, and Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakirev's "Islamey," also for a first hearing. On Saturday evening Margarete Matzenauer will be the soloist at a Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

As soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Monday evening Alfred Cortot will play Saint-Saens' fifth piano concerto in F major. The orchestral numbers are Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony and Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," arranged for orchestra by the Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND FRENCH PIANIST

Alfred Cortot to Play the Fifth Concerto of Saint-Saens in F-Major.

GIGLI HERE IN "LA BOHEME"

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Will Conduct Academy Concerts, Relieving Stokowski.

—The third concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening will present Alfred Cortot, eminent French pianist, as soloist. Cortot has been in this country three seasons, and in that time has made a reputation as the finest pianist that France has produced. The clarity of his technique and the color of his tone are shown to particular advantage in the Fifth Concerto of Saint-Saens, in F major, which he will play at this concert. The principal work on the program, however, will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, which is based upon Byron's dramatic poem of that title. The concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy "Islamey," named by many as the most difficult pianoforte piece ever written, which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, Italian composer.

ALFRED CORTOT.

* * *

From NORTH AMERICAN
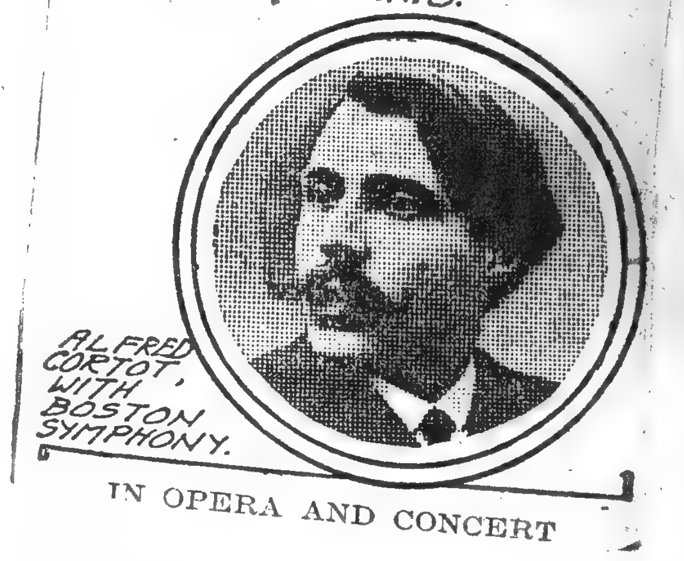
Philadelphia, Pa.

Cortot With Boston Band; Gabrilowitsch Leads Phila. Men

RECITAL PROGRAMS

At the third concert of the season in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, will be the soloist. He will play the Fifth Concerto of Saint-Saens in F major. The principal number will be Tchaikovski's "Manfred" Symphony, based upon Byron's dramatic poem. The concert will close with Balakireff's oriental fantasy, "Islamey," named by many as the most difficult pianoforte piece ever written, which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, the modernistic Italian composer.

* * *



ALFRED CORTOT, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

IN OPERA AND CONCERT

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE third concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at 8:15 o'clock, will be a musical event of particular importance in that Alfred Cortot, the eminent French pianist, will be the soloist. Alfred Cortot has been in this country three seasons and in that time has made an undoubted reputation as the finest pianist that France has produced. His technique and the color of his tone are shown to particular advantage in the Fifth Concerto of Saint-Saens in F major, which he will play at this concert and which is rich in the thematic material of an Oriental character. The principal work on the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, which is based upon Byron's dramatic poem of that title, and is considered one of his most impressive compositions. The concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy "Islamey," named by many as the most difficult pianoforte piece ever written, which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfred Casella, the notable Italian composer of the rising generation.

From
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

CONCERTS

CORTOT-BOSTON SYMPHONY.

As soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternon at 4:30 o'clock, Alfred Cortot, the great French pianist, will play with the Orchestra Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto in M major, which work is particularly fitted to reveal the amazing quality and the beauty of tone of this great artist's playing. Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Lalo's Overture to "The King of Ys," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

From TIMES

Address New York City

Date JAN-7.

Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, is announced as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Brooklyn concert on Friday evening in the Academy of Music.

Oberlin College's alumni...

Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mme. Menges as assisting violinist. Two unfamiliar pieces from familiar composers begin the programme—Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style" and Haydn's "Military Symphony." Then follow Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin and Debussy's symphonic sketches, "The Sea."

[70]

TRANS: DEC. 31

From JAN 2 1921
Morning Telegraph
New York

For the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programs:

For Thursday, Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, after Byron's dramatic poem, the movements of which describe Manfred's wanderings and despair; "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes," "Innovation to Astarte," "Manfred's Death," "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from d'Indy's new opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher'; "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, and Lalo's "Overture to the King of Ys."

For the Saturday afternoon concert, Mozart's overture to his opera "Don Giovanni," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after the poem of Coleridgre. Shortly after this work was introduced to New York in a Thursday concert by Pierre Monteux last Spring, the noted young American composer died. This and other of his works have aroused considerable musical interest. Malipiero's first suite, "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from Nature") will have its first performance in New York, and the concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy "Islamey," orchestrated by the rising young Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

From JAN 4 - 1921 M
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Third Concert of Season, With Alfred Cortot as Piano Soloist

WHILE made up of only three numbers, consisting of compositions by Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens and Balakireff, the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening, was of rare and distinctive interest. Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, was the soloist, making his first appearance this season in the Saint-Saens Concerto No. 5, in F major, for piano and orchestra.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," following, as a tonal elucidation, Byron's dramatic poem. Without being exactly of the "program" variety, the music is descriptive, the work having been referred to by the composer himself as "a program symphony." It is remarkable for both its poetic beauty and its dramatic power, large in scope and tremendous in effect, the four varied movements bearing the captions, "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale" and "The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death."

That the Boston Orchestra, under the skilfull guidance of Pierre Monteux, rapidly is regaining its lost grou[illegible]-time preparing soon to restore its [illegible] prestige, was evidenced in [illegible] interpretation of this dramatic [illegible]. The strings are of noticeable [illegible]ncy and brilliance, being perhaps the best part of the orchestra. They were particularly effective in the second part—the Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's symphonic composition—in the "Song of the Witch," though there was much beautiful playing elsewhere as well. In fact, the orchestra as a whole distinguished itself in this number, Mr. Monteux receiving a well-merited demonstration of admiration for his comprehensive and sympathetic conducting of it.

In the Saint-Saens concerto the audience was stirred to genuine enthusiasm by some remarkable piano playing. Mr. Cortot has played here several times during the past two or three seasons, but never before with such brilliant success as attended his interpretation last evening. The Saint-Saens work is less familiar, as it is, perhaps, somewhat less direct in melodious appeal than others by the great French composer. It partakes of the modern spirit, particularly in the first part, the allegro, which is surpassed in interest by the two that follow. Its difficulties throughout are apparent, but Cortot mastered them with unfaltering facility. In the finale he fairly dazed the audience by the rapidity with which he dashed off the galloping measures. But there was more than mere "execution," for Cortot has tone and style as well as poise and skill as a pianist, and in even such a spectacular composition as that of Saint-Saens he is "musical" as well as dextrous. He had reason to be well pleased with his success, for the applause reached the height of an ovation, and at the conclusion of the number he was recalled several times with sustained enthusiasm.

The orchestra completed the concert with the transcription by Alfredo Cassella of Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey." In its original form the composition is said to present well-nigh insurmountable difficulties to the pianist. It has been frequently played, however. As an orchestral work "Islamey" also has its difficulties, but they are not unusual in this day of involved and intricate instrumentation. Cassella appears to have original ideas, and he uses with unrestrained freedom all the available instruments of the regulation orchestra—and then some. But he loves melody, too, and in this transcription gives something of Italian charm to his profuse orchestration of the Russian's work.

From JAN 9 1921
POST,
Pittsburg, Pa.

MUSICIANS CLUB CONCERT

The Musicians Club of Pittsburgh, of which Mr. Will Earhart, supervisor of music in the public schools, is president, announces a concert which will hold unusual interest for Pittsburghers because of its association. The club will present the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting, at Carnegie Music Hal on the evening of Tuesday, February 1. Benno Moisewitsch, the gifted Russian pianist who came to America last season, will be the assisting soloist.

The entire net proceeds of the concert will be devoted by the Musicians Club to the rehabilitation of the Stephen C. Foster homestead. Some few years ago the house in which Foster lived for many years and did [illegible] of his writing was purchased by Mr. James H. Park and presented to the city as a memorial. Unfortunately it has been impossible for the city to make proper provision for the upkeep of the property and the Musicians Club, being particularly interested in the preservation of such a valuable landmark, determined upon some effort having for its object the securing of funds necessary to keep Foster's home in good condition. This concert by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra constitutes the club's first public effort along this line.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch was invited to become the conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra two years ago, since which time this body of players has become one of the foremost orchestras in the country. Due to the difficulties which for a time threatened the total disbandment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra many of the leading players of that famous organization left Boston and became affiliated with other orchestras throughout the country. A large number of these men have become associated with the Detroit Symphony under Mr. Gabrilowitsch, bringing additional strength to a body of players which already ranked very high. The Musicians Club anticipates a sold out house for this the first appearance in two seasons of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

From 9 - 1921 Y
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

At Parsons's Theater Tomorrow Night With Pierre Monteux Conducting.

Beginning at 8:15 tomorrow evening, the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Parsons's Theater, the only one of the season.

No more splendid and brilliantly colorful score exists than Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite "Scheherazade", based upon the Arabian Nights, which Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Orchestra, will present at this concert in lieu of a classic symphony. Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso", considered by many his masterpiece, will also be heard. As soloist of the evening, Mishel Piastro, the much-praised violinist, will play with the Orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, which is one of the most popular of all concertos written for the violin. Coming from Europe, where he was considered a supreme master of his instrument, Piastro made his debut in this country last autumn in New York. The advent of this pupil of Auer was looked forward to as still another of the numerous notable violinists which Russia in general, and that great violin teacher in particular, had produced. Piastro's preliminary concert surprised everyone, however, and the wondrous beauty of his playing surpassed all expectations. He has readily taken his place in the very forefront of violinists.

A few lower floor seats to be had at Sedgwick & Casey's, box seats and chair tickets for the orchestra pit. Standing room admission will be sold at the theater at night.

LASHANSKA SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two Scott Passacaglias the Orchestral Novelty

Dvorak and Wagner Contribute the Remainder of the Program

Hulda Lashanska, who made her first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert, sang Pamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise" with rare beauty and skill. She is wholly admirable as a concert singer.

Her interpretation showed, in addition to the unassuming perfection of vocal technique to be expected of a pupil of Sembrich, a fine and sure dramatic instinct. No new singer in recent years has used as lovely a voice with as exquisite an artistry as hers. The audience applauded her with unusual warmth.

Two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott were [illegible]

other [illegible] of the sort one recalls off hand in the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra are the last movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the Passacaglia by Seth Bingham, given its first performance last week. These both treat the given theme in the bass far more contrapuntally than Mr Scott has done.

They may be accused of pedantry, but at least they escape the rhythmic and melodic monotony of his two works, which depend on harmonic and orchestral color for whatever interest they possess. Mr Scott's color schemes are more blatant than subtle. They impose themselves upon the listener by sheer volume of sound, and bring applause by nervous stimulus rather than by thoughtful appreciation.

Dvorak's Second Symphony sounds as though he had tried to please the celebrated Viennese critic Hanslick by imitating that gentleman's ideal, Brahms. He imitates Brahms' themes, in one case, the second theme of the first movement which resembles the song "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," he even copies them, but of Brahms' skill in development and variation he has little. His themes are always interesting, but the padding he puts between them is often rather dull.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture" is one of the least interesting of all his works. It lacks the robust vulgarity of the "Rienzi" overture, but its musical material is trivial, though skilfully handled.

The performance gave renewed evidence of the way in which Mr Monteux is slowly but steadily bettering the ensemble of the reorganized orchestra. There are still many perfunctory bits where he has not had time to try for nuances, but the places he has polished grow smoother and smoother.

GLOBE JAN 2.

13TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott Heard Here for First Time

MME. LASHANSKA'S SINGING ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Air of Pamina, from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, A Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang for the first time in this city.

Mr. Scott's Passacaglias, according to Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, Mr. Scott's rapt biographer, were first played in London in 1916. The two melodies that serve as subjects are of Irish origin—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy." The latter song is said to have been often heard in the earlier Georgian period. The Passacaglias are scored for the swollen modern orchestra.

There are two ways of looking at these compositions. One is to regard them simply as curious experiments in harmonization and instrumentation; amusing, in the sense with which this word is used in the jargon of the Parisian studio, but not to be taken seriously. The other way is to accept them as a serious work of a composer endowed by nature, whose inventive faculty and technical skill are of no mean order; the work of a man who has original views and his own method of expression; a man whose independence and boldness—call it aesthetic arrogance, if you will—are not displeasing. This Englishman has surely fluttered the Academicians and the Doctors of Music in Great Britain.

If there is talk about form, Mr. Scott's Passacaglias are more orthodox in this respect than the one by Mr. Seth Bingham performed at the last concert. The subject is inexorably maintained; the hearer does not strain ears in detecting it. The structures built upon the two subjects as foundations may often be fantastical, even extravagant; gargoyles may serve at times in the decoration; but there is always the suggestion of native power. The composer does not build at random, he does not fail, or stand aghast at his own work; he knows exactly his purpose; he accomplishes it in his own defiant way.

Does some one, to whom music is a means of exciting a "gentleman-like joy," as an old Greek put it, exclaim in protestation: "But these Passacaglias are noisy"? When there is a tremendous volume of sound, it is not a din. The sound is as well-defined as a thunder-clap. Nor is there a constant orchestral whirlwind; there are variations of ingenious contrast, free from platitudes. Furthermore in each Passacaglia the hearer feels a certain continuity. He does not see Mr. Ceott putting down his pen, knocking his pate, and addressing the ceiling: "There, that's done. What in the world should come next?"

Whether the audience was startled from its well-bred and traditional composure; whether, forgetting the soothing charm of conventional music, it frankly enjoyed the music; whether it was hugely amused—this would be difficult to say. The applause was fervent and prolonged. Mr. Scott rose from the guest seat and bowed in a dignified manner, not effusively; and he applauded, as was eminently fitting the brilliant, stirring performance of the orchestra.

Dvorak's Symphony had not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1903. Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for the revival. The symphony shows Dvorak at his best. A master of rhythm and color, a melodist of direct appeal, naive, but not without art; seldom far away from his beloved Bohemian woods, fields, and simple, joyous life; not afraid of suggesting the folk songs and the dances of his country even in a symphonic work, he wrote during the years of his poverty from his heart. In his later years he became sophisticated. When his too-familiar symphony "From the New World"—was new in Boston, we wondered at the late Horatio Parker describing it as pleasing but "meretricious." In comparison with the symphony in D minor, the later one is "meretricious," indeed. It is a pity that to the younger generation Dvorak is known chiefly as the composer of "From the New World" Symphony and a certain "Humoresque" transcribed for the fiddle.

Wagner's overture has sadly aged.

Mme. Lashanska has a beautiful voice, which she uses skilfully and emotionally. Her admirable qualities were at once displayed in the pathetic air of Pamina; Mozart's music still remains the supreme test of a singer. She gave a concert version of the air from "Louise," the air itself is not for a symphony concert—and sang it delightfully. Perhaps in a performance of the opera, her interpretation would not be dramatically suited to the situation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 11 and 12 includes these works: Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2; Carpenter, Suite from the Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, C minor, for piano. Mr. Levitzki will be the pianist.

HERALD - JAN. 29

NEW SOPRANO HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Two novelties appeared on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirteenth of the present season, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, soprano, sang for the first time in this city, and two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the English composer, were given their first performance in Boston.

Besides the latter, the program included Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Wagner's "Faust" overture and two operatic arias, sung by Mme. Lashanska, Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

Mme. Lashanska, favorably known here by reputation, was enthusiastically greeted, but the applause which welcomed her first appearance was slight compared with that which broke forth at the end of her first number. She has voice of extraordinary beauty, rich and smooth in the middle and lower registers, clear and pure in the higher. The song from "Louise" has been given very few performances here comparable to that of Mme. Lashanska; nor should the performance of the orchestra be passed by without special mention. The singer was recalled again and again.

Enthusiasm marked the entire program. The Spanish dances by Mr. Scott were of unusual interest, the first especially striking, brilliantly orchestrated and brilliantly performed. Mr. Scott, who was in the audience, was forced to respond to the applause after Mr. Monteux had shown the audience by signs where he was sitting.

Both director and players were warmly applauded after the fine performance of the symphony, and the conductor summoned the meen to rise and share honors with him.

AMER. DEC. 29.

TENTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Percy Grainger, Pianist, Assists in Impressive Program

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "MANFRED" HEARD

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2 for the piano; Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Percy Grainger was the pianist.

The "Manfred" symphony had not been played at these concerts for nine years. In no one of Tschaikowsky's important works is the composer's labor more apparent. He was practically hounded to the task by Balakireff, who sketched a program for him in 1882, told him what he should and should not do, assuring him that Byron's tragedy as a subject for a symphonic poem had contemporaneous interest, "for modern humanity is such because it knows not how to preserve its ideals."

The performance yesterday was impressive and brilliant. The French musicians and critics have for some years not been over-friendly towards Tschaikowsky's music. It does not appeal to them so much as the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff or that of Borodin, or even that of Balakireff. Perhaps Tschaikowsky's mannerisms, never more noticeable than in this symphony, annoy them; the endless repe[illegible] negligable phrase by various solo instruments or groups of instruments; a certain coarseness in choice of thematic material; his tendency to shriek his emotions; a gloomy atmosphere, which he breathed as a man. Yet, now and then, in "Manfred" there are eloquently Byronic moments. Manfred and Astarte are strongly portrayed by their respective themes. Scorn, remorse, despair are thundered forth, while the memory and the vision of Astarte are expressed with a tenderness, now human, now unearthly that we find in Tschaikowsky's letters when he pours out his soul in confidence. The second movement, "The Fairy of the Alps," with its tonal representation of the cataract, and the final bacchanal show the influence of Berlioz. Tschaikowsky is no more fortunate in a musical orgy than Berlioz was in his finale of "Harold in Italy"; but for his finale the former found contrasting measures of a sepulchral solemnity that he alone could imagine; measures that speak of the tomb and the end of all desires; hopeless, desolate measures, as those in the first and last movements of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

"The symphonic poem of Griffes, played for the first time at a concert of this orchestra a little over a year ago, when the composer was suffering in body, unable to pay for the copying of the orchestral parts, and thus taxing what strength was his, teaching by day and working far into the night that his "Kubla Khan" might be ready for performance, brought vividly to mind the loss to the world by his untimely departure. For here is music of genuine fancy, music that by the thought and the expression reveal individuality and the soul of a poet. Nor was this composer guilty of abusing pseudo-Orientalism; he heard music that might have stirred the revellers beneath Kubla's pleasure dome.

Mr. Grainger played the familiar concerto in a delightfully musical manner. Not relying solely on fleetness and brilliancy, he gave a finely conceived and detailed performance of the first movement, too often read in a perfunctory manner by pianists impatient to show what they "can do" later when insistent demands are made on technical proficiency. And so, well-worn as the concerto is, yesterday it had fresh life, nor was the workmanship displayed by the composer the only attractive feature of the music itself.

The concert was too long, yet who would have missed Lalo's overture or Mr. Monteux's interpretation of it?

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: Schubert, "Overture in C-Major," in Italian style; Hadyn, "Military Symphony"; Bruch, "Violin Concerto, G-Minor, No. 1"; Debussy, "The Sea." Isolde Menges will be the violinist.

H[illegible] JAN. 1.

From JAN 29
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following program for its concert to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, February fourth: Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Opus 21; Wagner Faust Overture; Romanza of Juliet from the Opera "The Capulets and the Montagues" by Bellini, and Cavatina de Leila from "The Pearl Fishers" by Bizet, to be sung by Madam Lashanska; closing with Debussy's "The Sea"—three Orchestral Sketches, 1. From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean; Frolics of the Waves, and Dialogues of the Wind and the Sea.

GRAINGER APPLAUDED AT THE SYMPHONY

Soloist in Saint-Saens G-Minor Concerto

Griffes' "Kubla Khan" Wins Adde Appreciation

Percy Grainger, the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, gave a musicianly performance of Saint-Saens' familiar Concerto in G minor which wo him prolonged and enthusiastic applause. The pretty allegretto scherzando b which most people remember the piec has seldom been more effectively playe here.

The music is hardly a severe test o a pianist's imaginative power. Agreeable and well-made, it cannot be called either original or great. Like Leo Ornstein, who chose a MacDowell concerto last season, Mr Grainger seemed bent on avoiding displeasing a supposedly conservative audience by inflicting anything modern and startling upon them. Nor did either of the young modernists challenge comparison with their great elders by choosing a classic like the Beethoven Fourth Concerto.

Mr Monteux for the first time in his conductorship put a piece by Tschaikowsky on a regular program, presumably to satisfy the diminishing numbe who admire that composer. The "Manfred" Symphony has never been a popular as the Fourth, Fifth an "Pathetic." It sounded distinctly o fashioned and often intolerably bo bastic.

The clever orchestration shows the influence of Berlioz. There are plent bits of rather banal melody and amid much stage thunder [illegible]

From JAN 2 1921
Morning Telegraph
New York

For the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programs:

Thursday, Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, after Byron's dramatic poem, the movements of which describe Manfred's wanderings and despair; "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale," "The Palace of Arimanes," "Innovation to Astarte," "Manfred's Death," "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from d'Indy's new opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher'; "An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject by the English composer, Arnold Bax, which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York, and Lalo's "Overture to the King of Ys."

For the Saturday afternoon concert, Mozart's overture to his opera "Don Giovanni," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," composed by Charles T. Griffes after the poem of Coleridgre. Shortly after this work was introduced to New York in a Thursday concert by Pierre Monteux last Spring, the noted young American composer died. This and other of his works have aroused considerable musical interest. Malipiero's first suite, "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from Nature") will have its first performance in New York, and the concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy "Islamey," orchestrated by the rising young Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

From
BULLETIN,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Third Concert of Season, With Alfred Cortot as Piano Soloist

WHILE made up of only three numbers, consisting of compositions by Tschaikowsky, Saint-Saens and Balakireff, the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening, was of rare and distinctive interest. Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, was the soloist, making his first appearance this season in the Saint-Saens Concerto No. 5, in F major, for piano and orchestra.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," following, as a tonal elucidation, Byron's dramatic poem. Without being exactly of the "program" variety, the music is descriptive, the work having been referred to by the composer himself as "a program symphony." It is remarkable for both its poetic beauty and its dramatic power, large in scope and tremendous in effect, the four varied movements bearing the captions, "Manfred's Wanderings and Despair," "The Fairy of the Alps," "Pastorale" and "The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte; Manfred's Death."

That the Boston Orchestra, under the skilfull guidance of Pierre Monteux, rapidly is regaining its lost grow-time preparing soon to restore its [illegible] prestige, was evidenced in its interpretation of this dramatic [illegible] ancy and strings are of noticeable [illegible] brilliance, being perhaps the best part of the orchestra. They were particularly effective in the second part—the Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's symphonic composition—in the "Song of the Witch," though there was much beautiful playing elsewhere as well. In fact, the orchestra as a whole distinguished itself in this number, Mr. Monteux receiving a well-merited demonstration of admiration for his comprehensive and sympathetic conducting of it.

In the Saint-Saens concerto the audience was stirred to genuine enthusiasm by some remarkable piano playing. Mr. Cortot has played here several times during the past two or three seasons, but never before with such brilliant success as attended his interpretation last evening. The Saint-Saens work is less familiar, as it is, perhaps, somewhat less direct in melodious appeal than others by the great French composer. It partakes of the modern spirit, particularly in the first part, the allegro, which is surpassed in interest by the two that follow. Its difficulties throughout are apparent, but Cortot mastered them with unfaltering facility. In the finale he fairly dazed the audience by the rapidity with which he dashed off the galloping measures. But there was more than mere "execution," for Cortot has tone and style as well as poise and skill as a pianist, and in even such a spectacular composition as that of Saint-Saens he is "musical" as well as dextrous. He had reason to be well pleased with his success, for the applause reached the height of an ovation, and at the conclusion of the number he was recalled several times with sustained enthusiasm.

The orchestra completed the concert with the transcription by Alfredo Cassella of Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey." In its original form the composition is said to present well-nigh insurmountable difficulties to the pianist. It has been frequently played, however. As an orchestral work "Islamey" also has its difficulties, but they are not unusual in this day of involved and intricate instrumentation. Cassella appears to have original ideas, and he uses with unrestrained freedom all the available instruments of the regulation orchestra—and then some. But he loves melody, too, and in this transcription gives something of Italian charm to his profuse orchestration of the Russian's work.

[71]

From AN 9 1921
POST,
Pittsburg, Pa.

MUSICIANS CLUB CONCERT

The Musicians Club of Pittsburgh, of which Mr. Will Earhart, supervisor of music in the public schools, is president, announces a concert which will hold unusual interest for Pittsburghers because of its association. The club will present the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting, at Carnegie Music Hal on the evening of Tuesday, February 1. Benno Moisewitsch, the gifted Russian pianist who came to America last season, will be the assisting soloist.

The entire net proceeds of the concert will be devoted by the Musicians Club to the rehabilitation of the Stephen C. Foster homestead. Some few years ago the house in which Foster lived for many years and did [illegible] of his writing was purchased by Mr. James H. Park and presented to the city as a memorial. Unfortunately it has been impossible for the city to make proper provision for the upkeep of the property and the Musicians Club, being particularly interested in the preservation of such a valuable landmark, determined upon some effort having for its object the securing of funds necessary to keep Foster's home in good condition. This concert by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra constitutes the club's first public effort along this line.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch was invited to become the conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra two years ago, since which time this body of players has become one of the foremost orchestras in the country. Due to the difficulties which for a time threatened the total disbandment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra many of the leading players of that famous organization left Boston and became affiliated with other orchestras throughout the country. A large number of these men have become associated with the Detroit Symphony under Mr. Gabrilowitsch, bringing additional strength to a body of players which already ranked very high. The Musicians Club anticipates a sold out house for this the first appearance in two seasons of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

From
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

At Parsons's Theater Tomorrow Night With Pierre Monteux Conducting.

Beginning at 8:15 tomorrow evening, the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Parsons's Theater, the only one of the season.

No more splendid and brilliantly colorful score exists than Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite "Scheherazade", based upon the Arabian Nights, which Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Orchestra, will present at this concert in lieu of a classic symphony. Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso", considered by many his masterpiece, will also be heard. As soloist of the evening, Mishel Piastro, the much-praised violinist, will play with the Orchestra Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, which is one of the most popular of all concertos written for the violin. Coming from Europe, where he was considered a supreme master of his instrument, Piastro made his debut in this country last autumn in New York. The advent of this pupil of Auer was looked forward to as still another of the numerous notable violinists which Russia in general, and that great violin teacher in particular, had produced. Piastro's preliminary concert surprised everyone, however, and the wondrous beauty of his playing surpassed all expectations. He has readily taken his place in the very forefront of violinists.

A few lower floor seats to be had at Sedgwick & Casey's, box seats and chair tickets for the orchestra pit. Standing room admission will be sold at the theater at night.

LASHANSKA SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two Scott Passacaglias the Orchestral Novelty

Dvorak and Wagner Contribute the Remainder of the Program

Hulda Lashanska, who made her first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert, sang Pamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise" with rare beauty and skill. She is wholly admirable as a concert singer.

Her interpretation showed, in addition to the unassuming perfection of vocal technique to be expected of a pupil of Sembrich, a fine and sure dramatic instinct. No new singer in recent years has used as lovely a voice with as exquisite an artistry as hers. The audience applauded her with unusual warmth.

Two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott were other pieces of the sort one recalls off hand in the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra are the last movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the Passacaglia by Seth Bingham, given its first performance last week. These both treat the given theme in the bass far more contrapuntally than Mr Scott has done. They may be accused of pedantry, but at least they escape the rhythmic and melodic monotony of his two works, which depend on harmonic and orchestral color for whatever interest they possess. Mr Scott's color schemes are more blatant than subtle. They impose themselves upon the listener by sheer volume of sound, and bring applause by nervous stimulus rather than by thoughtful appreciation.

Dvorak's Second Symphony sounds as though he had tried to please the celebrated Viennese critic Hanslick by imitating that gentleman's ideal, Brahms. He imitates Brahms' themes, in one case, the second theme of the first movement which resembles the song "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," he even copies them, but of Brahms' skill in development and variation he has little. His themes are always interesting, but the padding he puts between them is often rather dull.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture" is one of the least interesting of all his works. It lacks the robust vulgarity of the "Rienzi" overture, but its musical material is trivial, though skilfully handled.

The performance gave renewed evidence of the way in which Mr Monteux is slowly but steadily bettering the ensemble of the reorganized orchestra. There are still many perfunctory bits where he has not had time to try for nuances, but the places he has polished grow smoother and smoother.

GLOBE JAN. 2.

13TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott Heard Here for First Time

MME. LASHANSKA'S SINGING ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 2, D minor; Cyril Scott, Two Passacaglias (first time in Boston); Mozart, Air of Pamina, from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, A Faust overture. Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang for the first time in this city.

Mr. Scott's Passacaglias, according to Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, Mr. Scott's rapt biographer, were first played in London in 1916. The two melodies that serve as subjects are of Irish origin—"The Irish Famine Song" and "The Poor Irish Boy." The latter song is said to have been often heard in the earlier Georgian period. The Passacaglias are scored for the swollen modern orchestra.

There are two ways of looking at these compositions. One is to regard them simply as curious experiments in harmonization and instrumentation; amusing, in the sense with which this word is used in the jargon of the Parisian studio, but not to be taken seriously. The other way is to accept them as a serious work of a composer endowed by nature, whose inventive faculty and technical skill are of no mean order; the work of a man who has original views and his own method of expression; a man whose independence and boldness—call it aesthetic arrogance, if you will—are not displeasing. This Englishman has surely fluttered the Academicians and the Doctors of Music in Great Britain.

If there is talk about form, Mr. Scott's Passacaglias are more orthodox in this respect than the one by Mr. Seth Bingham performed at the last concert. The subject is inexorably maintained; the hearer does not strain ears in detecting it. The structures built upon the two subjects as foundations may often be fantastical, even extravagant; gargoyles may serve at times in the decoration; but there is always the suggestion of native power. The composer does not build at random, he does not fail, or stand aghast at his own work; he knows exactly his purpose; he accomplishes it in his own defiant way.

Does some one, to whom music is a means of exciting a "gentleman-like joy," as an old Greek put it, exclaim in protestation: "But these Passacaglias are noisy"? When there is a tremendous volume of sound, it is not a din. The sound is as well-defined as a thunder-clap. Nor is there a constant orchestral whirlwind; there are variations of ingenious contrast, free from platitudes. Furthermore in each Passacaglia the hearer feels a certain continuity. He does not see Mr. Ceott putting down his pen, knocking his pate, and addressing the ceiling: "There, that's done. What in the world should come next?"

Whether the audience was startled from its well-bred and traditional composure; whether, forgetting the soothing charm of conventional music, it frankly enjoyed the music; whether it was hugely amused—this would be difficult to say. The applause was fervent and prolonged. Mr. Scott rose from the guest seat and bowed in a dignified manner, not effusively; and he applauded, as was eminently fitting the brilliant, stirring performance of the orchestra.

Dvorak's Symphony had not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1903. Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for the revival. The symphony shows Dvorak at his best. A master of rhythm and color, a melodist of direct appeal, naive, but not without art; seldom far away from his beloved Bohemian woods, fields, and simple, joyous life; not afraid of suggesting the folk songs and the dances of his country even in a symphonic work, he wrote during the years of his poverty from his heart. In his later years he became sophisticated. When his too-familiar symphony "From the New World"—was new in Boston, we wondered at the late Horatio Parker describing it as pleasing but "meretricious." In comparison with the symphony in D minor, the later one is "meretricious," indeed. It is a pity that to the younger generation Dvorak is known chiefly as the composer of "From the New World" Symphony and a certain "Humoresque" transcribed for the fiddle.

Wagner's overture has sadly aged.

Mme. Lashanska has a beautiful voice, which she uses skilfully and emotionally. Her admirable qualities were at once displayed in the pathetic air of Pamina; Mozart's music still remains the supreme test of a singer. She gave a concert version of the air from "Louise," the air itself is not for a symphony concert—and sang it delightfully. Perhaps in a performance of the opera, her interpretation would not be dramatically suited to the situation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 11 and 12 includes these works: Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2; Carpenter, Suite from the Ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, C minor, for piano. Mr. Levitzki will be the pianist.

HERALD - JAN. 29

NEW SOPRANO HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Two novelties appeared on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirteenth of the present season, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, soprano, sang for the first time in this city, and two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the English composer, were given their first performance in Boston.

Besides the latter, the program included Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Wagner's "Faust" overture and two operatic arias, sung by Mme. Lashanska, Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

Mme. Lashanska, favorably known here by reputation, was enthusiastically greeted, but the applause which welcomed her first appearance was slight compared with that which broke forth at the end of her first number. She has voice of extraordinary beauty, rich and smooth in the middle and lower registers, clear and pure in the higher. The song from "Louise" has been given very few performances here comparable to that of Mme. Lashanska; nor should the performance of the orchestra be passed by without special mention. The singer was recalled again and again.

Enthusiasm marked the entire program. The Spanish dances by Mr. Scott were of unusual interest, the first especially striking, brilliantly orchestrated and brilliantly performed. Mr. Scott, who was in the audience, was forced to respond to the applause after Mr. Monteux had shown the audience by signs where he was sitting.

Both director and players were warmly applauded after the fine performance of the symphony, and the conductor summoned the meen to rise and share honors with him.

AMER. DEC. 29.

TENTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Percy Grainger, Pianist, Assists in Impressive Program

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "MANFRED" HEARD

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, "Manfred" Symphony; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2 for the piano; Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Percy Grainger was the pianist.

The "Manfred" symphony had not been played at these concerts for nine years. In no one of Tschaikowsky's important works is the composer's labor more apparent. He was practically hounded to the task by Balakireff, who sketched a program for him in 1882, told him what he should and should not do, assuring him that Byron's tragedy as a subject for a symphonic poem had contemporaneous interest, "for modern humanity is such because it knows not how to preserve its ideals."

The performance yesterday was impressive and brilliant. The French musicians and critics have for some years not been over-friendly towards Tschaikowsky's music. It does not appeal to them so much as the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff or that of Borodin, or even that of Balakireff. Perhaps Tschaikowsky's mannerisms, never more noticeable than in this symphony, annoy them; the endless repetition of a negligable phrase by various solo instruments or groups of instruments; a certain coarseness in choice of thematic material; his tendency to shriek his emotions; a gloomy atmosphere, which he breathed as a man. Yet, now and then, in "Manfred" there are eloquently Byronic moments. Manfred and Astarte are strongly portrayed by their respective themes. Scorn, remorse, despair are thundered forth, while the memory and the vision of Astarte are expressed with a tenderness, now human, now unearthly that we find in Tschaikowsky's letters when he pours out his soul in confidence. The second movement, "The Fairy of the Alps," with its tonal representation of the cataract, and the final bacchanal show the influence of Berlioz. Tschaikowsky is no more fortunate in a musical orgy than Berlioz was in his finale of "Harold in Italy"; but for his finale the former found contrasting measures of a sepulchral solemnity that he alone could imagine; measures that speak of the tomb and the end of all desires; hopeless, desolate measures, as those in the first and last movements of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

"The symphonic poem of Griffes, played for the first time at a concert of this orchestra a little over a year ago, when the composer was suffering in body, unable to pay for the copying of the orchestral parts, and thus taxing what strength was his, teaching by day and working far into the night that his "Kubla Khan" might be ready for performance, brought vividly to mind the loss to the world by his untimely departure. For here is music of genuine fancy, music that by the thought and the expression reveal individuality and the soul of a poet. Nor was this composer guilty of abusing pseudo-Orientalism; he heard music that might have stirred the revellers beneath Kubla's pleasure dome.

Mr. Grainger played the familiar concerto in a delightfully musical manner. Not relying solely on fleetness and brilliancy, he gave a finely conceived and detailed performance of the first movement, too often read in a perfunctory manner by pianists impatient to show what they "can do" later when insistent demands are made on technical proficiency. And so, well-worn as the concerto is, yesterday it had fresh life, nor was the workmanship displayed by the composer the only attractive feature of the music itself.

The concert was too long, yet who would have missed Lalo's overture or Mr. Monteux's interpretation of it?

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: Schubert, "Overture in C-Major," in Italian style; Hadyn, "Military Symphony"; Bruch, "Violin Concerto, G Minor, No. 1"; Debussy, "The Sea." Isolde Menges will be the violinist.

From JAN 29
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following program for its concert to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, February fourth: Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Opus 21; Wagner Faust Overture; Romanza of Juliet from the Opera "The Capulets and the Montagues" by Bellini, and Cavatina de Leila from "The Pearl Fishers" by Bizet, to be sung by Madam Lashanska; closing with Debussy's "The Sea" three Orchestral Sketches, 1. From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean; Frolics of the Waves, and Dialogues of the Wind and the Sea.

GRAINGER APPLAUDED AT THE SYMPHONY

Soloist in Saint-Saens' G-Minor Concerto

Griffes' "Kubla Khan" Wins Added Appreciation

Percy Grainger, the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, gave a musicianly performance of Saint-Saens' familiar Concerto in G minor which won him prolonged and enthusiastic applause. The pretty allegretto scherzando by which most people remember the piece has seldom been more effectively played here.

The music is hardly a severe test of a pianist's imaginative power. Agreeable and well-made, it cannot be called either original or great. Like Leo Ornstein, who chose a MacDowell concerto last season, Mr Grainger seemed bent on avoiding displeasing a supposedly conservative audience by inflicting anything modern and startling upon them. Nor did either of the young modernists challenge comparison with their great elders by choosing a classic like the Beethoven Fourth Concerto.

Mr Monteux for the first time in his conductorship put a piece by Tschaikowsky on a regular program, presumably to satisfy the diminishing number who admire that composer. The "Manfred" Symphony has never been as popular as the Fourth, Fifth and "Pathetic." It sounded distinctly old-fashioned and often intolerably bombastic.

The clever orchestration shows the influence of Berlioz. There are pleasing bits of rather banal melody and color amid much stage thunder and lightning which prove that Tschaikowsky had

---

...lar most
... untimel
...had not been
... unconvenie
...mer in a
... had reserv
...ness which
...hear more of
... was able t
...ure, played a
... familiar overt
...isterously pe
... dull concert,
... piece is a

...week Toscanini
...tra replace the
... two concerts
... at the usual ho

GLOBE J

...RAING ...YMPH ...SO

...store Tscha ...to Place o ...List

BY OLIN DO...

...he variety and int
...nteux's programme
... Boston Sympho
...ed Tschaikowsky'
...phony; Griffith's
...n, "Pleasure Do
...n"; Lalo's overtur
... and, with the ...y Grainger, pi
...s' G minor concer
...rnoon in Symphon

...SCHAIKOWSKY ...

... Monteux has condu
... few compositions
...is Tschaikowsky w
...ert hall?—and his
...nfred" symphony,
... has not been heard
... for many years, w
... Writing this work,
...ssian "Manfred" hi
... listen willingly to
...que, dramatic compo
...ear again the su
... of "Manfred," so
... at the opening of
... flung out against th
... background of the

Other Beauties in

... there are other pa
...movement in which
...ests the appearance
...e Alps in the waterf
...s, in these days of
...mentation, a fascinati
...ng, and other page
...aikowsky shows his S
...he picturesque. Above
...haunting beauty and
...ialogue with the ghos
...ell, there are those wh
...escension on this
...aikowsky. They tal
...-emotionalism, his
...ations of self, his
...ms and excesses, his
...ering symphonic forn
...ins: as no other Ru
...possible exception of
... who could never ha
...s the size of the
...hony, Tschaikowsky
...casion.

...s Other Writers t...

... may flag at mome
...ncies of form emba
... confront him with a
...t, and he will por
... with a theme as
... Give him such a si
... which follows the or
... of Arimenes, in Byr
...schaikowsky will mat
...usic. He will match it
...ill never forget. He
... of the composers of hi
...omposers of Russia,
..., to shame by the f
...ty, the flaming inten
...ice.

... was occasion again, li
... Pleasure Dome of Kub
...ent the untimely taki
... Tomlinson Griffes, t
...an of great genius who ... himself in his art whe
... Pleasure Dome of Kub
... fact, barely become k
...zed for its work wh
... an end a career of
...omise.

Mr. Grainger's Playi...

... at the hands of M
...r, as fluent a pianist a
...r, a performer born to ... work, the Saint-Saens
..., with its astonishing
... and its astonishingly s
..., rattled to its end.
... noted composer, in a ... manner, does somethin
... far more—ala in the
...oi d'Ys."

...T JAN. 1

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From INQUIRER 2 - 1921
Philadelphia, Pa.

Cortot With Boston Symphony

The third concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at 8.15 will be a musical event of particular importance in that Alfred Cortot, the eminent French pianist, will be the soloist. Alfred Cortot has been in this country three season and in that time has made an undoubted reputation as the finest pianist that France has produced. The amazing clarity of his technique, and the color of his tone are shown to particular advantage in the Fifth Concerto of Saint-Saens in F major, which he will play at this concert and which is unusually interesting on account of its Oriental themes. The principal work on the programme, however, will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, which is based upon Byron's dramatic poem of that title, and is considered one of his most impressive works. The work is constructed on a large scale and its many episodes are wondrously impressive and thematically beautiful. The concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," named by many as the most difficult pianoforte piece ever written, which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, the notable Italian composer of the rising generation.

From
~~Evening~~ Sun
Baltimore, Md.

ALFRED Cortot, the distinguished pianist, who will be heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Switzerland of French parents. He came to Paris at a very early age, where he entered the Conservatory under Decombes. one of the last of Chopin's disciples, and under Diemer, in whose class, in 1896, he obtained first prize. Immediately thereafter he played as soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts. This led to several extensive tours of Europe, in which he was heard both with the orchestras in city after city and in recitals of his own, and was identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school. In addition to his career as pianist, he accepted the position (at the age of 24) of répétiteur at Bayreuth, and under his conductorship in Paris, Wagner's operas had notable performances. A year later, in 1903, he founded the Société des Concerts, the purpose of which was to give auditions of great choral works. Thus, to his organizing and conducting ability choral productions of "Parsifal," Beethoven's "Missa Solennis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" and many new works were due. In America, however, he is only known as pianist, and his European reputation as a master of this instrument has been confirmed here.

From
TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Piastro Remarkable Genius of the Violin—Here January 10.

The coming concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 10, will be an event of additional musical importance by the first appearance here of Mishel Piastro, the violinist, as soloist. Coming recently from Russia, his native country, where he had become one of the foremost pupils of Auer, Piastro made a more than notable debut in Carnegie hall, New York, in October. The consensus was that "he towers head and shoulders above any violinists presented thi season." Individual comments unreservedly acclaim his tone as one of the biggest, clearest and most sensuous of any heard in a concert hall.

Henry S. Krehbiel, in the Tribune, said: "His tone is something in which to rejoice. Piastro may write his name large upon the long list of virtuosi." Max Smith, of the New York American, calls him "A master of tone production," G. W. Gabriel of the Sun states that "Piastro with a beautiful tone and validity of technique, musicianly feeling and skill, will survive." William B. Murray of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, in a long artice on violinists of the day has this to say: "At present writing, we believe that only one of the newcomers has a chance for success in America. He, of course, is Mischel Piastro."

Seat sale now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's.

Prices $1 to $3. Gallery admission 75 cents.

ESTABLISHED 1881 1921 Y
From
TIMES,
Brook n, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD.

The only novelty in last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall was Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills," a clever interweaving of Irish themes. Other numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," "La Queste de Dieu" from Vincent D'Indy's "La Legende de Sainte-Christophe," and the "Le Roi d'Ys" of Lalo.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN - 1921 A
From CITIZEN,

THIRD BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Alfred Cortot, Soloist, Heard to Good Advantage.

The symphony played at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening was Schumann's Fourth in D Minor, one of the master's last works. Pierre Monteux opened the concert with Mozart's overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni," and closed it with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey."

The soloist was Alfred Cortot, who is considered the finest pianist of France. The quality and beauty of his playing were revealed to particular advantage in the Fifth Concerto in F Major by Saint-Saens, which he played with the orchestra.

From Record - 1921 K
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Cortot, French Pianist, Heard as Soloist at Concert.

Conducted by G. Pierre Monteux, the third concert in the series of this season's appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia was given before a large audience in the Academy of Music last night. Alfred Cortot, who has an especially warm place in the hearts of Philadelphia concert-goers, was the enthusiastically welcomed piano soloist. His selection, the fifth concerto of Saint-Saens, was admirably adapted to his versatility and displayed advantageously those qualities of tone and technique so widely admired. The fluency of the Cortot style, the brilliancy and endless polish were beautifully brought out in his interpretation of the glittering, scintillating passages of Saint-Saens, who is always interesting if seldom profound or moving. It was a very effective performance, the conductor supplementing the work of the soloist in an enjoyable manner and the audience expressing pronounced approval by recalling the young French artist several times.

The symphony was the "Manfred" of Tschaikowsky, a tonal delineation of Byron's great poem. While not as great a favorite as the other Tschaikowsky symphonies, it is a work of great beauty, power and expression and was graphically produced under the sympathetic direction of Monteux. A novelty on the program was an orchestral transcription of Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," a work which gains color and expression from the orchestral handling and which was received with keen enjoyment.

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux leading, gave a concert last evening for an audience that left a number of seats vacant in the Academy. The program began with Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" overture, owing its inspiration to Byron's poem and reflecting in grandiose and ornate fashion the temptestuous career of its hero. The best portions were the "Andante con duolo" at the close of the first movement, the delightful apparition of the Fairy of the Alps in the second movement, the work of the oboes at the start of the "pastorale," and the climax in largo time which brings the proceedings to a close with a passage that is one of the great moments in Tschaikowski's symphonic works.

Alfred Cortot enhanced his already lustrous reputation among us by a performance of Saint-Saens' fifth piano concerto transcending in excellence the subject-matter. He magnified the dimensions of the work by the big, broad way he played it. A tremendous physical vitality and virile power went to the making of the rolling arpeggios of the finale; in the second movement a similar immensity of tone was found for the plangent. Oriental effects directly inspired by the composer's Egyptian sojourn.

The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic over the pianist's exceptional performance. Rarely have we heard a player who seemed so perfectly in command of his medium and his technique. At times he fairly seemed to lift and [illegible] orchestra along with him, lukewarm in its support. The recalls were numerous.

Finally a spirited presentment of "Islamey," the Oriental fantasy orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, was appropriately linked with the Oriental episode of the Saint-Saens score. One could not fail to find in the stir and the swing of its passionate abandon the very spirit of the Cossacks in the region where Balakireff found his inspiration, [illegible]n as Saint-Saens felt the stimulus of old Nile. "Islamey" puts one in mind of the wild and whirling dances that raise the dust in Berodin's "Prince [illegible]r."

From JAN 4
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Alfred Cortot Heard Last Night in Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto

The programme presented at the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux was not one of the most attractive imaginable. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred Symphony," its most substantial feature, is an ambitious composition which contains some moments of extreme beauty and great impressiveness, but which upon the whole is a labored, turgid, inconsequential work, which becomes tiresome by reason of the scale of magnitude upon which it is projected, and which suggests aspiration rather than achievement. The other notable number for orchestra alone was Balkireff's Oriental fantasy of "Islamey," arranged by Alfredo Casella from the piano score in which it was originally written.

Both were played with a good deal of power and brilliancy and with an appreciable return to the exquisite loveliness of tone and perfecion of finish for which the Boston organization was for so many years distinguished. But the most notable and satisfying contribution to the evening's entertainment was made by Mr. Alfred Cortot, the famous French pianist, whose exceptional powers of execution and interpretation were wonderfully well displayed in an excellent and highly enjoyable performance of Saint-Saens' rather meretricious but decidedly effective concerto in F major, No. 5.

This is not great music, but it is melodious and cleverly constructed and i derives an agreeably exotic flavor fro the Oriental themes which it embodie It was enthusiastically applauded. Th next of these concerts will take plac on the evening of January 31.

ESTABLISHED
From NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SHINES IN 'MANFRED'

Monteux Leads in Brilliant Rendering of Tchaikovski Work

CORTOT IS SOLOIST

Peter Iljich Tchaikovski was the dominating spirit at the Boston Symphony's concert at the Academy last night. Beside the seldom heard "Manfred" Symphony, which headed the program, the other two works seemed pale and spiritless.

Writing to a program was an irksome undertaking to Tchaikovski. His method of merely writing in the mood of a poem as he has done in "Manfred" was a most satisfactory way out of the difficulty. In the first and last movements an intensity of despair is achieved that would transcend a program. In the "Fairy of the Alps" and "The Palace of Arimanes" sections the composer reveals a mastery of tone color that is not duplicated in any of his symphonies.

Mr. Monteux led his orchestra thru a brilliant reading of the work. The strings outdid themselves in dynamics and variety of color. The woodwinds performed with virtuosity in balance, the orchestra has improved greatly.

Alfred Cortot was the soloist and played the fifth piano concerto of Saint-Saens. The choice was not a particularly happy one. Saint-Saens wrote the work at the age of 60 and had nothing at all to say musically. The qualities of grace, ingenuity and technical skill, which are characteristics of all Saint-Saens' works, were there in abundance. But of inspiration there is none. The melodies sound machine-made and cheap. The only lyric episode is in the second movement, the two melodies of which are attributed to Moorish sources.

Mr. Cortot's playing did not infuse any warmth into the work. His touch glitters, but never glows. But rhythm and spirit were there in abundance. The audience was apathetic after the empty first movement and the inconsequential andante. But in the finale Mr. Cortot aroused a storm of applause by the speed and fury of his playing. Aided by the flashy technical tricks written into the music, he made it seem what it certainly is not—spontaneously brilliant.

A transcription of Balakireff's 'Islamey," made by Casella, closed the program. It is a work built on three oriental themes undistinguished for beauty or melodic appeal. The orchestration is well done, but the work fails in effectiveness.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. , 188

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played its third program of the current season in the Academy last evening. The music comprised the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Schumann's D Minor Symphony, Balikieff's "Islamey" colorfully arranged for orchestra by Alfred Casella, and with Alfred Cortot as soloist the Saint-Saens Concerto in F major for piano and orchestra.

This symphony of Schumann, practically a companion piece to that entitled "Spring," is of its composer's most fecund period—the years that followed immediately his marriage to Clara Wieck. Its four movements, played without break, follow each other in the closest of communions, the thematic material of one reappearing in another and thereby linking its parts together with bands so inseparable as to lead its maker at first to denominate the work a "symphonic fantasy." The band last evening gave it an admirable performance. Its spirit apparently has kinship with Mr. Monteux's temperament and he and his men seemed to enter genuinely into its romantic nature.

There was brilliancy in Mr. Cortot's playing of Saint-Saens's musically dull but pianistically exciting concerto. The performance represented Mr. Cortot's first since his return from a triumphal English tour. Likewise, brilliancy predominated in the orchestra's playing of Mozart's Overture. What trombones can sound as eloquent as these of Boston?

HERALD
ress New York City
te

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Charms Anew at Concert

Fantastic Oriental Music Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alph, the sacred river, will flow down to the sunless sea through many a winter day and summer night. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a fantastic Oriental symphonic poem in which Charles T. Griffes, an American composer, sings of it should be here to stay. The Boston Symphony Orchestra produced the work here on December 4, 1919, and repeated it yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. And again it was good to hear. The untimely death of Mr. Griffes robbed us of other well written music. Let us enjoy this while we can.

Few composers handle the Oriental idioms with the mastery of Mr. Griffes. Few use an orchestra with more certainty or greater variety of color. And still fewer of this barren period possess the American's picturesque conceptions. The symphonic poem was well performed yesterday afternoon and it received more applause than anything else on the list. And this, too, was an event. An American composition warmly approved by Americans! That is something to remember.

For some reason the same Americans were less enthusiastic about the "Impressioni del Vero" of Malipiero. Perhaps it was because the music was slighter of texture and less direct in its methods of expression except in the matter of the owl. It was no tragic owl "that shrieked, the fatal bellman, which gives the stern'st goodnight," but a gentle solitary that chanted its last "to whoo" through the whispering pianissimo of a mellow clarinet. One loved that owl. For the blackcap and the woodpecker there is less to say. And all three sounded somewhat thin after the luscious utterances of Mr. Griffes's score.

The concert began with the overture to "Don Giovanni," apparently given to play the people in. Then followed Schumann's D minor symphony, which was performed in a manner indicating that Mr. Monteux regarded it as a necessary evil to be endured and got rid of as soon as possible. The programme ended with Alfred Casella's orchestration of Balakirev's "Islamey." The thing ought to be orchestrated into the fourth dimension, like Mr. Hunker's enchanted symphony. It was not an afternoon of unmixed joy and not the least unpleasant part of it was the downright heavy and mechanical playing of the orchestra in the Schumann work. But as that is the sort of playing now pronounced good in Boston we need hope for nothing better.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From INQUIRER 2 - 1921
Philadelphia, Pa.

Cortot With Boston Symphony

The third concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at 8.15 will be a musical event of particular importance in that Alfred Cortot, the eminent French pianist, will be the soloist. Alfred Cortot has been in this country three season and in that time has made an undoubted reputation as the finest pianist that France has produced. The amazing clarity of his technique, and the color of his tone are shown to particular advantage in the Fifth Concerto of Saint-Saens in F major, which he will play at this concert and which is unusually interesting on account of its Oriental themes. The principal work on the programme, however, will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony, which is based upon Byron's dramatic poem of that title, and is considered one of his most impressive works. The work is constructed on a large scale and its many episodes are wondrously impressive and thematically beautiful. The concert will close with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," named by many as the most difficult pianoforte piece ever written, which has been arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella, the notable Italian composer of the rising generation.

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

ALFRED Cortot, the distinguished pianist, who will be heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Switzerland of French parents. He came to Paris at a very early age, where he entered the Conservatory under Decombes, one of the last of Chopin's disciples, and under Diemer, in whose class, in 1896, he obtained first prize. Immediately thereafter he played as soloist at the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts. This led to several extensive tours of Europe, in which he was heard both with the orchestras in city after city and in recitals of his own, and was identified as a principal founder of the new French piano school. In addition to his career as pianist, he accepted the position (at the age of 24) of répétiteur at Bayreuth, and under his conductorship in Paris, Wagner's operas had notable performances. A year later, in 1903, he founded the Société des Concerts, the purpose of which was to give auditions of great choral works. Thus, to his organizing and conducting ability choral productions of "Parsifal," Beethoven's "Missa Solennis," Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" and many new works were due. In America, however, he is only known as pianist, and his European reputation as a master of this instrument has been confirmed here.

From
TIMES
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Piastro Remarkable Genius of the Violin—Here January 10.

The coming concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 10, will be an event of additional musical importance by the first appearance here of Mishel Piastro, the violinist, as soloist. Coming recently from Russia, his native country, where he had become one of the foremost pupils of Auer, Piastro made a more than notable debut in Carnegie hall, New York, in October. The consensus was that "he towers head and shoulders above any violinists presented thi season." Individual comments unreservedly acclaim his tone as one of the biggest, clearest and most sensuous of any heard in a concert hall.

Henry S. Krehbiel, in the Tribune, said: "His tone is something in which to rejoice. Piastro may write his name large upon the long list of virtuosi." Max Smith, of the New York American, calls him "A master of tone production," G. W. Gabriel of the Sun states that "Piastro with a beautiful tone and validity of technique, musicianly feeling and skill, will survive." William B. Murray of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, in a long artice on violinists of the day has this to say: "At present writing, we believe that only one of the newcomers has a chance for success in America. He, of course, is Mischel Piastro."

Seat sale now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's.

Prices $1 to $3. Gallery admission 75 cents.

ESTABLISHED 1881 921
From
TIMES,
Brook n, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD.

The only novelty in last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall was Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills," a clever interweaving of Irish themes. Other numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," "La Queste de Dieu" from Vincent D'Indy's "La Legende de Sainte-Christophe," and the "Le Roi d'Ys" of Lalo.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN - 1921 A
From CITIZEN,

THIRD BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Alfred Cortot, Soloist, Heard to Good Advantage.

The symphony played at the third Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening was Schumann's Fourth in D Minor, one of the master's last works. Pierre Monteux opened the concert with Mozart's overture to his opera, "Don Giovanni," and closed it with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey."

The soloist was Alfred Cortot, who is considered the finest pianist of France. The quality and beauty of his playing were revealed to particular advantage in the Fifth Concerto in F Major by Saint-Saens, which he played with the orchestra.

From Record
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Cortot, French Pianist, Heard as Soloist at Concert.

Conducted by G. Pierre Monteux, the third concert in the series of this season's appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia was given before a large audience in the Academy of Music last night. Alfred Cortot, who has an especially warm place in the hearts of Philadelphia concert-goers, was the enthusiastically welcomed piano soloist. His selection, the fifth concerto of Saint-Saens, was admirably adapted to his versatility and displayed advantageously those qualities of tone and technique so widely admired. The fluency of the Cortot style, the brilliancy and endless polish were beautifully brought out in his interpretation of the glittering, scintillating passages of Saint-Saens, who is always interesting if seldom profound or moving. It was a very effective performance, the conductor supplementing the work of the soloist in an enjoyable manner and the audience expressing pronounced approval by recalling the young French artist several times.

The symphony was the "Manfred" of Tschaikowsky, a tonal delineation of Byron's great poem. While not as great a favorite as the other Tschaikowsky symphonies, it is a work of great beauty, power and expression and was graphically produced under the sympathetic direction of Monteux. A novelty on the program was an orchestral transcription of Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," a work which gains color and expression from the orchestral handling and which was received with keen enjoyment.

From
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux leading, gave a concert last evening for an audience that left a number of seats vacant in the Academy. The program began with Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" overture, owing its inspiration to Byron's poem and reflecting in grandiose and ornate fashion the temptestuous career of its hero. The best portions were the "Andante con duolo" at the close of the first movement, the delightful apparition of the Fairy of the Alps in the second movement, the work of the oboes at the start of the "pastorale," and the climax in largo time which brings the proceedings to a close with a passage that is one of the great moments in Tschaikowski's symphonic works.

Alfred Cortot enhanced his already lustrous reputation among us by a performance of Saint-Saens' fifth piano concerto transcending in excellence the subject-matter. He magnified the dimensions of the work by the big, broad way he played it. A tremendous physical vitality and virile power went to the making of the rolling arpeggios of the finale; in the second movement a similar immensity of tone was found for the plangent. Oriental effects directly inspired by the composer's Egyptian sojourn.

The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic over the pianist's exceptional performance. Rarely have we heard a player who seemed so perfectly in command of his medium and his technique. At times he fairly seemed to lift and [illegible] orchestra along with him, lukewarm in its support. The recalls were numerous.

Finally a spirited presentment of "Islamey," the Oriental fantasy orchestrated by Alfredo Casella, was appropriately linked with the Oriental episode of the Saint-Saens score. One could not fail to find in the stir and the swing of its passionate abandon the very spirit of the Cossacks in the region where Balakireff found his inspiration, n as Saint-Saens felt the stimulus of old Nile. "Islamey" puts one in mind of the wild and whirling dances that raise the dust in Berodin's "Prince Igor."

From JAN 4
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Alfred Cortot Heard Last Night in Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto

The programme presented at the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Pierre Monteux was not one of the most attractive imaginable. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred Symphony," its most substantial feature, is an ambitious composition which contains some moments of extreme beauty and great impressiveness, but which upon the whole is a labored, turgid, inconsequential work, which becomes tiresome by reason of the scale of magnitude upon which it is projected, and which suggests aspiration rather than achievement. The other notable number for orchestra alone was Balkireff's Oriental fantasy of "Islamey," arranged by Alfredo Casella from the piano score in which it was originally written.

Both were played with a good deal of power and brilliancy and with an appreciable return to the exquisite loveliness of tone and perfecion of finish for which the Boston organization was for so many years distinguished. But the most notable and satisfying contribution to the evening's entertainment was made by Mr. Alfred Cortot, the famous French pianist, whose exceptional powers of execution and interpretation were wonderfully well displayed in an excellent and highly enjoyable performance of Saint-Saens' rather meretricious but decidedly effective concerto in F major, No. 5.

This is not great music, but it is melodious and cleverly constructed and i derives an agreeably exotic flavor fro the Oriental themes which it embodie It was enthusiastically applauded. Th next of these concerts will take plac on the evening of January 31.

ESTABLISHED
From NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SHINES IN 'MANFRE

Monteux Leads in Brillia Rendering of Tchaikovski Work

CORTOT IS SOLOIS

Peter Iljich Tchaikovski was the dominating spirit at the Boston Symphony's concert at the Academy last night. Beside the seldom heard "Manfred" Symphony, which headed the program, the other two works seemed pale and spiritless.

Writing to a program was an irksome undertaking to Tchaikovski. His method of merely writing in the mood of a poem as he has done in "Manfred" was a most satisfactory way out of the difficulty. In the first and last movements an intensity of despair is achieved that would transcend a program. In the "Fairy of the Alps" and "The Palace of Arimanes" sections the composer reveals a mastery of tone color that is not duplicated in any of his symphonies.

Mr. Monteux led his orchestra thru a brilliant reading of the work. The strings outdid themselves in dynamic [illegible] nd variety of color. The woodwinds performed with virtuosity in balance, the orchestra has improved greatly.

Alfred Cortot was the soloist and played the fifth piano concerto of Saint-Saens. The choice was not a particularly happy one. Saint-Saens wrote the work at the age of 60 and had nothing at all to say musically. The qualities of grace, ingenuity and technical skill, which are characteristics of all Saint-Saens' works, were there in abundance. But of inspiration there is none. The melodies sound machine-made and cheap. The only lyric episode is in the second movement, the two melodies of which are attributed to Moorish sources.

Mr. Cortot's playing did not infuse any warmth into the work. His touch glitters, but never glows. But rhythm and spirit were there in abundance. The audience was apathetic after the empty first movement and the inconsequential andante. But in the finale Mr. Cortot aroused a storm of applause by the speed and fury of his playing. Aided by the flashy technical tricks written into the music, he made it seem what it certainly is not—spontaneously brilliant.

A transcription of Balakireff's 'Islamey," made by Casella, closed the program. It is a work built on three oriental themes undistinguished for beauty or melodic appeal. The orchestration is well done, but the work fails in effectiveness.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
188

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played its third program of the current season in the Academy last evening. The music comprised the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Schumann's D Minor Symphony, Balikieff's "Islamey" colorfully arranged for orchestra by Alfred Casella, and with Alfred Cortot as soloist the Saint-Saens Concerto in F major for piano and orchestra.

This symphony of Schumann, practically a companion piece to that entitled "Spring," is of its composer's most fecund period—the years that followed immediately his marriage to Clara Wieck. Its four movements, played without break, follow each other in the closest of communions, the thematic material of one reappearing in another and thereby linking its parts together with bands so inseparable as to lead its maker at first to denominate the work a "symphonic fantasy." The band last evening gave it an admirable performance. Its spirit apparently has kinship with Mr. Monteux's temperament and he and his men seemed to enter genuinely into its romantic nature.

There was brilliancy in Mr. Cortot's playing of Saint-Saens's musically dull but pianistically exciting concerto. The performance represented Mr. Cortot's first since his return from a triumphal English tour. Likewise, brilliancy predominated in the orchestra's playing of Mozart's Overture. What trombones can sound as eloquent as these of Boston?

HERALD
ress New York City
te

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Charms Anew at Concert

Fantastic Oriental Music Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alph, the sacred river, will flow down to the sunless sea through many a winter day and summer night. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a fantastic Oriental symphonic poem in which Charles T. Griffes, an American composer, sings of it should be here to stay. The Boston Symphony Orchestra produced the work here on December 4, 1919, and repeated it yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. And again it was good to hear. The untimely death of Mr. Griffes robbed us of other well written music. Let us enjoy this while we can.

Few composers handle the Oriental idioms with the mastery of Mr. Griffes. Few use an orchestra with more certainty or greater variety of color. And still fewer of this barren period possess the American's picturesque conceptions The symphonic poem was well performed yesterday afternoon and it received more applause than anything else on the list. And this, too, was an event. An American composition warmly approved by Americans! That is something to remember.

For some reason the same Americans were less enthusiastic about the "Impressioni del Vero" of Malipiero. Perhaps it was because the music was slighter of texture and less direct in its methods of expression except in the matter of the owl. It was no tragic owl "that shrieked, the fatal bellman, which gives the stern'st goodnight," but a gentle solitary that chanted its last "to whoo" through the whispering pianissimo of a mellow clarinet. One loved that owl. For the blackcap and the woodpecker there is less to say. And all three sounded somewhat thin after the luscious utterances of Mr. Griffes's score.

The concert began with the overture to "Don Giovanni," apparently given to play the people in. Then followed Schumann's D minor symphony, which was performed in a manner indicating that Mr. Monteux regarded it as a necessary evil to be endured and got rid of as soon as possible. The programme ended with Alfred Casella's orchestration of Balakirev's "Islamey." The thing ought to be orchestrated into the fourth dimension, like Mr. Hunker's enchanted symphony. It was not an afternoon of unmixed joy and not the least unpleasant part of it was the downright heavy and mechanical playing of the orchestra in the Schumann work. But as that is the sort of playing now pronounced good in Boston we need hope for nothing better.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Telegram
New York City

The Boston Symphony.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony was the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which held another concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon under the direction of Pierre Monteux. It was played with beauty of tone from the strings and wood winds. Mr. Monteux conducted earnestly and in the main gave this beautiful work rather a poetic reading. As a novelty, a short work by the late Charles T. Griffes, a very talented American composer, who died a few months ago, prematurely, was played. It was "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge. A series of tone pictures, written in a modern idiom, it is a pleasing work, though not the best that Mr. Griffes wrote.

The latest Italian style of composition was brought to prominence in a stirring performance of Malipiero's "Impressioni del Vero." The final number of a somewhat incoherent programme was Balakireff's oriental fantasy "Islamey."

From JAN 10 1921 K
Evening Globe
New York

Music.

Selma Kurz Makes Local Debut —Other Concerts.

By PITTS SANBORN.

A singer who used to be talked of as either a Metropolitan or a Manhattan possibility in the days when Oscar Hammerstein was at the height of his operatic activities finally appeared before a New York audience last evening at the Hippodrome. She is Selma Kurz, for years the chief florid soprano of the Vienna Opera, and formerly a favorite with the audiences at Covent Garden, London. Appearing with Miss Kurz was the National Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Paul Eisler.

Miss Kurz sang yesterday with a still, small voice that would have resembled more closely the voice of conscience if it had been ruthlessly true to pitch. But it was rather ruthlessly untrue to that quantity—so much so that any prime donne who have been reproached for singing out of tune can now take great comfort. They will be known henceforth as human pitch pipes. On the rare occasions when Miss Kurz vouchsafed a full-voice tone it was clear that her voice is somewhat worn. Her carefully advertised crescendo trill was not much like the crescendo trill for which Dame Nellie Melba was once famous. The pieces she elected to sing—"Deh, vieni non tardar" from "The Marriage of Figaro," Handel's "Sweet Bird," "Caro nome" from "Rigoletto," "Ah fors' è lui" from "La Traviata," and Strauss's "Voci di primavera" waltz—are replete with memories of Mmes Sembrich, Melba, Tetrazzini, Barrientos, and Galli-Curci. At least Miss Kurz must have the credit of an admirable courage.

The orchestral accompaniments were frequently at odds with the singer, a point the latter emphasized by turning now and then in piteous appeal to the conductor's cold, cold shoulders. It is possible to accuse that gentleman of too novel ideas as to tempo in familiar airs, but in extenuation of any vagaries on his part it must be said that the singer's delivery seldom showed anything like rhythmic incisiveness. The purely orchestral numbers on the programme were Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the third movement of Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." A large audience, which included many persons prominent in the world of music, applauded Miss Kurz rapturously.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon was a reminder of the loss to American music in the untimely death of Charles T. Griffes, a victim in this rich country to underpay and overwork. The orchestra played his "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn," which Mr. Monteux introduced here last season, and once more the imaginative splendor of the music and its promise of still better things to come were most impressive. The programme included also some bird studies by Malipiero ("Impressions from Nature," suite No. 1), a novelty in New York; the overture to "Don Giovanni," Schumann's fourth symphony, and an orchestral version by Alfredo Casella of Balakireff's oriental fantasy for piano, "Islamey."

The Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon offered its patrons Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, two movements from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Victor de Sabatas symphonic poem "Juventus" (introduced here the other day by Mr. Toscanini), and Albert Spalding in the Beethoven violin concerto.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Reinald Werrenrath gave another of his delightful song recitals.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 10 1921 K
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

Malipiero and de Sabata.

Out of the three orchestral concerts of the week-end, given by the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, the Philharmonic that evening and the New York Symphony Orchestra in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon, emerge the names of G. Francesco Malipiero and Victor de Sabata, two of the younger Italian composers of the day. Mr. Monteux played the former's first series of "Impressioni dal Vero" and Mr. Damrosch played the latter's "Juventus," introduced here only last week at one of the Toscanini concerts.

Malipiero's suite dates back ten years, was written when he was twenty-eight, and is considerably less successful than the second series of "Impressions from Nature" played here earlier in the season. Malipiero seeks to treat subjectively, rather than objectively, three moods of the forest which he has called "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker" and "The Owl." The first is an Autumn dirge, the second the blazing woods of Summer, and the last a nocturne. But Malipiero is ot convincing, his means of expres on are rather thin, the music does ot "come off." The really brilliant oments of Mr. Monteux's afternoon ere the late Charles T. Griffes's "The leasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (potic, beautiful music), and the final iece of this programme, Balakirev's riental fantasia, "Islamey," as orhestrated with enormous cleverness by lfredo Casella, who, by the way, is a ar more significant figure among ontemporary Italian composers than Malipiero.

Mr. Damrosch's programme of yesterday apparently had given him some little trouble, not improbably due to the rehearsals of other matter necessitated during the visit of Albert Coates as a guest conductor. The Sabata piece took the place originally intended for Ottorino Respighi's "Fontane di Roma" (also played by Mr. Toscanini); Chausson's B flat symphony gave way to two movements from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," repeated from last Thursday and Friday's pair of concerts, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, also previously given this season, was added at the last moment. The only thing remaining from the original plan was the Beethoven concerto for violin and orchestra, with Albert Spalding as soloist—a painstaking but scarcely uplifting performance. Mr. Damrosch gave a stirring account of the Sabata piece, but it seemed even rather less worth while, as music, than when Mr. Toscanini played it.

Margaret Matzenauer sang the Beethoven scena, "Ah! Perfido" and the so-called Immolation Scene from Wagner's "Die Goettedaemmerung" (in Mr. Krehbiel's translation) at the concert of the Philharmonic, which was otherwise given over to the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven and Listz's "Mazeppa"—a wearisomely lustreless performance of the former.

From JAN 10 1921 M
EVENING MAIL
New York City

THERE was a novelty on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, when Malipiero's "Impressions from Nature" was played, with a hint of the Siegfried forest warblings. The bird images were created with deft orchestral craft.

The colorful, picturesque "Palace of Kubla Khan" by Charles T. Griffes, and Schumann's Tenth symphony were the other numbers.

ndless repetition of by various solo in ps of instruments; a n choice of thematic ency to shriek his atmosphere, which man. Yet, now and here are eloquently Manfred and As portrayed by their scorn, remorse, de forth, while the sion of Astarte are nderness, now hu
ly that we find in rs when he pours dence. The second dry of the Alps," esentation of the al bacchanal show
loz. Tschaikowsky in a musical orgy is finale of "Har for his finale the sting measures of y that he alone
res that speak of nd of all desires;
easures, as those movements of the poem of Griffes, me at a concert of s over a year ago,

was suffering in for the copying of
, and thus taxing is, teaching by day
the night that his t be ready for per vidly to mind the y his untimely de s music of genuine y the thought and al individuality and Nor was this com
g pseudo-Oriental lo that might have s beneath Kubla's

ed the familiar con
lly musical manner.
n fleetness and bril
finely conceived and e of the first move ad in a perfunctory
s impatient to show later when insistent e on technical pro vell-worn as the con
it had fresh life, nor hip displayed by the attractive feature of s too long, yet who d Lalo's overture or erpretation of it?

be repeated tonight.
he concert next week
chubert, "Overture in alian style; Hadyn, ony"; Bruch, "Violin
r, No. 1"; Debussy, le Menges will be the

---

lowing program for its concert to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, February fourth: Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Opus 21; Wagner Faust Overture; Romanza of Juliet from the Opera "The Capulets and the Montagues" by Bellini, and Cavatina de Leila from "The Pearl Fishers" by Bizet, to be sung by Madam Lashanska; closing with Debussy's "The Sea"—three Orchestral Sketches, 1. From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean; Frolics of the Waves, and Dialogues of the Wind and the Sea.

ER APPLAUDED THE SYMPHONY

in Saint-Saens' minor Concerto

bla Khan" Wins Added Appreciation

ger, the soloist at yester ony concert, gave a musi mance of Saint-Saens' fa to in G minor which won l and enthusiastic applause.
allegretto scherzando by people remember the piece ed more effectively played is hardly a severe test of aginative power. Agree

-made, it cannot be called l or great. Like Leo Orn ose a MacDowell concerto
Mr Grainger seemed bent displeasing a supposedly audience by inflicting any and startling upon them.
r of the young modernists parison with their great eping a classic like the rth Concerto.

for the first time in his put a piece by Tschai regular program, presum
y the diminishing numbe that composer. The "Man hony has never been a the Fourth, Fifth an sounded distinctly ol d often intolerably bor

rchestration shows the fi rlioz. There are pleasin usual melody and color thunder and lightnin

---

nal ambition lain that way, could have written really admirable light music. Griffes' "Kubla Khan" again seemed beautiful and original music deserving repeated hearings. Everyone interested in American music must bitterly regret the composer's untimely death last April. If he had not been forced to earn a living by uncongenial drudgery as piano teacher in a boys' school he might have had reserve strength to resist the illness which killed him. One hopes to hear more of the few compositions he was able to finish in his scanty leisure, played at these concerts.

Lalo's familiar overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," boisterously performed, brought a rather dull concert, except for the Griffes piece to a somewhat belated end.

Next week Toscanini and his La Scala orchestra replace the Boston Symphony, giving two concerts with different programs at the usual hours in Symphony Hall.

G

GRAINGER SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Restore Tschaikowsky to Place on the List

BY OLIN DOWNES

The variety and interest of Mr. Monteux's programmes continuing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony; Griffith's symphonic poem, "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and, with the assistance of Percy Grainger, pianist, Saint-Saens' G minor concerto, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

TSCHAIKOWSKY WELCOME

Mr. Monteux has conducted comparatively few compositions of Tschaikowsky—is Tschaikowsky waning in the concert hall?—and his choice of the "Manfred" symphony, or fantasie, which has not been heard at these concerts for many years, was a welcome one. Writing this work, Tschaikowsky is Russian "Manfred" himself, and we would listen willingly to this long, picturesque, dramatic composition, if only to hear again the superbly tragic theme of "Manfred," so ominously intoned at the opening of the work, so nobly flung out against the tumultuous tonal background of the conclusion.

Other Beauties in Work

But there are other pages. There is the movement in which Tschaikowsky suggests the appearance of the Witch of the Alps in the waterfall, which remains, in these days of virtuoso instrumentation, a fascinating passage of scoring, and other pages, in which Tschaikowsky shows his Slavic passion for the picturesque. Above all, there is the haunting beauty and poignancy of the dialogue with the ghost of Astarte.

Well, there are those who look with condescension on this composer Tschaikowsky. They talk about his over-emotionalism, his unrestrained revelations of self, his tonal mannerisms and excesses, his difficulty in mastering symphonic form. This fact remains: as no other Russian, with the possible exception of Moussorgsky, who could never have filled a canvas the size of the "Manfred" symphony, Tschaikowsky can rise to an occasion.

Puts Other Writers to Shame

He may flag at moments when exigencies of form embarass him. But confront him with a dramatic moment, and he will portray Manfred with a theme as Byronic as Byron. Give him such a situation as that which follows the orgy in the Palace of Arimenes, in Byron's poem, and Tschaikowsky will match it with his music. He will match it in a way you will never forget. He will put most of the composers of his day, not only composers of Russia, but of all Europe, to shame by the fervor, the sincerity, the flaming intensity of his utterance.

There was occasion again, listening to "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn," to lament the untimely taking off of Charles Tomlinson Griffes, the young American of great genius who was just finding himself in his art when he died. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn" had, in fact, barely become known and recognized for its work when there came to an end a career of extraordinary promise.

Mr. Grainger's Playing

Then, at the hands of Mr. Percy Grainger, as fluent a pianist as he is a composer, a performer born to play this popular work, the Saint-Saens G minor concerto, with its astonishingly grand opening and its astonishingly superficial progress, rattled to its end.

A less noted composer, in a less pretentious manner, does something which stirs us far more—ala in the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

POST JAN. 1.

Events and Comments of Current Interest

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour for the current week, though symphony concerts will be given at the usual hours in Symphony Hall by La Scala Orchestra, Arturo Toscanini, conductor. The program for Jan 14 and 15 as now arranged begins with Schubert's seldom heard overture in the Italian style. The symphony is Haydn's "Military" in G major. Isolde Menges, the English violinist, will play Bruch's First Concerto. The only modern number is Debussy's familiar "La Mer."

The second and last Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Feb 6 will have an all-Wagner program. This is a welcome return to a former custom, which is likely to pay better at the box office than excursions into Tschaikowsky and Saint-Saens.

GLOBE JAN. 2.

MENGES WITH SYMPHONY

At the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon, January 14, and Saturday evening, January 15, will come the first appearance in Boston of Isolde Menges, the English violinist. She will be heard in Bruch's first concerto in G minor. Schubert's Overture in the Italian style in C major, Haydn's so-called "military" symphony and Debussy's suite "La Mer" will complete the program.

ADVERTISER-JAN.2.

GRAINGER AS PIANIST STAR

Makes First Appearance With the Symphony, Winning Ovation

Percy Grainger, who may now be described as a permanent resident in the great musical colony established over here during the war, made his first appearance as Symphony soloist at the tenth pair of concerts. His selection was the second Saint-Saens concerto, in G minor, which the composer himself, now living in Paris and looking back over eighty-five years of turbulent French history, first introduced to the public when Andrew Johnson was President.

Mr. Grainger's artistry is not of the classic order, but he is picturesque, red-blooded, with much poetry in his mind if not in his fingers. He ranks high among British pianists, who are pedagogic figures hardly of the virtuoso stamp. Nor is the concerto one of Saint-Saens' masterpieces. However, the audience at the matinee waxed enthusiastic, recalling the soloist again and again. No doubt it was glad to see this militant musician, built like a football tackle and investing his performance with athletic ardor.

There was another ovation for Mr. Monteux and his men after the performance of Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, which had not been heard for nearly ten years. The composer thought exceedingly well of this work—as fond fathers do of all their children—but the public has not agreed with him. The symphony is long-winded, after the Byronic manner; but there are saving graces, such as the characteristic lyrical third movement and the powerful peroration with organ accompaniment. Mr. Monteux achieved a frenzied finale, which awakened the audience and raised much applause.

Griffes' imaginative symphonic poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a work first performed here not long before the gifted composer's premature death, and Lalo's melodious overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," gave a graceful fillip to a program that threatened to be ponderous.

This week the orchestra will make its third Southern trip.

DVERTISER. JAN 2

MENGES BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Following the third tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall will take place Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, and Saturday evening, Jan. 15. For these concerts Pierre Monteux has arranged a conventional but interesting programme, which will be made the more eventful by the first appearance in Boston of Isolde Menges, the renowned English violinist, as soloist with the orchestra.

WAGNER PROGRAMME FOR PENSION FUND

For Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, is planned the second and last Pension Fund concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall, the proceeds to be devoted to the Pension Fund for retired members. One of the most notable orchestral programmes of the season may be looked for on this occasion in that the entire concert will be given over to excerpts from the great music dramas of Wagner. The programme in detail will be announced later.

POST JAN 2

MENGES BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Following the third tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall will take place Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, and Saturday evening, Jan. 15.

For these concerts Mr. Monteux has arranged an interesting program, which will be the more eventful through the first appearance in Boston of Isolde Menges, the renowned English violinist, as soloist. Miss Menges first became known in her own country and in the cities of Ireland and Scotland in 1913, when she was generally accorded the highest praise. Having played in the larger cities of Europe until the war broke out in 1916, she came to the United States and gave several highly successful concerts in New York; later in Canada, playing in several cities there. At the coming concert she will play Bruch's First Concerto in G minor.

Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major, and Haydn's so-called "Military" symphony in G major have not been played at these concerts for a long time. The co with Debussy's "La Dawn till Noon on th of Waves," "Dialo Sea."

HERALD. JAN. 2.

---

dress New York City

te TIMES

Griffes's "Pleause Dome of Kubla Khan" will be revived and Malipiero's Suite No. 1 of "Impressioni dai Vero" will be new at the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday, which opens with Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, then Schumann's Symphony No. 4, and closes with Balakireff's "Islamey."

Margaret Matzenauer will assist the

From AMERICAN,
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its third pair of concerts for the season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The programme for the first event consists of "Manfred" Symphony by Tschaikowsky; "Au Sluagh Sidhe (In the Faery Hills) by Bax, first time here; "The Search for God," from D'Indy's "Legend of St. Christopher;" Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys" by Lalo. At the afternoon concert the orchestra will play Symphony D minor by Schumann; Overture, "Don Giovanni," by Mozart;" "The Pleasure Dome on Kubla Khan," by Griffes; "Impressions dal ver o," by Malipiero (first time).

From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 2 1921 Y

CORTOT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The symphony to be played at the third Boston Smyphony concert of the season in the Academy of Music next Friday night, at 8:15, will be Schumann's Fourth in D minor, one of the master's last works and also one of his most beautiful. Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's Overture to his opera "Don Giovanni," and close it with Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey." The soloist will be Alfred Cortot, considered the finest pianist of France.

HERALD

s New York City

The programmes for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall this week are: Thursday evening—Tschaikovsky, "Manfred" symphony; D'Indy, symphonic interlude, "La Queste de Dieu"; Arnold Bax, symphonic poem, An Sluagh Sidhe" (Gaelic subject, "In the Faery Hills"), new here; Lalo, overture to "The King of Ys." Saturday matinee—Mozart, overture, "Don Giovanni"; Schumann, Symphony No. 4; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Malipiero, Suite No. 1, "Impressioni dal Vero," new here; Balakireff, Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," orchestrated by Casella.

POST

ss: Washington, D. C.

An English Opinion.

When Alfred Cortot, who is to b
the soloist with the Boston Sym phony Orchestra here, recently playe in London, the London Daily Tele graph voiced opinion of his gre powers in the following terms:

"That Cortot is colossal as piani
we have long known, but never h he shown us to greater advanta how truly great he is than at t Wigmore Hall on Saturday afterno when he gave a very beautiful Sch mann recital. Of course, the pla was packed to the doors and b yond, but it was packed with an au ence that knew not where to stop, that the great man was obviou tired out when, after the recital, encore fiends had their way. Qu possibly there were some who garded the playing as a little clear cut, too steely, too Fre if you like.

HERALD

ress Washington, D. C.

JAN 2 1921

e show.

Cortot as Soloist.

The third concert of the season to be given in the New National Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, will be a musical event of particular importance in that Alfred Cortot, the eminent French pianist, will be the soloist.

The concert will be opened with Lalo's "Overture to the King of Yes," and the closing number will be Balakireff's Oriental fantasy, "Islamey," with piano work set for orchestra by the Italian composer, Alfredo Casella.

ESTABLISHED
From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 2 1921 A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Brooklyn Academy of Music to-morrow evening, Alfred Cortot, pianist, is the soloist.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR SUNDAY

Famous Hub Organization to Furnish Concert Sunday

The annual appearance at the Auditorium of the Boston symphony orchestra under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association will take place on Sunday. The full strength of the orchestra of 100 pieces will be present under the leadership of Pierre Monteaux. This is the association's choicest contribution to the city's enjoyment this season.

The attention of the public is called to the change in the time of this concert, made necessary by the length of the program. The concert will begin at 3 instead of 3.30, the usual hour. The terrace subscribers' door will open at 2.15 and the front doors will open at 2.45.

SUN

ss New York City

e

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony was the feature of the third Thursday night programme played here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It is a work rarely enough heard here now. Byron, who once inspired more musicians than probably any other English poet, and perhaps more than any other poet in the world outside of Goethe—and possibly Dante—is almost as distant from modern audiences as are most of the composers he inspired.

Byron himself called "Manfred" his witch drama. That is almost all he gave by way of clue to it too. But the busy biographers have been finding all sorts of secret allusions to his own life in its lines. Every imaginable horror has been thrust up as its motif. Goethe himself wrote, with more directness than generosity:

"This singularly intellectual poet has extracted from my Faust the strongest nourishment for his hypochondria; but he has made use of the impelling principles for his own purpose . . . When a bold and enterprising young man he won the affections of a Florentine lady. Her husband discovered the amour and murdered his wife; but the murderer was the same night found dead in the street, and there was no one to whom any suspicion could be attached. Lord Byron removed from Florence, but these spirits have haunted him all his life. This romantic incident explains innumerable allusions. . . ."

Which is all plausible enough, considering that the allusions all do have to do with a murdered lady, were it not for the fact that Byron never saw Florence until after "Manfred" was completed. He was at the time of writing "Manfred" living mostly in Venice, jilting a cloth merchant's wife for a baker's wife—hence La Fornarina, he called her, after Raphael—and then jilting the baker's wife because she pulled the hats from the heads of any other dames who looked at her poet. Such was the background for a plot which Galt thought turned on a "tradition of unhallowed necromancy—a human sacrifice . . ."

But Byron himself says that "Manfred" owns no plot and hints away with dramatic delight: "It was the Staubbach and the Jungfrau, and something else more than Faustus, which made me write 'Manfred.'" And he says to Murray of one of his critics: "It had a better origin than he can devise or divine, for the soul of him!"

Tschaikowsky, with his hypochondriachal self-searchments, was the one to do most with such a theme, no matter how many might try it. The movements of "Manfred's wandering and despair" and the "invocation to Astarte" are acute in their suffering, great in their gloominess. The "Pastorale" throws a glacier glow over Byron's monarch of mountains, and Manfred's death sums up the whole of it in a terror pierced by a peal of beautiful hope. There is more of Byron in it all, surely, than in Schumann's pagodalike overture of angular solemnities.

---

came "La Queste de Dieu," a symphonic excerpt from D'Indy's new opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," played here only a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony. And for another and more absolute novelty there followed a symphonic poem of Gaelic subject, "An Slaugh Sidhe" (In the Faery Hills). It is the work of the English composer Arnold Bax, and this was its first performance in New York.

Mr. Bax, whose name is still in the ascendant abroad, scarcely on the horizon here, has been greeted by the English critics as a very brilliant, gifted composer. Mr. Ernest Newman hopes that of the younger generation of British musicians America will take Mr. Bax as the most truly representative. But this fairy piece is representative of no English characteristic as that of the English eclecticism—and Rimsky-Korsakov stalks through County Clare in ways that are long and circuitous. There was much reliance upon the harp, accounting for the Irish element.

From
Telegram
New York City

JAN 7 1921 L

Boston Orchestra in 'Manfred' Symphony

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is regaining much of its past efficiency has been demonstrated at all of its concerts this season. Last night in Carnegie Hall another programme was played admirably. Pierre Monteux led his men through the length of Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony. That was a feat, for it is a long and arduous composition. But it was hardly a worth while thing, except for those music lovers who like to hear the less important works of great composers. This symphony is rather a tedious work. Some of its music is characteristically melodious and moves with sweeping rhythms. But for the most part it is not calculated to add greatly to the reputation of its composer.

For the first time here a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, an English composer, who appears to be fond of the music of Claude Debussy, was heard. It is called "An Slaugh Sidhe." It is more Russian than it is English and more French than it is Russian.

Another unusual number on the programme was Vincent d'Indy's "Le Queste de Dieu," from his opera "La Legende de Saint Christophe," which was heard recently at a concert of the Symphony Society. It is interesting chiefly because it is one of the latest things by one of France's most distinguished composers.

---

n EAGLE

ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e JAN 7 1921

THURSDAY'S MUSIC

Dullness was the predominating quality in Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony was heard in the third of its Thursday programs. Mr. Monteux began with Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," as full-throated an expression of monotony as we know. Nor did the band lighten the Stygian atmosphere that adheres to these pages. By his stricture against Byron, Goethe probably did more to make the poem "Manfred" immortal than the English poet himself; Tschaikowsky's music only serves to heap additional sod on the Byronic grave.

However, "Manfred" was mild in comparison with the succeeding "La Queste de Dieu" of Vincent d'Indy (as dull this time as when it was played recently under Walter Damrosch) and "In the Faery Hills," a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, one of the younger English composers. Despite much contemporary British praise, Mr. Bax seems to be at best a clever eclectic. The composer was inspired by Irish poets, but the fairies in this case are Gallic rather than Keltic.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING WORLD
New York City

Pierre Monteux And Bostonians; The Symphony

By Sylvester Rawling.

PIERRE MONTEUX, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert in Carnegie Hall last night, was greeted cordially as he came upon the stage. He may not be a "prima donna" conductor, but he has removed the stigma that, for a time, was applied to the once preeminent organization of "shot all to pieces." He has welded the recruits with the old members and marshalled a body of players that commands respect.

Mr. Monteux began with Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, founded upon Byron's poem, which, after the first colorful movement depicting Manfred's wanderings and despair, loses strength. "The Fairy of the Alps" movement is trivial, the "Pastoral" is of no great weight, and the finale is more imposing in construction than inspired. D'Indy's descriptive symphony "La Queste de Dieu," from his opera "La Legende de St. Christophe" came next. It was played by Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Orchestra, and was worth hearing again. Mr. Monteux and his musicians gave it a lucid exposition.

Then there was Arnold Bax's "An Slaugh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), played for the first time in New York, a musical attempt to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight, the composer says. It is cleverly orchestrated, is not without appeal, and has a refreshing jig movement; but the musical devices to indicate the fairies are familiar ones. Mr. Bax might have changed their Nighties, an irreverent listener whispered in my ear. For the end there was Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

JAN 7 - 1921 A

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES THIRD CONCERT

"La Queste de Dieu," d'Indy's Symphonic Interlude, Is Featured on Program.

For the third time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generaled by Pierre Monteux, is paying New York a visit and with a program of varying quality gave the first of its two concerts, scheduled for the week, in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Following the example recently set by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, Vincent d'Indy's symphonic interlude, "La Queste de Dieu," was featured by the Bostonians who illustrated with a veritable riot of instrumental color and forceful emphasis the story of the life of St. Christopher. This selection from the opera, "St. Christopher," which was produced in Paris last Summer, bids fair to take permanent place on American orchestra programs. It was given fair treatment last night by Mr. Monteux and his players.

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, built upon the Byron poem, also held the concentrated attention of an appreciative audience. The movements of this work describe the wanderings of the restless Manfred through changing moods to the final scene which depicts his death.

"Slaugh Sidhe," another symphonic poem, this time dealing with Gaelic Faery-land and life, by the English composer, Arnold Bax, was given its first performance in New York. The work has a lilt and delicious observance of rhythm which make it appealing even in its incongruous places. Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ya" closed the program.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 7 1921 M
From
EVENING MAIL,
New York City

By KATHARINE SPAETH.

WHERE so lately the tempestuous toes of Albert Coates pirouetted, the majestic arms of the volatile Toscanini waved, and the blond head of Leopold Stokowski nodded, last night le petit Pierre Monteux led the Boston Orchestra.

And that means the platform of Carnegie Hall, but no invidious comparisons are intended. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony flowed along, with a great deal of sweetness and light tempering the despair of that Italian Peer-Gynt-Faust, Don Juan.

More interesting was D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," which Walter Damrosch explained so delightfully three Sundays ago. You could hear the wistful questioning of the giant Auferus, "Are you the King of Heaven?" and the vigorous denials.

A new work by Arnold Bax, "In the Faery Hills," was not too important. Its suggestion of Irish folk tunes was confined largely to vague bits of conventional jig-rhythms and the fluent use of harps.

That sprightly overture to the Lalo opera "Le Roi d'Ys" concluded the programme.

ESTABLISHED
From JAN 7 - 1921 A
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony

A new composer of Irish music has arisen, and he is an Englishman! Arnold Bax by name, a young Britisher whose works are attracting attention far and wide. Mr. Edwin Evans, in an exceedingly intimate study of Bax, has pointed out the Celtic influence "plainly visible in all his musical work. * * * The special quality of which is a paradoxical blend of musical thought which, however evanescent its expression, is as definite as it is concise, with a sense of beauty that demands a continuous softening of outlines." Further on the writer, discussing Mr. Bax's music itself, refers to its "curious beauty, eminently sane, and yet tinged with a certain wistfulness wherein resides at once its charm and its paradoxical nature, for to be wistful and at the same time robust is a combination of qualities that falls to few."

A New York audience assembled at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, last evening, heard Mr. Pierre Monteaux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first presentation hereabouts of this interesting composer's symphonic poem, "An Sluagh Sidhe" (In the Faery Hills"), an attempt [illegible] the composer [illegible] suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight. A liberal use is made of Irish dance tunes, but their appearance occurs in a guise of elegantly adorned instrumentation and moderately applied harmonic formulae. Certain it is that Mr. Bax, although inclining towards contemporary French idioms, has nevertheless succeeded in capturing the soul of Celtic lyrical poesy and limning it in tone. Debussy's "Faun" gambols in the Bax musical pasturage quite frequently, otherwise his music is more or less quite much his own original expression. "In the Faery Hills" makes good listening and should be heard more than once.

At a time when Tschaikowsky's fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies are going strong with the public fancy, it is good to hear his obscure "Manfred" symphony if for no other reason than to admire its composer's sincerity of effort and dexterity of workmanship. His is a Russian Manfred, perhaps Tschaikowsky himself is portrayed. And yet the score, despite its burning and yearning melancholy, fails to attain the sustained flights of the "Francesca" fantasie or the "Romeo and Juliet" overtures. Tschaikowsky confesses his physical weakness when working upon this "Manfred" score, and yet it is the product of a master, not a weakling. All that is lacked is the gripping themes. The same mastery of orchestration applied to more inspired material would have brought forth a masterpiece. Although expressing his belief that it was his best work for orchestra, the great Russian composer predicted that it would be played "once or twice and then it will disappear." Now thirty-four years old, it is still given at season intervals. That it will ever equal the popularity of Tschaikowsky's other symphonic works, however, is not to be expected. Taking one hour in performance, the "Manfred" received an earnest reading at the hands of Mr. Monteau and his players. There were many moments of fine power and beautiful tonal shades throughout the instrumental ensemble. Though not the band of yore, the Boston Orchestra can yet boast pre-eminent qualities a-many. Its oboe, clarionet and first violins still sing with their wonted beauty.

Other numbers were Vincent d'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture. The audience was of good size, though not over large.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 7 - 1921
Evening Globe
New York

Music.

Symphony Concerts by a Visiting and Local Orchestra.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra revisited Carnegie Hall last evening and performed in the presence of a considerable audience a programme consisting of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, "The Search for God" from Vincent d'Indy's "Legend of St. Christopher," a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax entitled "In the Faery Hills," and the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The feature of this long and curious concert was the performance of the overture that ended it. This overture is beautiful music by a man who had something to say and who knew how to say it. Played with spirit and tonal richness, this music came as a belated relief where relief was welcome. The "Manfred" symphony used to be performed here a good deal in the Safonoff period. Of late years it has mainly rested. An occasional performance is worth while for historical reasons, but really the symphony is very much of a bore. Mr. Monteux conducted a good performance of it.

It is impossible to write of the symphonic interlude from d'Indy's legend without touching on the controversy that continues about its composer. One thing is certain: it comprises the most successful pages of the score of which it makes a part. And, of course, the science of its composer never fails to command admiration. The Bax piece, which was done for the first time in New York, is, like so much other music that sets out to be supernaturally agreeable, distinctly tiresome in the hearing.

~~In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Society resumed its historical cycle under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony with piano and organ, and César Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra made the programme. Harold Bauer played the piano, Pietro Yon the organ, and René Pollain the viola obbligato in Berlioz's symphony. The programme was performed well, and the audience seemed pleased with the instruction vouchsafed.~~

From
EVENING JOURNAL, JAN 7 - 1921
New York City

BOSTON AND N. Y. ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS

Monteux Plays New English Music—Harold Bauer, Soloist, with Damrosch Band.

An exceptionally large dose of music of the purely romantic type was administered to the concertgoer yesterday, both by Pierre Monteux and his Boston Orchestra and by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony band. The matter was of course fortuitous—the treading on one another's programmatic heels by orchestral conductors is nothing if not accidental—but in any case Mr. Damrosch may be said to have had the right of way. He was giving the sixth of his series of concerts concerned with the chronological evolution of symphonic music and had reached the French romanticists. Mr. Monteux merely hit upon a heterogeneous lot of romantic composers, from Tchaikovsky to Pierre Lalo and Vincent d'Indy, as well as Arnold Bax on the way.

The music of this same Arnold Bax was the only unfamiliar piece on either of these programmes, Bax himself being an unfamiliar, almost an unknown person locally. His name is, completely, Arnold E. Trevor Bax, and he is one of the younger English, or perhaps, Gaelic-English composers of the day, being now thirty-seven years old. The Gaelic touch, or rather, a Gaelic significance appears in much of the music he has written, notably in the work played last night, which has, indeed, a Gaelic title—"An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"). This dates from some eleven or twelve years ago, but the Gaelic fragrance also arises from a later symphonic piece, "Christmas Eve in the Mountains," in the early "Celtic Song Cycle" and other matters.

The acquaintance of Mr. Bax appeared to be well worth making, although this music of his, written when he was twenty-five or thereabouts, had considerable of the imitative flavor that it could scarcely fail to have as the product of a man at that age. But it also held arresting talent—of inventive fancy, neat adjustment of expressive needs to expressive means, delicate and apt instrumentation, and a certain deft assurance—enough of this sort of potentiality to cause one to wish to hear some of the more recent of the man's music. The piece was excellently played by Mr. Monteux and his men.

This programme otherwise held the now seldom played "Manfred" symphony by Tchaikovsky; the orchestral interlude, "La queste de Dieu," from d'Indy's new opera, "La legende de Saint Christophe," recently introduced here by Mr. Damrosch, and, finally, the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le roi d'Ys." Tchaikovsky, in this work, battles with generally befuddled Byronics and whilst there are brilliant flashes of the real Tchaikovsky through the haze, the music as a whole is second-rate. Mr. Monteux energized it manfully wherever the opportunity offered, but now and then narrowly grazed the banality of melodramatics, and lost altogether some of its finer and more subtle moments. The d'Indy opera is already dead dog and repetition of its orchestral interlude describing the as yet unsanctified Auferus's search for the "King of Heaven," awakened no new belief that it was fit to survive the rest of d'Indy's childish allegory.

Mr. Damrosch's standard romantics

---

m TRIBUNE

dress New York City

te JAN 7 - 1921 D

Harold Bauer Is Soloist

Plays in Brilliant Manner With the Symphony Society

Harold Bauer, pianist; Pietro Yon, organist, and Rene Pollain Viola were the soloists at yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall. The compositions were all familiar scenes from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Saint-Saëns's Symphony No. 3 in C minor and Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano with orchestra, played by Mr. Bauer with his accustomed brilliance and fluency.

In the evening at the same hall there was a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only novelty was a symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills," by Arnold Bax, in which the composer has skillfully framed Irish themes in the modern orchestral idioms. The other numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," from his opera "La Legende de Saint-Christophe," and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

From
TIMES JAN 7 - 1921 K
New York City

PLAY BAX'S 'IN F[illegible] HILLS.'

Boston Orchestra Gives a Symphonic Poem of Rare Beauty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced in its concert at Carnegie Hall last night a work of rare beauty by Arnold Bax, composer of neo-Gaelic fantasies, whose "In the Faery Hills," but ten years old in London, was now performed for the first time in New York, following an American production in Boston. Frederick Stock in Chicago had given one of Bax's later pieces, "The Garden of Fand." Conductor Monteux opened his program with other "fairy-like music" in Tschaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony after Byron. There were also d'Indy's "The Search for God," lately heard here, from an opera, "St. Christopher," given in Paris last year, and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

Bax's music was of arresting novelty, wistful, ghostly, demoniac, at the same time that it was curiously strong, coherent in harmony and powerfully based in the folklore of Ireland. It was one of those tales of the "little people," the bad fairies, that stir in whirls of the wind on a restless weather-breeding day. Between Bax and Tschaikovsky, as between their inspiring poems, W. B. Yeats's of how a demon trapped the blind bard, Oisin, and Byron's episode of a witch of the Alps, there was a great gulf fixed; as great indeed, as was the contrast of their expressive musical means, Tchaivoksky's glowing finale with organ as against Bax's exotic belled celesta and "silver harp," the poet's "saddest harp in all the world."

All the instruments of the orchestra gave potency to the varied inner voices of these spirits shrieking, crying, whispering, ventriloquially peering through a web of tone; it was an apt juxtaposition that brought the two works together, and where the older symphony was greeted by the audience with insistent recalls, the new and briefer "poem," which came near the close of two hours' playing, left the audience in rapt mood, as if the vision would not pass. The sense of unearthly calls and answers was in the air; the Bax composition suggested, through a never lifted veil, the soul of a people. For the rest, Mr. Monteux led his own pair of compatriots with a hand of caressing gentleness, like a true Parisian.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN - 1921
Evening Post
New York

"In the Faery Hills"

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is industrious in bringing musical novelties to New York, and at the Bostonians' third concert of the season, in Carnegie Hall last night, he scored again over his local competitors by giving the first performance here of an exquisitely beautiful and masterfully orchestrated symphonic poem, a novel Gaelic fantasy, entitled "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold E. Trevor Bax. Arnold Bax is an English composer (at least he was born in London, in 1883), and at an early age he came under the influence of the Neo-Celtic movement in literature and art and took an absorbing interest in everything touched by the glamour of Ireland in ancient days. This symphonic poem was written when he was twenty-six years old, in 1909, and had its first performance in London in 1910. It is a work of such instant appeal to lovers of orchestral music and of such unmistakable poetry and power that the wonder is that it took ten years to reach New York, and then had to be brought by a visiting conductor.

Mr. Bax has vouchsafed so much of a programme as to say that his music attempts to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight. "The composer has endeavored also to shadow forth the atmosphere of mystery and almost of terror with which the Irish people regard their faery compatriots. The middle section was to some extent suggested by a passage in Mr Yeats's 'Wanderings of Oisin,' in which a human bard having strayed among the host of the Sidhe (wind) is asked by them to sing a song for their pleasure. But when he sings a song of human joy the faeries declare it the saddest song that was ever sung and throw the harp away in sorrow and anger while the harper is swept away into their revel."

The music—mystic, wistful, ghostly, weird, yet at the same time eminently sane, vigorous, strong and coherent, with now and then a snatch of typical Irish melody boldly sung above its rushing winds of ethereal sound—has the impress of new and individual beauty, of sincerity and of power; and is of a curiously paradoxical character in that it is equally wistful and robust, a rare combination of qualities. It was superbly played by the Boston men and was received with prolonged plaudits of favor and delight by the large audience.

G. W. H.

From JAN 7 - 1921
WORLD,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

It is not often that New York enjoys the chance to hear in one day two such orchestras as the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony. They represent the very apex of our musical culture—for symphony is a superior art form and opera seldom is—no matter what one thinks of their conductors. The band from Boston last night at Carnegie Hall discoursed most eloquently Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony. Toujours Byron. Earlier in the day we had listened to the "Harold" of Berlioz-Byron, but not altogether convinced that the monster machine had been worth the trouble of fabrication. The Russian's version of Byron did convince; in that vast land Byron has always been understood; there are Poushekine and Lermontov as witnesses. Berlioz's method of composition was the juxtaposition of huge blocks of tone; nothing melts or merges, while continual flux and flow are the life of the Tschaikowsky music, banal as some of it now sounds. But the chief weakness of Berlioz is his contrapuntal handling. Therein he is the eternal amateur. As Harold Bauer sensibly puts it: You can't make bricks without straw, and you can't make good music without counterpoint.

Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony vigorously and drew from his instrument a rich volume of tone. "The Search for God," by Vincent D'Indy is no longer a novelty, thanks to Mr. Damrosch. It is the most viable quotation from his opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," produced at Paris with success. Still, we couldn't help recalling unhappy and tortured August Strindberg, crucified on the cross of his own morose genius. He said: "I searched for God and found the Devil." D'Indy searched too, but only found the devil of cacophony. The music is brilliantly dull.

The novelty of this curiously arranged programme was an ambitious symphonic poem, "In the Faery Hills," which contained one jolly, jigging Celtic, or Gaelic, tune served with modern harmonic sauce. Clever and well scored. It is by Arnold Bax, an English composer. The evening was announced to end with Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD

New York City

7 - 1921 H

Boston Symphony Concert.

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Carnegie Hall last evening. The second will take place to-morrow afternoon. The thermometer fell considerably yesterday and not even the second stimulant in the shape of Byronic music administered in the evening (there had been one in the afternoon) served to keep some people from feeling the chill. M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the wise men of the East, began his entertainment with the "Manfred" symphony of Tschaikowsky. The work was vigorously played and there were some moments of finish in the performance. Also there were some of false intonation. But the audience seemed to like it.

Tschaikowsky was a great master, but if his fame had to rest on the "Manfred" symphony no one would ever cry "Beware the Muscovite." It is an exceedingly ponderous, dull and empty work, in which the only good ideas are those which sound like echoes of Rimsky-Korsakov. However, it seemed last evening to be a fitting prelude to the descriptive symphony from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "Le Legende de St. Christophe," called "La Queste de Dieu."

This music probably would be much more interesting in its place in the opera. Only such tid-bits as the intermezzo of "Cavalleria Rusticana" or the "Thais" meditation, which, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the case, can be transferred successfully to the concert room. D'Indy's intermezzo should be heard between the acts by those who do not feel obliged to go out.

It sounded last evening as if it meant something, but there was no key to the composer's purpose, and as sheer music it presented too many changes of front to be clear and satisfying. The orchestra played it very well. There was also a work of Arnold Bax, "In the Fairy Hills," a symphonic poem which will have to be heard earlier in the evening in order to receive proper consideration. The long concert came to an end with Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture.

NOTED VIOLINIST TO PLAY AT SYMPHONY

As soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 11th pair of concerts to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, and Saturday evening, Jan. 15, Isolde Menges will be heard with the orchestra in Bruch's First Violin Concerto in G minor.

This will be her Boston debut, for, although she has been long famous in the larger cities of Europe and has played in New York and in Canada as well, mischance has hitherto prevented her appearance in Boston. At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's Overture in the Italian style in C major, Haydn's "Military" Symphony in G major, and Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer."

REG. 1 6.

recently by Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Orchestra, and was worth hearing again. Mr. Monteux and his musicians gave it a lucid exposition.

Then there was Arnold Bax's "An Slaugh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), played for the first time in New York, a musical attempt to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight, the composer says. It is cleverly orchestrated, is not without appeal, and has a refreshing jig movement; but the musical devices to indicate the fairies are familiar ones. Mr. Bax might have changed their Nighties, an irreverent listener whispered in my ear. For the end there was Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Y's."

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES THIRD CONCERT

"La Queste de Dieu," d'Indy's Symphonic Interlude, Is Featured on Program.

For the third time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generaled by Pierre Monteux, is paying New York a visit and with a program of varying quality gave the first of its two concerts, scheduled for the week, in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Following the example recently set by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, Vincent d'Indy's symphonic interlude, "La Queste de Dieu," was featured by the Boston ans who illustrated with a veritable riot of instrumental color and forceful emphasis the story of the life of St. Christopher. This selection from the opera, "St Christopher," which was produced in Paris last Summer, bids fair to take permanent place on American orchestra programs. It was given fair treatment last night by Mr. Monteux and his players.

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony built upon the Byron poem, also held the concentrated attention of an appreciative audience. The movements of this work describe the wanderings of the restless Manfred through changing moods to the final scene which depicts his death.

"Slaugh Sidhe," another symphonic poem, this time dealing with Gaelic Faery-land and life, by the English composer, Arnold Bax, was given its first performance in New York. The work has a lilt and delicious observance of rhythm which make it appealing even in its incongruous places. Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ya" closed the program.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

EVENING MAIL,

New York City

By KATHARINE SPAETH.

WHERE so lately the tempestuous toes of Albert Coates pirouetted, the majestic arms of the volatile Toscanini waved, and the blond head of Leopold Stokowski nodded, last night le petit Pierre Monteux led the Boston Orchestra.

And that means the platform of Carnegie Hall, but no invidious comparisons are intended. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony flowed along, with a great deal of sweetness and light tempering the despair of that Italian Peer-Gynt-Faust, Don Juan.

More interesting was D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," which Walter Damrosch explained so delightfully three Sundays ago. You could hear the wistful questioning of the giant Auferus, "Are you the King of Heaven?" and the vigorous denials.

A new work by Arnold Bax, "In the Faery Hills," was not too important. Its suggestion of Irish folk tunes was confined largely to vague bits of conventional jig-rhythms and the fluent use of harps.

That sprightly overture to the Lalo opera "Le Roi d'Ys" concluded the programme.

ESTABLISHED

From JAN 7 - 1921 A

STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony

A new composer of Irish music has arisen, and he is an Englishman! Arnold Bax by name, a young Britisher whose works are attracting attention far and wide. Mr. Edwin Evans, in an exceedingly intimate study of Bax, has pointed out the Celtic influence "plainly visible in all his musical work. * * * The special quality of which is a paradoxical blend of musical thought which, however evanescent its expression, is as definite as it is concise, with a sense of beauty that demands a continuous softening of outlines." Further on the writer, discussing Mr. Bax's music itself, refers to its "curious beauty, eminently sane, and yet tinged with a certain wistfulness wherein resides at once its charm and its paradoxical nature, for to be wistful and at the same time robust is a combination of qualities that falls to few."

A New York audience assembled at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, last evening, heard Mr. Pierre Monteaux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first presentation hereabouts of this interesting composer's symphonic poem, "Au Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"), an attempt of the composer to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight. A liberal use is made of Irish dance tunes, but their appearance occurs in a guise of elegantly adorned instrumentation and moderately applied harmonic formulae. Certain it is that Mr. Bax, although inclining towards contemporary French idioms, has nevertheless succeeded in capturing the soul of Celtic lyrical poesy and limning it in tone. Debussy's "Faun" gambols in the Bax musical pasturage quite frequently, otherwise his music is more or less quite much his own original expression. "In the Faery Hills" makes good listening and should be heard more than once.

At a time when Tschaikowsky's fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies are going strong with the public fancy, it is good to hear his obscure "Manifred" symphony if for no other reason than to admire its composer's sincerity of effort and dexterity of workmanship. His is a Russian Manfred, perhaps Tschaikowsky himself is portrayed. And yet the score, despite its burning and yearning melancholy, fails to attain the sustained flights of the "Francesca" fantasie or the "Romeo and Juliet" overtures. Tschaikowsky confesses his physical weakness when working upon this "Manfred" score, and yet it is the product of a master, not a weakling. All that is lacked is the gripping themes. The same mastery of orchestration applied to more inspired material would have brought forth a masterpiece. Although expressing his belief that it was his best work for orchestra, the great Russian composer predicted that it would be played "once or twice and then it will disappear." Now thirty-four years old, it is still given at season intervals. That it will ever equal the popularity of Tschaikowsky's other symphonic works, however, is not to be expected. Taking one hour in performance, the "Manfred" received an earnest reading at the hands of Mr. Monteau and his players. There were many moments of fine power and beautiful tonal shades throughout the instrumental ensemble. Though not the band of yore, the Boston Orchestra can yet boast pre-eminent qualities a-many. Its oboe, clarionet and first violins still sing with their wonted beauty.

Other numbers were Vincent d'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture. The audience was of good size, though not over large.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

Evening Globe

New York

Music.

Symphony Concerts by a Visiting and Local Orchestra.

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra revisited Carnegie Hall last evening and performed in the presence of a considerable audience a programme consisting of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, "The Search for God" from Vincent d'Indy's "Legend of St. Christopher," a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax entitled "In the Faery Hills," and the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The feature of this long and curious concert was the performance of the overture that ended it. This overture is beautiful music by a man who had something to say and who knew how to say it. Played with spirit and tonal richness, this music came as a belated relief where relief was welcome. The "Manfred" symphony used to be performed here a good deal in the Safonoff period. Of late years it has mainly rested. An occasional performance is worth while for historical reasons, but really the symphony is very much of a bore. Mr. Monteux conducted a good performance of it.

It is impossible to write of the symphonic interlude from d'Indy's legend without touching on the controversy that continues about its composer. One thing is certain; it comprises the most successful pages of the score of which it makes a part. And, of course, the science of its composer never fails to command admiration. The Bax piece, which was done for the first time in New York, is, like so much other music that sets out to be supernaturally agreeable, distinctly tiresome in the hearing.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Society resumed its historical cycle under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony with piano and organ, and César Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra made the programme. Harold Bauer played the piano, Pietro Yon the organ, and René Pollain the viola obbligato in Berlioz's symphony. The programme was performed well, and the audience seemed pleased with the instruction vouchsafed.

From JAN 7 - 1921

EVENING JOURNAL,

New York City

BOSTON AND N. Y. ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS

Monteux Plays New English Music—Harold Bauer, Soloist, with Damrosch Band.

An exceptionally large dose of music of the purely romantic type was administered to the concertgoer yesterday, both by Pierre Monteux and his Boston Orchestra and by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony band. The matter was of course fortuitous—the treading on one another's programmatic heels by orchestral conductors is nothing if not accidental—but in any case Mr. Damrosch may be said to have had the right of way. He was giving the sixth of his series of concerts concerned with the chronological evolution of symphonic music and had reached the French romanticists. Mr. Monteux merely hit upon a heterogeneous lot of romantic composers, from Tchaikovsky to Pierre Lalo and Vincent d'Indy, as well as Arnold Bax on the way.

The music of this same Arnold Bax was the only unfamiliar piece on either of these programmes, Bax himself being an unfamiliar, almost an unknown person locally. His name is, completely, Arnold E. Trevor Bax, and he is one of the younger English, or perhaps, Gaelic-English composers of the day, being now thirty-seven years old. The Gaelic touch, or rather, a Gaelic significance appears in much of the music he has written, notably in the work played last night, which has, indeed, a Gaelic title—"An Sluagh Sidhe" ("In the Faery Hills"). This dates from some eleven or twelve years ago, but the Gaelic fragrance also arises from a later symphonic piece, "Christmas Eve in the Mountains," in the early "Celtic Song Cycle" and other matters.

The acquaintance of Mr. Bax appeared to be well worth making, although this music of his, written when he was twenty-five or thereabouts, had considerable of the imitative flavor that it could scarcely fail to have as the product of a man at that age. But it also held arresting talent—of inventive fancy, neat adjustment of expressive needs to expressive means, delicate and apt instrumentation, and a certain deft assurance—enough of this sort of potentiality to cause one to wish to hear some of the more recent of the man's music. The piece was excellently played by Mr. Monteux and his men.

This programme otherwise held the now seldom played "Manfred" symphony by Tchaikovsky; the orchestral interlude, "La queste de Dieu," from d'Indy's new opera, "La legende de Saint Christophe," recently introduced here by Mr. Damrosch, and, finally, the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le roi d'Ys." Tchaikovsky, in this work, battles with generally befuddled Byronics and whilst there are brilliant flashes of the real Tchaikovsky through the haze, the music as a whole is second-rate. Mr. Monteux energized it manfully wherever the opportunity offered, but now and then narrowly grazed the banality of melodramatics, and lost altogether some of its finer and more subtle moments. The d'Indy opera is already dead dog and repetition of its orchestral interlude describing the as yet unsanctified Auferus's search for the "King of Heaven," awakened no new belief that it was fit to survive the rest of d'Indy's childish allegory.

Mr. Damrosch's standard romantics

---

m TRIBUNE

dress JAN 7 - 1921 D New York City

te

Harold Bauer Is Soloist

Plays in Brilliant Manner With the Symphony Society

Harold Bauer, pianist; Pietro Yon, organist, and Rene Pollain Viola were the soloists at yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall. The compositions were all familiar scenes from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Saint-Saëns's Symphony No. 3 in C minor and Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano with orchestra, played by Mr. Bauer with his accustomed brilliance and fluency.

In the evening at the same hall there was a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only novelty was a symphonic poem, "In the Fairy Hills," by Arnold Bax, in which the composer has skillfully framed Irish themes in its modern orchestral idioms. The other numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, D'Indy's "La Queste de Dieu," from his opera "La Legende de Saint-Christophe," and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

From

TIMES JAN 7 - 1921 K

New York City

PLAY BAX'S 'IN FAERY HILLS.'

Boston Orchestra Gives a Symphonic Poem of Rare Beauty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced in its concert at Carnegie Hall last night a work of rare beauty by Arnold Bax, composer of neo-Gaelic fantasies, whose "In the Faery Hills," but ten years old in London, was now performed for the first time in New York, following an American production in Boston. Frederick Stock in Chicago had given one of Bax's later pieces, "The Garden of Fand." Conductor Monteux opened his program with other "fairy-like music" in Tschaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony after Byron. There were also d'Indy's "The Search for God," lately heard here, from an opera, "St. Christopher," given in Paris last year, and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

Bax's music was of arresting novelty, wistful, ghostly, demoniac at the same time that it was curiously strong, coherent in harmony and powerfully based in the folklore of Ireland. It was one of those tales of the "little people," the bad fairies, that stir in whirls of the wind on a restless weather-breeding day. Between Bax and Tschaikovsky, as between their inspiring poems, W. B. Yeats's of how a demon trapped the blind bard, Oisin, and Byron's episode of a witch of the Alps there was a great gulf fixed; as great indeed, as was the contrast of their expressive musical means, Tchaikovsky's glowing finale with organ as against Bax's exotic belled celesta and "silver harp," the poet's "saddest harp in all the world."

All the instruments of the orchestra gave potency to the varied inner voices of these spirits shrieking, crying, whispering, ventriloquially peering through a web of tone; it was an apt juxtaposition that brought the two works together, and where the older symphony was greeted by the audience with insistent recalls, the new and briefer "poem," which came near the close of two hours' playing, left the audience in rapt mood, as if the vision would not pass. The sense of unearthly calls and answers was in the air; the Bax composition suggested, through a never lifted veil, the soul of a people. For the rest, Mr. Monteux led his own pair of compatriots with a hand of caressing gentleness, like a true Parisian.

ISHED 1881

From

Evening Post

New York

"In the Faery Hills"

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is industrious in bringing musical novelties to New York, and at the Bostonians' third concert of the season, in Carnegie Hall last night, he scored again over his local competitors by giving the first performance here of an exquisitely beautiful and masterfully orchestrated symphonic poem, a novel Gaelic fantasy, entitled "In the Faery Hills," by Arnold E Trevor Bax. Arnold Bax is an English composer (at least he was born in London, in 1883), and at an early age he came under the influence of the Neo-Celtic movement in literature and art and took an absorbing interest in everything touched by the glamour of Ireland in ancient days. This symphonic poem was written when he was twenty-six years old, in 1909, and had its first performance in London in 1910. It is a work of such instant appeal to lovers of orchestral music and of such unmistakable poetry and power that the wonder is that it took ten years to reach New York, and then had to be brought by a visiting conductor.

Mr. Bax has vouchsafed so much of a programme as to say that his music attempts to suggest the note of the Hidden People in the hills of Ireland after twilight. "The composer has endeavored also to shadow forth the atmosphere of mystery and almost of terror with which the Irish people regard their faery compatriots. The middle section was to some extent suggested by a passage in Mr Yeats's 'Wanderings of Oisin,' in which a human bard having strayed among the host of the Sidhe (wind) is asked by them to sing a song for their pleasure. But when he sings a song of human joy the faeries declare it the saddest song that was ever sung and throw the harp away in sorrow and anger while the harper is swept away into their revel."

The music—mystic, wistful, ghostly, weird, yet at the same time eminently sane, vigorous, strong and coherent, with now and then a snatch of typical Irish melody boldly sung above its rushing winds of ethereal sound—has the impress of new and individual beauty, of sincerity and of power; and is of a curiously paradoxical character in that it is equally wistful and robust, a rare combination of qualities. It was superbly played by the Boston men and was received with prolonged plaudits of favor and delight by the large audience.

G. W. H.

---

owsky's "Manfred" symphony. Toujours Byron. Earlier in the day we had listened to the "Harold" of Berlioz-Byron, but not altogether convinced that the monster machine had been worth the trouble [illegible] tion. The Russian's version of Byron did convince; in that vast land Byron has always been understood; there are Poushekine and Lermontov as witnesses. Berlioz's method of composition was the juxtaposition of huge blocks of tone; nothing melts or merges, while continual flux and flow are the life of the Tschaikowsky music, banal as some of it now sounds. But the chief weakness of Berlioz is his contrapuntal handling. Therein he is the eternal amateur. As Harold Bauer sensibly puts it: You can't make bricks without straw, and you can't make good music without counterpoint.

Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony vigorously and drew from his instrument a rich volume of tone. "The Search for God," by Vincent D'Indy is no longer a novelty, thanks to Mr. Damrosch. It is the most viable quotation from his opera, "The Legend of St. Christopher," produced at Paris with success. Still, we couldn't help recalling unhappy and tortured August Strindberg, crucified on the cross of his own morose genius. He said: "I searched for God and found the Devil." D'Indy searched too, but only found the devil of cacophony. The music is brilliantly dull.

The novelty of this curiously arranged programme was an ambitious symphonic poem, "In the Faery Hills," which contained one jolly, jigging Celtic, or Gaelic, tune served with modern harmonic sauce. Clever and well scored. It is by Arnold Bax, an English composer. The evening was announced to end with Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD

New York City

Boston Symphony Concert.

The January concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Carnegie Hall last evening. The second will take place to-morrow afternoon. The thermometer fell considerably yesterday and not even the second stimulant in the shape of Byronic music administered in the evening (there had been one in the afternoon) served to keep some people from feeling the chill. M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the wise men of the East, began his entertainment with the "Manfred" symphony of Tschaikowsky. The work was vigorously played and there were some moments of finish in the performance. Also there were some of false intonation. But the audience seemed to like it.

Tschaikowsky was a great master, but if his fame had to rest on the "Manfred" symphony no one would ever cry "Beware the Muscovite." It is an exceedingly ponderous, dull and empty work, in which the only good ideas are those which sound like echoes of Rimsky-Korsakov. However, it seemed last evening to be a fitting prelude to the descriptive symphony from Vincent d'Indy's opera, "Le Legende de St. Christophe," called "La Queste de Dieu."

This music probably would be much more interesting in its place in the opera. Only such tid-bits as the intermezzo of "Cavalleria Rusticana" or the "Thaïs" meditation, which, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the case, can be transferred successfully to the concert room. D'Indy's intermezzo should be heard between the acts by those who do not feel obliged to go out.

It sounded last evening as if it meant something, but there was no key to the composer's purpose, and as sheer music it presented too many changes of front to be clear and satisfying. The orchestra played it very well. There was also a work of Arnold Bax, "In the Fairy Hills," a symphonic poem which will have to be heard earlier in the evening in order to receive proper consideration. The long concert came to an end with Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture.

NOTED VIOLINIST TO PLAY AT SYMPHONY

As soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 11th pair of concerts to be given in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, and Saturday evening, Jan. 15, Isolde Menges will be heard with the orchestra in Bruch's First Violin Concerto in G minor.

This will be her Boston debut, for, although she has been long famous in the larger cities of Europe and has played in New York and in Canada as well, mischance has hitherto prevented her appearance in Boston. At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's Overture in the Italian style in C major, Haydn's "Military" Symphony in G major, and Debussy's symphonic suite "La Mer."

RE [illegible] 6.

From

WORLD,

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

It is not often that New York enjoys the chance to hear in one day two such orchestras as the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony. They represent the very apex of our musical culture—for symphony is a superior art form and opera seldom is—no matter what one thinks of their conductors. The band from Boston last night at Carnegie Hall discoursed most eloquently Tchai-

Familiar and Unfamiliar Music on Mr. Monteux's Programme—Mr. Hofmann and Mr. Bauer for Notable Pianists—Mme. Szumowska Anew—Mr. Kubelik Returns—Again the Harvard Glee Club—Other Impending Joys

EXPLORING the less familiar music of Schubert and Haydn, rather than taking the easy way of "repertory pieces," Mr. Monteux has drawn from them two numbers for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—from Schubert, an Overture in the Italian style, presumably with what those days called "a grand crescendo," and from Haydn the so-called "Military Symphony." These items fill the first half of the conductor's programme. The second he divides between Bruch's Concerto for Violin in G minor, and Debussy's Symphonic Sketches of "The Sea"—a piece that has probably been heard oftener in Boston than in Paris itself. There is little need to recall the pictorial and imaginative quality of the music. In the concerto a violinist as yet unheard in Boston—Mme. Isolde Menges—will play the solo part. She plays with large tone and manner. German and English audiences have applauded her.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Monteux will be heard at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, in Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Lalo's overture, "The King of Ys," and Grieg's Concerto for Piano. In that piece Mme. Goodson, the pianist of fine, nervous energies, crisp touch and bright tone, long unheard hereabouts, will play the solo part.

TRANS. JAN. 8.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," Haydn's symphony in G minor, and Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer." Ysolde Menges, the English violinist, will be heard in Bruch's concerto in G minor.

ADVERTISER JAN 9

Menges Symphony Soloist

Next Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, and Saturday evening, Jan. 15, the 11th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux will head the programme with Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major. This composer always aspired to write an opera which would be as popular as those of his contemporary, Rossini, and the overture to be played at this concert is said to have been influenced by Rossini's manner. Mr. Monteux will revive at this concert Haydn's Symphony in G minor, which is known as the "Military' symphony, composed in his last years for one of his Saloman concerts in England. This work has taken its name from the martial character of many of its pages and the number of percussion instruments used unusually large for the time. A notable number on this programme will be Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer." The movements describe "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves," "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." As soloist at this concert Ysolde Menges, the young English violinist, will be heard in Bruch's first violin Concerto in G minor. Although she has become famous in her own country and the cities of Europe, and in New York and Canada as well, it has happened that Miss Menges has never played in Boston.

POST-JAN. 9

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Overture in the Italian style, Schubert; Symphony in G minor, "Military," Haydn; Concerto in G minor, Bruch; "La Mer," Debussy. Soloist, Isolde Menges, violinist. (First appearance in Boston.)

Events and Comments of Current Interest

Isolde Menges, the English violinist, who makes her first appearance in Boston at this week's Symphony concerts, has a reputation in her own country which rouses favorable anticipations of her playing.

GLOBE JAN. 9.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the 11th pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux heads the program with Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major. The overture was influenced by Rossini's manner. Mr. Monteux will revive at this concert Haydn's Symphony in G minor, the "Military" symphony, composed in his last years for one of his Saloman concerts in England. This work has taken its name from the martial character of certain pages and the number of percussion instruments used unusually large for the time. A notable number will be Debussy's "La Mer," one of the finest and most graphic works of the French composer, which has figured prominently in the repertory of the orchestra. The movements describe "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves," "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." As soloist at this concert Isolde Menges, the young English violinist, will be heard in Bruch's Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor. Although she has become famous in her own country, the cities of Europe, and in New York and Canada as well, Miss Menges has never played in Boston.

APPEARING THIS WEEK

ISOLDE MENGES, VIOLINIST, IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS OF THIS WEEK
HER FIRST APPEARANCE IN BOSTON

WORLD,
New York City
JAN 9 1921 L

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huncker

AN INTERESTING CONCERT.

The programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was interesting: Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, the fourth symphony of Schumann, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes; a novelty by the sprightly young Italian composer, Malipiero, "Impressions From Nature," Suite No. 1, all ending with Balakireff's "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

The bird music of Malipiero might have extorted a smile from the sardonic Aristophanes; fellow feeling makes us wondrous sour. There are plenty of sour notes in this charming music, for charming it is as a whole. The owl was in it, but not the pussycat; the woodpecker pecked and the blackcap warbled. We liked the little two-note call of Minerva's pet fowl, best of all we admired the rustic piping of Mr. Longy's oboe. He evoked true woodland air. The Malipiero dissonances no longer disturb; they derive from the genial Mr. Strawinski, who must keep a harmonious vinegar factory somewhere down the River Don. Strictly speaking, we preferred the "Islamey" Oriental fantasy when it was so astonishingly played years ago by the Russian virtuoso and famous Liszt pupil, Arthur Friedheim. Notwithstanding the kaleidoscopic orchestration of the clever Casella, we missed the incisive "martellato" of the pianoforte. However, it was a brilliant experiment in color and rhythm and gorgeously played under Pierre Monteaux's energetic baton. Rimsky-Korsakoff evidently remembered one of its themes when he wrote "The Golden Cock."

It is always with a feeling of hesitation that a critic hears for the second time a composition that made an appeal to him when a novelty. Will the magic operate again? We are glad to record the fact that in the case of the Griffes setting of Coleridge's magnificent poem, "Kubla Khan," the magic still lurked in its mysterious and opulent measures, and always will be there because a poet-composer has stamped his music with the seal of a vivid imagination, a planturous imagination, one that revels in the fantastic dreams of faraway, mystic Asia. Slavic influences are easy to trace in this score, Rimsky-Korsakoff and some traits of Tchaikovsky, in the manipulation of the brass choir. The narrative tone, after the [illegible] atmosphere of the [illegible]

HERALD JAN. 9

—the line of force and continuity escapes us, but the ensemble effect of the picture is impressive in its evocation of a light that never was on sea or land. The loss to American art through the death of Griffes is twofold; he was a musician doubled by a poet. He would have outlived the sultry and opiate spirit of Coleridge, but he would have always remained the imaginative thinker in tone.

The Boston organization made a better showing at this matinee than it did last Thursday evening. The Schumann symphony, redolent with melody, is a favorite of Pere Monteux. There was a crowded house and much genuine enthusiasm after the Griffes music.

From JAN 9 1921 L
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty Picturing Birds

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Repeated in Interesting Program at Carnegie Hall

There was a novelty on the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from Nature") Suite No. 1. It comprises three little sketches suggested by three birds, the Blackcap, the Woodpecker and the Owl. The first pictures the song of the bird in autumn woods. In the second the woodpecker is at work on the mildewed trunks o the oaks at high noon. The forest is en fête, teeming with life under the warming rays of the sun. In the third the mournful note of the owl is heard through the stillness of night. All three show imagination and exquisite fancy, and Malipiero has not found it necessary to wallow in dissonance. Each of the pieces has character and distinction, each is skilfully orchestrated.

Another feature of a delightful program was a repetition of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by the late Charles Griffes, a symphonic poem first played here last season by Mr. Monteux. A second hearing renews the excellent impression made by the music at its first performance, and deepens the realization of the tragic loss to American music caused by the composer's early death. This music is a fitting musical embodiment of Coleridge's superb poem. The poetry is Coleridge at his best and one is almost tempted to say that the music is greater than the poem. Griffes is magnificently Oriental, but his Orientalism is no mere borrowing or imitation. It is his own.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4, Op. 120 in D minor, one of his lesser works chiefly notable for its Romanza, which has a distinctly Celtic flavoring. Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni" and Casella's ingenious orchestration of Balakireff's "Islamey" were the other pieces. An interesting program delightfully played.

From TIMES
Address New York City
Date JAN 9 - 19

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its New York visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The fourth symphony of Schumann was the chief number of the program, which included also the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" and Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's brilliant piano piece, "Islamey."

In Schumann's symphony neither orchestra nor conductor was very satisfactory. The performance was distinctly a commonplace one; it seemed perfunctory. Now this symphony, however much its orchestration may be criticised, is not commonplace music, nor is it perfunctory in spirit; and it is indispensable that it should not be played so. The romantic glow in it is still warm and there is a fault somewhere when a performance so signally fails to recapture that spirit as did the performance yesterday afternoon. It centred, no doubt, in a lack of sympathy or a lack of comprehension. Nor could it be said that the performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture was a brilliant one.

There was far more of the spirit of the music in Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." This piece was first played here last season, while the composer was still alive; and he had the pleasure of knowing of its very favorable reception in New York and in other cities. Mr. Monteux did an excellent thing in repeating the composition in his concerts this year. One of the grievances of the American composer—though Mr. Griffes is not known to have audibly voiced grievances—is that his music is played once and then shelved, even when it is found deserving.

This symphonic poem is well worth keeping in the orchestral repertory. It is filled with imagination, with picturesque and poetical imagery, and these are expressed in a manner essentially musical in ideas and development, so that the interest and value of the piece are musical beyond and outside of the picturesque and graphic suggestion that is set in motion by Coleridge's verses. Once again Mr. Griffes's composition gave a deep pleasure.

There was a new piece on the program Francesco Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero"—the title is paraphrased as "Impressions from Nature"—was played for the first time in New York. It consists of three sections called, respectively, "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," "The Owl." It is not to be supposed that the composer was greatly preoccupied with the calls or notes of these three birds. He has endeavored to recall "the musical impression that he himself one day felt in listening to the confidences of the woods peopled with birds." The music is evocative of woods. There are native wood notes, more or less wild. The first is a "Waldweben" of a sort; the peck of the woodpecker is indeed heard in the rapid movement of the second; and the suggestion of the owl in the third, in which the music is carried through in the mood of the nocturne, is that of a gentle bird. The composer is less concerned with giving form and shape to his music, which has charm and a varied harmonic beauty, than in developing atmosphere and effect. These were pleasingly in evidence, but the composition did not assert itself as

---

SYMPHONY PERFORMS "THE SEA"

Debussy's Work Easily Feature of Its Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Isolde Menges, violinist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions were: Schubert's Overture in the Italian manner; Haydn's Military symphony, and Debussy's three pieces for orchestra, which go under the collective title of "La Mer."

DEBUSSY THE FEATURE

The performance of this music of Debussy was for some the feature of the concert. Not but what Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of a delightful and insufficiently known symphony of Haydn, not but what Schubert's overture in the manner of Rossini entertained the audience hugely. But the crown of the concert was Debussy's impressionistic score, which was given by far the best performance thus far heard in this city.

As to the permanent value of this music, one hesitates after many hearing in coming to a conclusion. Debussy's sea is as baffling as the sea itself, in its many moods. These moods, or these sounds [illegible]

---

chestra.

Marvelous Orchestration

The orchestration of this composition seems almost past compare. It is wonderful in every way and in every department of the orchestra. If one took the scoring for the woodwind choir alone, the woodwind choir without strings or brass or even percussion to help it out, one would be fascinated. In fact, some times we wonder if fewer strings than those of the standard symhony orchestra of today, with the retention of the standard number of wind instruments, would not make even a more effective performance. We have heard this music in the smaller spaces of Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, where the wood showed more than it does in the spaces of Symphony Hall, and the effect was wilder, more eerie, more uncannily of the sea. But what is true of the woodwind is likewise true of the strings and other divisions of the orchestra. Debussy writes for one as for all, with complete mastery.

In Debussy's orchestra the winds whisper, the waves crash, sirens sing strange songs. But in spite of all this tonal magic the music seems to lack the grip and the unity of conception which make so wonderful for example, the earlier and less mature music of the movement "Sirens" from the three orchestral nocturnes. In that movement is the essence of "La Mer," and the Nocturne is much less sophisticated, much less fussed over, while simple and wonderful ideas, put very modestly, tell with becoming brevity, an unforgetable tale.

Best Way to Enjoy It

The way to take "La-Mer"—and one could not help taking it that way during the sympathetic and engrossing performance of Mr. Monteux—is perhaps to listen to each measure for what it is, to immerse oneself in its sheer tonal beauty and wonder; to forget all instinctive demands for some kind of a form, some kind of an artistic structure; to meet the composer half way, not to reflect that this sound might represent a wind that was shaking the shutters as well as a wind disturbing ocean depths, to take Debussy's word for it that this is the sea and revel in the fantasy with the composer. Thus Wilde lamented the decay of the art of lying. To him every artist was a liar, a man who invents something which is not so, and his greatness to be measured by the quality of his yarn. Let us listen to Mr. Debussy, artist-liar, with the understanding that if he will please keep on lying so wonderfully about the sea we will listen to him, promise not to interrupt or ask embarrassing questions as to the accuracy of his tale, but take it for what it is and neither inquire nor speculate as to its probability. But we personally think down deep in our hearts that this music is a little less genuine, less spontaneous and inspired than earlier music of Debussy. It is certain that much of its tonal fascination was the accomplishment of Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra.

The performance of Haydn's symphony showed again what foolish and traditional fallacies historians and students of music, as well as of every other subject under the sun, will maintain. The particular Haydn fallacy is that Haydn was a very proper and respectable composer, an apostle of form for form's sake, and a man without too many elemental human impulses in him. Whereas the truth is that Haydn was an extremely red-blooded man, who danced attendance on a prince only because he had to, but whose heart went out to the people and the fields, which found their way into his lusty, melodious music.

Miss Menges, who was widely applauded, played the Bruch G minor concerto, a conventional though excellently written work, a work which will soon be as dead as the dodo, a work over which Mendelssohn would have shed tears of joy, and pointed it out to Schumann as a model of composition. This work Miss Menges played in a conventional manner with an abuse of vibrato, without individuality, without artistic distinction.

POST JAN. 15

Mr. Monteux has put together a promising miscellany for the Symphony Concerts of next week. It begins with Beethoven's First Symphony—music of eighteenth-century accent and manner; continues with Franck's rarely heard Symphonic Poem "The Djinns," and a new Passacaglia by Seth Bingham; and ends with the French Suite of Roger-Ducasse. Verses of Hugo about these spirits of Arab mythology suggested Franck's piece. It contains a considerable piano-part to be played by Mr. Schmitz. Mr. Bingham is an American composer of the younger generation, a teacher as well at Columbia College. Presumably his Passacaglia is a brief set of variations. Roger-Ducasse's French Suite, a spirited piece in short movements, was played at the Symphony Concerts under Mr. Fiedler and since, for nearly ten years, has lain on the shelf. Neither French nor American audiences hear his music too often.

Much in the ~~present~~ hullaballoo about Mr. ~~Toscanini~~ as the one and only conductor for the Symphony Orchestra is amusing. Not least so the fact that some of his loudest advocates were, no more than two short years ago, equally ardent champions of le bonhomme Rabaud as a "great conductor." In view of the difference between the two men, these notions of "greatness" do seem rather mixed.

TRANS. JAN. 13.

[76]

Symphony." Tsc
r in the day w
"Harold" of Be altogether conster machine had double of ... s version of Byron vast land Byron understood; there d Lermontov as s method of comjuxtaposition of one; nothing melts continual flux and the Tschaikowsky

some of it now chief weakness of rapuntal handling.
eternal amateur.
sensibly puts it:
ricks without straw,
good music with-conducted the symand drew from his volume of tone

"God," by Vincent
a novelty, thanks
It is the most vian his opera, "The istopher," produced success. Still, we lling unhappy and Strindberg, crucified his own morose
"I searched for God ll." D'Indy searched
d the devil of ca-usic is brilliantly

this curiously ar-was an ambitious
in the Faery Hills,"
one jolly, jigging tune served with sauce. Clever and by Arnold Bax, an
The evening was with Lalo's over-— 1921

hony Concert.
certs of the Boston
began in Carnegie
The second will take fternoon. The thererably yesterday and nd stimulant in the music administered in had been one in the
to keep some people hill. M. Pierre Mon-the wise men of the ntertainment with the ay of Tschaikowsky.
gorously played and moments of finish in Also there were ation. But the audiit.
as a great master,
had to rest on the ny no one would ever Muscovite." It is an rous, dull and empty he only good ideas are d like echoes of Rim-However, it seemed last fitting prelude to the phony from Vincent

"Le Legende de St. led "La Queste de

obably would be much in its place in the h tid-bits as the inter-lleria Rusticana" or the ation, which, like the om in the spring, have with the case, can be cessfully to the concert intermezzo should be the acts by those who ged to go out.
t evening as if it meant there was no key to the pose, and as sheer music many changes of front satisfying. The orchesery well. There was also nold Bax, "In the Fairy phonic poem which will rd earlier in the evening
eive proper consideration.
rt came to an end with d'Ys" overture.

IOLINIST TO Y AT SYMPHONY

with the Boston Symstra at the 11th pair be given in Symphony afternoon, Jan. 14, and vening, Jan. 15, Isolde be heard with the oruch's First Violin Con-inor.
her Boston debut, for,
has been long famous r cities of Europe and in New York and in well, mischance has vented her appearance
At the same concerts
eux will conduct Schu-
ure in the Italian style
, Haydn's "Military"
n G major, and Dephonic suite "La Mer."

RD. JAN. 8.

Familiar and Unfamiliar Music on Mr. Monteux's Programme—Mr. Hofmann and Mr. Bauer for Notable Pianists—Mme. Szumowska Anew—Mr. Kubelik Returns—Again the Harvard Glee Club—Other Impending Joys

EXPLORING the less familiar music of Schubert and Haydn, rather than taking the easy way of "repertory pieces," Mr. Monteux has drawn from them two numbers for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—from Schubert, an Overture in the Italian style, presumably with what those days called "a grand crescendo," and from Haydn the so-called "Military Symphony." These items fill the first half of the conductor's programme. The second he divides between Bruch's Concerto for Violin in G minor, and Debussy's Symphonic Sketches of "The Sea"—a piece that has probably been heard oftener in Boston than in Paris itself. There is little need to recall the pictorial and imaginative quality of the music. In the concerto a violinist as yet unheard in Boston—Mme. Isolde Menges—will play the solo part. She plays with large tone and manner. German and English audiences have applauded her.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Monteux will be heard at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, in Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Lalo's overture, "The King of Ys," and Grieg's Concerto for Piano. In that piece Mme. Goodson, the pianist of fine, nervous energies, crisp touch and bright tone, long unheard hereabouts, will play the solo part.

TRANS JAN. 8

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," Haydn's symphony in G minor, and Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer." Ysolde Menges, the English violinist, will be heard in Bruch's concerto in G minor.

ADVERTISER JAN 9

Menges Symphony Soloist

Next Friday afternoon, Jan. 14, and Saturday evening, Jan. 15, the 11th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux will head the programme with Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major. This composer always aspired to write an opera which would be as popular as those of his contemporary, Rossini, and the overture to be played at this concert is said to have been influenced by Rossini's manner. Mr. Monteux will revive at this concert Haydn's Symphony in G minor, which is known as the "Military' symphony, composed in his last years for one of his Saloman concerts in England. This work has taken its name from the martial character of many of its pages and the number of percussion instruments used unusually large for the time. A notable number on this programme will be Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer." The movements describe "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves," "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." As soloist at this concert Ysolde Menges, the young English violinist, will be heard in Bruch's first violin Concerto in G minor. Although she has become famous in her own country and the cities of Europe, and in New York and Canada as well, it has happened that Miss Menges has never played in Boston.

JAN. 9

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Overture in the Italian style, Schubert; Symphony in G minor, "Military," Haydn; Concerto in G minor, Bruch; "La Mer," Debussy. Soloist, Isolde Menges, violinist. (First appearance in Boston.)

Events and Comments of Current Interest

Isolde Menges, the English violinist, who makes her first appearance in Boston at this week's Symphony concerts, has a reputation in her own country which rouses favorable anticipations of her playing.

JAN. 9

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the 11th pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux heads the program with Schubert's Overture in the Italian Style in C major. The overture was influenced by Rossini's manner. Mr. Monteux will revive at this concert Haydn's Symphony in G minor, the "Military" symphony, composed in his last years for one of his Saloman concerts in England. This work has taken its name from the martial character of certain pages and the number of percussion instruments used unusually large for the time. A notable number will be Debussy's "La Mer," one of the finest and most graphic works of the French composer, which has figured prominently in the repertory of the orchestra. The movements describe "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolic of Waves," "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." As soloist at this concert Isolde Menges, the young English violinist, will be heard in Bruch's Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor. Although she has become famous in her own country, the cities of Europe, and in New York and Canada as well, Miss Menges has never played in Boston.

APPEARING THIS WEEK

ISOLDE MENGES, VIOLINIST, IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS OF THIS WEEK
HER FIRST APPEARANCE IN BOSTON

HERALD JAN. 9

WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

AN INTERESTING CONCERT.

The programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was interesting: Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, the fourth symphony of Schumann, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes; a novelty by the sprightly young Italian composer, Malipiero, "Impressions From Nature," Suite No. 1, all ending with Balakireff's "Islamey," orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

The bird music of Malipiero might have extorted a smile from the sardonic Aristophanes; fellow feeling makes us wondrous sour. There are plenty of sour notes in this charming music, for charming it is as a whole. The owl was in it, but not the pussy-cat; the woodpecker pecked and the blackcap warbled. We liked the little two-note call of Minerva's pet fowl. best of all we admired the rustic piping of Mr. Longy's oboe. He evoked true woodland air. The Malipiero dissonances no longer disturb; they derive from the genial Mr. Stra[illegible]nski, who must keep a harmonious vinegar factory somewhere down the River Don. Strictly speaking, we preferred the "Islamey" Oriental fantasy when it was so astonishingly played years ago by the Russian virtuoso and famous Liszt pupil, Arthur Friedheim. Notwithstanding the kaleidoscopic orchestration of the clever Casella, we missed the incisive "martellato" of the pianoforte. However, it was a brilliant experiment in color and rhythm and gorgeously played under Pierre Monteaux's energetic baton. Rimsky-Korsakoff evidently remembered one of its themes when he wrote "The Golden Cock."

It is always with a feeling of hesitation that a critic hears for the second time a composition that made an appeal to him when a novelty. Will the magic operate again? We are glad to record the fact that in the case of the Griffes setting of Coleridge's magnificent poem, "Kubla Khan," the magic still lurked in its mysterious and opulent measures, and always will be there because a poet-composer has stamped his music with the seal of a vivid imagination, a planturous imagination, one that revels in the fantastic dreams of far-away, mystic Asia. Slavic influences are easy to trace in this score, Rimsky-Korsakoff and some traits of Tchalkovsky, in the manipulation of the brass choir. The narrative tone, after the dusky atmosphere of the opening, is often broken into episodes—the line of force and continuity escapes us, but the ensemble effect of the picture is impressive in its evocation of a light that never was on sea or land. The loss to American art through the death of Griffes is twofold; he was a musician doubled by a poet. He would have outlived the sultry and opiate spirit of Coleridge, but he would have always remained the imaginative thinker in tone.

The Boston organization made a better showing at this matinee than it did last Thursday evening. The Schumann symphony, redolent with melody, is a favorite of Pere Monteux. There was a crowded house and much genuine enthusiasm after the Griffes music.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty Picturing Birds

Symphonic Poem by Griffes Repeated in Interesting Program at Carnegie Hall

There was a novelty on the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from Nature") Suite No. 1. It comprises three little sketches suggested by three birds, the Blackcap, the Woodpecker and the Owl. The first pictures the song of the bird in autumn woods. In the second the woodpecker is at work on the mildewed trunks o the oaks at high noon. The forest is en fête, teeming with l[illegible] under the warming rays of the sun. [illegible] the third the mournful note of the owl is heard through the stillness of night. All three show imagination and exquisite fancy, and Malipiero has not found it necessary to wallow in dissonance. Each of the pieces has character and distinction, each is skilfully orchestrated.

Another feature of a delightful program was a repetition of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by the late Charles Griffes, a symphonic poem first played here last season by Mr. Monteux. A second hearing renews the excellent impression made by the music at its first performance, and deepens the realization of the tragic loss to American music caused by the composer's early death. This music is a fitting musical embodiment of Coleridge's superb poem. The poetry is Coleridge at his best and one is almost tempted to say that the music is greater than the poem. Griffes is magnificently Oriental, but his Orientalism is no mere borrowing or imitation. It is his own.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 4, Op. 120 in D minor, one of his lesser works chiefly notable for its Romanza, which has a distinctly Celtic flavoring. Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni" and Casella's ingenious orchestration of Balakireff's "Islamey" were the other pieces. An interesting program delightfully played.

---

rom.......................... TIMES
ddress New York City
ate.......................... JAN 9 - 19

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its New York visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The fourth symphony of Schumann was the chief number of the program, which included also the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero" and Alfredo Casella's orchestration of Balakireff's brilliant piano piece, "Islamey."

In Schumann's symphony neither orchestra nor conductor was very satisfactory. The performance was distinctly a commonplace one; it seemed perfunctory. Now this symphony, however much its orchestration may be criticised, is not commonplace music, nor is it perfunctory in spirit; and it is indispensable that it should not be played so. The romantic glow n it is still warm and there is a fault somewhere when a performance so signally fails to recapture that spirit as did the performance yesterday afternoon. It centred, no doubt, in a lack of sympathy or a lack of comprehension. Nor could it be said that the performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture was a brilliant one.

There was far more of the spirit of the music in Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." This piece was first played here last season, while the composer was still alive; and he had the pleasure of knowing of its very favorable reception in New York and in other cities. Mr. Monteux did an excellent thing in repeating the composition in his concerts this year. One of the grievances of the American composer—though Mr. Griffes is not known to have audibly voiced grievances—is that his music is played once and then shelved, even when it is found deserving.

This symphonic poem is well worth keeping in the orchestral repertory. It is filled with imagination, with picturesque and poetical imagery, and these are expressed in a manner essentially musical in ideas and development, so that the interest and value of the piece are musical beyond and outside of the picturesque and graphic suggestion that is set in motion by Coleridge's verses. Once again Mr. Griffes's composition gave a deep pleasure.

There was a new piece on the program Francesco Malipiero's "Impressioni dal Vero"—the title is paraphrased as "Impressions from Nature"—was played for the first time in New York. It consists of three sections called, respectively, "The Blackcap," "The Woodpecker," "The Owl." It is not to be supposed that the composer was greatly preoccupied with the calls or notes of these three birds. He has endeavored to recall "the musical impression that he himself one day felt in listening to the confidences of the woods peopled with birds." The music is evocative of woods. There are native wood notes, more or less wild. The first is a "Waldweben" of a sort; the peck of the woodpecker is indeed heard in the rapid movement of the second; and the suggestion of the owl in the third, in which the music is carried through in the mood of the nocturne, is that of a gentle bird. The composer is less concerned with giving form and shape to his music, which has charm and a varied harmonic beauty, than in developing atmosphere and effect. These were pleasingly in evidence, but the composition did not assert itself as

---

SYMPHONY PERFORMS "THE SEA"

Debussy's Work Easily Feature of Its Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Isolde Menges, violinist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions were: Schubert's Overture in the Italian manner; Haydn's Military symphony, and Debussy's three pieces for orchestra, which go under the collective title of "La Mer."

DEBUSSY THE FEATURE

The performance of this music of Debussy was for some the feature of the concert. Not but what Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of a delightful and insufficiently known symphony of Haydn, not but what Schubert's overture in the manner of Rossini entertained the audience hugely. But the crown of the concert was Debussy's impressionistic score, which was given by far the best performance thus far heard in this city.

As to the permanent value of this music, one hesitates after many hearing in coming to a conclusion. Debussy's sea is as baffling as the sea itself, in its many moods. These moods, or these sounds of the sea are miraculosuly echoed by Debussy's orchestra.

Marvelous Orchestration

The orchestration of this composition seems almost past compare. It is wonderful in every way and in every department of the orchestra. If one took the scoring for the woodwind choir alone, the woodwind choir without strings or brass or even percussion to help it out, one would be fascinated. In fact, some times we wonder if fewer strings than those of the standard symhony orchestra of today, with the retention of the standard number of wind instruments, would not make even a more effective performance. We have heard this music in the smaller spaces of Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, where the wood showed more than it does in the spaces of Symphony Hall, and the effect was wilder, more eerie, more uncannily of the sea. But what is true of the woodwind is likewise true of the strings and other divisions of the orchestra. Debussy writes for one as for all, with complete mastery.

In Debussy's orchestra the winds whisper, the waves crash, sirens sing strange songs. But in spite of all this tonal magic the music seems to lack the grip and the unity of conception which make so wonderful for example, the earlier and less mature music of the movement, "Sirens" from the three orchestral nocturnes. In that movement is the essence of "La Mer," and the Nocturne is much less sophisticated, much less fussed over, while simple and wonderful ideas, put very modestly, tell with becoming brevity, an unforgetable tale.

Best Way to Enjoy It

The way to take "La-Mer"—and one could not help taking it that way during the sympathetic and engrossing performance of Mr. Monteux—is perhaps to listen to each measure for what it is, to immerse oneself in its sheer tonal beauty and wonder; to forget all instinctive demands for some kind of a form, some kind of an artistic structure; to meet the composer half way, not to reflect that this sound might represent a wind that was shaking the shutters as well as a wind disturbing ocean depths, to take Debussy's word for it that this is the sea and revel in the fantasy with the composer. Thus Wilde lamented the decay of the art of lying. To him every artist was a liar, a man who invents something which is not so, and his greatness to be measured by the quality of his yarn. Let us listen to Mr. Debussy, artist-liar, with the understanding that if he will please keep on lying so wonderfully about the sea we will listen to him, promise not to interrupt or ask embarrassing questions as to the accuracy of his tale, but take it for what it is and neither inquire nor speculate as to its probability. But we personally think down deep in our hearts that this music is a little less genuine, less spontaneous and inspired than earlier music of Debussy. It is certain that much of its tonal fascination was the accomplishment of Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra.

The performance of Haydn's symphony showed again what foolish and traditional fallacies historians and students of music, as well as of every other subject under the sun, will maintain. The particular Haydn fallacy is that Haydn was a very proper and respectable composer, an apostle of form for form's sake, and a man without too many elemental human impulses in him. Whereas the truth is that Haydn was an extremely red-blooded man, who danced attendance on a prince only because he had to, but whose heart went out to the people and the fields, which found their way into his lusty, melodious music.

Miss Menges, who was widely applauded, played the Bruch G minor concerto, a conventional though excellently written work, a work which will soon be as dead as the dodo, a work over which Mendelssohn would have shed tears of joy, and pointed it out to Schumann as a model of composition. This work Miss Menges played in a conventional manner with an abuse of vibrato, without individuality, without artistic distinction.

POST JAN. 15

Mr. Monteux has put together a promising miscellany for the Symphony Concerts of next week. It begins with Beethoven's First Symphony—music of eighteenth-century accent and manner; continues with Franck's rarely heard Symphonic Poem "The Djinns," and a new Passacaglia by Seth Bingham; and ends with the French Suite of Roger-Ducasse. Verses of Hugo about these spirits of Arab mythology suggested Franck's piece. It contains a considerable piano-part to be played by Mr. Schmitz. Mr. Bingham is an American composer of the younger generation, a teacher as well at Columbia College. Presumably his Passacaglia is a brief set of variations. Roger-Ducasse's French Suite, a spirited piece in short movements, was played at the Symphony Concerts under Mr. Fiedler and since, for nearly ten years, has lain on the shelf. Neither French nor American audiences hear his music too often.

Much in the present hullaballoo about Mr. Toscanini as the one and only conductor for the Symphony Orchestra is amusing. Not least so the fact that some of his loudest advocates were, no more than two short years ago, equally ardent champions of le bonhomme Rabaud as a "great conductor." In view of the difference between the two men, these notions of "greatness" do seem rather mixed.

TRANS. JAN. 13.

[76]

COMPOSERS, CONDUCTORS, SINGERS, BOLSHEVISTS

Pity the Plight of Malipiero, Who Will Not "Stay Put"—Rare Gervase Elwes—Mme du Carp, Earnest and Monotonous Pianist—The Soviets Decide Who Shall and Shall Not Write Music—Mr. Toscanini's Return to Boston — Impending Programmes

FORTUNATE and unfortunate is Malipiero in concert-halls hereabouts. None of the "new Italians" has had such frequent place upon programmes in Boston and in Cambridge; none except Respighi with the tone-poem of the Roman fountains, has made so auspicious a beginning. When Mr. Rabaud set Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" in the Symphony Concerts, when Mr. Monteux repeated the piece, the music made no small impression. It was moody, emotional, alive with stress and pang. It suggested a tense, introspective, almost self-torturing quality in a composer who seemingly spoke from the depths of his spirit. As individual, strained and darkling was the tonal speech that Malipiero chose. Now, it is our American habit to expect that an artist—poet, painter, musician, actor, what not—will continue in the way in which he has first interested and impressed us. Since "Pauses of Silence" was a sombre music, wrung, as it seemed, from the composer, ever afterward must Malipiero beat high and run deep in the concert-room.

The Italian is a man like the rest of us. Consequently he has other minds and moods. Being composer, he may even express them in music. In fact he did so in the two sets of "Nature-Pictures" ("Impressioni dal Vero") that Mr. Monteux and Mr. Bodanzky have lately included in their programmes: in the quartet for strings, "Madrigals and Grotesques," Playd last week in Cambridge. With surprise audiences heard him musingly minded over the woods in autumn; writing music of the whirr and sheen of the forest in summer; setting the night-wind to drive the cypresses in ghostly round; hearing bells across hazy distances; catching the spirit of rustic merrymaking. Moreover, as he translated these images and sensations into tones, he hinted at Italianate melody; used no more than the lighter idiom of the modernists in fanciful pieces. Where, where, was the soul-wrung Malipiero crying his pain in a strained and darksome speech?

So, again, with the quartet for strings—often written in the clear, sharp accents of Italian song, alternating light music of the folk in antic play with a gentler but no less transparent music of longing, using his medium skilfully, fancifullly, but with no exceptional invention and in no unusual manner. Therefore, weighings, scruples, doubts, among the curious in new men, matter, manners. Is Malipiero, they ask themselves and each other, so rare and remarkable a composer as we believed him after "Pauses of Silence"? Possibly the time is too early and the material too scant for judgment. At least, however, we can all agree that he is a composer of more than one voice and aspect. To be so has advantages. It even upsets preconceived opinions. H. T. P.

TRANS, JAN. 13.

LITTLE HACKNEYED MUSIC IN PROGRAM

Schubert, Bruch, Haydn in Unfamiliar Pieces

Miss Menges Scores a Triumph as a Violin Virtuoso

Mr Monteux put together for yesterday's Symphony concert a program of numbers from the repertory of the orchestra, none of which has had frequent performances in the past. Schubert's overture in the Italian style and Haydn's "Military" Symphony were both last heard in the season of 1899-1900. Bruch's first concerto has been chosen by only eight previous soloists in 40 years. There have been five performances of Debussy's "La Mer," the only piece on the list which was at all familiar to the present generation of concert goers.

Shubert wrote much seldom-heard music for orchestra. Only the thrice familiar symphonies in B minor and C major are usually played, in fact. Although yesterday's overture can scarcely be called great music it is interesting and tuneful. One would like to hear more of the unknown Schubert.

The Haydn symphony is one of his best, superior to the oft heard "Surprise." The performance might have had more subtle dynamic gradations throughout. The slow movement would gain by being taken as a military march instead of as a song without words.

Isolde Menges, who made her first concert appearance in Boston as soloist in Bruch's concerto, is another great violinist to add to one's bewilderingly long list of admirable fiddlers still in their 20's. No woman since the late Maud Powell has played here with such phenomenal technique and sound musicianship combined. This generation may lack great singers, it has almost a surplus of great violinists.

The Bruch concerto is a tuneful show piece of the sort turned out in profusion by Wieniewski and Vieuxtemps. [illegible] longer take Bruch [illegible] t composer. It is [illegible] hat although Bruch [illegible] "patriotic" in Ger[illegible] mporary Saint-Saens [illegible] ring the late war [illegible] y music," nobody pro[illegible] concerto yesterday. [illegible] was [illegible] en a bril[illegible] But the[illegible] s with less [illegible] cent, how[illegible]

Mr Monteux, whatever his shortcomings, deserves more credit than he is likely to get for his success in remolding the orchestra. If everyone did not have memories of bygone excellences, which neither he nor the present players on the whole can yet equal, his work would meet more heartfelt appreciation.

GLOBE. JAN. 15.

Beethoven, Franck, and Two Young Moderns from Mr. Monteux—Mr. Toscanini to Return Once More—The Flonzaleys Again — Novel Pieces from the Musical Association — Rakhmaninov Returns—Miscellaneous Recitals

AGAIN Mr. Monteux is minded to an eighteenth-century symphony—Beethoven's first, in C major—to begin the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The music actually dates from the early years of the nineteenth, but in voice and spirit, it belongs to the days of Haydn and Mozart. Modern is the second half of the conductor's list: Franck's tone-poem, "The Djinns"; a Passacaglia by Seth Bingham; the French Suite of Roger-Ducasse. According to the title-page, a poem of Victor Hugo about Djinns—good, evil and wandering spirits of earth and air in Arab verse, tale and fancy—suggested Franck's music, but in the score itself there is little hint of such verse. The piece contains an elaborate piano-part to be played by Mr. Schmitz, the Parisian pianist, already heard and liked in Boston at the Symphony Concerts and in recitals of his own. Mr. Bingham is a young and little known American composer, who now teaches music at Columbia College in New York. His Passacaglia—an ancient form that has tempted Cyril Scott among the moderns—is music of diverse voice and mood developed from a motiv recurring in the bass. Roger-Ducasse's Suite was first heard in Boston in Mr. Fiedler's time. It runs in an Overture, Bourrée, Air and Minuet—a spirited and well contrasted music by a French composer of these days, not too often heard either in France or in America.

TRAN. JAN 15.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will comprise Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; Cesar Franck's descriptive symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," which will be given for the first time at these concerts, with E. Robert Schmitz as pianist; a "Passacaglia," by Seth Bingham, the American composer, which will have its first public performance on this occasion, and the "Suite Francaise," by Roger Ducasse.

ADVERTISER-JAN 16

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 12th program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be headed by Beethoven's First Symphony in C major. Cesar Franck's descriptive symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," will be performed for the first time at these concerts. The important piano solo part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist. A "Passacaglia," by Seth Bingham, the American composer, will have its first public performance on this occasion. The concert will close with the "Suite Francaise," by Roger-Ducasse, which consists of an overture, bourree, recitative and air, and minuet.

HERALD JAN. 16

Boston Symphony Programme

The twelfth regular programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon, Jan. 21, and Saturday evening, Jan. 22, will be headed by Beethoven's First Symphony in C major. Cesar Franck's descriptive symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," will be given for the first time at these concerts. The important piano solo part will be played by Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist. A "Passacaglia," by Seth Bingham, the American composer, will have its first public performance on this occasion. The programme will close with the "Suite Francaise" by Roger Ducasse, which consists of an Overture, Bourree, Recitative and Air, and Minuet.

Wagner for Pension Fund Concert

The second pension fund concert of the season, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux, on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, will be an unusual musical event of the season, in that the programme will consist entirely of the music of Richard Wagner.

POST JAN. 16.

JAN. 16. POST.

[77]

The twelfth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on January 21 was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major; Bingham, Passacaglia (first performance); Franck, "Les Djinns"; Roger-Ducasse, Suite Française. E. Robert Schmitz played the piano part in the Franck piece.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven symphony was the outstanding feature of the afternoon. He never sought to imbue the music with an importance foreign to it. All was grace and lightness, and this work of Beethoven's youth, so full of promise of the great genius to be revealed in the compositions of his maturer years, was presented with all the freshness and charm so native to it.

Bingham's passacaglia for orchestra is a magnified exercise in counterpoint. It inspires awe when one reflects on the immense amount of labor involved in the writing of it. If the object of music is to display mathematical ingenuity, this passacaglia is undoubtedly an important composition. Those who look for something more in music will probably find it but dry stuff indeed. Why, in a country so full of poetical ideas and impulses as America, do so many of its native composers seek their inspiration in the abstruse contrapuntal of Reger and his followers? Bach, the greatest contrapuntist of them all, contrived to express emotion in spite of his counterpoint. But then, scarcely one of Bach's fugues would pass muster in a conservatory as an example in "the strict style." The Suite Française by Roger-Ducasse is agreeable music. It is facile, sounding no great emotional depths, and brilliantly orchestrated. Franck's "Les Djinns" was adequately interpreted by Mr. Schmitz. Excellent artist that he is, one regretted that he had not the opportunity to display those qualities, for which he is justly admired, to better advantage.

MONITOR JAN 22

MID-SEASON CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Work of American Given—Schmitz, Pianist, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Schmitz played the piano part in Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's 1st symphony; a "Passacaglia" by Seth Bingham, a young American, an organist and a graduate of Yale University, who was present in person to respond to the applause of his composition, and Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Francaise."

NOT A DISPLAY LIST

The programme was not one calculated to display to the greatest advantage the capabilities of the conductor and the orchestra. The more noticeable was the interest given to compositions which were not of exceptional importance, the musicianly care for detail, the brilliancy and the technical finish, the tonal glory of the orchestra which Mr. Monteux has developed.

Thus Beethoven's early symphony was made arresting because of the unexpected interest of inner parts and of passages which ordinarily sound old-fashioned, if not commonplace. But why any longer play the symphony? The First symphony is not Beethoven. The Second is, and the Third is one of the greatest of the nine. If we want the style of music presented by Beethoven's first symphony why not play Haydn or Mozart, whose G. minor or C major symphonies are far superior to this one. And yet—there was a day when the opening chords of this first symphony of the youthful Beethoven, chords known and used and introduced with like freedom by inexperienced students of harmony today, were savagely attacked and held up by critics as matter for distrust or ridicule.

Not Franck at Best

Franck's piece is not representative of the composer either. Just why so admirable a musician and so brilliant a virtuoso as Mr. Schmitz should have elected to play this work it is hard to understand. Once in a while there is heard the voice of Franck. Elsewhere it is orchestral racket. When the piano enters with a theme which as a theme of thanksgiving for the passage and the disappearance of the demons of Hugo's poem, we recognize the organist of St. Sulpice.

To say that Mr. Schmitz made of his part as much as could be made of it is merely to state the fulfilment of expectation. But again, why the selection? At best the piano part of "Les Djinns" is an obligato part of a symphonic work and not a concerto, while the work is not a work in itself worth while.

Bingham's "Passacaglia"

Nor can we wax enthusiastic over Mr. Bingham's "Passacaglia." It is brilliantly scored and in that way effective. But we cannot feel that the composer feels natural in this music. It seems mathematically planned. The theme of the Passacaglia appears fussed over. It offers certain facilities for development and variation which the composer no doubt planned carefully, if not fussily. But where is the spontaneity, or the "developments" which develop as though nothing else could happen under God's shining sun?

One of the best places is a variation in which the harmony is most conventional. Listening to that, one queries whether all this elaborate counterpoint and somewhat d'Indyesque d'Indy was one of Mr. Bingham's teachers—this d'Indyesque treatment is not unconsciously artifical, unconsciously assumed by the composer of whose seriousness and idealism there can be no doubt. But respectable intentions do not make good music, and this music is respectable enough to have originated in Boston instead of New Jersey. O for a really wild strain from Camden or Passaic! It is true, nevertheless, that the audience called Mr. Bingham twice to his feet, and that he accepted this applause with a pleasure as unfeigned as his modesty.

Ducasse's Suite

After all, the most entertaining and natural music—barring Beethoven—was that of Roger-Ducasse. It is not great music. It is not deep. It relies over much on sequences and other musicians' tricks. But it has movement, life, rythm, gaiety which is French.

It is clearly written and orchestrated in a frequently piquant manner. And it was beautifully played by Mr. Monteau and his men.

POST JAN. 22

AN unfamiliar Symphony by Dvo the second, in D minor, leads Monteux's programme for the S phony Concerts of next Friday aftern and Saturday evening in welcome sub tution for the hackneyed "Symphony f the New World," usually the beginning the end of the Bohemian composer on s occasions. Then follow two short Pas caglie for Orchestra by the Englishm Cyril Scott, now on visit to this countr music already heard and variously judg in other cities and Wagner's sombre a stirring "Faust Overture" not too oft reappearing at Symphony Hall. Betwe whiles, Mme Lashansha, the one pupil Mme. Sembrich, to keep place in the co cert-hall will sing airs from Mozar opera, "The Magic Flute," and Charpe tier's music-drama, "Louise."

Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, in Sympho Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orche tra for the increase of its Pension Fu for disabled or retired members. Mr. Mo teux will conduct and, for the first time some years, the programme will consi wholly of Wagner's music—for the m part from his operas.

TRANS. JAN. 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Apathetic Afternoon with None To Interesting a Programme—Mr. Monteu and the Orchestra Excel Themselves wit Early Beethoven — Thin-Voiced Franck Thick-Voiced Bingham, and, Finally, th Clear, Bright Tones of Roger-Ducasse

Not often, within easy recollection, ha an audience at a Symphony Concert seemed so indifferent toward conductor, music, and even soloist, as did that of yestreday afternoon. Only at the discovery of Mr. Seth Bingham, thrice called upon to acknowledge the applause at the end of his Passacaglia, was there any display of enthusiasm. For the rest, through Beethoven's First Symphony, which began the concert, through César Franck's "Les Djinns,' in which Mr. Robert Schmitz played the accessory piano-part, and even through most of Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Française"—far and away the most interesting music of the afternoon—the apathy continued. Undoubtedly some of this indifference can be laid to the general lassitude occasioned by the thermometer's violent reaction from the recent "cold snap," but the "weather-man" should not be made to bear all the blame. The fact is that Mr. Monteux has a second time put together a rather dull programme—the one really bright spot in it the aforesaid Suite by Roger-Ducasse.

Surely the days of the first of Beethoven's symphonies are numbered, if they are not already told. It was many years ago that Berlioz, one of the most appreciative of all commentators on Beethoven's music, said of the piece, "This is not Beethoven." Nor is it, save in the Minuet, and in certain passages here and there in the other movements. There is a pleasing dignity in the introductory Adagio, once a stumbling block to the pedants because of the tonality of its opening chords, but the Allegro and the amiable Andante are for the most part colorless music, without the light charm, the peasant gaiety of Haydn, the Grecian purity of Mozart, or the robustness and depth of Beethoven himself. The Minuet—it is really a Scherzo—is still fresh and vigorous, though the once celebrated Trio seems now overpraised; and there is a bright cheerfulness in the Finale—though Berlioz found it childish—that still gives a mild pleasure. The performance was in every way admirable—clear, supple, beautifully proportioned and euphonious. Mr. Monteux has never been so fortunate in his reading of the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart as in this symphony of the youthful Beethoven which somewhat resembles them. And so far as the playing of the orchestra was concerned, little that it has done this year has given so happy an augury of return to its former technical perfection.

Mr. Bingham's Passacaglia terday its first public perform the all-informing programme-bo learn that the composer's name ha peared in the concerts of the New Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmo ciety of New York, the Barrère En and the Little Symphony. Yet for he cannot be considered one of the known among even the younger Ame composers, and for that reason Mr. Mo teux deserves the more credit for giving Passacaglia a hearing. With every wi to be kind to Mr. Bingham it is not easy to grow enthusiastic over his piece. Ther is in it an abundant display of schola ship, skill in counterpoint, in themati transformation and, though to a less d gree, in orchestration. It is commendab vigorous and straight-forward, and times there is a pleasing richness of fect—and yet the breath of life seems to be there. It is more than ten ye since this Passacaglia was composed surely Mr. Bingham, who is still a you man, must look upon it somewhat as exercise in composition. The great di culty in the treatment of the Passacag form as it is ordinarily understood lies making the numerous short episodes pear congruous and relevant. That Bingham has done this with the same s cess as, for example, Brahms in the Fin of his Fourth Symphony, cannot be mitted. But his intention appears to h been slightly different; with the delibe adoption of rhythmic modifications changes of tonality, the resultant effec more that of a theme and variations t of a single unified movement. The c shortcoming of the piece is its frequ thickness, which at times comes perilo near to clumsiness.

"After the Poem of Victor Hugo" runs the sub-title of César Franck's Djinns"; and the irreverent will add long way after." For a few meas there is a suggestion of the flight of spirits, but after the piece is once u way the composer seems more conce with the technical problem of adjusting combining the piano and orchestra—which he worked out far more success in his later "Variations Symphoniq
But Franck, even at his feeblest, is al an interesting craftsman, and this phonic Poem is not without a certain gance; it has its moments of effective Yet on the whole it is sterile music.
more the pity then that Mr. Schmitz sh have wasted his art and skill upon it;
as has already been suggested, it pr for him a rather thankless task. Of technical excellence and musical of his playing, much might be said.

is no longer a new story, and the tion of it may well be deferred until heard again in music more worthy o powers.

After so much that, in one way o
other, failed to stir and interest, French Suite of Roger-Ducasse seem veritable masterpiece of modern m which it actually is not. Nor is it particularly individual, but it is ch ing and well made, melodious and liantly orchestrated. The Overture amplitude and stride, and it and the lier Bourrée and Menuet are str rhythmed, while the "Recitatif et Ai in striking contrast to them. Of al music of the afternoon, this latter m ment, with its pensively haunting ures, made the deepest impression. In single performance which the Suite ceived ten years ago by the heavy-han
Mr. Fiedler, the music lost not a littl its lightness and distinction, and yes day it made a far better impression.
long-credited dogma that only Ger conductors can properly interpret Ger music has been pretty thoroughly proved, yet nowadays we are furni with abundant evidence that French sic receives its fullest and most cha teristic voice only at the hands o Frenchman.
W. S.

TRANS. JAN. 22

WAGNER PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Montaux, its regular conductor, at the second Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. Particular attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 3.30.

LASHANSKA IS TO BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the 13th pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 28 and 29, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott and a Faust overture by Richard Wagner. As soloist at these concerts, Mme. Hulda La-shanska will make her Boston debut. In New York she made her professional debut several years ago in Carnegie Hall. She will sing Tamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute "and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

RECORD JAN.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at ton Symphony Orchestra, 13th pro Second Symphony, Dvorak; "Two caglias," Cyril Scott; aria from Zauberflote," Mozart; "Depuis from "Louise," Charpentier; Overture," Wagner. Soloist
Lashanska, soprano.

COMPOSERS, CONDUCTORS, SINGERS, BOLSHEVISTS

Pity the Plight of Malipiero, Who Will Not "Stay Put"—Rare Gervase Elwes—Mme du Carp, Earnest and Monotonous Pianist—The Soviets Decide Who Shall and Shall Not Write Music—Mr. Toscanini's Return to Boston — Impending Programmes

FORTUNATE and unfortunate is Malipiero in concert-halls hereabouts. None of the "new Italians" has had such frequent place upon programmes in Boston and in Cambridge; none, except Respighi with the tone-poem of the Roman fountains, has made so auspicious a beginning. When Mr. Rabaud set Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" in the Symphony Concerts, when Mr. Monteux repeated the piece, the music made no small impression. It was moody, emotional, alive with stress and pang. It suggested a tense, introspective, almost self-torturing quality in a composer who seemingly spoke from the depths of his spirit. As individual, strained and darkling was the tonal speech that Malipiero chose. Now, it is our American habit to expect that an artist—poet, painter, musician, actor, what not—will continue in the way in which he has first interested and impressed us. Since "Pauses of Silence" was a sombre music, wrung, as it seemed, from the composer, ever afterward must Malipiero beat high and run deep in the concert-room.

The Italian is a man like the rest of us. Consequently he has other minds and moods. Being composer, he may even express them in music. In fact he did so in the two sets of "Nature-Pictures" ("Impressioni dal Vero") that Mr. Monteux and Mr. Bodanzky have lately included in their programmes: in the quartet for strings, "Madrigals and Grotesques," Playd last week in Cambridge. With surprise audiences heard him musingly minded over the woods in autumn; writing music of the whirr and sheen of the forest in summer; setting the night-wind to drive the cypresses in ghostly round; hearing bells across hazy distances; catching the spirit of rustic merrymaking. Moreover, as he translated these images and sensations into tones, he hinted at Italianate melody; used no more than the lighter idiom of the modernists in fanciful pieces. Where, where, was the soul-wrung Malipiero crying his pain in a strained and darksome speech?

So, again, with the quartet for strings—often written in the clear, sharp accents of Italian song, alternating light music of the folk in antic play with a gentler but no less transparent music of longing, using his medium skilfully, fancifullly, but with no exceptional invention and in no unusual manner. Therefore, weighings, scruples, doubts, among the curious in new men, matter, manners. Is Malipiero, they ask themselves and each other, so rare and remarkable a composer as we believed him after "Pauses of Silence"? Possibly the time is too early and the material too scant for judgment. At least, however, we can all agree that he is a composer of more than one voice and aspect. To be so has advantages. It even upsets preconceived opinions.

H. T. P.

TRANS, JAN. 13.

LITTLE HACKNEYED MUSIC IN PROGRAM

Schubert, Bruch, Haydn in Unfamiliar Pieces

Miss Menges Scores a Triumph as a Violin Virtuoso

Mr Monteux put together for yesterday's Symphony concert a program of numbers from the repertory of the orchestra, none of which has had frequent performances in the past. Schubert's overture in the Italian style and Haydn's "Military" Symphony were both last heard in the season of 1899-1900. Bruch's first concerto has been chosen by only eight previous soloists in 40 years. There have been five performances of Debussy's "La Mer," the only piece on the list which was at all familiar to the present generation of concert goers.

Shubert wrote much seldom-heard music for orchestra. Only the thrice familiar symphonies in B minor and C major are usually played, in fact. Although yesterday's overture can scarcely be called great music it is interesting and tuneful. One would like to hear more of the unknown Schubert.

The Haydn symphony is one of his best, superior to the oft heard "Surprise." The performance might have had more subtle dynamic gradations throughout. The slow movement would gain by being taken as a military march instead of as a song without words.

Isolde Menges, who made her first concert appearance in Boston as soloist in Bruch's concerto, is another great violinist to add to one's bewilderingly long list of admirable fiddlers still in their 20's. No woman since the late Maud Powell has played here with such phenomenal technique and sound musicianship combined. This generation may lack great singers, it has almost a surplus of great violinists.

The Bruch concerto is a tuneful show piece of the sort turned out in pro- by Wieniewski and Vieuxtemps. longer take Bruch t composer. It is hat although Bruch "patriotic" in Ger- mporary Saint-Saens ring the late war, y music," nobody pro- concerto yesterday en a bri- But there s with less cert, how- more pre- for many

---

Mr Monteux, whatever his shortcomings, deserves more credit than he is likely to get for his success in remolding the orchestra. If everyone did not have memories of bygone excellences, which neither he nor the present players on the whole can yet equal, his work would meet more heartfelt appreciation.

BLOBE. JAN. 15.

Beethoven, Franck, and Two Young Moderns from Mr. Monteux—Mr. Toscanini to Return Once More—The Flonzaleys Again — Novel Pieces from the Musical Association — Rakhmaninov Returns—Miscellaneous Recitals

AGAIN Mr. Monteux is minded to an eighteenth-century symphony—Beethoven's first, in C major—to begin the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The music actually dates from the early years of the nineteenth, but in voice and spirit, it belongs to the days of Haydn and Mozart. Modern is the second half of the conductor's list: Franck's tone-poem, "The Djinns"; a Passacaglia by Seth Bingham; the French Suite of Roger-Ducasse. According to the title-page, a poem of Victor Hugo about Djinns—good, evil and wandering spirits of earth and air in Arab verse, tale and fancy—suggested Franck's music, but in the score itself there is little hint of such verse. The piece contains an elaborate piano-part to be played by Mr. Schmitz, the Parisian pianist, already heard and liked in Boston at the Symphony Concerts and in recitals of his own. Mr. Bingham is a young and little known American composer, who now teaches music at Columbia College in New York. His Passacaglia—an ancient form that has tempted Cyril Scott among the moderns—is music of diverse voice and mood developed from a motiv recurring in the bass. Roger-Ducasse's Suite was first heard in Boston in Mr. Fiedler's time. It runs in an Overture, Bourrée, Air and Minuet—a spirited and well contrasted music by a French composer of these days, not too often heard either in France or in America.

TRAN. JAN. 15.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will comprise Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; Cesar Franck's descriptive symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," which will be given for the first time at these concerts, with E. Robert Schmitz as pianist; a "Passacaglia," by Seth Bingham, the American composer, which will have its first public performance on this occasion, and the "Suite Francaise," by Roger Ducasse.

ADVERTISER-JAN 16

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 12th program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be headed by Beethoven's First Symphony in C major. Cesar Franck's descriptive symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," will be performed for the first time at these concerts. The important piano solo part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist. A "Passacaglia," by Seth Bingham, the American composer, will have its first public performance on this occasion. The concert will close with the "Suite Francaise," by Roger-Ducasse, which consists of an overture, bourree, recitative and air, and minuet.

HERALD JAN. 16

Boston Symphony Programme

The twelfth regular programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon, Jan. 21, and Saturday evening, Jan. 22, will be headed by Beethoven's First Symphony in C major. Cesar Franck's descriptive symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," will be given for the first time at these concerts. The important piano solo part will be played by Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist. A "Passacaglia," by Seth Bingham, the American composer, will have its first public performance on this occasion. The programme will close with the "Suite Francaise" by Roger Ducasse, which consists of an Overture, Bourree, Recitative and Air, and Minuet.

Wagner for Pension Fund Concert

The second pension fund concert of the season, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux, on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, will be an unusual musical event of the season, in that the programme will consist entirely of the music of Richard Wagner.

POST JAN. 16.

JAN. 16. POST.

The twelfth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on January 21 was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major; Bingham, Passacaglia (first performance); Franck, "Les Djinns"; Roger-Ducasse, Suite Française. E. Robert Schmitz played the piano part in the Franck piece.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven symphony was the outstanding feature of the afternoon. He never sought to imbue the music with an importance foreign to it. All was grace and lightness, and this work of Beethoven's youth, so full of promise of the great genius to be revealed in the compositions of his maturer years, was presented with all the freshness and charm so native to it.

Bingham's passacaglia for orchestra is a magnified exercise in counterpoint. It inspires awe when one reflects on the immense amount of labor involved in the writing of it. If the object of music is to display mathematical ingenuity, this passacaglia is undoubtedly an important composition. Those who look for something more in music will probably find it but dry stuff indeed. Why, in a country so full of poetical ideas and impulses as America, do so many of its native composers seek their inspiration in the abstruse contrapuntal of Reger and his followers? Bach, the greatest contrapuntist of them all, contrived to express emotion in spite of his counterpoint. But then, scarcely one of Bach's fugues would pass muster in a conservatory as an example in "the strict style." The Suite Française by Roger-Ducasse is agreeable music. It is facile, sounding no great emotional depths, and brilliantly orchestrated. Franck's "Les Djinns" was adequately interpreted by Mr. Schmitz. Excellent artist that he is, one regretted that he had not the opportunity to display those qualities, for which he is justly admired, to better advantage.

MONITOR JAN 22

MID-SEASON CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Work of American Given—Schmitz, Pianist, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Schmitz played the piano part in Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns." The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's 1st symphony; a "Passacaglia" by Seth Bingham, a young American, an organist and a graduate of Yale University, who was present in person to respond to the applause of his composition, and Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Francaise."

NOT A DISPLAY LIST

The programme was not one calculated to display to the greatest advantage the capabilities of the conductor and the orchestra. The more noticeable was the interest given to compositions which were not of exceptional importance, the musicianly care for detail, the brilliancy and the technical finish, the tonal glory of the orchestra which Mr. Monteux has developed.

Thus Beethoven's early symphony was made arresting because of the unexpected interest of inner parts and of passages which ordinarily sound old-fashioned, if not commonplace. But why any longer play the symphony? The First symphony is not Beethoven. The Second is, and the Third is one of the greatest of the nine. If we want the style of music presented by Beethoven's first symphony why not play Haydn or Mozart, whose G. minor or C major symphonies are far superior to this one. And yet—there was a day when the opening chords of this first symphony of the youthful Beethoven, chords known and used and introduced with like freedom by inexperienced students of harmony today, were savagely attacked and held up by critics as matter for distrust or ridicule.

Not Franck at Best

Franck's piece is not representative of the composer either. Just why so admirable a musician and so brilliant a virtuoso as Mr. Schmitz should have elected to play this work it is hard to understand. Once in a while there is heard the voice of Franck. Elsewhere it is orchestral racket. When the piano enters with a theme which as a theme of thanksgiving for the passage and the disappearance of the demons of Hugo's poem, we recognize the organist of St. Sulpice.

To say that Mr. Schmitz made of his part as much as could be made of it is merely to state the fulfilment of expectation. But again, why the selection? At best the piano part of "Les Djinns" is an obligato part of a symphonic work and not a concerto, while the work is not a work in itself worth while.

Bingham's "Passacaglia"

Nor can we wax enthusiastic over Mr. Bingham's "Passacaglia." It is brilliantly scored and in that way effective. But we cannot feel that the composer feels natural in this music. It seems mathematically planned. The theme of the Passacaglia appears fussed over. It offers certain facilities for development and variation which the composer no doubt planned carefully, if not fussily. But where is the spontaneity, or the "developments" which develop as though nothing else could happen under God's shining sun?

One of the best places is a variation in which the harmony is most conventional. Listening to that, one queries whether all this elaborate counterpoint and somewhat d'Indyesque d'Indy was one of Mr. Bingham's teachers—this d'Indyesque treatment is not unconsciously artifical, unconsciously assumed by the composer of whose seriousness and idealism there can be no doubt. But respectable intentions do not make good music, and this music is respectable enough to have originated in Boston instead of New Jersey. O for a really wild strain from Camden or Passaic! It is true, nevertheless, that the audience called Mr. Bingham twice to his feet, and that he accepted this applause with a pleasure as unfeigned as his modesty.

Ducasse's Suite

After all, the most entertaining and natural music—barring Beethoven—was that of Roger-Ducasse. It is not great music. It is not deep. It relies over much on sequences and other musicians' tricks. But it has movement, life, rythm, gaiety which is French.

It is clearly written and orchestrated in a frequently piquant manner. And it was beautifully played by Mr. Monteau and his men.

POST JAN. 22

AN unfamiliar Symphony by Dvo the second, in D minor, leads Monteux's programme for the S phony Concerts of next Friday aftern and Saturday evening in welcome sub tution for the hackneyed "Symphony f the New World," usually the beginning the end of the Bohemian composer on s occasions. Then follow two short Pas caglie for Orchestra by the Englishm Cyril Scott, now on visit to this country music already heard and variously judg in other cities and Wagner's sombre a stirring "Faust Overture" not too oft reappearing at Symphony Hall. Betwe whiles, Mme Lashansha, the one pupil Mme. Sembrich, to keep place in the co cert-hall will sing airs from Mozart opera, "The Magic Flute," and Charpe tier's music-drama, "Louise."

Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, in Sympho Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orche tra for the increase of its Pension Fu for disabled or retired members. Mr. Mo teux will conduct and, for the first time some years, the programme will consi wholly of Wagner's music—for the m part from his operas.

TRANS. JAN. 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Apathetic Afternoon with None Too Interesting a Programme—Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra Excel Themselves with Early Beethoven — Thin-Voiced Franck Thick-Voiced Bingham, and, Finally, th Clear, Bright Tones of Roger-Ducasse

Not often, within easy recollection, has an audience at a Symphony Concert seemed so indifferent toward conductor, music, and even soloist, as did that of yestreday afternoon. Only at the discovery of Mr. Seth Bingham, thrice called upon to acknowledge the applause at the end of his Passacaglia, was there any display of enthusiasm. For the rest, through Beethoven's First Symphony, which began the concert, through César Franck's "Les Djinns,' in which Mr. Robert Schmitz played the accessory piano-part, and even through most of Roger-Ducasse's "Suite Française"—far and away the most interesting music of the afternoon—the apathy continued. Undoubtedly some of this indifference can be laid to the general lassitude occasioned by the thermometer's violent reaction from the recent "cold snap," but the "weather-man" should not be made to bear all the blame. The fact is that Mr. Monteux has a second time put together a rather dull programme—the one really bright spot in it the aforesaid Suite by Roger-Ducasse.

Surely the days of the first of Beethoven's symphonies are numbered, if they are not already told. It was many years ago that Berlioz, one of the most appreciative of all commentators on Beethoven's music, said of the piece, "This is not Beethoven." Nor is it, save in the Minuet, and in certain passages here and there in the other movements. There is a pleasing dignity in the introductory Adagio, once a stumbling block to the pedants because of the tonality of its opening chords, but the Allegro and the amiable Andante are for the most part colorless music, without the light charm, the peasant gaiety of Haydn, the Grecian purity of Mozart, or the robustness and depth of Beethoven himself. The Minuet—it is really a Scherzo—is still fresh and vigorous, though the once celebrated Trio seems now overpraised; and there is a bright cheerfulness in the Finale—though Berlioz found it childish—that still gives a mild pleasure. The performance was in every way admirable—clear, supple, beautifully proportioned and euphonious. Mr. Monteux has never been so fortunate in his reading of the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart as in this symphony of the youthful Beethoven which somewhat resembles them. And so far as the playing of the orchestra was concerned, little that it has done this year has given so happy an augury of return to its former technical perfection.

Mr. Bingham's Passacaglia received yesterday its first public performance. From the all-informing programme-book we learn that the composer's name has appeared in the concerts of the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society of New York, the Barrère Ensemble and the Little Symphony. Yet for all that he cannot be considered one of the better known among even the younger American composers, and for that reason Mr. Monteux deserves the more credit for giving his Passacaglia a hearing. With every wish to be kind to Mr. Bingham it is not easy to grow enthusiastic over his piece. There is in it an abundant display of scholarship, skill in counterpoint, in thematic transformation and, though to a less degree, in orchestration. It is commendably vigorous and straight-forward, and at times there is a pleasing richness of effect—and yet the breath of life seems not to be there. It is more than ten years since this Passacaglia was composed and surely Mr. Bingham, who is still a young man, must look upon it somewhat as an exercise in composition. The great difficulty in the treatment of the Passacaglia form as it is ordinarily understood lies in making the numerous short episodes appear congruous and relevant. That Mr. Bingham has done this with the same success as, for example, Brahms in the Finale of his Fourth Symphony, cannot be admitted. But his intention appears to have been slightly different; with the deliberate adoption of rhythmic modifications and changes of tonality, the resultant effect is more that of a theme and variations than of a single unified movement. The chief shortcoming of the piece is its frequent thickness, which at times comes perilously near to clumsiness.

"After the Poem of Victor Hugo"—so runs the sub-title of César Franck's "Les Djinns"; and the irreverent will add "a long way after." For a few measures there is a suggestion of the flight of evil spirits, but after the piece is once under way the composer seems more concerned with the technical problem of adjusting and combining the piano and orchestra—one which he worked out far more successfully in his later "Variations Symphoniques." But Franck, even at his feeblest, is always an interesting craftsman, and this Symphonic Poem is not without a certain elegance; it has its moments of effectiveness. Yet on the whole it is sterile music. The more the pity then that Mr. Schmitz should have wasted his art and skill upon it; and, as has already been suggested, it proved for him a rather thankless task. Of the technical excellence and musical beauty of his playing, much might be said. But is no longer a new story, and the repetition of it may well be deferred until he is heard again in music more worthy of his powers.

After so much that, in one way or another, failed to stir and interest, the French Suite of Roger-Ducasse seemed a veritable masterpiece of modern music, which it actually is not. Nor is it especially individual, but it is charming and well made, melodious and brilliantly orchestrated. The Overture has amplitude and stride, and it and the lighter Bourrée and Menuet are strongly rhythmed, while the "Recitatif et Air" is in striking contrast to them. Of all the music of the afternoon, this latter movement, with its pensively haunting measures, made the deepest impression. In the single performance which the Suite received ten years ago by the heavy-handed Mr. Fiedler, the music lost not a little of its lightness and distinction, and yesterday it made a far better impression. The long-credited dogma that only German conductors can properly interpret German music has been pretty thoroughly disproved, yet nowadays we are furnished with abundant evidence that French music receives its fullest and most characteristic voice only at the hands of a Frenchman.

W. S. S.

S. JAN. 22

WAGNER PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Montaux, its regular conductor, at the second Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. Particular attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 3.30.

LASHANSKA IS TO BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the 13th pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 28 and 29, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott and a Faust overture by Richard Wagner. As soloist at these concerts, Mme. Hulda Lashanska will make her Boston debut. In New York she made her professional debut several years ago in Carnegie Hall. She will sing Tamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

E ORD JAN.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at ton Symphony Orchestra, 13th pro Second Symphony, Dvorak; "Two caglias," Cyril Scott; aria from Zauberflote, Mozart; "Depuis le from "Louise," Charpentier; Overture," Wagner. Soloist, Lashanska, soprano.

MME. HULDA LAS

Will Make Her Bo

Soloist at the Boston S

certs Next W

HERALD JA

SYMPHONY PRO

Madame Hulda Lasha prano, will sing for th Boston as soloist Symphony Orchestra n ternoon and Saturday e ary 28 and 29. Pierre conduct Anton Dvorak's phony in D minor, glias," by Cyril Scott, "Faust Overture." Mada will sing Tamina's aria zart's "Magic Flute" an Jour" from Charpentier's

ADVERTISER

PENSION FUND

A program consisting e tions from Richard Wa dramas will be played b Symphony Orchestra, und teux, at the second pensi cert of the season in Sy Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. will begin at 3 o'clock inst

BOSTON SYMP

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, ly will sing for the first tim with the Boston Symphon next Friday afternoon an evening. Mr. Monteux w Dvorak's Second Symphony less frequently played in A the "New World" Sympho especially high repute in Eu will also be played Two Pas Cyril Scott, and Richard Faust Overture." Madame will sing Pamina's aria fro Magic Flute" and "Depui from "Louise."

HERALD J

Wagner at Pension

A programme consisting selections from Richard music dramas will be played Symphony Orchestra, und Monteux, its regular conduc second Pension Fund conc season in Symphony Hall Su noon, Feb. 6. Particular a called to the fact that this c begin at 3 o'clock instead of hour of 3:30.

ston Symphony Prog

Madame Hulda Lashanska will sing for the firs time when she appears the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon and Jan. 28 and 29. Pi will conduct at these co Dvorak's Second Symph less frequently played i the "New World" sy of especially high repute There will also be pla caglias, by Cyril Scott, composer, and Richard Overture." Madame looked upon as one of the recent years. The la training has taken plac where Madame Sembr most distinguished teacher so she made her publ seasons ago at Carne occasion caused surp siasm on the part of the Since then her fame to other cities maturing. The numbe sing with the orche s aria from Mozart's and "Depuis le Jou tier's "Louise."

POST JAN

GATED HARVEST

WEEK-END

Symphony Orchestra E Music—Familiar Depe Copley-Plaza — Quasi-N Handel and Haydn Socie Pleasing Singer—An to"—Impending Progra

HERE is no occasion to with the Symphony Saturday evening. I pleasure to a

TIGHT BINDING

the composer's name has apn the concerts of the New Haven ony Orchestra, the Philharmonic So-
New York, the Barrère Ensemble Little Symphony. Yet for all that not be considered one of the better
among even the younger American ers, and for that reason Mr. Mon-serves the more credit for giving his aglia a hearing. With every wish kind to Mr. Bingham it is not easy enthusiastic over his piece. There t an abundant display of scholar-skill in counterpoint, in thematic rmation and, though to a less den orchestration. It is commendably
s and straight-forward, and at here is a pleasing richness of ef-nd yet the breath of life seems not there. It is more than ten years his Passacaglia was composed and Mr. Bingham, who is still a young must look upon it somewhat as an e in composition. The great diffin the treatment of the Passacaglia
s it is ordinarily understood lies in the numerous short episodes apcongruous and relevant. That Mr.
m has done this with the same suc-
, for example, Brahms in the Finale
Fourth Symphony, cannot be ad-
But his intention appears to have lightly different; with the deliberate on of rhythmic modifications and s of tonality, the resultant effect is hat of a theme and variations than single unified movement. The chief oming of the piece is its frequent ess, which at times comes perilously
o clumsiness.

er, the Poem of Victor Hugo"—so
he sub-title of César Franck's "Les
"; and the irreverent will add "a way after." For a few measures is a suggestion of the flight of evil
, but after the piece is once under he composer seems more concerned
he technical problem of adjusting and ning the piano and orchestra—one
he worked out far more successfully
s later "Variations Symphoniques."
ranck, even at his feeblest, is always teresting craftsman, and this Sym-
Poem is not without a certain ele-
; it has its moments of effectiveness.
n the whole it is sterile music. The
the pity then that Mr. Schmitz should wasted his art and skill upon it; and,
s already been suggested, it proved
m a rather thankless task. Of the ical excellence and musical beau

s playing, much might be said. But longer a new story, and the repeti of it may well be deferred until he is d again in music more worthy of his rs.

ter so much that, in one way or anr, failed to stir and interest, the ch Suite of Roger-Ducasse seemed a able masterpiece of modern music—
h it actually is not. Nor is it even enlarly individual, but it is charm-and well made, melodious and brillly orchestrated. The Overture has itude and stride, and it and the live-Bourrée and Menuet are strongly hmed, while the "Recitatif et Air" is striking contrast to them. Of all th ic of the afternoon, this latter move
t, with its pensively haunting mea
, made the deepest impression. In th le performance which the Suite r ed ten years ago by the heavy-hand Fiedler, the music lost not a little lightness and distinction, and yeste
it made a far better impression. Th
g-credited dogma that only Germa
ductors can properly interpret Germa
sic has been pretty thoroughly di
ved, yet nowadays we are furnishe
h abundant evidence that French mu receives its fullest and most charac
stic voice only at the hands of nchman.

W. S. S.

TRAN. JAN 22

WAGNER PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Montaux, its regular conductor, at the second Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. Particular attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 3.30.

LASHANSKA IS TO BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the 13th pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 28 and 29, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott and a Faust overture by Richard Wagner. As soloist at these concerts, Mme. Hulda Lashanska will make her Boston debut. In New York she made her professional debut several years ago in Carnegie Hall. She will sing Tamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

RECORD JAN. 2

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. Second Symphony, Dvorak; "Two Passacaglias," Cyril Scott; aria from "Zauberflote," Mozart; "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise," Charpentier; "Faust Overture," Wagner. Soloist, Hulda Lashanska, soprano.

MME. HULDA LASHANSKA
Who Will Make Her Boston Debut as Soloist at the Boston Symphony Concerts Next Week.

HERALD JAN.23

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Madame Hulda Lashanska, lyric soprano, will sing for the first time in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 28 and 29. Pierre Monteux will conduct Anton Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, "Two Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott, and Wagner's "Faust Overture." Madame Lashanska will sing Tamina's aria from Mozart's 'Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour" from Charpentier's "Louise."

ADVERTISER JAN.23

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, at the second pension fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of 3:30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, lyric soprano, will sing for the first time in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, less frequently played in America than the "New World" Symphony but of especially high repute in Europe. There will also be played Two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, and Richard Wagner's "Faust Overture." Madame Lashanska will sing Pamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise."

HERALD-JAN.23

Wagner at Pension Concert

A programme consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor, at the second Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. Particular attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 3:30.

Boston Symphony Programme

Madame Hulda Lashanska, lyric soprano, will sing for the first time in Boston, when she appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 28 and 29. Pierre Monteux will conduct at these concerts Anton Dvorak's Second Symphony in E minor, less frequently played in America than the "New World" symphony, but of especially high repute in Europe. There will also be played Two Passacaglias, by Cyril Scott, the English composer, and Richard Wagner's "Faust Overture." Madame Lashanka is looked upon as one of the discoveries of recent years. The larger part of her training has taken place in New York, where Madame Sembrich was her most distinguished teacher. In that city also she made her public debut several seasons ago at Carnegie Hall, and the occasion caused surprise and enthusiasm on the part of the musical public. Since then her fame has been spreading to other cities and her artistry maturing. The numbers which she will sing with the orchestra are Tamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour" from Charpentier's "Louise."

POST JAN 25

VARIEGATED HARVEST FROM THE WEEK-END

The Symphony Orchestra Excels Most of Its Music—Familiar Dependables at the Copley-Plaza—Quasi-Novelty from the Handel and Haydn Society—Miss Howell, Pleasing Singer—An "American Concerto"—Impending Programmes

THERE is no occasion to be severe with the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. It gave placid pleasure to a somewhat smaller [illegible] sembles. Once more came clear token of the progress of the orchestra along the course to which Mr. Monteux deviatingly and tirelessly holds it. Good to hear were its plasticity, euphony and transparency of tone in Beethoven's first symphony; its sprightly progress and light, lithe accents in Roger-Ducasse's French Suite. Rather, the concert, like that of the week before, missed the exhilaration of the ten predecessors by none too stimulating a programme. Beethoven's eighteenth-century Symphony was a bit too much of music of a period after Haydn's Military Symphony seven days before. Franck's tone-poem of "The Jinns" is more industrious than inspired; and if we are to hear Regerian music thick with counterpoint and a multitude of instrumental voices seldom stilled and rarely parted, Reger himself—say in the Hiller Variations—is more to be desired than the plodding Mr. Bingham of the Passacaglia. The champions of American composers because they are American assert that mediocre French and German pieces find place in symphony concerts in the United States. They surely do; but so also do mediocre American numbers; while nationality in all three instances is scant soothing to the chafing listener. As in the week before a piece resurrected from the repertory was savor to the concert—Roger-Ducasse' French Suite, deft and compact, fertile spirited and for ten years—the more the pity!—left on the shelves. Perhaps it is too much to ask of Mr. Monteux a stirring programme every week; the best of us sag in a long job; but he himself set the pace and valiantly.

TRANS. JAN. 24

PENSION FUND CONCERT

At the pension fund concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6, at 3 o'clock, the programme in detail is now announced as follows: Prelude to "'The Mastersingers," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhauser," and the Bacchanale as added by the composer for the first production of that work in Paris, in which the chorus of singers will be members of the Cecilia Society, trained for the occasion by Agide Jacchia. There will also be played "The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyries," the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," strikingly sad music in which there is a brilliant English horn solo, one of the most famous passages ever written for that beautiful instrument, and finally the excerpts from "The Ring," "Siegfried's Passage Through the Circle of Fire to Brunnhilde's Rock," from the third act of "Siegfried," and the "Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey of Siegfried," which makes the prelude to "The Dusk of the Gods."

POST JAN. 26

THERE WILL BE 101 IN ENSEMBLE

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Concert Here on Feb. 20.

SPECIAL TRAIN IS HIRED

First Appearance of Full Orchestra in 10 Years.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Brockton, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 20, in the City Theatre, will be the first appearance of the full orchestra of 101 men in this city for 10 years. That a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert may be an annual event here is the desire of the managers, W. H. Brennan and G. E. Judd. Such cities as Lawrence, Lowell, Providence, Lynn and Haverhill are already included in the itinerary of cities visited by the orchestra, and it is hoped Brockton may be added to the list.

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor.

The concert promises to be exceptional. The orchestra ensemble will be composed of 101 musicians, with Pierre Monteux, conductor, regarding whose ability and personal magnetism musical critics have only words of admiration, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster and violin soloist. Mr. Burgin is already known to Brocktonians, having appeared with Mme. Florence Ferrell in a recent concert in City Theatre.

That the coming of the orchestra to Brockton is a task for which an army general might be particularly fitted is evidenced by the arrangements.

Special Train Is Engaged.

There will be a special train to convey the orchestra to and from Brockton, permission for which was secured through the State board of public utilities, A. A. Highlands secretary. Three applications were also necessary before the concert could be given, one the local permit signed by Mayor Keith.

There will also be a baggage car and two baggage men in addition to the passenger car and with the orchestra Manager Brennan and Judd, the conductor, librarian, and others, will include a personnel of nearly 125.

The afternoon hour, the concert to commence at 3:15, continuing for two hours, was felt to be more satisfactory than the evening. This will be more advantageous to out of town patrons who are beginning to turn to Brockton more and more for good concerts and will not conflict with evening events in the city proper.

The special number on the programme, which will be one of the orchestra's best, will be Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, "From the New World," Op. 95. This remarkable symphony was written by Dvorak on returning from America. In his composition he embodied American motifs in music, especially the famous negro spiritual, "Swing, Low Sweet Chariot." In the four movements of the symphony some characteristic American musical themes are brought out. A horn solo is a feature.

The "Tannhauser" Overture.

Other numbers will include Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," which in the series of pop concerts given last season by the orchestr was second in the demand for request numbers. The famous "Concert for Violin in E Minor," Op. 64, by Mendelssohn, will be given and "Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A Major, O 11, No. 1.

Some of the principal artists of th orchestra, several of whom have a peared here are Alfred Holy, eight season as first harp; Albert San seventh season as first clarine Georges Mager, second season as fir trumpet; Ferdinand Thillois, third se son as leader of second violins; Ca Hampe, 29th season as first trombone; Georges Longy, 23d season as firs oboe; Julius Theodorowicz, second season as second concert master; Stefan Neumann, 11th season as firs tympani; George Wendler, 12th season as first horn; Georges Laurent third season as first flute; Jean Be detti, second season as first 'cello; Max Kunze, 10th season as first bass; Abdon Laus, third season as firs bassoon.

BROSKTON-ENTEPRISE
JAN 27

AFTER MANY DAYS CARPENTE BALLET-MUSIC

"The Birthday of the Infanta" to Played by the Symphony Orchest
The Hoffmann Quartet from Smetan Schumann—Vaughan Williams's "L
don Symphony" Near—Mr. Mengel Carries the Day—Items, Incidents, O ions

AT last Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," will be heard, though not seen, in Boston. From the music for the stage he has drawn a Suite for the concert-hall, to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week. If recollection and information do not slip, he has made few material omissions in this transfer, so that we shall hear, virtually "in entirety," the venture of a highly individual American composer into a field little cultivated by his fellows. By common consent, moreover, "The Birthday of the Infanta" is new witness to the progress of Mr. Carpenter in firmness of hand, fineness of means and scope of imagination. As he writes in this Ballet, as he wrote in the preceding Symphony, he has broadened and deepened from the days of the early Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator" and the subsequent Concertino.

Of course music for the stage is music for the stage, and at Symphony Hall, there will be no miming by Mr. Bolm and the other dancers, no settings and dresses by Mr. Jones. As many will recall, we were to see as well as hear "The Birthday of the Infanta" when the Chicago Opera visited Boston a year ago. A storm that held Mr. Bolm at New Haven, the bunglings of the "office-man" then director (sic) of the company and the indifference of the "local management" defeated the announced or any subsequent performance. Now, thanks to Mr. Monteux, comes a measure of compensation. When the Suite was played by the Chicago Orchestra a month or more ago, Mr. Carpenter divided it as follows:

I. Introduction—[illegible] of the Infanta—Children's Dance—Arrival of the Guests—The Gypsy Dance.
II. The Bull Fight.
III. Entrance of the Dwarf—The Fatal Dance—The Tragedy—The End.

while, for the programme, he wrote the following "Argument," as felicitous in another way as the gladsome preamble to "Adventures in a Perambulator." Behind both ballet and "Argument," lies, of course, the story by Oscar Wilde of like title with the music:

The little princess, dressed in a costume of the Velasquez period, emerges from the palace alone. She is sad and depressed. She is convinced that her birthday has been forgotten. But she is interrupted by her old and ample nurse, who comes to prepare her for the great surprise. Almost at once the children, her birthday guests, begin to arrive—in twos, in fours, and finally in one gay and noisy flock. They run, they dance, they play. At the climax of their excitement a trumpet, a signal, is heard from behind the scene. Eager curiosity! Something is going to happen! A strange procession marches upon the stage. First come two enormous major-domos, with clothes and gesture bizarre and alike. They are followed by a file of solemn servants, each bearing a birthday gift, covered with mysterious wrappings, but large and satisfying.

The spectacle begins. First there are gypsy dancers, followed by a juggler and a tight-rope walker, a curious pair, the one tall and meagre, the other short and much too fat for his delicate profession. Then follows a bull fight, the best kind of all, a make-believe one with boys on hobby horses and a wonderful bull in plush.

Then comes the climax of the party. A weird and fabulous creature is brought in. He has been caught in the forest, and appears grotesque and misshapen. He is the last offering at the feast. At first he is timid and shy. His dance is one of strangely shifting moods, of fear and confidence. But in the end he achieves a dance of wild and absorbing abandon. The children applaud wildly, and the princess in her excitement throws her handkerchief to the fantastic. He is filled with extraordinary emotion. He wonders if it is a sign that she has found him beautiful. He wonders if, may be, she loves him.

The cook now comes out, a great, fat creature, carrying a birthday cake with sixteen candles. There is great excitement among the children, and they follow cook into the palace. Pedro, the fantastic, cannot bear to be left alone. He follows and is repulsed by the major-domos. It is growing dark, so he clambers up to the palace windows. The scene changes; but the music does not stop, and almost at once Pedro is seen entering one of the palace chambers. It is gloomy. He can barely see. Suddenly he sees something coming toward him. He stops. It stops. Pedro has never seen a reflection, but suddenly the terrifying consciousness comes over him that this monstrous grotesque image may be his own. He holds up the handkerchief, and lo! it too appears before him. This is the last blow. He recalls with inner agony the effect he must have made on the princess. He repeats his dance only in perverted form, in the way he thinks it must have seemed to her, and he falls broken hearted and dies. The children are seen in the background passing the door as they play some game. Finally they come in, but they do not see the prostrate form. But the princess enters and at once detects the huddled shape of Pedro lying in the shadow to one side. She steals up quietly to his side and kneels. She makes a mute appeal. Finally she touches the handkerchief in his hand, but finding no response, starts back in horror and slowly steals away.

Programmes in Prospect

Since Mr. Carpenter's Ballet-Suite longish, only two other pieces stand u
Mr. Monteux's programme for the S phony Concerts of next week: Schuma Symphony in C major, in which he s the happiness he was lucky enough find in marriage, and Beethoven's Conce
for Piano and Orchestra in C minor w
Mr. Levitzki taking the solo-part. Usua conductors and pianists overlook this C certo—the third in the series—but w Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Levitzki and the tional Symphony Orchestra played it other day in New York the audience to it.

Clearly Mr. Monteux's programmes are whetting interest again—this week with Mr. Scott's two Passacaglie; next week with Mr. Carpenter's ballet; and, before long, possibly on Feb. 25 and 26, with the celebrated "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams—vivid, eloquent, atmospheric music, both largely and finely written. In British music of the day, it is second only to Elgar's Symphonies and of far different matter and manner. When Mr. Coates and the Damrosch Orchestra played it in New York last month, two audiences were equally illuded and impressed.

NEW SOPRANO HEARD AT SYMPHONY

Two novelties appeared on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirteenth of the present season, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, soprano, sang for the first time in this city, and two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, the English composer, were given their first performance in Boston.

Besides the latter, the program included Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Wagner's "Faust" overture and two operatic arias, sung by Mme. Lashanska, Pamina's aria from Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

Mme. Lashanska, favorably known here by reputation, was enthusiastically greeted, but the applause which welcomed her first appearance was slight compared with that which broke forth at the end of her first number. She has voice of extraordinary beauty, rich and smooth in the middle and lower registers, clear and pure in the higher. The song from "Louise" has been given very few performances here comparable to that of Mme. Lashanska; nor should the performance of the orchestra be passed by without special mention. The singer was recalled again and again.

Enthusiasm marked the entire program. The Spanish dances by Mr. Scott were of unusual interest, the first especially striking, brilliantly orchestrated and brilliantly performed. Mr. Scott, who was in the audience, was forced to respond to the applause after Mr. Monteux had shown the audience by signs where he was sitting.

Both director and players were warmly applauded after the fine performance of the symphony, and the conductor summoned the meen to rise and share honors with him.

1962 | MASS. 578

AMER. JAN 29.

Boston Notes

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on January 28. The following was the program: Dvořák, Symphony No. 2 in D minor op. 70; Scott, two passacaglias; Mozart, Air of Pamina from "The Magic Flute"; Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"; Wagner, a Faust overture. Hulda Lashanska was the soloist.

The revival of Dvořák's second symphony was a happy thought on the part of Mr. Monteux. It added another to the long list of such revivals for which we cannot be too grateful to him. This symphony does not show the lapse of time as much as might be expected. There is a certain freshness and sincerity in the music of Dvořák which will probably cause it to outlast much of the music of his contemporaries who wrote with perhaps more method and seriousness. It is to be regretted that Dvořák's name has so long been associated with the "New World Symphony" only. Many of his other works are quite as worthy of a hearing as yesterday's performance showed. Cyril Scott's two passacaglias, performed for the first time in Boston, are hardly to be taken seriously. This does not mean that they are not delightful music to hear. The orchestral coloring is laid on with a lavish hand and the meagerness of invention is thereby concealed. Although these pieces are not unpleasantly dissonant, they do not excite the desire for an immediate rehearing. They were enthusiastically received and the composer, who was present, acknowledged the applause which his compositions brought forth. Mme. Lashanska interpreted the aria from "Louise" with much purity of tone and style. The playing of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was brilliant, and remarkable as well for its rare beauty of nuance and rhythm.

Those who attend orchestral concerts for the purpose of hearing sensational interpretations of Beethoven's symphonies, those who enjoy theatrical pianissimos and fortes, those who enjoy a thick, heavy orchestral tone quality will not be satisfied with the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the other hand, those who delight in hearing the masterpieces of the classical repertory and deserving works of our own time interpreted with exquisite taste and skill, without the intrusion of an aggressive personality between them and the music, will find these concerts a never ending source of pleasure and education.

MONITOR- JAN. 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCOTT'S MUSIC IN UNFAMILIAR VOICE

His Two Passacaghas for Orchestra Works of Imagination and Power—The Faded Wagner of "A Faust Overture"—The Fresh Dvorak of a Resurrected Symphony—Mme. Lashanska, Cool and Crystalline Singer

A TRANQUIL Symphony Concert ran agreeable course at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and naught disturbed peace and pleasure unless it was the two Passacaglias of Cyril Scott. Prolific in songs, piano-pieces and the "smaller forms" generally, he has written relatively little for orchestra in his riper years—a Concerto for Piano, a setting of Keats's ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," possibly the music-drama with which gossip credits him, and the two troublesome Passacaglias. These and the Piano-Concerto he brought with him on his present visit to the United States. The Concerto requires the presence of the composer "at the piano"; the powers at Symphony Hall preferred that he should occupy the "guest-seats" and as "the author of their being," acknowledge the applause the persistent Passacaglias won. Not only did the audience hear the composer's music; it also looked upon him; and a pleasure of the lecture-room became a pleasure of the concert-hall.

In more senses than one, persistent is the word for the two pieces. True modernist, Mr. Scott respects the chosen form. That is to say, he preserves "the subject" of each Passacaglia as faithfully as though he were writing in the eighteenth instead of the twentieth century. An Irish folk-piece—a sombre, moaning "Famine Song"—underlies the first; another folk-

TIGHT BINDING

1962 | MASS. 78

is first public performance. From ill-informing programme-book we hat the composer's name has ap-in the concerts of the New Haven
ony Orchestra, the Philharmonic So-
f New York, the Barrère Ensemble e Little Symphony. Yet for all that not be considered one of the better
among even the younger American ers, and for that reason Mr. Mon-serves the more credit for giving his aglia a hearing. With every wish kind to Mr. Bingham it is not easy
y enthusiastic over his piece. There
t an abundant display of scholar-
skill in counterpoint, in thematic rmation and, though to a less den orchestration. It is commendably
s and straight-forward, and at there is a pleasing richness of ef-nd yet the breath of life seems not there. It is more than ten years this Passacaglia was composed and Mr. Bingham, who is still a young must look upon it somewhat as an
e in composition. The great diffi-
n the treatment of the Passacaglia
s it is ordinarily understood lies in g the numerous short episodes apcongruous and relevant. That Mr.
m has done this with the same suc-
s, for example, Brahms in the Finale
Fourth Symphony, cannot be ad-
. But his intention appears to have lightly different; with the deliberate
on of rhythmic modifications and es of tonality, the resultant effect is hat of a theme and variations than single unified movement. The chief
oming of the piece is its frequent
ess, which at times comes perilously
o clumsiness.

er, the Poem of Victor Hugo"—so
he sub-title of César Franck's "Les s"; and the irreverent will add "a way after." For a few measures is a suggestion of the flight of evil
, but after the piece is once under
he composer seems more concerned
he technical problem of adjusting and
ning the piano and orchestra—one
he worked out far more successfully
s later "Variations Symphoniques."
ranck, even at his feeblest, is always
teresting craftsman, and this Sym-
Poem is not without a certain ele-
, it has its moments of effectiveness.
n the whole it is sterile music. The
the pity then that Mr. Schmitz should wasted his art and skill upon it; and,
s already been suggested, it proved
m a rather thankless task. Of the

ical excellence and musical beau
s playing, much might be said. But longer a new story, and the repet of it may well be deferred until he i d again in music more worthy of his
rs.

ter so much that, in one way or anr, failed to stir and interest, the
ch Suite of Roger-Ducasse seemed a
able masterpiece of modern music—
h it actually is not. Nor is it even icularly individual, but it is charm-
and well made, melodious and brilly orchestrated. The Overture has itude and stride, and it and the live
Bourrée and Menuet are strongly
hmed, while the "Recitatif et Air" is striking contrast to them. Of all th
ic of the afternoon, this latter move
t, with its pensively haunting meas
, made the deepest impression. In th
le performance which the Suite r ed ten years ago by the heavy-hand
Fiedler, the music lost not a little lightness and distinction, and yeste
it made a far better impression. Th
g-credited dogma that only Germa
ductors can properly interpret Germa
sic has been pretty thoroughly di
ved, yet nowadays we are furnishe
n abundant evidence that French mu receives its fullest and most charac
istic voice only at the hands of enchman.

W. S. S.

TRAN JAN 22

WAGNER PROGRAM FOR PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Montaux, its regular conductor, at the second Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. Particular attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 3.30.

LASHANSKA IS TO BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the 13th pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 28 and 29, Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott and a Faust overture by Richard Wagner. As soloist at these concerts, Mme. Hulda Lashanska will make her Boston debut. In New York she made her professional debut several years ago in Carnegie Hall. She will sing Tamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute "and "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise."

RECORD JAN. 2

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. Second Symphony, Dvorak; "Two Passacaglias," Cyril Scott; aria from "Zauberflote," Mozart; "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise," Charpentier; "Faust Overture," Wagner. Soloist, Hulda Lashanska, soprano.

MME. HULDA LASHANSKA
Who Will Make Her Boston Debut as Soloist at the Boston Symphony Concerts Next Week.

JAN. 26

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Madame Hulda Lashanska, lyric soprano, will sing for the first time in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 28 and 29. Pierre Monteux will conduct Anton Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, "Two Passacaglias," by Cyril Scott, and Wagner's "Faust Overture." Madame Lashanska will sing Tamina's aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "Depuis le Jour" from Charpentier's "Louise."

ERTISER JAN

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, at the second pension fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. The concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of 3:30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Hulda Lashanska, lyric soprano, will sing for the first time in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Second Symphony in D minor, less frequently played in America than the "New World" Symphony but of specially high repute in Europe. There will also be played Two Passacaglias by Cyril Scott, and Richard Wagner's "Faust Overture." Madame Lashanska will sing Pamina's aria from Mozart's Magio Flute" and "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise."

HERALD JAN.

Wagner at Pension Concert

A programme consisting entirely of selections from Richard Wagner's music dramas will be played by Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor, at the second Pension Fund concert of the season in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Feb. 6. Particular attention is called to the fact that this concert will begin at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 3:30.

Boston Symphony Programme

Madame Hulda Lashanska, lyric so-ano, will sing for the first time in oston, when she appears as soloist
th the Boston Symphony Orchestra xt Friday afternoon and Saturday ening, Jan. 28 and 29. Pierre Mon-ux will conduct at these concerts Ann Dvorak's Second Symphony in E nor, less frequently played in Amerithan the "New World" Symphony, ut of especially high repute in Euope. There will also be played Two assacaglias, by Cyril Scott, the Eng-sh composer, and Richard Wagner's Faust Overture." Madame Lashanka looked upon as one of the discovries of recent years. The larger part f her training has taken place in New ork, where Madame Sembrich was er most distinguished teacher. In that ity also she made her public debut everal seasons ago at Carnegie Hall, nd the occasion caused surprise and nthusiasm on the part of the musical ublic. Since then her fame has been
